So perfectly he gets the spirit of the composition he might himself have inspired it. When the movement is light and graceful he moves in graceful unison with it, if the theme is of sorrow and despair, dejection seems to settle upon him, in fiery passages his movements are galvanic. Sometimes he doesn't move at all. Thru whole passages, when simple and smoothly running, no gesture was perceptible to the audience. Koussevitzky makes no meaningless or superfluous motions.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a master at program-making. No Boston Symphony concert here has been so varied, so finely balanced, without a dull or uninteresting moment. The Symphony (by Haydn, in G Major) was melodious and its four movements were short. The three following numbers were very short. The closing two numbers of Wagner—the enraptured audience hardly noted whether they were long or short, but only knew they wanted more.

This symphony was in a happier vein than most that are presented. An outstanding feature was the Largo, a beautiful melody, sung by the master oboe player, Longy, and the cellos, with an undertone of violas, double basses, bassoon and horn. The finale was most cheerful, a gay rondo built on the theme of a peasant country dance. Gorgeously colorful was the "Roman Carnival" overture, by Berlioz, played by the full orchestra. It had an exquisite opening of horn solo, the air then taken up by the violas. The carnival spirit worked up in flamboyant display of pagan jubilation with fascinating effects of tambourines, cymbals and triangle, and the kettledrums never too much in evidence. Koussevitzky certainly knows how to conduct a triumphant climax.

While the "Carnival" was in rich and glowing colors, Moussorgsky's "Prelude to Khowantchina," which followed it, was a tone picture in pastels, depicting in delicate tones and subtle shadings, with soft lovely undertones, the coming of dawn. Wind instruments and strings predominated, with dainty harp arpeggios, and an instrument new to most of the audience, a tam-tam. It conveyed with subtle magi wonderment and awe which panies the daily miracle of the s rise.

It was "The Flight of the Bum Bee," from the "Fairy Tale of T Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakov, t Conductor Koussevitzky respond to the overwhelming applause a gave an encore. The same th happened recently in Boston, wh he broke a Boston Symphony pr cedent of forty years. It is odd an fanciful, rather than beautifu but a truly wonderful bit of mus cal description. The various instru ments, mingled in sound imitatin the bee, seemed to come from on composite instrument.

Over the two Wagnerian numbers, one might enthuse to great length. Mr. Koussevitzky is equally at home with the old masters and the very modern composers, but he impressed many Wednesday evening as the ideal interpreter of Wagner. With lavish prodigality of instrumental color and sound he gave rein to the wild revelry and tumultuous seductions of the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser," conducting, with consummate art, the transition indicating the victory of the Graces over mad passions.

His crowning achievement was an inspiring presentation of the Prelude from the "Meistersingers," with all the splendor of the full orchesta of more than a hundred players and a conductor who loses not a bit of the nobility of theme and grandeur of form. All thru it ran the love theme, one of the most beautiful lyrical melodies Wagner has written, voiced by oboe, clarinet, flute and horn, alternating with pompous episodes, and breaking forth into a thunderous explosion of the brasses, with martial rhythm. And this mighty fanfare brought the concert to a close in one of the most spontaneous outbursts of applause ever heard here.

Special cars to Lewiston and Auburn and other outlying towns, took home delighted crowds of patrons who were of unanimous opinion that this was the best concert the Boston Symphony has ever given in Portland.

Herald
Mar 26

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Scriabin's "Prometheus: A Poem of Fire," for orchestra, chorus, piano and organ, will be performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night. Mr. Koussevitzky, who was closely associated with Scriabin, brought out this tone-poem at Moscow on March 15, 1911. The first performance in the United States was by the Chicago orchestra on March 5, 1915. Scriabin wished the music to be accompanied by a color keyboard; that is to say, colored lights were to be thrown on a screen in conjunction with the music. Thus note C was to be represented by the color red; G by rosy orange, D by yellow, etc. At Moscow this keyboard was not ready, or it refused to work. The first use of it was in New York, when the Russian Symphony orchestra performed "Prometheus" on March 20, 1915. The result was not effective. To watch the colors and hear the music at the same time was distracting. "Prometheus" was written when Scriabin was a confirmed mystic, and wished to compose music in theosophic terms. His hero is not the Prometheus of Aeschylus or Shelley.

For this performance the piano will be played by Alexander Lang Steinert; the organ by Mr. Snow of the Symphony orchestra, and the wordless chorus will be sung by the Cecilia Society.

This society will also sing the various choruses of the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The choruses have been performed in Boston, but not at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The other pieces on the program are Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, and Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which has already been performed this season.

* * *

The Symphony program for next week comprises Foote's Suite, E major, for strings; Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" (about 600 A. D.); Schumann's Piano Concerto, Germaine Tailleferre's Concerto for piano and orchestra, Franck's "Wild Huntsman." The pianist will be that admirable artist, Alfred Cortot.

* * *

Myra Hess will play Beethoven's piano concerto in G major at the fourth extra concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday night. The program will also include Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Dance of the Seven Veils, from Strauss's "Salome."

* * *

For the concert of this orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday night (April 2) is this program: Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; Franck's "Wild Huntsman"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Salome's Dance.

* * *

Notes and Lines:

I am from the country. I live in Concord, Mass. I went to the Symphony concert in Boston last week. I liked it. I should not say that Mr. Koussevitzky was a conductor. The man with gold on his cap and coat who took the tickets at the door seemed to me more like a conductor. Koussevitzky, who made the orchestra start and stop and turned on the electric juice was the motor man. I may be wrong.

C. H. P.

* * *

---

anscript
ar. 27

in Prospect

r. Koussevitzky for the concert mphony Orchestra in Sanders
Cambridge on Thursday evening

n F major, No. 6, "The Pas- ....Beethoven the Incidental Music to Shak-
Play, "A Midsummer Night's ....Mendelssohn

Prelude to the Opera, "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Salome's Dance from the Opera, "Salome," Strauss

From Mr. Koussevitzky for two concerts of the Symphony Orchestra to young people at Symphony Hall on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7:

Overture to the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding" Mozart
Allegretto Scherzando from the Eighth Symphony ....Beethoven
Procession to the Cathedral from the Opera, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Dance of the Blessed Spirits from the Opera, "Orpheus" ....Gluck (Flute: Mr. Laurent)
Three Numbers—Chinese Dance; Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy; Trepak—from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" ....Chaikovsky
Fantasia for Harp ....Saint-Saëns (Harpist: Mr. Holy)
Tone Poem, "Finlandia" ....Sibelius

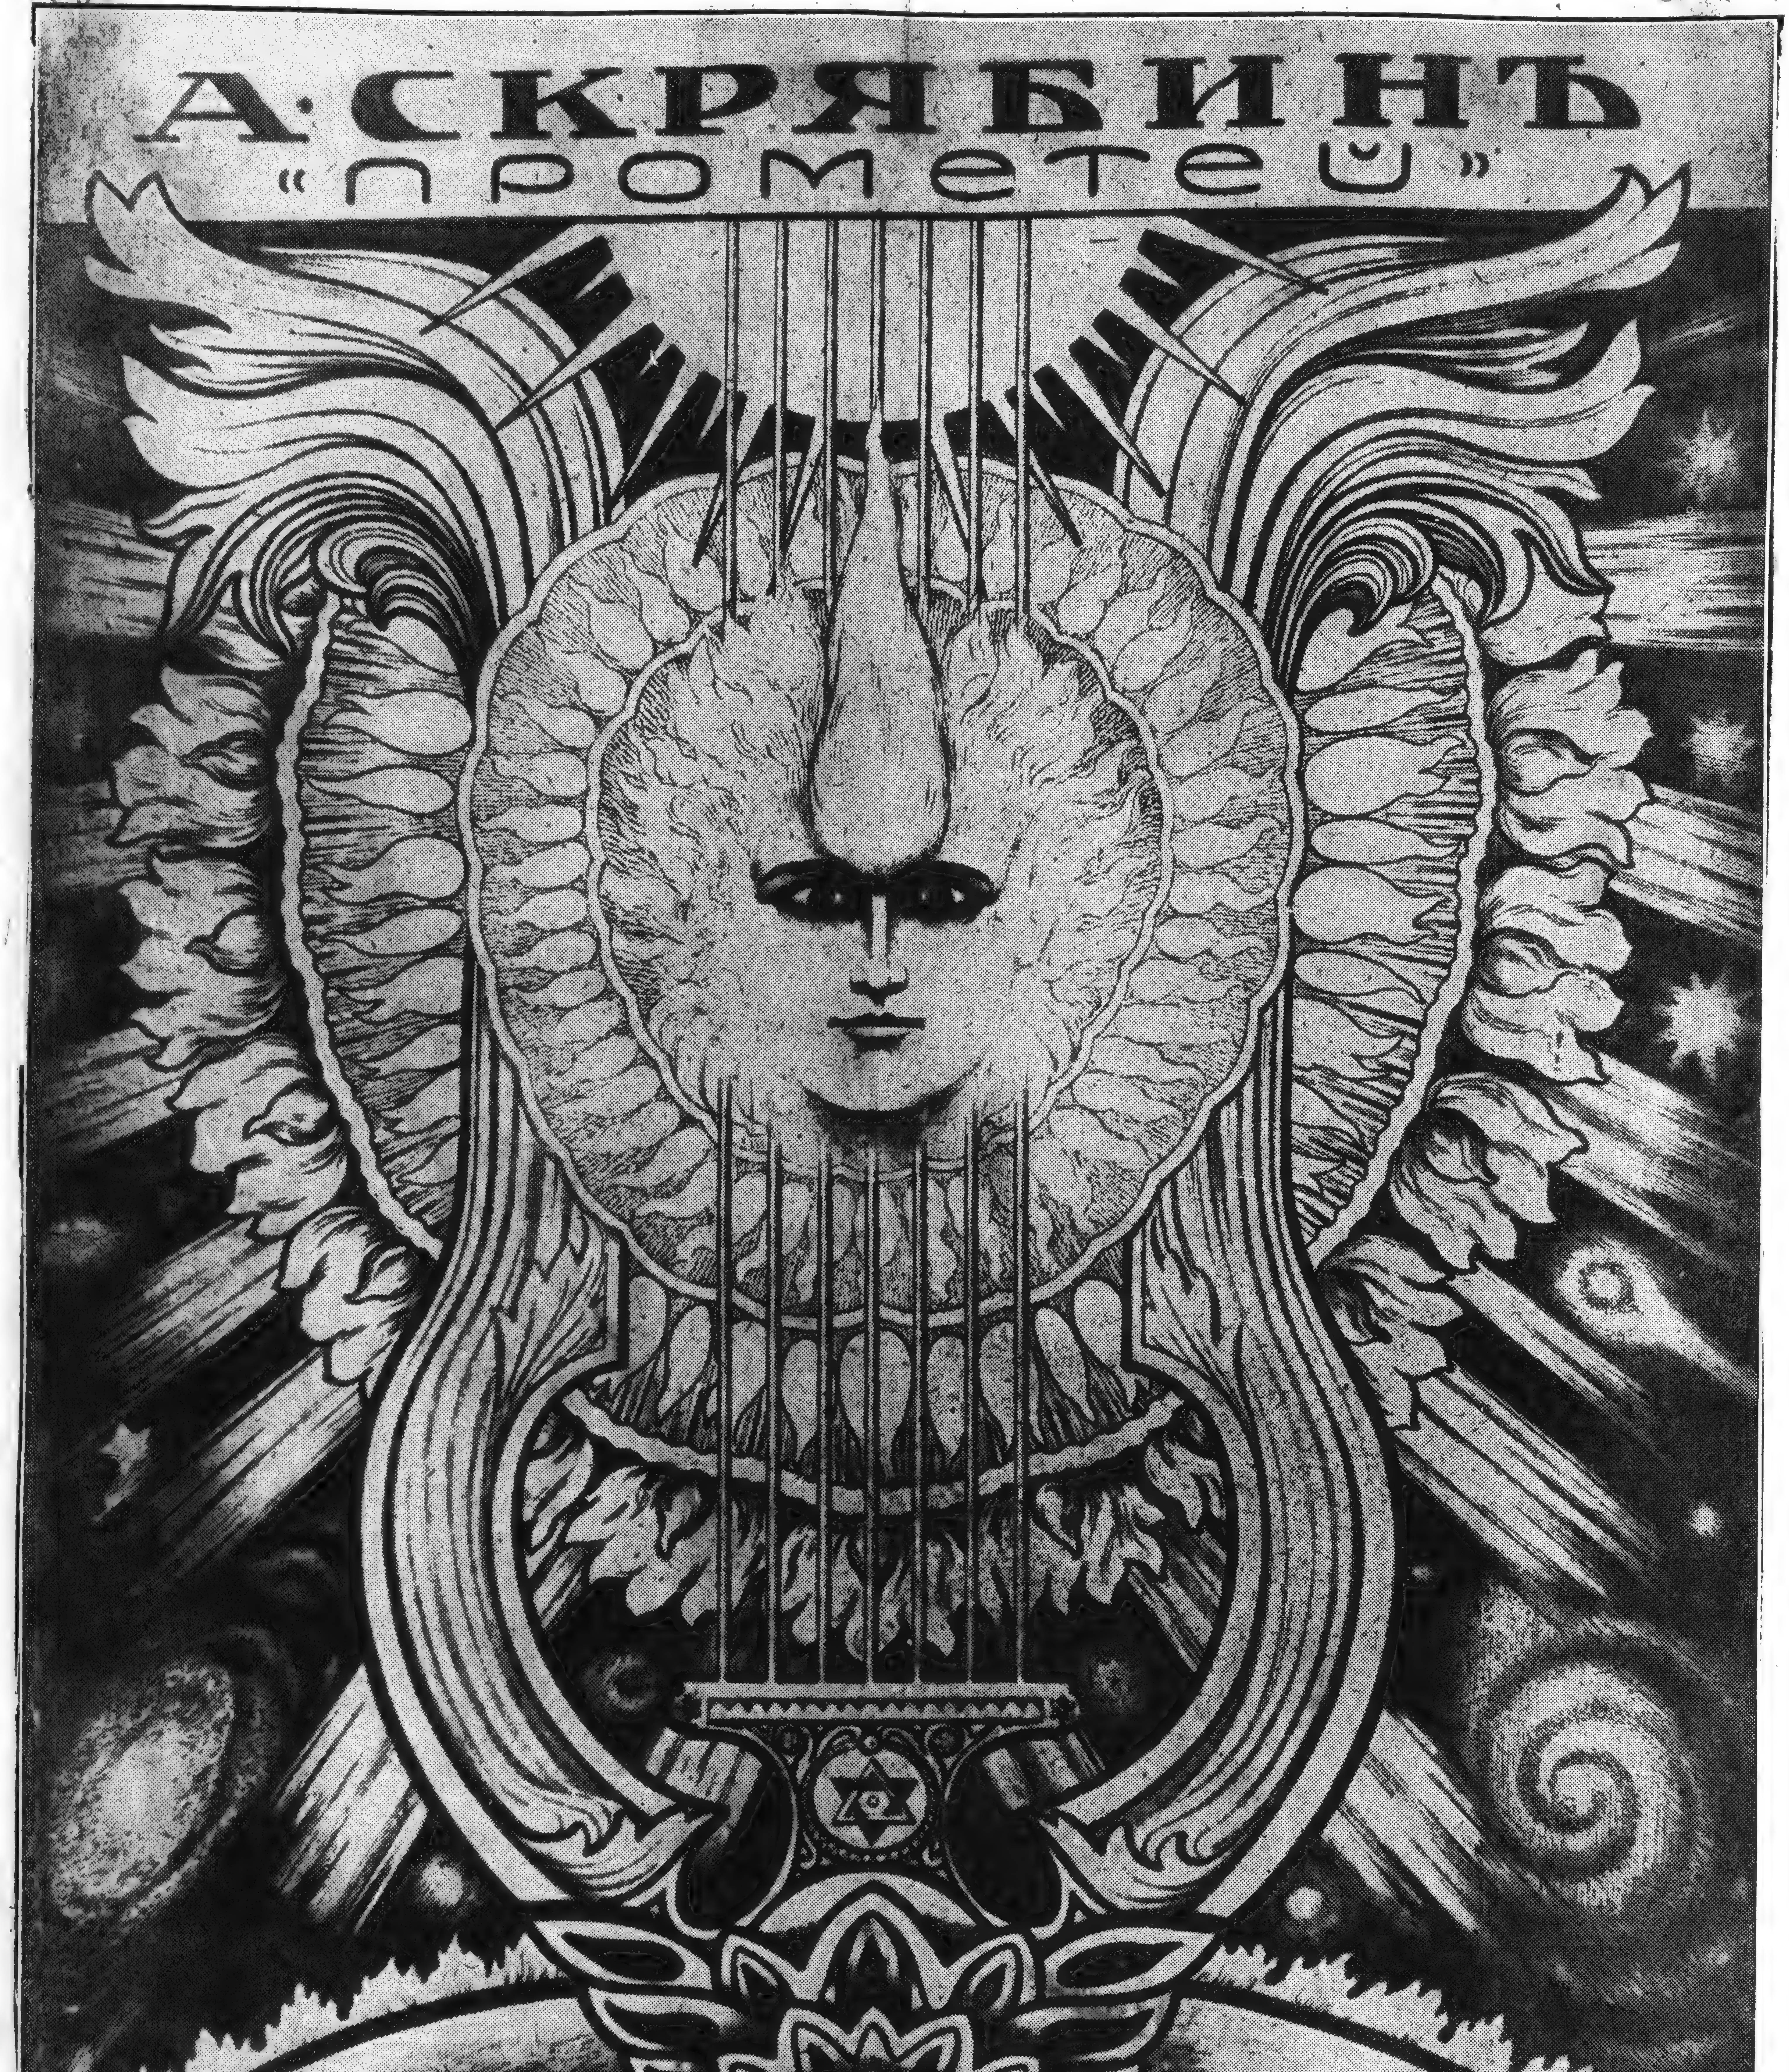
From Mr. Martino for the concert of ancient music played by the Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 5:

Concerto da Chiesa............Dall' Abac
(Piano, Organ, Orchestra)
Sonata ....Scarletti
Gavotte ....Bach
Sonata for Flute and Piano............Bigaglia
Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, No. 9. Handel
(Organist: R. G. Appel)
Suite, "Dolorosa" ....Scheidt
Pastorale Veriée ....Mozart
Gavotte ....Martini
Sonata for Flute, Oboe, Bassoon and Piano. Marini
Largo from "Xerxes"—Hallalujah Chorus from "The Messiah" ....Handel

Transcript

Pierced With the White Radiance of Eternity

Mar 28



А·СКРЯБИНЪ
«ПРОМЕТЕЙ»
JEAN DELVILLE
ДЛЯ 2ХЪ Ф-П.
РОССІЙСКОЕ МУЗЫКАЛЬНОЕ ИЗДАТЕЛЬСТВО·БЕРЛИНЪ·МОСКВА·С·ПЕТЕРБУРГЪ

Cover Design for the Full Score of Skriabin's "Prometheus"

Made by the Belgian Theosophist, Jean Delville. It Represents the Titan as "A Son of the Flame of Wisdom" Surrounded by Theosophical Symbols

([illegible]script Photograph by Colby from the Copy in the Brown Music Library)

71

Transcript
Mar 28

SKRIABIN'S ECSTASY, BORODIN'S WILDNESS, CHORUS UP-SWELLING

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY ON ANOTHER HEYDAY

At Last He Joins Choir and Orchestra—The Polovtsian Dances for the First Time with Singing Voices—"Prometheus" Searched Deep and Carried High but to Mixed and Changeful Outcome—Incidents of the Concert

TWO DESIRES of Mr. Koussevitzky now stand fulfilled. He has joined a chorus to the Symphony Orchestra and led them both. He has conducted in Skriabin's tone-poem, "Prometheus," and given the music such voice as, in America, it had never known before. (When, some years ago, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra played the piece, they were by no means at their present prowess.) From the day in which Mr. Koussevitzky considered a term in Boston, he has wished for a chorus. He is accustomed to a choir at his command—of old in Moscow, more recently in Paris. He has a penchant for symphonic pieces in which composers, classical or modern, include voices among their instruments. He is disposed to reserve one or more concerts in a symphonic series for the performance of music, primarily choral. Thus he is eager to outpour his version of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony upon Bostonian ears. And thus he would willingly surrender a pair of Symphony Concerts—or a pair outside the regular order—to performances of Honegger's oratorio, "King David."

The trustees and the management have no mind to revive the notable choir of Dr. Muck's final year. They balk, indeed, at the assembling, schooling and maintenance of any Symphony Chorus as such. They are quite willing, however, to call to the conductor's aid any organized and resident choir that may meet his needs. Sooner or later the public of Symphony Hall will hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony from Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra and Dr. Davison's collegiate singers; while yesterday for the voice-parts in "Prometheus" and for the songs accompanying the Polovtsian Dances in "Prince Igor," the choir of The Cecilia was at hand.

In Skriabin's tone-poem the chorus is neither frequent nor significant. From end to end the piece is intrinsically symphonic and orchestral, with the piano hardly less an intrusion than the massed voices. The composer uses them only to swell the ecstasy and heighten the radiance of the pages designed as incandescent close. They sing mere vowel sounds—meaningless unless the hearer knows the incantations of theosophy; while, as it seemed yesterday, they tended to clog the ardors and dim the lusters of the music. And through no fault of the choir. Mr. Lang, on the part of The Cecilia, had schooled it thoroughly. It was responsive to Mr. Koussevitzky. In excellent form, it missed neither quality nor volume of tone. Rather the fault lay with Skriabin scheming and writing these final measures. The voices indeed swelled the tonal mass; but, as it seemed, they also deadened the orchestral impact. Above the end of this "Poem of Fire" glowed in memory the molten fervors that are climax to the "Poem of Ecstasy."

On the other hand, the singing voices added not a little to the graphic and the musical quality of the scene from "Prince Igor." Borodin's music is not fully itself outside the opera in which it is written. Not that it depends upon preceding or following pages; on the contrary, it is essentially episodic. It does, however, need the setting of hill and plain, Tartar camp and Tartar folk—the light, the color, the visible motion of the dancers, the visible presence of the watching princes, chiefs and tribesmen. Boston, as it happens, is a "metropolitan" and a "musical" city where opera flourishes annually through exactly twelve evenings and four matinées, while the ballet is virtually unknown. Nor is "Prince Igor," after the dubious experiment at the Metropolitan ten years ago, likely to regain place in any American repertory. Therefore, we hearers of yesterday may return thanks that, at last, the Polovtsi were vocal as well as instrumental; that their choruses, especially when the women's voices sang them, added materially to the native wildness, the rhythmic frenzy, the tribal tumult.

The chorus of dancing girls was bright with motion and folk-flavor; the men's chorus, as usual with The Cecilia, la[illegible] pulse and sonority, despite the conductor's urgings; in the "general chorus," however, with Borodin's music for additional goad, there were shoutings and stampings. Needless, almost, to say, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled in this tribal music of a barbaric folk. He whipped it into a pervading turbulence; he caressed it into passing languors. Rhythms beat firm and keen and high. Full-throated and warmly colored sounded the song. The dance whirled and darted. At Borodin's and the conductor's will, Eastern tribe leapt its license and cried its loyalty as barbarically as Western measure may permit. The smell of earth is in Borodin's music; from it a pagan voice outflings; often, under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, it sweats blood and fire.

To listen to Skriabin's "Prometheus" as to an "absolute" music was to be prey to many sensations. Themes or motivs there are, discoverable, recognizable, recurring, less impressive in themselves than generating and fruitful source of the music to come. Skriabin labelled some of them. He obviously intended them to suggest emotional states or metaphysical concepts. They did to him, inventing them in spiritual excitement, brooding long and deep upon them. The listener across Symphony Hall is less impregnated and far less stirred. . . . For a while Skriabin's singular, self-invented and self-chosen chordal and harmonic system engages mind and ear. Soon it becomes dry and monotonous; while before the end of a relatively short tone-poem, it seems narrow and cribbing, willed and artificial. The composer becomes as a man that persists in one dialect of a universal speech—and that of his own devising. . . . Furthermore the progress of the music diffuses no melodic glow; whips with no vivid rhythms; depends for the most part upon the advance or recession of waves of tone and upon the instrumental color playing over them.

Everyone accustomed to mountain-walking knows the false summits (so-called) of a long ascent. Each seems the topmost height; yet above it rises another, with relative levels between. So does Skriabin order the course of his tone-poem. Upon it, moreover, he distributes a considerable variety and richness of color. The instruments of a vast orchestra sound group by group in individualized and impinging voice; or are marshalled into a massy and manifold whole. A pianoforte part, perceptively, sensitively and anxiously played by Mr. Alexander Steinert, summoned for the occasion, contrasts with the other timbres or sets new edge upon them. Wide is the range of this tonal coloring—limpid or darkling; pale or aglow; thick-massed or shallow upon the ear; deepened or sharpened—epitome of orchestral palettes at the turn of the century, not without pigments of the composer's own. "Prometheus" is a richly colored music in insistent motion. As such, and only as such, does it impress "in the absolute."

Skriabin, however, intended the tone-poem to be much more than an "absolute" music. To him, and as he would have it to others, it was expression of faith and aspiration, release and ritual of the soul, mystical and mounting ecstasy into communion with the Infinite. For him, it began as an earth-bound, and ended as a celestial, music. As Promethean "Sons of the Flame of Wisdom," under the guidance and the compulsion of "The Creative Will," we mortals gradually put off human dross; break through earthly trammels; plane by plane ascend into the bliss of spiritual energy and spiritual radiance. It is not necessary to clutter this soulful progress with the tenets or the jargon of Theosophy, in which Skriabin was an ardent believer. Enough that this spiritual aspiration, conflict, ascent and attainment is ancient, honorable, kindling and passioning matter for music. The substance changes; the surface alters; but within remain the longing and striving, the attainment and the beatitude.

Each hearer may only know for himself how far "Prometheus" evokes this mystical passion; unfolds this ardent progress: attains this fervid and radiant exaltation. There are those—and they are not all either Russians or mystics—whom this music of "Prometheus" searches, stirs and uplifts. There are those as well—and they are neither dull of mind nor insensitive of spirit—whom it leaves quite cold: a palpitating frenzy of inchoate orchestral sound and impotent emotional fury; a music signifying nothing. Between, the hearer, who would listen neither too detachedly nor dispassionately, who would keep an eager and a receptive ear, must walk—and write—exceeding warily. May not we others, who find ourselves in this Laodicean congregation, burning neither hot nor cold, be left to our moments of emotion—when the theme of "The Creative Will" becomes a tongue of fire upon the music; when, for instants, it swims in some stilled and limpid pool of passing bliss; when, for other instants, it bursts its shackles like the Prometheus who was also Titan; would scale the skies; dwell mayhap in the quivering domes of ecstasy

For Skriabin, by the very token of his temperament, could write these occasional pages of inspiration. By that same temperament, he also writes twice as many pages of spiritual balderdash, tonal inflation, musical monotony. And we Laodiceans with "Prometheus" suffer them but coldly. Fourteen years ago, to a month, Mr. Koussevitzky in Moscow was the voice and the prophet of Skriabin, sounding for the first time the measures of this crowning and final tone-poem. He was not less yesterday when he renewed every fervor; heightened and deepened every eloquence upon an orchestra molten to his hand. Yet where Skriabin flags or is but resounding void, spent and empty must also go they who speak for him.

Incidents of the afternoon complete the record. First, the playing by the string choir of four divisions of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major—familiar music of large stride and resonant voice, of mellowed and up-curving song, of swift figures and sturdy strands interwoven; music, besides, in which the players have more than once proved their collective and individual valor. Second, a repetition within a short six weeks of Monsieur Rabaud's musical marshallow, "La Procession Nocturne," as sweet upon the aural palate of many a listener as once were Signor Respighi's now forgotten Roman Fountains. Third and last, the loud and long ado over young Mr. Steinert presented by the conductor, applauded by the audience, as one who had done feats and wonders of pianistic prowess. Not often is a pianist, added to the orchestra, "one of ourselves." That felicity—and the consequences—usually fall to composers.

H. T. P.

(A Reproduction of the Cover Design to the Full Score of Skriabin's "Prometheus" Appears on Page Nine of Part Three)

Monitor
Mar 28

Boston Orchestra Plays 'Prometheus'

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its twentieth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Handel—Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major for String Orchestra
Scriabin—"Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," for Orchestra and Piano with Organ and Chorus op. 60
Rabaud—"La Procession Nocturne "Symphobic Poem after Lenau op. 6
Borodin—Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" for Orchestra and Chorus

Alexander Lang Steinert played the piano part in Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor.

Of course the outstanding event of the afternoon was the performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus," which was played for the first time in Boston. A composition built on such a large scale, and utilizing effectively, as this one does, such a large array of musical forces, is bound to make a powerful impression, at least on a first hearing. The mass of sound produced by such a body of performers is in itself almost overwhelming. It arouses enthusiasm. The question of course is, "Is the music itself of inherent worth? Are the musical ideas beautiful? Do they stir the emotions apart from their somewhat awe-inspiring setting?"

Many Pages of Beauty

In the case of "Prometheus," the answer must be both yes and no, for there are pages of undoubted beauty, even inspiration, side by side with others in which the composer does little but mark time. Shorn of all its trappings, there is little in the thematic material of this mighty symphonic poem which may be said to be original. As in other compositions by Scriabin played here this winter, there is much evidence of Wagner's influence, and for that matter of Debussy as well, although in a lesser degree. Yet after all does this really matter? The question of originality in music has not so much to do with the material itself as with the use to which it is put. From this latter viewpoint, the genius of the composer of "Prometheus" must be unhesitatingly acknowledged. It is a stupendous conception, on the whole successfully realized.

Whatever personal preference may be in regard to music, the loftiness of this work must be conceded, as well as the mastery of its composer. There must of necessity be imperfections in a composition built on such a large scale. Whether or not a greater result has been achieved in "Prometheus" than in many another composition constructed on a much simpler plan is another question. Many perhaps will think the end does not altogether justify the means. The fact remains that it is impossible to listen to this music unmoved and after all, is this no sufficient reason for its existence?

Performance Meritorious

The performance was meritorious. All concerned gave themselves wholeheartedly to the task in hand. Mr. Steinert played the difficult piano part with a rare display of musicianship; the chorus and orchestra were more than equal to the demands made upon them. It was an artistic event long to be remembered, and Mr. Koussevitzky deserves every praise for bringing it to pass.

There were other remarkable moments during the afternoon, though perhaps less striking ones. The playing of Handel's Concerto Grosso by the strings, and of Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," was of unusual excellence. Handel's music never within recollection sounded so magnificently noble as it did yesterday, and no more poetically conceived interpretation of Rabaud's symphonic poem could possibly be desired. It was indeed a difficult problem for both conductor and orchestra to make the remaining portion of the program interesting after the thunders of Scriabin, yet it was a problem successfully solved by both. S. M.

Traveler
Mar 28

Symphony Plays Unusual Progam

This week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is short but unusually interesting. Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program that includes Handel's fifth Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra; Scriabin's "Poem of Fire," "Prometheus," Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," heard earlier this season, and the familiar Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The Cecilia Society, Malcolm Long, conductor, joins the orchestra to sing the choruses in the two Russian works, and Alexander Lang Steinert is playing the piano in "Prometheus." The concert, which was heard at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, will be repeated tonight.

"Prometheus" was played yesterday for the first time in Boston, without the color organ which Scriabin intended to accompany it. Many of the audience were surprised to find Scriabin's master-work falling as gently on the ear as Debussy does now; not even the celebrated "mystic chord" distressed the conservative. To be sure, it has had time to cool off, for it was composed 15 years ago. Music since then has gone so much farther along radical lines that "Prometheus" can now be accepted in pure enjoyment of its exquisite beauty, its poetry and mysticism, and the triumphant climax which ends it in such a blaze of glory. The performance was very brilliant. The applause was so genuinely enthusiastic, recalling the conductor again and again, that one fears Scriabin may become as popular here as he is in Russia.

The Handel concerto was played with delightful tone and crisp precision. Mr. Burgin, Mr. Theodorowicz, Mr. Fourel and Mr. Bedetti played the solos expertly.

[illegible]
Mar 28

KOUSSEVITZKY IN BRILLIANT READING

The outstanding feature at this week's Symphony's concerts is the superb presentation of Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra of Scriabin's "Prometheus," never before heard in Boston. This spectacular tone-poem, with the subtitle "A Poem of Fire," was produced for the first time by Mr. Koussevitsky at Moscow in 1911, with the composer playing the piano part. Mr. Koussevitsky's rendition must therefore be taken as authoritative.

Besides a huge orchestra and the piano, which was ably handled by Alexander Steinert of this city, the work enlists a mixed chorus, the choral work being done by the Cecilia Society.

Of the performance of this work, which is very difficult, there can only be the greatest praise. The great climax at the very end of the tone-poem, and the lesser one which precedes it a few pages before, were magnificently done. Here, too, the composer comes in for credit, for he showed what can be done by utilizing the sound-producing qualities of the orchestra. The rest of the number, at least for this reviewer, was sheer boredom. Scriabin was a wild-eyed mystic and attempted to have this music express the very essence of his philosophy, but it "didn't mean anything." Musically, the work seemed much inferior to his "Divine Poem," for example.

The program opened with Mr. Kousevitsky on his mettle in the fifth of Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra. There is no questioning the outstanding supremacy of Mr. Kousevitsky in eighteenth century music.

Post
Mar 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT A SENSATIO

Scriabin's "Poem Fire" Stupendous i Sheer Sound

BY WARREN STOREY SMI

A concert rarely enjoyable rarely stimulating was that given terday afternoon by Mr. Koussevit and the Symphony Orchestra, with substantial assistance of the Cec Society; a Symphony concert will be gratefully remembered w many another has come and gone way

SCRIABIN'S "POEM OF FIRE"

Upon this week's programme Koussevitzky has placed the Fi Concerto Grosso of Handel, the la bent and heaven-scaling "Prometheu of Scriabin, the sorrowfully beaut "Procession Nocturne" of Rabau and the superb "Polovtsian Dance from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor And yesterday, from the music Handel through that of Borodin, co ductor and orchestra quite outd themselves.

Hitherto unheard in Boston, Scri bin's "Poem of Fire," to give "Prome theus" its descriptive title, came yes terday to its initial performance Symphony Hall under auspicious cir cumstances. An intimate of the com poser, and the conductor of the origi nal performance at Moscow in 1911 Mr. Koussevitzky brings to this scor not only perfect understanding but by every sign, an almost fanatical en thusiasm as well.

To the full modern orchestra the score of "Prometheus" adds an organ a pianoforte, played yesterday by Alexander Lang Steinert, and, at the end, a mixed chorus. Swayed, animated and enkindled by Mr. Koussevitzky's fervor, collectively and severally these forces yesterday brought to pas a performance eloquent and inspire a performance that must surely ha revealed to the fullest the musical a spiritual content of this extraordina composition.

Rabaud's Work Well Placed

A shrewd stroke of programme-ma ing placed "La Procession Nocturne heard yesterday for the second tim this season, between "Prometheus" a Borodin's Dances, which then were first heard at a Symphony Concert with the choral investiture that immediately seemed essential to them. And played with transfusing and trans figuring eloquence, this tone-poem Rabaud, for once genuinely mov brought needed foil to both the r tures of Scriabin and the Tartar fur of Borodin which followed it.

Many a time has Borodin's exotic magnificently barbaric music been played in Boston, but never before with such over-powering energy, such rhy mic exhilaration. To Mr. K vitzky's fires chorus and or once again responded utterl pletely. And the mad del final episode brought a to a concert already more than us rich in tonal excitements and se tions.

Transcript

To Will, To Work, To Gain the Power

Mar 28

Serge Koussevitzky (Photograph by Garo)

In These, His Days in Boston

Advertiser Mar 28

Symphony Triumphs Again

Alexander Lang Steinert, one of the foremost of Boston younger musical artists, won a well deserved share of the ovation following the performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus" at yesterday's Symphony concert.

He played the piano part in the still lamented Russian composer's most revolutionary tone poem, which is new on Symphony programs. The Cecelia Society also assisted in one of the most stirring performances of the season.

"Prometheus" is prodigiously difficult music either to play or to follow—mystical music, written in the radical manner that made Scriabin sort of demigod among modernists. The finale is a wonderful blaze of harmony, a pyrotechnic outburst of one. It fairly stunned the audience. Then came the ovation.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who had one of e most brilliant afternoons, made e "Prometheus" performance one the memorable artistic triumphs Symphony history, equal in its ay to his interpretation of the fifth chaikovsky symphony last week. led the first performance of ometheus" in Russia 14 years when Scriabin himself played piano part.

andel's "Concerto rosso" in D jor; for string orchestra; the Posian dances from Borodin's rince Igor" and a repetition of baud's "Procession Nocturne" plete this week's program.

Traveler Mar 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The following programs are to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, in Symphony Hall:

Next Monday evening, the fourth concert of the Monday evening series, with the following program: Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major, with Myra Hess as soloist; Mendelssohn's Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Strauss's Dance of Salome.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Arthur Foote's Suite for String Orchestra in E Major; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.), which is to have itts first performance in a large orchestral versio Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, wi Alfred Cortot as soloist, and likewise Concerto by Tailleferre, the feminin member of the Parisian "six." Final Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Cha seur Maudit."

The last pair of young people's concerts will take place on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7, at 4 o'clock.

The spring pension fund concert of the orchestra will take place on Sunday afternoon, April 19.

Post Mar 29

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth of the "extra series" of Symphony Concerts takes place tomorrow evening, with Myra Hess, making her first appearance with orchestra in Boston, as soloist. Miss Hess will be heard in Beethoven's G major piano concerto, and the purely orchestral pieces announced are Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet"; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music of "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the "Lohengrin" Prelude of Wagner; and Salome's Dance from the opera of Richard Strauss.

* * * *

Compositions by two Americans will be heard at this week's pair of subscription concerts: Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, for string orchestra. Recently given as ballet with small orchestra in Chicago, Mr. Eichheim's music will now receive its first performance in the new version for large orchestra. As soloist Alfred Cortot will play the Piano Concerto of Schumann and a new Concerto by Germaine Tailleferre, the feminine member of the Parisian Group of Six. The final number is Franck's Symphonic poem, "The Mad Huntsman."

NEW YORK
WORLD

MAR 29 1925

Cecilia Hansen has been engaged to appear as soloist with Koussevitzky and his orchestra at the opera in Paris in May.

lton Announces—
Parisian appearan es. Aft., Mar.31, at 3
AL BY

Globe Mar 28

CHORUS ASSISTS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Cecilia Society Heard in Skriabin's "Prometheus"

A chorus from the Cecilia Society trained by Malcolm Lang, assisted the orchestra in two numbers at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky's well-known desire to conduct here pieces demanding the aid of a chorus at last was successfully realized. The audience applauded to the echo both Skriabin's "Prometheus" and the "Polovtsian Dances" from Forodin's "Prince Igor," and much of the demonstration was plainly intended for the chorus.

Alexander Lang Steinert, young Boston pianist and composer who has been studying in Paris, returned to play the incidental piano part in "Prometheus." Mr Koussevitzky emphasized the high value he obviously sets upon Mr Steirnert's talent by leading him to the front of the stage both before and after the performance of Skriabin's symphony and applauding him enthusiastically. The audience followed heartily the example set for it by the much-admired conductor. As far as one could judge from the very few moments at which the piano part is prominent in the symphony Mr Steinert played it excellently.

"Prometheus" bears a later opus number than either "The Divine Poem" or the "Poem of Ecstasy." Those who have made a cult of the music of Skriabin regard it as an especially great work. The composer intended that "a symphony of color rays" in which the note C is represented by red, G is rosy orange, A green, and so on should accompany the performance of this symphony. He invented a "clavier a lumieres," akin, no doubt to Mr Wilfred's "Clavilux," exhibi here at Jordan Hall last year, and the first American performance in New York in 1915 these colored lights were shown. But, in accordance with permission granted by the composer in the published score, no colored lights accompanied yesterday's performance, the first in Boston.

Nor were they needed. Mr Koussevitzky, who conducted the original performance at Moscow, at which Skriabin played the piano part, thoroughly understands this music and brought out yesterday the full nervous intensity of it. The final climax is remarkably thrilling. The curious harmonic scheme, based on a "mystic chord" which employs the interval of the fourth instead of the third, and the agonized groping for the vast, the titanic, the supernatural, that one feels underlying the music save Skriabin from the reproach of mediocrity. Yet his gift is here, as always, insufficient to sustain intense emotion throughout a whole composition. He is the imperfect genius, whose blunders no clever worldling would make, but whose rare triumphs, like the latter third of "Prometheus," no clever worldling, no Ravel, no Richard Strauss, can hope to equal.

Plainly the "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor" should never be given without chorus, though they have been so given at these concerts in past seasons. Borodin's music gains in grace and in Russian flavor by the voices, which have a great deal to do. If operatic fragments are permissable at these concerts, and about this there may well be grave doubt, these dances heard in a brilliant performance like yesterday's furnish a sonorous close to a program. Another Handel concerto grosso for strings, in D major, edited by Kogel, began the concert. Mr Koussevitzky's Handel is phenomenally effective. It was warmly applauded.

The other number was by a curious whim of Koussevitzky's Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," a repertory piece already played this season. Though agreeable music, this number is neither novel enough nor great enough to deserve two hearings a year. Nor has there been in 15 seasons at least such a repetition at these concerts of any number. Copeland's organ symphony might well have been repeated instead. One wondered in listening to the Rabaud, why Koussevitzky so often extorts coarse harsh tone from the brass.

P. R.

Globe Mar 29

(Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Fourth Monday concert. Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky; Fourth Piano Concerto, Beethoven; Scherzo from music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Dance of Salome, Strauss. Soloist, Myra Hess.

Mr Koussevitzky has made this week two symphony programs without a symphony. In each case a pianoforte concerto is the chief number. Now neither Schuman's concerto nor even Beethoven's G major concerto can be considered as the equivalent in dignity and seriousness of any first rate standard symphony. It is a mistake thus to lower the standard of the Symphony concerts. There are three novelties on the regular concert program. Two by Boston composers, Foote and Eichheim, one one by Mlle Taillefer, the feminine member of the group of "Six" young Paris composers to which Honegger and Milhaud belong.

It will be a pleasure to hear Myra Hess with orchestra tomorrow night though it is hard to see why she w asked for the Monday series and not the regular series in view of some of soloists in the latter

---

Herald Mar 28

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Much of Program Chosen by Koussevitzky New to Boston Music Lovers

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall The program was as follows: Roland-Manuel, Sinfonia from "Isabelle et Pantalon"; Borchard, "L'Elan"; Debussy-Ravel, Dance; Caplet, "Epiphany," a Fresco for violoncello and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5, E minor.

Borchard's piece, dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, was performed for the first time. Ravel's orchestration of Debussy's Dance was heard in Boston for the first time. Roland-Manuel's Sinfonia (overture) and Caplet's "Fresco" were performed, probably, for the first time in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave an intensely dramatic interpretation of Tchaikovsky's hymphony, in the only way that this symphony should be interpreted. Did the composer have a definite program in his mind? A Russian critic has declared that the music "seems to set forth some dark spiritual experience." Tchaikovsky wrote to Mme. von Meek an elaborate program for his fourth symphony. He said of the "Pathetic" that the thoughts inspiring it, if they were published, would cause astonishment.

Without conjecturing what is behind the Fifth Symphony, is not the music a human and personal document? Personal as the expression of the self-torturing Russian's dark moods, his despair, his vain attempt to come out of the shadow, and at the last a brave endeavor to be heroic, defiant of Fate. This music is a "human document" as the resounding voice of "the complaining millions of men."

The best, the only explanation of the music, if music can be, or should be, explained, is the life of the composer; his letters reveal his gloomy moments, his downcast hours, his dread of death and dissolution, his illusions, his timid hopes, his joy in creative work quenched by self-depreciation and the hostility too often shown by his own countrymen.

When in this symphony, he, seeing all things black, shrieks in his agony, the violent musical expression should not be softened, sand papered, polished by conductors standing in awe of that fetish, the symphonic form. He should be allowed to storm, rage and rave. Nor should the lighter pages be read perfunctorily, hastily passed over, as too trivial for symphonic orthodoxy.

Mr. Koussevitsky, conducting the music, revealed the composer, in his strength and his weakness. For once we heard an irresistibly emotional performance of this dramatic music: The passionate outbursts of revolt; the broad and sweeping lyric lines; the confessions of the soul, not intimate and confidential as with Schumann, but as the Prometheus of Aeschylus called on the dread majesty of his mother Earth, and the light-diffusing aether, to behold the wrongs he suffered.

The Finale, to many a stumbling block, was yesterday imposing, overwhelming.

The unfamiliar compositions were of uneven worth. Roland-Manuel's "Sinfonia" in which he epitomizes the story of his opera-bouffe, an opera in the spirit of the old Italian comedy, is delightfully ironical, with the irony of Ravel, his master, in "L'Heure Espagnole"; ironical even in the short sentimental episode that is artfully contrasted with the gay and mocking music that precedes and follows. Charming too is Ravel's instrumentation of Debussy's early piano piece.

No doubt many found Borchard's "L'Elan" pretentious, bombastic, futile. The score bears a curious, not wholly intelligible, quotation from Henri de Regnier. We are told that the composer endeavors to express "the intoxication of movement, the gesture of one stretching hands towards the Infinite." This is all very fine, but the ecstatic endeavor is too laborious. Borchard visited Boston 14 years ago as a pianist, and played so well and in such respectable manner that no one would then have suspected him of this boisterous rush towards the Infinite. Nevertheless we owe Mr. Koussevitzky a debt of gratitude for producing it. New compositions should be heard, for then one knows what to avoid in future.

Caplet's "Epiphany" pictures Melchior, one of the three wise men, following the star to Bethlehem, where, lost in adoration, he became ecstatic, and called on his little negroes to dance in honor of the divine child. (Melchior's ecstasy takes the form of a cadenza for the violoncello, accompanied only by monotonous beating on a tambourine.) This composition is interesting not only by reason of its harmonic scheme and the instrumentation; it contains passages of exquisite beauty. The first section is too long spun out, so that the effect is weakened; but the cadenza is a monologue of singular eloquence, and the dance is free from the banality of pseudo-orientalism. What a relief from the cut-and-dried violoncello concerto! Mr. Bedetti played in a masterly manner, with artistically varied expression, with full insight into the character of the music and with keen appreciation of it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major; Scriabin, "Prometheus: A Poem of Fire," for orchestra, piano (Alexander Lang Steinert), organ and chorus (Cecilia Society); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," for orchestra with chorus.

Herald
Mar 28

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Koussevitzky Offers Pieces by Handel-Kogel, Scriabin, Rabaud and Borodin

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS ASSISTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, for strings (edited by Kogel); Scriabin, "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" (first time in Boston); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Borodin, Polovsian Dances from "Prince Igor," for orchestra and chorus. The Cecilia Society assisted.

Kogel's edition of Handel's Concerto calls for two solo violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz); solo viola (Mr. Fourel); solo violoncello (Mr. Bedetti). How this music of Handel's by the majestic pomp, the solemn beauty—and simple are the means employed—the vitality stands out after nearly 200 years! How superb the introduction! It might bear for a motto that sentence in the Book of Daniel: "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." Hearing this introduction, the presto and the allegro, and the slow movement that has a tenderness and an unearthly serenity peculiar to Handel, it may be questioned whether music, after all, has progressed so greatly since Handel shook his powdered wig and threatened to throw the capricious Francesca Cuzzoni out of a window. It is not necessary to go as far as Samuel Butler, who, offering incense to his idol, battered the statues of other composers in the great temple of music; then, poor, misguided man, tried to write music in the Handelian manner; but Handel is still one of the mightiest figures in the history of music.

There was a beautiful performance of Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which was played at a concert last February. Repeated hearings lead one to wish that the mood of the first section, poetic as it is, were not so long maintained.

Borodin's Dances were performed with charm for the first time at a Symphony concert. They had been performed here elsewhere. The voices added greatly to the contrasting effects. The chorus of young girls is deliciously suave; the splendid and barbaric savagery of the males proclaiming the glory of their Khan is intensified four-fold. Thus there was a brilliant ending. Fortunately "The Nocturnal Procession" followed with the intermission the tremendous climax of the "Prometheus," so that the power of Borodin's Dances was not diminished.

Scriabins "Prometheus" is for orchestra, piano, organ and chorus. It was natural that Mr. Koussevitzky should wish to have Boston hear it. The composer was his close friend, and, as a pianist, his associate in concert tours. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of "Prometheus" at Moscow, when Scriabin played the piano part.

The composer wished this "symphony of sounds" to be accompanied by a "symphony of color rays" and so he constructed a keyboard instrument which should throw colored lights on a screen as the music was playing. This keyboard was apparently used for the first time in New York. The result was unsatisfactory. Scriabin also wished the performance to take the form of a mystical ceremony, with the chorus clad in white, as for a religious service, not a concert. In his later years his mysticism passed beyond the boundary, so for his fame as a composer, he was no doubt fortunate in his death before his projected "Mystery" found form; a work in which sounds, colors, perfumes and movement were, with the audience as celebrants, to express one "fundamental idea."

Much has been written about the psychology, the theosophical expression, the mysticism of "Prometheus." The greater part of what has been written is sheer hifalution. One does not go to a concert to observe through the ears the process of merging human, individuality in the Cosmos. A trumpet theme is not the more stirring because it typifies "The Will to create and attain." Nor is a theme that symbolizes "dawning consciousness" the more appealing by reason of an esoteric quality.

What is to be said of "Prometheus" if it is to be considered first of all as a "symphony of sounds"?

In some respects it is an advance on Scriabin's preceding orchestral poems. It is less influenced by Wagner; it has passages of more individual strength and beauty; the instrumentation is more varied, more interesting, with greater charm of coloring. The final climax—and there is a dangerous anticipation of it—is overpoweringly sonorous.

On the other hand, the music is too often diffuse and negligible. One wearies quickly of the "mystic chord." One wishes a firmer continuity, fewer episodes that say little or nothing.

The piano part was played by Alexander Lang Steinert, who left Paris, where he is studying composition, at the repeated request of Mr. Koussevitzky, to assist in the performance. The piano part, taxing by technical difficulties and sudden entrances, often inconsequential as regards musical contents, ungrateful music as a rule, was played by Mr. Steinert intelligently and, as far as the performance was concerned, effectively.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Foote, Suite, E major, for strings; Eichheim, "A Chinese Legend," (first time here); Schumann, piano con-

---

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 29 1925

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Kennard of Berlin, N. H., were guests at the Boston Symphony concert last week, coming especially for this event of rare interest. Mrs. Kennard will be remembered as Miss Mabel Swett of Casco street.

"If it hadn't been for the people up State," said a member of the music commission on Thursday, we might not have made good from the Boston Symphony concert. As it was, we did make a little money. We hope to follow the precedent of making the tickets for the Symphony low in price so that Portland people may generally take advantage of the opportunity of hearing this fine music."

That Portland people did appreciate to the utmost the treat of Wednesday evening at City Hall was shown by the attitude of the audience and the comments heard afterwards. Some years ago the real worth of such a program might not haver been so appreciated but the growth in the love of fine music is marked here and nothing would be more welcome to Portlanders than the annual visit of this Boston organization.

The long anticipated concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an affair of the past and it is safe to say that City Hall never held a more enraptured audience than that which filed away from the hall Wednesday evening at just before the hour of 10, after nearly two hours of wonderful musicianship. The audience was a very large one, though the house was not entirely sold out. The program given was a wonderful one—one chosen with skill and of a variety which included classics, modern works and interesting novelties.

The orchestra was never in finer form and though no inducement was needed to tempt people to a feast of this order, there was of course great interest and curiosity regarding the brilliant Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, who last Autumn took up his baton with the orchestra at the begining of its 44th season.

A beautiful symphony by Haydn, which brought surpassing enjoyment; an unusual arrangement of Tanhauser music ,the Paris version of the Bacchanala; a beautiful descriptive Russian piece; one dainty novelty, the Bumble Bee scherzo; a brilliant standard overture The Roman Carnival, by Berlioz, and a superb Meistersingers Prelude made up this rare treat in high class orchestral music. There was a wealth of exquisite melody in the program and the audience was the most applausive in years and was of the calibre to appreciate the merit and beauty of the evening's offering.

At the close, the hearers were still unsatisfied and would gladly have lingered an hour longer to revel in more of this splendid melody.

Mrs. Louis Cassard of the Colum-

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The following programs for the Boston Symphony orchestra have been arranged by Koussevitzky, conductor:

Tomorrow, at 8:15, the fourth concert of the Monday evening series: Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in G major (Myra Hess, pianist); Mendelssohn's scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and Strauss's "Dance of Salome."

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 3 and 4, Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (About 600 A.D). which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version: Schumann's piano concerto (Alfred Cortot, pianist), and likewise a piano concerto by Tailleferre. Finally, Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman."

The last pair of Young People's concerts will take place on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7, at 4 o'clock.

The spring pension fund concert of the orchestra will take place on Sunday afternoon, April 19.

---

your way lies to the right. there; you have to do the walking astray."

CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The program of the young people's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, on the afternoons of Monday, April 6, and Tuesday, April 7, at 4 o'clock in Symphony hall, will be as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage Figaro"; Beethoven, Second Movement from Symphony No. 8; Wagner, Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"; Gluck, Dance of Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Georges Laurent); Tchaikovsky, Chinese Dance, Dance of the Sugar Fairy (celesta, Arthur Fiedler), Russian Dance, from the "Nutcracker" Ballet; Saint-Saens, Fantasy for Harp (Alfred Holy); Sibelius, "Finlandia," symphonic poem.

Thomas W. Surette will speak about the various compositions.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The program of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday night at 8 o'clock, will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Wagner, prelude to Lohengrin"; Strauss, Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils.

Herald Mar 29

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 29 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play "Prometheus" Here

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the ultimate of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano, and mixed chorus.

Koussevitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this mighty score since he was a close friend of the composer during the ripest part of Scriabin's career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus" which was performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus has been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitols and notably by Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano part will be taken by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part by the Cecilia Society of Boston which has been trained by its conductor, Malcolm Lang.

This work was inspired by the theosophic divinity, the son of the God of fire who descends to enlighten struggling humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the God head. The culmination of this "poem of fire," revealing the final unification of the chosen wth God, is considered one of the most stupendous climaxes in music.

Advertiser
Mar 29

Three Symphony Concerts for This Week

THREE concerts will be given this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

Tomorrow night at the fourth Monday concert, the following will be played: Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet;" Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, with Myra Hess as soloist; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," scherzo; Wagner's "Lohengrin," prelude, and Strauss' "Dance of Salome."

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at the regular Symphony concerts, Mr. Koussevitsky will offer Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra, in E major; Eichheim's "Chinese Legend," which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version; Schumann's piano concerto, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, and also a concerto by Tailleferre, feminine member of the Parisian "six," and Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 29 1925

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the last achievement of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. Mr. Koussewitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this work, since he was a close friend of Scriabin's during the ripest part of his career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus," which was first performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus" has since been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitals and as well by Koussewitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano will be played by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston. "Prometheus" was inspired by the theosophic divinity the son of the God of Fire, who descends to enlighten humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the godhead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER

MAR 29 1925

OUR ORCHESTRAS AS SEEN FROM ABROAD

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testifies the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for the New York Evening Post.

Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year.

As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor.

The London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response.

It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

HESS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Myra Hess, noted English pianist, was soloist at the fourth Monday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Symphony Hall. She has been previously heard in Boston only in recital. Her remarkably fine performance last night in Beethoven's G major concerto was applauded with unusual enthusiasm by both orchestra and audience. Mr Koussevitzky's program included Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera.

Miss Hess gave an exquisitely polished, delicately emotional interpretation of Beethoven's music. Her subtle phrasing, her carefully graduated dynamics, her thoroughly fine artistry gave great pleasure. Nor was there any lack of feeling in her playing. In the andante especially it was deeply, yet quietly moving. Mr Koussevitzky's accompaniment was too vigorous. This concerto is not heroic Beethoven, but akin to the Eighth Symphony.

All the other numbers have been lately heard at concerts in the regular series, and duly commented upon by reviewers. Koussevitzky's interpretations last night were at times markedly different from those he gave at the earlier performances of the same music. This time "Romeo and Juliet" did not stir him to fervors as intense as those of the other day. Mendelssohn's scherzo went more trippingly last night than before. Strauss' dance was no less languorously violent. The climax of the "Lohengrin" prelude, steadily and sweepingly built up was the most drastic thing of the evening and a real triumph for the conductor and orches-

Herald
Mar 28

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Koussevitzky Offers Pieces by Handel-Kogel, Scriabin, Rabaud and Borodin

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS ASSISTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, for strings (edited by Kogel); Scriabin, "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" (first time in Boston); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Borodin, Polovsian Dances from "Prince Igor," for orchestra and chorus. The Cecilia Society assisted.

Kogel's edition of Handel's Concerto calls for two solo violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz); solo viola (Mr. Fourel); solo violoncello (Mr. Bedetti). How this music of Handel's by the majestic pomp, the solemn beauty—and simple are the means employed—the vitality stands out after nearly 200 years! How superb the introduction! It might bear for a motto that sentence in the Book of Daniel: "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." Hearing this introduction, the presto and the allegro, and the slow movement that has a tenderness and an unearthly serenity peculiar to Handel, it may be questioned whether music, after all, has progressed so greatly since Handel shook his powdered wig and threatened to throw the capricious Francesca Cuzzoni out of a window. It is not necessary to go as far as Samuel Butler, who, offering incense to his idol, battered the statues of other composers in the great temple of music; then, poor, misguided man, tried to write music in the Handelian manner; but Handel is still one of the mightiest figures in the history of music.

There was a beautiful performance of Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which was played at a concert last February. Repeated hearings lead one to wish that the mood of the first section, poetic as it is, were not so long maintained.

Borodin's Dances were performed with charm for the first time at a Symphony concert. They had been performed here elsewhere. The voices added greatly to the contrasting effects. The chorus of young girls is deliciously suave; the splendid and barbaric savagery of the males proclaiming the glory of their Khan is intensified four-fold. Thus there was a brilliant ending. Fortunately "The Nocturnal Procession" followed with the intermission the tremendous climax of the "Prometheus," so that the power of Borodin's Dances was not diminished.

Scriabins "Prometheus" is for orchestra, piano, organ and chorus. It was natural that Mr. Koussevitzky should wish to have Boston hear it. The composer was his close friend, and, as a pianist, his associate in concert tours. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of "Prometheus" at Moscow, when Scriabin played the piano part.

The composer wished this "symphony of sounds" to be accompanied by a "symphony of color rays" and so he constructed a keyboard instrument which should throw colored lights on a screen as the music was playing. This keyboard was apparently used for the first time in New York. The result was unsatisfactory. Scriabin also wished the performance to take the form of a mystical ceremony, with the chorus clad in white, as for a religious service, not a concert. In his later years his mysticism passed beyond the boundary, so for his fame as a composer, he was no doubt fortunate in his death before his projected "Mystery" found form; a work in which sounds, colors, perfumes and movement were, with the audience as celebrants, to express one "fundamental idea."

Much has been written about the psychology, the theosophical expression, the mysticism of "Prometheus." The greater part of what has been written is sheer hifalution. One does not go to a concert to observe through the ears the process of merging human, individuality in the Cosmos. A trumpet theme is not the more stirring because it typifies "The Will to create and attain." Nor is a theme that symbolizes "dawning consciousness" the more appealing by reason of an esoteric quality.

What is to be said of "Prometheus" if it is to be considered first of all as a "symphony of sounds"?

In some respects it is an advance on Scriabin's preceding orchestral poems. It is less influenced by Wagner; it has passages of more individual strength and beauty; the instrumentation is more varied, more interesting, with greater charm of coloring. The final climax—and there is a dangerous anticipation of it—is overpoweringly sonorous.

On the other hand, the music is too often diffuse and negligible. One wearies quickly of the "mystic chord." One wishes a firmer continuity, fewer episodes that say little or nothing.

The piano part was played by Alexander Lang Steinert, who left Paris, where he is studying composition, at the repeated request of Mr. Koussevitzky, to assist in the performance. The piano part, taxing by technical difficulties and sudden entrances, often inconsequential as regards musical contents, ungrateful music as a rule, was played by Mr. Steinert intelligently and, as far as the performance was concerned, effectively.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Foote, Suite, E major, for strings; Eichheim, "A Chinese Legend," (first time here); Schumann, piano con-

---

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 29 1925

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Kennard of Berlin, N. H., were guests at the Boston Symphony concert last week, coming especially for this event of rare interest. Mrs. Kennard will be remembered as Miss Mabel Swett of Casco street.

"If it hadn't been for the people up State," said a member of the music commission on Thursday, we might not have made good from the Boston Symphony concert. As it was, we did make a little money. We hope to follow the precedent of making the tickets for the Symphony low in price so that Portland people may generally take advantage of the opportunity of hearing this fine music."

That Portland people did appreciate to the utmost the treat of Wednesday evening at City Hall was shown by the attitude of the audience and the comments heard afterwards. Some years ago the real worth of such a program might not haver been so appreciated but the growth in the love of fine music is marked here and nothing would be more welcome to Portlanders than the annual visit of this Boston organization.

The long anticipated concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an affair of the past and it is safe to say that City Hall never held a more enraptured audience than that which filed away from the hall Wednesday evening at just before the hour of 10, after nearly two hours of wonderful musicianship. The audience was a very large one, though the house was not entirely sold out. The program given was a wonderful one—one chosen with skill and of a variety which included classics, modern works and interesting novelties.

The orchestra was never in finer form and though no inducement was needed to tempt people to a feast of this order, there was of course great interest and curiosity regarding the brilliant Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, who last Autumn took up his baton with the orchestra at the begining of its 44th season.

A beautiful symphony by Haydn, which brought surpassing enjoyment; an unusual arrangement of Tanhauser music ,the Paris version of the Bacchanala; a beautiful descriptive Russian piece; one dainty novelty, the Bumble Bee scherzo; a brilliant standard overture The Roman Carnival, by Berlioz, and a superb Meistersingers Prelude made up this rare treat in high class orchestral music. There was a wealth of exquisite melody in the program and the audience was the most applausive in years and was of the calibre to appreciate the merit and beauty of the evening's offering.

At the close, the hearers were still unsatisfied and would gladly have lingered an hour longer to revel in more of this splendid melody.

Mrs. Louis Cassard of the Colum

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The following programs for the Boston Symphony orchestra have been arranged by Koussevitzky, conductor:

Tomorrow, at 8:15, the fourth concert of the Monday evening series: Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in G major (Myra Hess, pianist); Mendelssohn's scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and Strauss's "Dance of Salome."

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 3 and 4, Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (About 600 A.D). which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version; Schumann's piano concerto (Alfred Cortot, pianist), and likewise a piano concerto by Tailleferre. Finally, Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman."

The last pair of Young People's concerts will take place on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7, at 4 o'clock.

The spring pension fund concert of the orchestra will take place on Sunday afternoon, April 19.

---

your way lies to the [illegible] there; you have to do the walking [illegible]
astray

CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The program of the young people's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, on the afternoons of Monday, April 6, and Tuesday, April 7, at 4 o'clock in Symphony hall, will be as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage Figaro"; Beethoven, Second Movement from Symphony No. 8; Wagner, Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"; Gluck, Dance of Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Georges Laurent); Tchaikovsky, Chinese Dance, Dance of the Sugar Fairy (celesta, Arthur Fiedler), Russian Dance, from the "Nutcracker" Ballet; Saint-Saens, Fantasy for Harp (Alfred Holy); Sibelius, "Finlandia," symphonic poem.

Thomas W. Surette will speak about the various compositions.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The program of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday night at 8 o'clock, will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Wagner, prelude to Lohengrin"; Strauss, Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils.

Herald mar 29

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 29 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play "Prometheus" Here

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the ultimate of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano, and mixed chorus.

Koussevitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this mighty score since he was a close friend of the composer during the ripest part of Scriabin's career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus" which was performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus has been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitols and notably by Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano part will be taken by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part by the Cecilia Society of Boston which has been trained by its conductor, Malcolm Lang.

This work was inspired by the theosophic divinity, the son of the God of fire who descends to enlighten struggling humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the God head. The culmination of this "poem of fire," revealing the final unification of the chosen wth God, is considered one of the most stupendous climaxes in music.

Advertiser
Mar 29

Three Symphony Concerts for This Week

THREE concerts will be given this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

Tomorrow night at the fourth Monday concert, the following will be played: Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet;" Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, with Myra Hess as soloist; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," scherzo; Wagner's "Lohengrin," prelude, and Strauss' "Dance of Salome."

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at the regular Symphony concerts, Mr. Koussevitsky will offer Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra, in E-major; Eichheim's "Chinese Legend," which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version; Schumann's piano concerto, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, and also a concerto by Tailleferre, feminine member of the Parisian "six," and Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit."

73

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 29 1925

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the last achievement of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. Mr. Koussewitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this work, since he was a close friend of Scriabin's during the ripest part of his career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus," which was first performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus" has since been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitals and as well b Koussewitzky and the Boston Sym phony Orchestra in Boston last Fri day and Saturday. The piano will b played by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston. "Prometheus" was inspired by the theosophic divinity the son of the God of Fire, who descends to enlighten humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the godhead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER

MAR 29 1925

OUR ORCHESTRAS AS SEEN FROM ABROAD

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testifies the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for the New York Evening Post.

Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr. Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year.

As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor.

The London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response.

It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

[illegible]
Mar 31

HESS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Myra Hess, noted English pianist, was soloist at the fourth Monday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Symphony Hall. She has been previously heard in Boston only in recital. Her remarkably fine performance last night in Beethoven's G major concerto was applauded with unusual enthusiasm by both orchestra and audience. Mr Koussevitzky's program included Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera.

Miss Hess gave an exquisitely polished, delicately emotional interpretation of Beethoven's music. Her subtle phrasing, her carefully graduated dynamics, her thoroughly fine artistry gave great pleasure. Nor was there any lack of feeling in her playing. In the andante especially it was deeply, yet quietly moving. Mr Koussevitzky's accompaniment was too vigorous. This concerto is not heroic Beethoven, but akin to the Eighth Symphony.

All the other numbers have been lately heard at concerts in the regular series, and duly commented upon by reviewers. Koussevitzky's interpretations last night were at times markedly different from those he gave at the earlier performances of the same music. This time "Romeo and Juliet" did not stir him to fervors as intense as those of the other day. Mendelssohn's scherzo went more trippingly last night than efore. Strauss' dance was no less lan ouroualy violent. The climax of the ohengrin" prelude, steadily and eepingly built up was the most dras thing of the evening and a real mph for the conductor and orches-

73

Herald Mar 28

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Koussevitzky Offers Pieces by Handel-Kogel, Scriabin, Rabaud and Borodin

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS ASSISTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, for strings (edited by Kogel); Scriabin, "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" (first time in Boston); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Borodin, Polovsian Dances from "Prince Igor," for orchestra and chorus. The Cecilia Society assisted.

Kogel's edition of Handel's Concerto calls for two solo violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz); solo viola (Mr. Fourel); solo violoncello (Mr. Bedetti). How this music of Handel's by the majestic pomp, the solemn beauty—and simple are the means employed—the vitality stands out after nearly 200 years! How superb the introduction! It might bear for a motto that sentence in the Book of Daniel: "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." Hearing this introduction, the presto and the allegro, and the slow movement that has a tenderness and an unearthly serenity peculiar to Handel, it may be questioned whether music, after all, has progressed so greatly since Handel shook his powdered wig and threatened to throw the capricious Francesca Cuzzoni out of a window. It is not necessary to go as far as Samuel Butler, who, offering incense to his idol, battered the statues of other composers in the great temple of music; then, poor, misguided man, tried to write music in the Handelian manner; but Handel is still one of the mightiest figures in the history of music.

There was a beautiful performance of Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which was played at a concert last February. Repeated hearings lead one to wish that the mood of the first section, poetic as it is, were not so long maintained.

Borodin's Dances were performed with charm for the first time at a Symphony concert. They had been performed here elsewhere. The voices added greatly to the contrasting effects. The chorus of young girls is deliciously suave; the splendid and barbaric savagery of the males proclaiming the glory of their Khan is intensified four-fold. Thus there was a brilliant ending. Fortunately "The Nocturnal Procession" followed with the intermission the tremendous climax of the "Prometheus," so that the power of Borodin's Dances was not diminished.

Scriabins "Prometheus" is for orchestra, piano, organ and chorus. It was natural that Mr. Koussevitzky should wish to have Boston hear it. The composer was his close friend, and, as a pianist, his associate in concert tours. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of "Prometheus" at Moscow, when Scriabin played the piano part.

The composer wished this "symphony of sounds" to be accompanied by a "symphony of color rays" and so he constructed a keyboard instrument which should throw colored lights on a screen as the music was playing. This keyboard was apparently used for the first time in New York. The result was unsatisfactory. Scriabin also wished the performance to take the form of a mystical ceremony, with the chorus clad in white, as for a religious service, not a concert. In his later years his mysticism passed beyond the boundary, so for his fame as a composer, he was no doubt fortunate in his death before his projected "Mystery" found form; a work in which sounds, colors, perfumes and movement were, with the audience as celebrants, to express one "fundamental idea."

Much has been written about the psychology, the theosophical expression, the mysticism of "Prometheus." The greater part of what has been written is sheer hifalution. One does not go to a concert to observe through the ears the process of merging human, individuality in the Cosmos. A trumpet theme is not the more stirring because it typifies "The Will to create and attain." Nor is a theme that symbolizes "dawning consciousness" the more appealing by reason of an esoteric quality.

What is to be said of "Prometheus" if it is to be considered first of all as a "symphony of sounds"?

In some respects it is an advance on Scriabin's preceding orchestral poems. It is less influenced by Wagner; it has passages of more individual strength and beauty; the instrumentation is more varied, more interesting, with greater charm of coloring. The final climax—and there is a dangerous anticipation of it—is overpoweringly sonorous.

On the other hand, the music is too often diffuse and negligible. One wearies quickly of the "mystic chord." One wishes a firmer continuity, fewer episodes that say little or nothing.

The piano part was played by Alexander Lang Steinert, who left Paris, where he is studying composition, at the repeated request of Mr. Koussevitzky, to assist in the performance. The piano part, taxing by technical difficulties and sudden entrances, often inconsequential as regards musical contents, ungrateful music as a rule, was played by Mr. Steinert intelligently and, as far as the performance was concerned, effectively.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Foote, Suite, E major, for strings; Eichheim, "A Chinese Legend," (first time here); Schumann, piano con-

---

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 29 1925

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Kennard of Berlin, N. H., were guests at the Boston Symphony concert last week, coming especially for this event of rare interest. Mrs. Kennard will be remembered as Miss Mabel Swett of Casco street.

"If it hadn't been for the people up State," said a member of the music commission on Thursday, we might not have made good from the Boston Symphony concert. As it was, we did make a little money. We hope to follow the precedent of making the tickets for the Symphony low in price so that Portland people may generally take advantage of the opportunity of hearing this fine music."

That Portland people did appreciate to the utmost the treat of Wednesday evening at City Hall was shown by the attitude of the audience and the comments heard afterwards. Some years ago the real worth of such a program might not haver been so appreciated but the growth in the love of fine music is marked here and nothing would be more welcome to Portlanders than the annual visit of this Boston organization.

The long anticipated concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an affair of the past and it is safe to say that City Hall never held a more enraptured audience than that which filed away from the hall Wednesday evening at just before the hour of 10, after nearly two hours of wonderful musicianship. The audience was a very large one, though the house was not entirely sold out. The program given was a wonderful one—one chosen with skill and of a variety which included classics, modern works and interesting novelties.

The orchestra was never in finer form and though no inducement was needed to tempt people to a feast of this order, there was of course great interest and curiosity regarding the brilliant Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, who last Autumn took up his baton with the orchestra at the begining of its 44th season.

A beautiful symphony by Haydn, which brought surpassing enjoyment; an unusual arrangement of Tanhauser music ,the Paris version of the Bacchanala; a beautiful descriptive Russian piece; one dainty novelty, the Bumble Bee scherzo; a brilliant standard overture The Roman Carnival, by Berlioz, and a superb Meistersingers Prelude made up this rare treat in high class orchestral music. There was a wealth of exquisite melody in the program and the audience was the most applausive in years and was of the calibre to appreciate the merit and beauty of the evening's offering.

At the close, the hearers were still unsatisfied and would gladly have lingered an hour longer to revel in more of this splendid melody.

Mrs. Louis Cassard of the Colum

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The following programs for the Boston Symphony orchestra have been arranged by Koussevitzky, conductor:

Tomorrow, at 8:15, the fourth concert of the Monday evening series: Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in G major (Myra Hess, pianist); Mendelssohn's scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and Strauss's "Dance of Salome."

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 3 and 4, Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (About 600 A.D). which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version; Schumann's piano concerto (Alfred Cortot, pianist), and likewise a piano concerto by Tailleferre. Finally, Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman."

The last pair of Young People's concerts will take place on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7, at 4 o'clock.

The spring pension fund concert of the orchestra will take place on Sunday afternoon, April 19.

---

your wa[illegible] lies to the [illegible] there [illegible] do the walking [illegible]
astray

CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The program of the young people's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, on the afternoons of Monday, April 6, and Tuesday, April 7, at 4 o'clock in Symphony hall, will be as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage Figaro"; Beethoven, Second Movement from Symphony No. 8; Wagner, Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"; Gluck, Dance of Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Georges Laurent); Tchaikovsky, Chinese Dance, Dance of the Sugar Fairy (celesta, Arthur Fiedler), Russian Dance, from the "Nutcracker" Ballet; Saint-Saens, Fantasy for Harp (Alfred Holy); Sibelius, "Finlandia," symphonic poem.

Thomas W. Surette will speak about the various compositions.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The program of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday night at 8 o'clock, will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Wagner, prelude to Lohengrin"; Strauss, Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils.

Herald Mar 29

Advertiser Mar 29

Three Symphony Concerts for This Week

THREE concerts will be given this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

Tomorrow night at the fourth Monday concert, the following will be played: Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet;" Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, with Myra Hess as soloist; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," scherzo; Wagner's "Lohengrin," prelude, and Strauss' "Dance of Salome."

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at the regular Symphony concerts, Mr. Koussevitsky will offer Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra, in E major; Eichheim's "Chinese Legend," which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version; Schumann's piano concerto, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, and also a concerto by Tailleferre, feminine member of the Parisian "six," and Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 29 1925

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the last achievement of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. Mr. Koussewitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this work, since he was a close friend of Scriabin's during the ripest part of his career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus," which was first performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus" has since been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitals and as well by Koussewitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano will be played by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston. "Prometheus" was inspired by the theosophic divinity the son of the God of Fire, who descends to enlighten humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the godhead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER

MAR 29 1925

OUR ORCHESTRAS AS SEEN FROM ABROAD

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testifies the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for the New York Evening Post.

Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr. Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year.

As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor.

The London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response.

It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 29 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play "Prometheus" Here

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the ultimate of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano, and mixed chorus.

Koussevitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this mighty score since he was a close friend of the composer during the ripest part of Scriabin's career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus" which was performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus has been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitols and notably by Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano part will be taken by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part by the Cecilia Society of Boston which has been trained by its conductor, Malcolm Lang.

This work was inspired by the theosophic divinity, the son of the God of fire who descends to enlighten struggling humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the God head. The culmination of this "poem of fire," revealing the final unification of the chosen wth God, is considered one of the most stupendous climaxes in music.

[illegible] Mar 31

HESS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Myra Hess, noted English pianist, was soloist at the fourth Monday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Symphony Hall. She has been previously heard in Boston only in recital. Her remarkably fine performance last night in Beethoven's G major concerto was applauded with unusual enthusiasm by both orchestra and audience. Mr Koussevitzky's program included Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera.

Miss Hess gave an exquisitely polished, delicately emotional interpretation of Beethoven's music. Her subtle phrasing, her carefully graduated dynamics, her thoroughly fine artistry gave great pleasure. Nor was there any lack of feeling in her playing. In the andante especially it was deeply, yet quietly moving. Mr Koussevitzky's accompaniment was too vigorous. This concerto is not heroic Beethoven, but akin to the Eighth Symphony.

All the other numbers have been lately heard at concerts in the regular series, and duly commented upon by reviewers. Koussevitzky's interpretations last night were at times markedly different from those he gave at the earlier performances of the same music. This time "Romeo and Juliet" did not stir him to fervors as intense as those of the other day. Mendelssohn's scherzo went more trippingly last night than before. Strauss' dance was no less lan[illegible]ourously violent. The climax of the "Lohengrin" prelude, steadily and [illegible]eepingly built up was the most dras[illegible] thing of the evening and a real [illegible]mph for the conductor and orches-

Herald
Mar 28

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Koussevitzky Offers Pieces by Handel-Kogel, Scriabin, Rabaud and Borodin

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS ASSISTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, for strings (edited by Kogel); Scriabin, "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" (first time in Boston); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Borodin, Polovsian Dances from "Prince Igor," for orchestra and chorus. The Cecilia Society assisted.

Kogel's edition of Handel's Concerto calls for two solo violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz); solo viola (Mr. Fourel); solo violoncello (Mr. Bedetti). How this music of Handel's by the majestic pomp, the solemn beauty—and simple are the means employed—the vitality stands out after nearly 200 years! How superb the introduction! It might bear for a motto that sentence in the Book of Daniel: "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." Hearing this introduction, the presto and the allegro, and the slow movement that has a tenderness and an unearthly serenity peculiar to Handel, it may be questioned whether music, after all, has progressed so greatly since Handel shook his powdered wig and threatened to throw the capricious Francesca Cuzzoni out of a window. It is not necessary to go as far as Samuel Butler, who, offering incense to his idol, battered the statues of other composers in the great temple of music; then, poor, misguided man, tried to write music in the Handelian manner; but Handel is still one of the mightiest figures in the history of music.

There was a beautiful performance of Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," which was played at a concert last February. Repeated hearings lead one to wish that the mood of the first section, poetic as it is, were not so long maintained.

Borodin's Dances were performed with charm for the first time at a Symphony concert. They had been performed here elsewhere. The voices added greatly to the contrasting effects. The chorus of young girls is deliciously suave; the splendid and barbaric savagery of the males proclaiming the glory of their Khan is intensified four-fold. Thus there was a brilliant ending. Fortunately "The Nocturnal Procession" followed with the intermission the tremendous climax of the "Prometheus," so that the power of Borodin's Dances was not diminished.

Scriabins "Prometheus" is for orchestra, piano, organ and chorus. It was natural that Mr. Koussevitzky should wish to have Boston hear it. The composer was his close friend, and, as a pianist, his associate in concert tours. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of "Prometheus" at Moscow, when Scriabin played the piano part.

The composer wished this "symphony of sounds" to be accompanied by a "symphony of color rays" and so he constructed a keyboard instrument which should throw colored lights on a screen as the music was playing. This keyboard was apparently used for the first time in New York. The result was unsatisfactory. Scriabin also wished the performance to take the form of a mystical ceremony, with the chorus clad in white, as for a religious service, not a concert. In his later years his mysticism passed beyond the boundary, so for his fame as a composer, he was no doubt fortunate in his death before his projected "Mystery" found form; a work in which sounds, colors, perfumes and movement were, with the audience as celebrants, to express one "fundamental idea."

Much has been written about the psychology, the theosophical expression, the mysticism of "Prometheus." The greater part of what has been written is sheer hifalution. One does not go to a concert to observe through the ears the process of merging human, individuality in the Cosmos. A trumpet theme is not the more stirring because it typifies "The Will to create and attain." Nor is a theme that symbolizes "dawning consciousness" the more appealing by reason of an esoteric quality.

What is to be said of "Prometheus" if it is to be considered first of all as a "symphony of sounds"?

In some respects it is an advance on Scriabin's preceding orchestral poems. It is less influenced by Wagner; it has passages of more individual strength and beauty; the instrumentation is more varied, more interesting, with greater charm of coloring. The final climax—and there is a dangerous anticipation of it—is overpoweringly sonorous.

On the other hand, the music is too often diffuse and negligible. One wearies quickly of the "mystic chord." One wishes a firmer continuity, fewer episodes that say little or nothing.

The piano part was played by Alexander Lang Steinert, who left Paris, where he is studying composition, at the repeated request of Mr. Koussevitzky, to assist in the performance. The piano part, taxing by technical difficulties and sudden entrances, often inconsequential as regards musical contents, ungrateful music as a rule, was played by Mr. Steinert intelligently and, as far as the performance was concerned, effectively.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Foote, Suite, E major, for strings; Eichheim, "A Chinese Legend," (first time here); Schumann, piano con-

---

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 29 1925

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Kennard of Berlin, N. H., were guests at the Boston Symphony concert last week, coming especially for this event of rare interest. Mrs. Kennard will be remembered as Miss Mabel Swett of Casco street.

"If it hadn't been for the people up State," said a member of the music commission on Thursday, we might not have made good from the Boston Symphony concert. As it was, we did make a little money. We hope to follow the precedent of making the tickets for the Symphony low in price so that Portland people may generally take advantage of the opportunity of hearing this fine music."

That Portland people did appreciate to the utmost the treat of Wednesday evening at City Hall was shown by the attitude of the audience and the comments heard afterwards. Some years ago the real worth of such a program might not haver been so appreciated but the growth in the love of fine music is marked here and nothing would be more welcome to Portlanders than the annual visit of this Boston organization.

The long anticipated concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now an affair of the past and it is safe to say that City Hall never held a more enraptured audience than that which filed away from the hall Wednesday evening at just before the hour of 10, after nearly two hours of wonderful musicianship. The audience was a very large one, though the house was not entirely sold out. The program given was a wonderful one—one chosen with skill and of a variety which included classics, modern works and interesting novelties.

The orchestra was never in finer form and though no inducement was needed to tempt people to a feast of this order, there was of course great interest and curiosity regarding the brilliant Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, who last Autumn took up his baton with the orchestra at the begining of its 44th season.

A beautiful symphony by Haydn, which brought surpassing enjoyment; an unusual arrangement of Tanhauser music ,the Paris version of the Bacchanala; a beautiful descriptive Russian piece; one dainty novelty, the Bumble Bee scherzo; a brilliant standard overture The Roman Carnival, by Berlioz, and a superb Meistersingers Prelude made up this rare treat in high class orchestral music. There was a wealth of exquisite melody in the program and the audience was the most applausive in years and was of the calibre to appreciate the merit and beauty of the evening's offering.

At the close, the hearers were still unsatisfied and would gladly have lingered an hour longer to revel in more of this splendid melody.

Mrs. Louis Cassard of the Colum

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The following programs for the Boston Symphony orchestra have been arranged by Koussevitzky, conductor:

Tomorrow, at 8:15, the fourth concert of the Monday evening series: Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in G major (Myra Hess, pianist); Mendelssohn's scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and Strauss's "Dance of Salome."

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 3 and 4, Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (About 600 A.D). which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version: Schumann's piano concerto (Alfred Cortot, pianist), and likewise a piano concerto by Tailleferre. Finally, Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman."

The last pair of Young People's concerts will take place on Monday and Tuesday afternoons, April 6 and 7, at 4 o'clock.

The spring pension fund concert of the orchestra will take place on Sunday afternoon, April 19.

---

your way lies to the [illegible] there; you have to do the walking [illegible] astray.

CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The program of the young people's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, on the afternoons of Monday, April 6, and Tuesday, April 7, at 4 o'clock in Symphony hall, will be as follows: Mozart. Overture to "The Marriage Figaro"; Beethoven, Second Movement from Symphony No. 8; Wagner, Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"; Gluck, Dance of Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Georges Laurent); Tchaikovsky, Chinese Dance, Dance of the Sugar Fairy (celesta, Arthur Fiedler), Russian Dance, from the "Nutcracker" Ballet; Saint-Saens, Fantasy for Harp (Alfred Holy); Sibelius, "Finlandia," symphonic poem.

Thomas W. Surette will speak about the various compositions.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The program of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday night at 8 o'clock, will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Franck, "The Wild Huntsman"; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils.

Herald Mar

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 29 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play "Prometheus" Here

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the ultimate of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano, and mixed chorus.

Koussevitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this mighty score since he was a close friend of the composer during the ripest part of Scriabin's career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus" which was performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus has been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitols and notably by Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano part will be taken by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part by the Cecilia Society of Boston which has been trained by its conductor, Malcolm Lang.

This work was inspired by the theosophic divinity, the son of the God of fire who descends to enlighten struggling humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the God head. The culmination of this "poem of fire," revealing the final unification of the chosen wth God, is considered one of the most stupendous climaxes in music.

73

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 29 1925

American
Mar 27

Three Symphony Concerts for This Week

THREE concerts will be given this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Tomorrow night at the fourth Monday concert, the following will be played: Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet;" Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, with Myra Hess as soloist; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," scherzo; Wagner's "Lohengrin," prelude, and Strauss' "Dance of Salome."

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at the regular Symphony concerts, Mr. Koussevitsky will offer Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra, in E major; Eichheim's "Chinese Legend," which is to have its first performance in a large orchestral version; Schumann's piano concerto, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, and also a concerto by Tailleferre, feminine member of the Parisian "six," and Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit."

A feature of the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 10, will be Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." This score is the last achievement of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. Mr. Koussewitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this work, since he was a close friend of Scriabin's during the ripest part of his career, and was the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus," which was first performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part.

"Prometheus" has since been performed repeatedly in the various musical capitals and as well b Koussewitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The piano will b played by Alexander Steinert, and the choral part sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston. "Prometheus" was inspired by the theosophic divinity the son of the God of Fire, who descends to enlighten humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the godhead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER

MAR 29 1925

OUR ORCHESTRAS AS SEEN FROM ABROAD

Players in America's great symphony orchestras are less adventurous than those of staid London, so testifies the famous English music critic, Ernest Newman, who has been serving as guest critic for the New York Evening Post.

Mr. Newman was asked to give his impressions of American orchestras. These are based upon hearings only of the New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

Of these four organizations Mr. Newman considers the Philadelphia the best—which recalls a similar statement from Richard Strauss during his last visit to America. However, Mr Newman considers the Philharmonic a close second.

In giving his reasons for the more adventurous quality of the London playing, Mr. Newman instances first the initial advantage of the American orchestras in being economically secure, whereas the London orchestras are not sure of their existence from year to year.

As a result the London orchestras engage a number of visiting conductors during a season—the Queen's Hall orchestra being the only one that always plays under the same conductor.

The London players seem to Mr. Newman more quickly adaptable than the American. The Londoners are gamblers, says he, and they develop a gambler's virtues and defects. Among the former are an unusual sharpness of apprehension and quickness of response.

It is that sense of adventure that gives their playing a nervous intensity that Mr. Newman has not often met with in New York. In all the finest playing that he has heard in New York, the impression has been one not of nervous adventure, but of steady confidence—a feeling that the magnificent machine could not possibly go wrong.

HESS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Myra Hess, noted English pianist, was soloist at the fourth Monday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Symphony Hall. She has been previously heard in Boston only in recital. Her remarkably fine performance last night in Beethoven's G major concerto was applauded with unusual enthusiasm by both orchestra and audience. Mr Koussevitzky's program included Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera.

Miss Hess gave an exquisitely polished, delicately emotional interpretation of Beethoven's music. Her subtle phrasing, her carefully graduated dynamics, her thoroughly fine artistry gave great pleasure. Nor was there any lack of feeling in her playing. In the andante especially it was deeply, yet quietly moving. Mr Koussevitzky's accompaniment was too vigorous. This concerto is not heroic Beethoven, but akin to the Eighth Symphony.

All the other numbers have been lately heard at concerts in the regular series, and duly commented upon by reviewers. Koussevitzky's interpretations last night were at times markedly different from those he gave at the earlier performances of the same music. This time "Romeo and Juliet" did not stir him to fervors as intense as those of the other day. Mendelssohn's scherzo went more trippingly last night than efore. Strauss' dance was no less lan- iourously violent. The climax of the ohengrin" prelude, steadily and eepingly built up was the most dras- thing of the evening and a real mph for the conductor and orches-

74

FOURTH OF SYMPHONY'S "EXTRAS"

Post Mar 31

Myra Hess Soloist—Tschaikowsky Again Revealed

Post Mar 31

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

No other pianist that has come to us within the past few years has more completely captured both popular and critical fancy than has Mrs. Myra Hess, who last evening, at the fourth of the "extra series" of Symphony Concerts, made her first appearance in this city with orchestra.

BEETHOVEN'S G MAJOR

In view of Miss Hess' special gifts as interpreter of romantic music, it was possible to regret before time that she had elected to play last evening Beethoven's Concerto in G major, music to which she might do full justice, yet hardly music to call forth her most characteristic abilities. Her performance of this concerto was, however, marked by warmth and tenderness where those qualities might be evidenced, as in the poetic slow movement, and also by nobility of conception, by beauty of tone, by clearness and limpidity of passage-work and by a seemingly effortless mastery of a piano-part exceptionally difficult by reason of its frequent awkwardness and unidiomatic, unsonorous character.

Thus aided, this music of Beethoven's had far more of charm and less of dryness than has sometimes been the case with it; moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra contributed thrice eloquent support. Particularly noteworthy were the dramatic contrasts of the second movement, one of Beethoven's happiest inventions. For Miss Hess at the end there was long and loud applause, justly earned; not in many a year had this concerto come to such revealing performance in Symphony Hall.

Last night, in accordance with Mr. Koussevitzky's practice at these Monday concerts, the programme, aside from the soloist's contribution, was made of pieces that had already been played during the season: Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet"; the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; the prelude to "Lohengrin," and "The Dance of Seven Veils" from Strauss' "Salome."

In these numbers conductor and orchestra showed expected, and here and there, added eloquence. For it is not the least among Mr. Koussevitzky's virtues that he is apparently never satisfied to rest upon an achievement, no matter how significant. Heard a second time, his interpretation of a given composition is more likely to reveal a heightening of this or that detail, or an even firmer grasp of the piece's structural logic. In particular did this hold last evening with the poignant tonal drama that is Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Tchaikovsky's Fantasia. Extraordinary as was the performance of that piece a few weeks ago, that of last evening was even more remarkable.

EXQUISITE CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Herald Mar 31

Orchestra Gives Fourth Monday Evening Program

For the fourth Monday evening concert by the Symphony orchestra the program read: Tchaikovsky's fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's G major piona concerto (pianist, Myra Hess); the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the prelude to "Lohengrin"; Salome's dance from Strauss's "Salome."

Did Miss Hess plan it? Did Mr. Koussevitzky? Or was it an instance of two heads being better than one? To whomever the credit may be due, Miss Hess and Mr. Koussevitzky between them gave a performance of the G major concerto so truly exquisite, it must surely set a standard for performances in the future.

Mr. Koussevitzky began it. He cut down his usual volume of sound by perhaps one-third. Thus, by pitching his entire scale so low, he gave full play to even the most delicate tints of Beethoven's color scheme, and in the climaxes he was able to achieve a grand sonority absolutely free from the coarse harshness that too often mars the splendor of Beethoven's greatest pages. The loveliness of the transition from the andante to the rondo, the joyous lilt of the rondo itself—they will not soon be forgotten. The orchestra's fine work in the concerto should not be forgotten; it shows what can be done.

Miss Hess in her turn pointed out something that can be done—the transformation of the usual frenzied tussle between the piano of a concerto and the orchestra for first place, into a performance of a symphony of quiet beauty in which the piano played a part not much more outstanding than that of an oboe or a horn. Where desirable, it sounded melodies forth; it also lent its color.

It was color indeed, at the hands of Miss Hess. She played, attuned to the orchestra, in a low key, quietly, with tone always cool but none the less subtly and widely varied. Through her beautifully sung melodies she gave expression to gentle feeling; by her passages of ornament she added beauty to the whole, but never a hint of flourish. Even in the cadenza she maintained with such perfect taste the tone Mr. Koussevitzky had set, that for once it did not seem like an excrescence.

More beautifully even tnan the allegro Miss Hess played the andante, music as poetic as Beethoven ever penned; she felt its poetry to the full. If for some reason she did not quite rise to the high spirits of the rondo's opening theme, its second theme she played delightfully, and toward the end she had some moments that united in an amazing way delicacy with brilliance. The treat it would be to hear Miss Hess in chamber music!

Let people who despair of music's parlous state take hope. Miss Hess's rare performance was as heartily applauded as though she had torn the piano in pieces.

The rest of the concert, oddly put together, needs no comment, since everything has been recently played. The audience was large and enthusiastic. At the last concert, April 27, the soloist will be Mieczyslaw Muenz, pianist.

R. R. G.

From Mr. Koussevitzky

For the Symphony Concerts of Frid April 17 and Saturday, April 18, after return of the orchestra from a visit, week, to New York:

Tone-Poem, "The Garden of Fand"........
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Rakhman
(Pianist: The Composer).
Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben"........Str

For the first times in Boston, Mr. Kousevitzky will undertake one of the la tone-poems of Strauss, "A Hero-Life," heard here—and remembered—from Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Soc of New York. (Thrice and four ti would they be welcome again, did t choose to return.) The music is of Stra most Straussian—for better and wo Nor will the conductor and the orches lack in it manifold opportunity. Mr. Bax's tone-poem would evoke a magic and fateful isle, far remote in the seas of Irish legend, strangely frequented withal. The piece is fanciful and romantic; multicolored, deftly written—say by a Celtic Debussy. Several years ago, Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra, on visit to Boston played it in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rakhmaninov's Concerto—a piece of symphonic dimensions—is like unto the presence and the playing of the composer, when he is most weighty and serious.

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concert to increase the Pension Fund of the orchestra—on Sunday afternoon, April 19, in Symphony Hall:

Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben"........Strauss
Forest-Scene from "Siegfried"; Good-Friday Spell from "Parsifal"; Overture to "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week, again in Brooklyn on Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky, the band and the choir of The Cecilia will repeat both Skriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Therewith he would end for the season his visits to New York—gr-r-randly.

Trans. Apr. 3

Trans Mar

Works of Good Will

Mr. Koussevitzky Asks Leave to Shift the Final Symphony Concert, and Agrees to a Second Performance of Brahms's Requiem.

DURING May and June, the height of the season in Paris and in London, Mr. Koussevitzky has engagements to keep—for a short series of his own concerts on the French side of the Channel; for concerts as guest-conductor on the English. To meet them, he must take ship from New York on Saturday, May 2. That he may do so, the final Symphony Concert in Boston has been shifted from the evening of that day to the preceding Friday evening, May 1, when the rites of leave-taking may be celebrated as appropriately and exuberantly. Subscribers are politely requested to note—and condone—the change. The matinée of Friday, May 1, stands unaltered. Upon two Symphony Concerts in eight hours will Mr. Koussevitzky wreak himself.

The conductor has also agreed to lead through a second performance of Brahms's Requiem by Dr. Davison's Harvard-Radcliffe Choirs and the Symphony Orchestra. Tickets for the first, on Thursday evening, April 16, have been unobtainable for days. Tickets for the second, on the following evening, Friday, April 17, may now be had by prompt application. Seemingly, the public is as keen for Brahms's threnody as it was last spring for Beethoven's Choral Symphony, via the University and Symphony Hall. Again will Mr. Koussevitzky do a double day's work, with Strauss's "Heldenleben" for beginning on Friday afternoon.

Transcript April 4

Monday and Tuesday afternoons, in Symphony Hall, the final pair of concerts, this season, for young people by the Symphony Orchestra. The program traverses the Overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding"; the Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Dances from Gluck's "Orpheus" and Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker"; the Procession into the Cathedral from "Lohengrin"; Sibelius's "Finlandia"; a harp-piece for Mr. Holy. Unless accompanied by children, adults are not admitted. Mr. Kousesevitzky will conduct.

NEW YORK
POST

APR 4 1925

The Boston Symphony Society gives its last concerts here this season Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At each concert Serge Koussevitzky will conduct two choral works: Scriabin's "Prometheus" and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor." The composer took the piano at Koussevitzky's first production of "Prometheus" in Russia and Alexander Steinert will be at the piano this time, while the chorus part will be sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston.

Herald April 2

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program announced for the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening has been changed: Ravel's Valse, which was played earlier in the season, has been substituted for Cesar Franck's "Wild Huntsman." Arthur Foote's Suite, E major, for strings, will be followed by Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend." Alfred Cortot will play Schumann's piano concerto and, after the intermission, Mlle. Tailleferre's concerto. Ravel's Valse will bring the end.

Place aux dames! Mlle. Tailleferre is not wholly unknown here as a composer, for Messrs. Maier and Pattison in two recitals at least have played movements from her suite for two pianos, "Outdoor Games," that is, games for children. This concerto was played for the first time with orchestra by Mr. Cortot, who has performed it in Philadelphia and New York. Mlle. Tailleferre, born near Paris in 1892, took a first prize for counterpoint at the Paris Conservatory in 1914, and she took other prizes. She allied herself to the little group of composers who had the name "Groupe des Six" foisted upon them. The "Six" became "Cinq" by the secession of a member. The hide-bound conservatives in the Symphony audience who tremble at the thought of hearing anything new, especially if it comes from Paris, will probably not be obliged to take their ear-caps with them if they should venture into the hall, for Henri Prunieres assures us that Mlle. Germaine is not at all a revolutionary, but a follower of traditions, Gabriel Faure's, Debussy's and Ravel's (we believe that our conservative friends have become reconciled to these three composers). And M. Pruniers says she has exquisite feminine sensibility and rare good taste; that she can "write harmonies full of savor without outraging our ears." Well, we shall hear what we shall hear.

Mlle. Tailleferre says she has used the classic form in her concerts as a sort of reaction against impressionism and orientalism.

She has written a ballet "The Bird Merchant" which was produced by the Swedish Ballet in Paris; a Ballade for piano and orchestra, a violin sonata which was played by her and Mr. Imandt (violinist) in New York, a string quartet, piano pieces; "Image" for a small orchestra, and she has completed a ballet in collaboration with the painter, Georges Barbier.

Other women composers have been represented at these Symphony concerts: Miss Maida Lang with her Dramatic Overture (1893), Mrs. Beach with her "Gaelic" symphony (1896 and 1898) and her piano concerto (1900); Lili Boulanger (Funeral music for a Soldier) 1925.

Mr. Eichheim, composer, violinist, traveler, photographer, is an old and esteemed friend. His "Oriental Impressions," a result of his musical adventures in Japan and China, gave great pleasure when it was performed at a Symphony concert in March, 1922. His "Malay Mosaic" for orchestra was performed recently in New York, but it is unknown here except by name. "A Chinese Legend," to be heard this week, was first performed as a ballet in Chicago. It was then entitled "The Rivals." Adolph Bolm and Ruth Page were the chief dancers with Mark Turbyfill. Mr. Eichheim conducted. Since the two performances in Chicago, Mr. Eichheim has rewritten the score for a larger orchestra.

The legend is of the sixth century. Gen. Houang and Gen. Yu come to their death through Houang's love for Mme. Yu. Mr. Eichheim utilizes for part of the thematic material music that he heard in China.

Born in Chicago in 1870, he now lives in Santa Barbara. After a year in Theodore Thomas's orchestra, he joined the Boston Symphony in the season of 1890-1 and did not leave it before the end of the season of 1911-12. He will go to Europe soon as a member of a string quartet organized by Mrs. F. S. Coolidge to give concerts of modern chamber music in Rome, Paris and London.

Scriabin's "Prometheus," performed last week, has excited lively discussion. Some, mostly women, cannot speak of it without eyes bathed in ecstacy and palpitation of the heart. Others, male and female, show more moderate rapture in discussion; while there are those who, acknowledging impressive moments, find dreary stretches. No one disputes the magnificence of the performance itself.

Mr. Koussevitzky will give "Prometheus" twice in New York next week with the full strength of the orchestra, young Mr. Steinert and the Cecilia Society. He will also perform it in Brooklyn. The New York programs will be as follows:

Thursday evening, April 9, Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5; Scriabin, "Prometheus"; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Borodini, dances with chorus from "Prince Igor."

Saturday afternoon, April 11, Respighi, old dances and airs for the lute; Scriabin, "Prometheus"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Borodin, dances with chorus from "Prince Igor."

The program of the Symphony concert in Cambridge tonight has been slightly changed. It now stands: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, Salome's Dance.

The program of the Boston concerts of April 17-18 is announced as follows: Bax, "The Garden of Fand" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2 for piano (Mr. Rachmaninoff pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Apr. 4 Herald

SYMPHONY GIVES UNIQUE CONCERT

Offers as Striking Novelty Eichheim's Captivating "Chinese Legend"

CORTOT AT HIS BEST IN SCHUMANN WORK

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 21st concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, Suite, E major, for string orchestra; Eichheim, "A Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.);" Schumann, piano concerto (Alfred Cortot, pianist); Tailleferre, piano concerto (first time in Boston, Mr. Cortot, pianist); Ravel, "La Valse." Mr. Eichheim conducted his legend which, rewritten for a larger orchestra than that taking part in the performance, as a ballet, "The Rivals," in Chicago last January, was played for the first time.

The concert was one of extraordinary worth. Mr. Foote's charming Suite had been played twice at these concerts. It will bear many repetitions, it is so clearly written, containing fresh musical ideas of an interesting nature, with the movements finely contrasted. The long melodic lines of the prelude are skilfully treated for the imitative voices. The Pizzicato movement is piquant without being laboriously so, and the interrupting Adagietto is eloquent. For the Finale Mr. Foote chose the fugal form; not for any vain show of pedantry, but as a natural and flowing expression. The Suite was beautifully played under Mr. Kouseevitzy's sympathetic and poetic direction. There was an appropriately romantic interpretation. The composer was obliged to rise from his seat several times, so long-continued and genuine was the applause.

Mr. Eichheim is far from being a stranger in Boston. He has long been recognized as a sound and well-equipped musician. Of late years he has been engrossed in the music of Japan, China, India and Java. He has journeyed to those lands; their music has entered his soul. Auber wished that Felicien David, the composer of "The Desert" and "Lalla Rookh," would dismount from his camel. Mr. Eichheim, writing in this country, hears the bells and gongs of Oriental temples: The sounds of street cries, wandering minstrels, and strange instruments are ever in his ears. And he sometimes hears them in a Parisian atmosphere. Not without profit did Debussy listen entranced to the Javanese musicians at a Paris exhibition.

The Chinese legend that inspired Mr. Eichheim's latest composition is the old story of the ages, the tragedy of two men and a woman. The husband is killed by a rival general. The wife of slain vows revenge and would kill him. They fight, but there is a strange spell upon them. Exhausted they will resume the contest. She visits a shrine and begs forgiveness of the god for not having brought the head of her enemy as an offering. She prays for strength to break the spell. Again they fight, but their eyes betray mutual love. She reaches for his spear; he catches her sword. The spear goes through his breast; with the sword he cuts his throat. They die together in a rapturous embrace.

Though this music was written originally for a ballet, it serves as a symphonic poem, wild and barbaric. Mr. Eichheim uses ceremonial themes, temple music, the Buddhistic service for the dead. There is the picturing in tones of the savage duels: there is a love motive. The exotic and the original themes are used with technical skill and compelling imagination. There is much more in this legend than an ingenious employment of Oriental instruments. There is fire, there is fury; there is the contrasting and impressive monotony of the East, as in the ceremonial music at the beginning; there is the appearance of "the most exquisite woman in the kingdom." And in the splendid savagery of it all, Mr. Eichheim does not forget that he is a musician; that there may be beauty in wildness, that there may be form. No wonder that Mr. Kouseevitzky purposes to produce the legend in Paris. Yesterday the reception by the audience was all that even an exacting composer could desire. Mr. Eichheim, conducting in an authoritative manner, recalled several times, bore his honors modestly.

There is a pleasing irony in Ravel's "Valse." No doubt some would prefer a waltz by Strauss or Waldteufel frankly played, for the lovers of the obvious are always with us; but in Ravel's there is an admirable mixture of sensuousness, irony, even mockery. There is a terpsichorean drunkenness that is irresistible and haunting.

It has been said that Schumann's concerto is no longer suited to great audiences, that the meditations, the shy confessions and the dreams of Schumann are only for a small hall where intimate relations with the hearers may be established. We have heard performances of this concerto when the "dreams" of Schumann put the hearer a-sleep. Now there is virility in this concerto as well as tenderness, romantic beauty. It is not easy to speak of the performance by Mr. Cortot and the orchestra in measured terms. It was an unbaring of Schumann's soul. To mention details, to praise this or that feature of the interpretation, and here pianist and conductor were as one, would be impertinent. It is enough to say that the performance was unsurpassable, never to be forgotten.

Mlle. Tailleferre's concerto is short, melodious, entertaining, with hints here and there at 18th century moods and manner of expression. The lively passages for trumpet were brilliantly played by Mr. Mager, and Mr. Cortot, it is needless to say, was again admirable.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. The program of April 17, 18 will comprise "The Garden of Fand" by Arnold Bax; Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Strauss's "Heldenleben."

74

FOURTH OF SYMPHONY'S "EXTRAS"

Post Mar 31

Myra Hess Soloist—Tschaikowsky Again Revealed

Post Mar 31

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

No other pianist that has come to us within the past few years has more completely captured both popular and critical fancy than has Mrs. Myra Hess, who last evening, at the fourth of the "extra series" of Symphony Concerts, made her first appearance in this city with orchestra.

BEETHOVEN'S G MAJOR

In view of Miss Hess' special gifts as interpreter of romantic music, it was possible to regret before time that she had elected to play last evening Beethoven's Concerto in G major, music to which she might do full justice, yet hardly music to call forth her most characteristic abilities. Her performance of this concerto was, however, marked by warmth and tenderness where those qualities might be evidenced, as in the poetic slow movement, and also by nobility of conception, by beauty of tone, by clearness and limpidity of passage-work and by a seemingly effortless mastery of a piano-part exceptionally difficult by reason of its frequent awkwardness and unidiomatic, unsonorous character.

Thus aided, this music of Beethoven's had far more of charm and less of dryness than has sometimes been the case with it; moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra contributed thrice eloquent support. Particularly noteworthy were the dramatic contrasts of the second movement, one of Beethoven's happiest inventions. For Miss Hess at the end there was long and loud applause, justly earned; not in many a year had this concerto come to such revealing performance in Symphony Hall.

Last night, in accordance with Mr. Koussevitzky's practice at these Monday concerts, the programme, aside from the soloist's contribution, was made of pieces that had already been played during the season: Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet"; the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; the prelude to "Lohengrin," and "The Dance of Seven Veils" from Strauss' "Salome."

In these numbers conductor and orchestra showed expected, and here and there, added eloquence. For it is not the least among Mr. Koussevitzky's virtues that he is apparently never satisfied to rest upon an achievement, no matter how significant. Heard a second time, his interpretation of a given composition is more likely to reveal a heightening of this or that detail, or an even firmer grasp of the piece's structural logic. In particular did this hold last evening with the poignant tonal drama that is Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Tchaikovsky's Fantasia, Extraordinary as was the performance of that piece a few weeks ago, that of last evening was even more remarkable.

EXQUISITE CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Herald Mar 31

Orchestra Gives Fourth Monday Evening Program

For the fourth Monday evening concert by the Symphony orchestra the program read: Tchaikovsky's fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven's G major piona concerto (pianist, Myra Hess); the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the prelude to "Lohengrin"; Salome's dance from Strauss's "Salome."

Did Miss Hess plan it? Did Mr. Koussevitzky? Or was it an instance of two heads being better than one? To whomever the credit may be due, Miss Hess and Mr. Koussevitzky between them gave a performance of the G major concerto so truly exquisite, it must surely set a standard for performances in the future.

Mr. Koussevitzky began it. He cut down his usual volume of sound by perhaps one-third. Thus, by pitching his entire scale so low, he gave full play to even the most delicate tints of Beethoven's color scheme, and in the climaxes he was able to achieve a grand sonority absolutely free from the coarse harshness that too often mars the splendor of Beethoven's greatest pages. The loveliness of the transition from the andante to the rondo, the joyous lilt of the rondo itself—they will not soon be forgotten. The orchestra's fine work in the concerto should not be forgotten; it shows what can be done.

Miss Hess in her turn pointed out something that can be done—the transformation of the usual frenzied tussle between the piano of a concerto and the orchestra for first place, into a performance of a symphony of quiet beauty in which the piano played a part not much more outstanding than that of an oboe or a horn. Where desirable, it sounded melodies forth; it also lent its color.

It was color indeed, at the hands of Miss Hess. She played, attuned to the orchestra, in a low key, quietly, with tone always cool but none the less subtly and widely varied. Through her beautifully sung melodies she gave expression to gentle feeling; by her passages of ornament she added beauty to the whole, but never a hint of flourish. Even in the cadenza she maintained with such perfect taste the tone Mr. Koussevitzky had set, that for once it did not seem like an excrescence.

More beautifully even than the allegro Miss Hess played the andante, music as poetic as Beethoven ever penned; she felt its poetry to the full. If for some reason she did not quite rise to the high spirits of the rondo's opening theme, its second theme she played delightfully, and toward the end she had some moments that united in an amazing way delicacy with brilliance. The treat it would be to hear Miss Hess in chamber music!

Let people who despair of music's parlous state take hope. Miss Hess's rare performance was as heartily applauded as though she had torn the piano in pieces.

The rest of the concert, oddly put together, needs no comment, since everything has been recently played. The audience was large and enthusiastic. At the last concert, April 27, the soloist will be Mieczyslaw Muenz, pianist.

R. R. G.

From Mr. Koussevitzky

For the Symphony Concerts of Fri
April 17 and Saturday, April 18, after return of the orchestra from a visit,
week, to New York:

Tone-Poem, "The Garden of Fand".......
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Rakhman
(Pianist: The Composer).
Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben".........Str

For the first times in Boston, Mr. Ko sevitzky will undertake one of the la tone-poems of Strauss, "A Hero-Life," heard here—and remembered—from Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Soc of New York. (Thrice and four ti would they be welcome again, did t choose to return.) The music is of Stra most Straussian—for better and wo
Nor will the conductor and the orches lack in it manifold opportunity. Mr. Bax's tone-poem would evoke a magic and fateful isle, far remote in the seas of Irish legend, strangely frequented withal. The piece is fanciful and romantic; multi-colored, deftly written—say by a Celtic Debussy. Several years ago, Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra, on visit to Boston played it in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rakhmaninov's Concerto—a piece of symphonic dimensions—is like unto the presence and the playing of the composer, when he is most weighty and serious.

From Mr. Kcussevitzky for the concert to increase the Pension Fund of the orchestra—on Sunday afternoon, April 19, in Symphony Hall:

Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben".......Strauss
Forest-Scene from "Siegfried"; Good-Friday Spell from "Parsifal"; Overture to "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week, again in Brooklyn on Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky, the band and the choir of The Cecilia will repeat both Skriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Therewith he would end for the season his visits to New York—gr-r-randly.

Trans. Apr 4

April 4

Monday and Tuesday afternoons, in Symphony Hall, the final pair of concerts, this season, for young people by the Symphony Orchestra. The program treverses the Overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding"; the Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Dances from Gluck's "Orpheus" and Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker"; the Procession into the Cathedral from "Lohengrin"; Sibelius's "Finlandia"; a harp-piece for Mr. Holy. Unless accompanied by children, adults are not admitted. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Works of Good Will

Mr. Koussevitzky Asks Leave to Shift the Final Symphony Concert, and Agrees to a Second Performance of Brahms's Requiem.

DURING May and June, the height of the season in Paris and in London, Mr. Koussevitzky has engagements to keep—for a short series of his own concerts on the French side of the Channel; for concerts as guest-conductor on the English. To meet them, he must take ship from New York on Saturday, May 2. That he may do so, the final Symphony Concert in Boston has been shifted from the evening of that day to the preceding Friday evening, May 1, when the rites of leave-taking may be celebrated as appropriately and exuberantly. Subscribers are politely requested to note—and condone—the change. The matinée of Friday, May 1, stands unaltered. Upon two Symphony Concerts in eight hours will Mr. Koussevitzky wreak himself.

The conductor has also agreed to lead through a second performance of Brahms's Requiem by Dr. Davison's Harvard-Radcliffe Choirs and the Symphony Orchestra. Tickets for the first, on Thursday evening, April 16, have been unobtainable for days. Tickets for the second, on the following evening, Friday, April 17, may now be had by prompt application. Seemingly, the public is as keen for Brahms's threnody as it was last spring for Beethoven's Choral Symphony, via the University and Symphony Hall. Again will Mr. Koussevitzky do a double day's work, with Strauss's "Heldenleben" for beginning on Friday afternoon.

Trans. Apr. 3

NEW YORK
POST
APR 4 1925

will play the harpsichord music.

The Boston Symphony Society gives its last concerts here this season Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At each concert Serge Koussevitzky will conduct two choral works: Scriabin's "Prometheus" and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor." The composer took the piano at Koussevitzky's first production of "Prometheus" in Russia and Alexander Steinert will be at the piano this time, while the chorus part will be sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston.

Herald April 2

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program announced for the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening has been changed: Ravel's Valse, which was played earlier in the season, has been substituted for Cesar Franck's "Wild Huntsman." Arthur Foote's Suite, E major, for strings, will be followed by Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend." Alfred Cortot will play Schumann's piano concerto and, after the intermission, Mlle. Tailleferre's concerto. Ravel's Valse will bring the end.

Place aux dames! Mlle. Tailleferre is not wholly unknown here as a composer, for Messrs. Maier and Pattison in two recitals at least have played movements from her suite for two pianos, "Outdoor Games," that is, games for children. This concerto was played for the first time with orchestra by Mr. Cortot, who has performed it in Philadelphia and New York. Mlle. Tailleferre, born near Paris in 1892, took a first prize for counterpoint at the Paris Conservatory in 1914, and she took other prizes. She allied herself to the little group of composers who had the name "Groupe des Six" foisted upon them. The "Six" became "Cinq" by the secession of a member. The hide-bound conservatives in the Symphony audience who tremble at the thought of hearing anything new, especially if it comes from Paris, will probably not be obliged to take their ear-caps with them if they should venture into the hall, for Henri Prunieres assures us that Mlle. Germaine is not at all a revolutionary, but a follower of traditions, Gabriel Faure's, Debussy's and Ravel's (we believe that our conservative friends have become reconciled to these three composers). And M. Pruniers says she has exquisite feminine sensibility and rare good taste: that she can "write harmonies full of savor without outraging our ears." Well, we shall hear what we shall hear.

Mlle. Tailleferre says she has used the classic form in her concerts as a sort of reaction against impressionism and orientalism.

She has written a ballet "The Bird Merchant" which was produced by the Swedish Ballet in Paris; a Ballade for piano and orchestra, a violin sonata which was played by her and Mr. Imandt (violinist) in New York, a string quartet, piano pieces; "Image" for a small orchestra, and she has completed a ballet in collaboration with the painter, Georges Barbier.

Other women composers have been represented at these Symphony concerts: Miss Maida Lang with her Dramatic Overture (1893), Mrs. Beach with her "Gaelic" symphony (1896 and 1898) and her piano concerto (1900); Lili Boulanger (Funeral music for a Soldier) 1925.

Mr. Eichheim, composer, violinist, traveler, photographer, is an old and esteemed friend. His "Oriental Impressions," a result of his musical adventures in Japan and China, gave great pleasure when it was performed at a Symphony concert in March, 1922. His "Malay Mosaic" for orchestra was performed recently in New York, but it is unknown here except by name. "A Chinese Legend," to be heard this week, was first performed as a ballet in Chicago. It was then entitled "The Rivals." Adolph Bolm and Ruth Page were the chief dancers with Mark Turbyfill. Mr. Eichheim conducted. Since the two performances in Chicago, Mr. Eichheim has rewritten the score for a larger orchestra.

The legend is of the sixth century. Gen. Houang and Gen. Yu come to their death through Houang's love for Mme. Yu. Mr. Eichheim utilizes for part of the thematic material music that he heard in China.

Born in Chicago in 1870, he now lives in Santa Barbara. After a year in Theodore Thomas's orchestra, he joined the Boston Symphony in the season of 1890-1 and did not leave it before the end of the season of 1911-12. He will go to Europe soon as a member of a string quartet organized by Mrs. F. S. Coolidge to give concerts of modern chamber music in Rome, Paris and London.

Scriabin's "Prometheus," performed last week, has excited lively discussion. Some, mostly women, cannot speak of it without eyes bathed in ecstacy and palpitation of the heart. Others, male and female, show more moderate rapture in discussion; while there are those who, acknowledging impressive moments, find dreary stretches. No one disputes the magnificence of the performance itself.

Mr. Koussevitzky will give "Prometheus" twice in New York next week with the full strength of the orchestra, young Mr. Steinert and the Cecilia Sosiety. He will also perform it in Brooklyn. The New York programs will be as follows:

Thursday evening, April 9, Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 5; Scriabin, "Prometheus": Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Borodini, dances with chorus from "Prince Igor."

Saturday afternoon, April 11, Respighi, old dances and airs for the lute; Scriabin, "Prometheus"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Borodin. dances with chorus from "Prince Igor."

The program of the Symphony concert in Cambridge tonight has been slightly changed. It now stands: Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, Salome's Dance.

The program of the Boston concerts of April 17-18 is announced as follows: Bax, "The Garden of Fand" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2 for piano (Mr. Rachmaninoff pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Apr. 4 Herald

SYMPHONY GIVES UNIQUE CONCERT

Offers as Striking Novelty Eichheim's Captivating "Chinese Legend"

CORTOT AT HIS BEST IN SCHUMANN WORK

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 21st concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, Suite, E major, for string orchestra; Eichheim, "A Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.);" Schumann, piano concerto (Alfred Cortot, pianist); Tailleferre, piano concerto (first time in Boston, Mr. Cortot, pianist); Ravel, "La Valse." Mr. Eichheim conducted his legend which, rewritten for a larger orchestra than that taking part in the performance, as a ballet, "The Rivals," in Chicago last January, was played for the first time.

The concert was one of extraordinary worth. Mr. Foote's charming Suite has been played twice at these concerts. It will bear many repetitions, it is so clearly written, containing fresh musical ideas of an interesting nature, with the movements finely contrasted. The long melodic lines of the prelude are skilfully treated for the imitative voices. The Pizzicato movement is piquant without being laboriously so, and the interrupting Adagietto is eloquent. For the Finale Mr. Foote chose the fugal form; not for any vain show of pedantry, but as a natural and flowing expression. The Suite was beautifully played under Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic and poetic direction. There was an appropriately romantic interpretation. The composer was obliged to rise from his seat several times, so long-continued and genuine was the applause.

Mr. Eichheim is far from being a stranger in Boston. He has long been recognized as a sound and well-equipped musician. Of late years he has been engrossed in the music of Japan, China, India and Java. He has journeyed to those lands; their music has entered his soul. Auber wished that Felicien David, the composer of "The Desert" and "Lalla Rookh," would dismount from his camel. Mr. Eichheim, writing in this country, hears the bells and gongs of Oriental temples: The sounds of street cries, wandering minstrels, of strange instruments are ever in his ears. And he sometimes hears them in a Parisian atmosphere. Not without profit did Debussy listen entranced to the Javanese musicians at a Paris exhibition.

The Chinese legend that inspired Mr. Eichheim's latest composition is the old story of the ages, the tragedy of two men and a woman. The husband is killed by a rival general. The wife of slain vows revenge and would kill him. They fight, but there is a strange spell upon them. Exhausted they will resume the contest. She visits a shrine and begs forgiveness of the god for not having brought the head of her enemy as an offering. She prays for strength to break the spell. Again they fight, but their eyes betray mutual love. She reaches for his spear; he catches her sword. The spear goes through his breast; with the sword he cuts his throat. They die together in a rapturous embrace.

Though this music was written originally for a ballet, it serves as a symphonic poem, wild and barbaric. Mr. Eichheim uses ceremonial themes, temple music, the Buddhistic service for the dead. There is the picturing in tones of the savage duels; there is a love motive. The exotic and the original themes are used with technical skill and compelling imagination. There is much more in this legend than an ingenious employment of Oriental instruments. There is fire, there is fury; there is the contrasting and impressive monotony of the East, as in the ceremonial music at the beginning; there is the appearance of "the most exquisite woman in the kingdom." And in the splendid savagery of it all, Mr. Eichheim does not forget that he is a musician; that there may be beauty in wildness, that there may be form. No wonder that Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to produce the legend in Paris. Yesterday the reception by the audience was all that even an exacting composer could desire. Mr. Eichheim, conducting in an authoritative manner, recalled several times, bore his honors modestly.

There is a pleasing irony in Ravel's "Valse." No doubt some would prefer a waltz by Strauss or Waldteufel frankly played, for the lovers of the obvious are always with us; but in Ravel's there is an admirable mixture of sensuousness, irony, even mockery. There is a terpsichorean drunkenness that is irresistible and haunting.

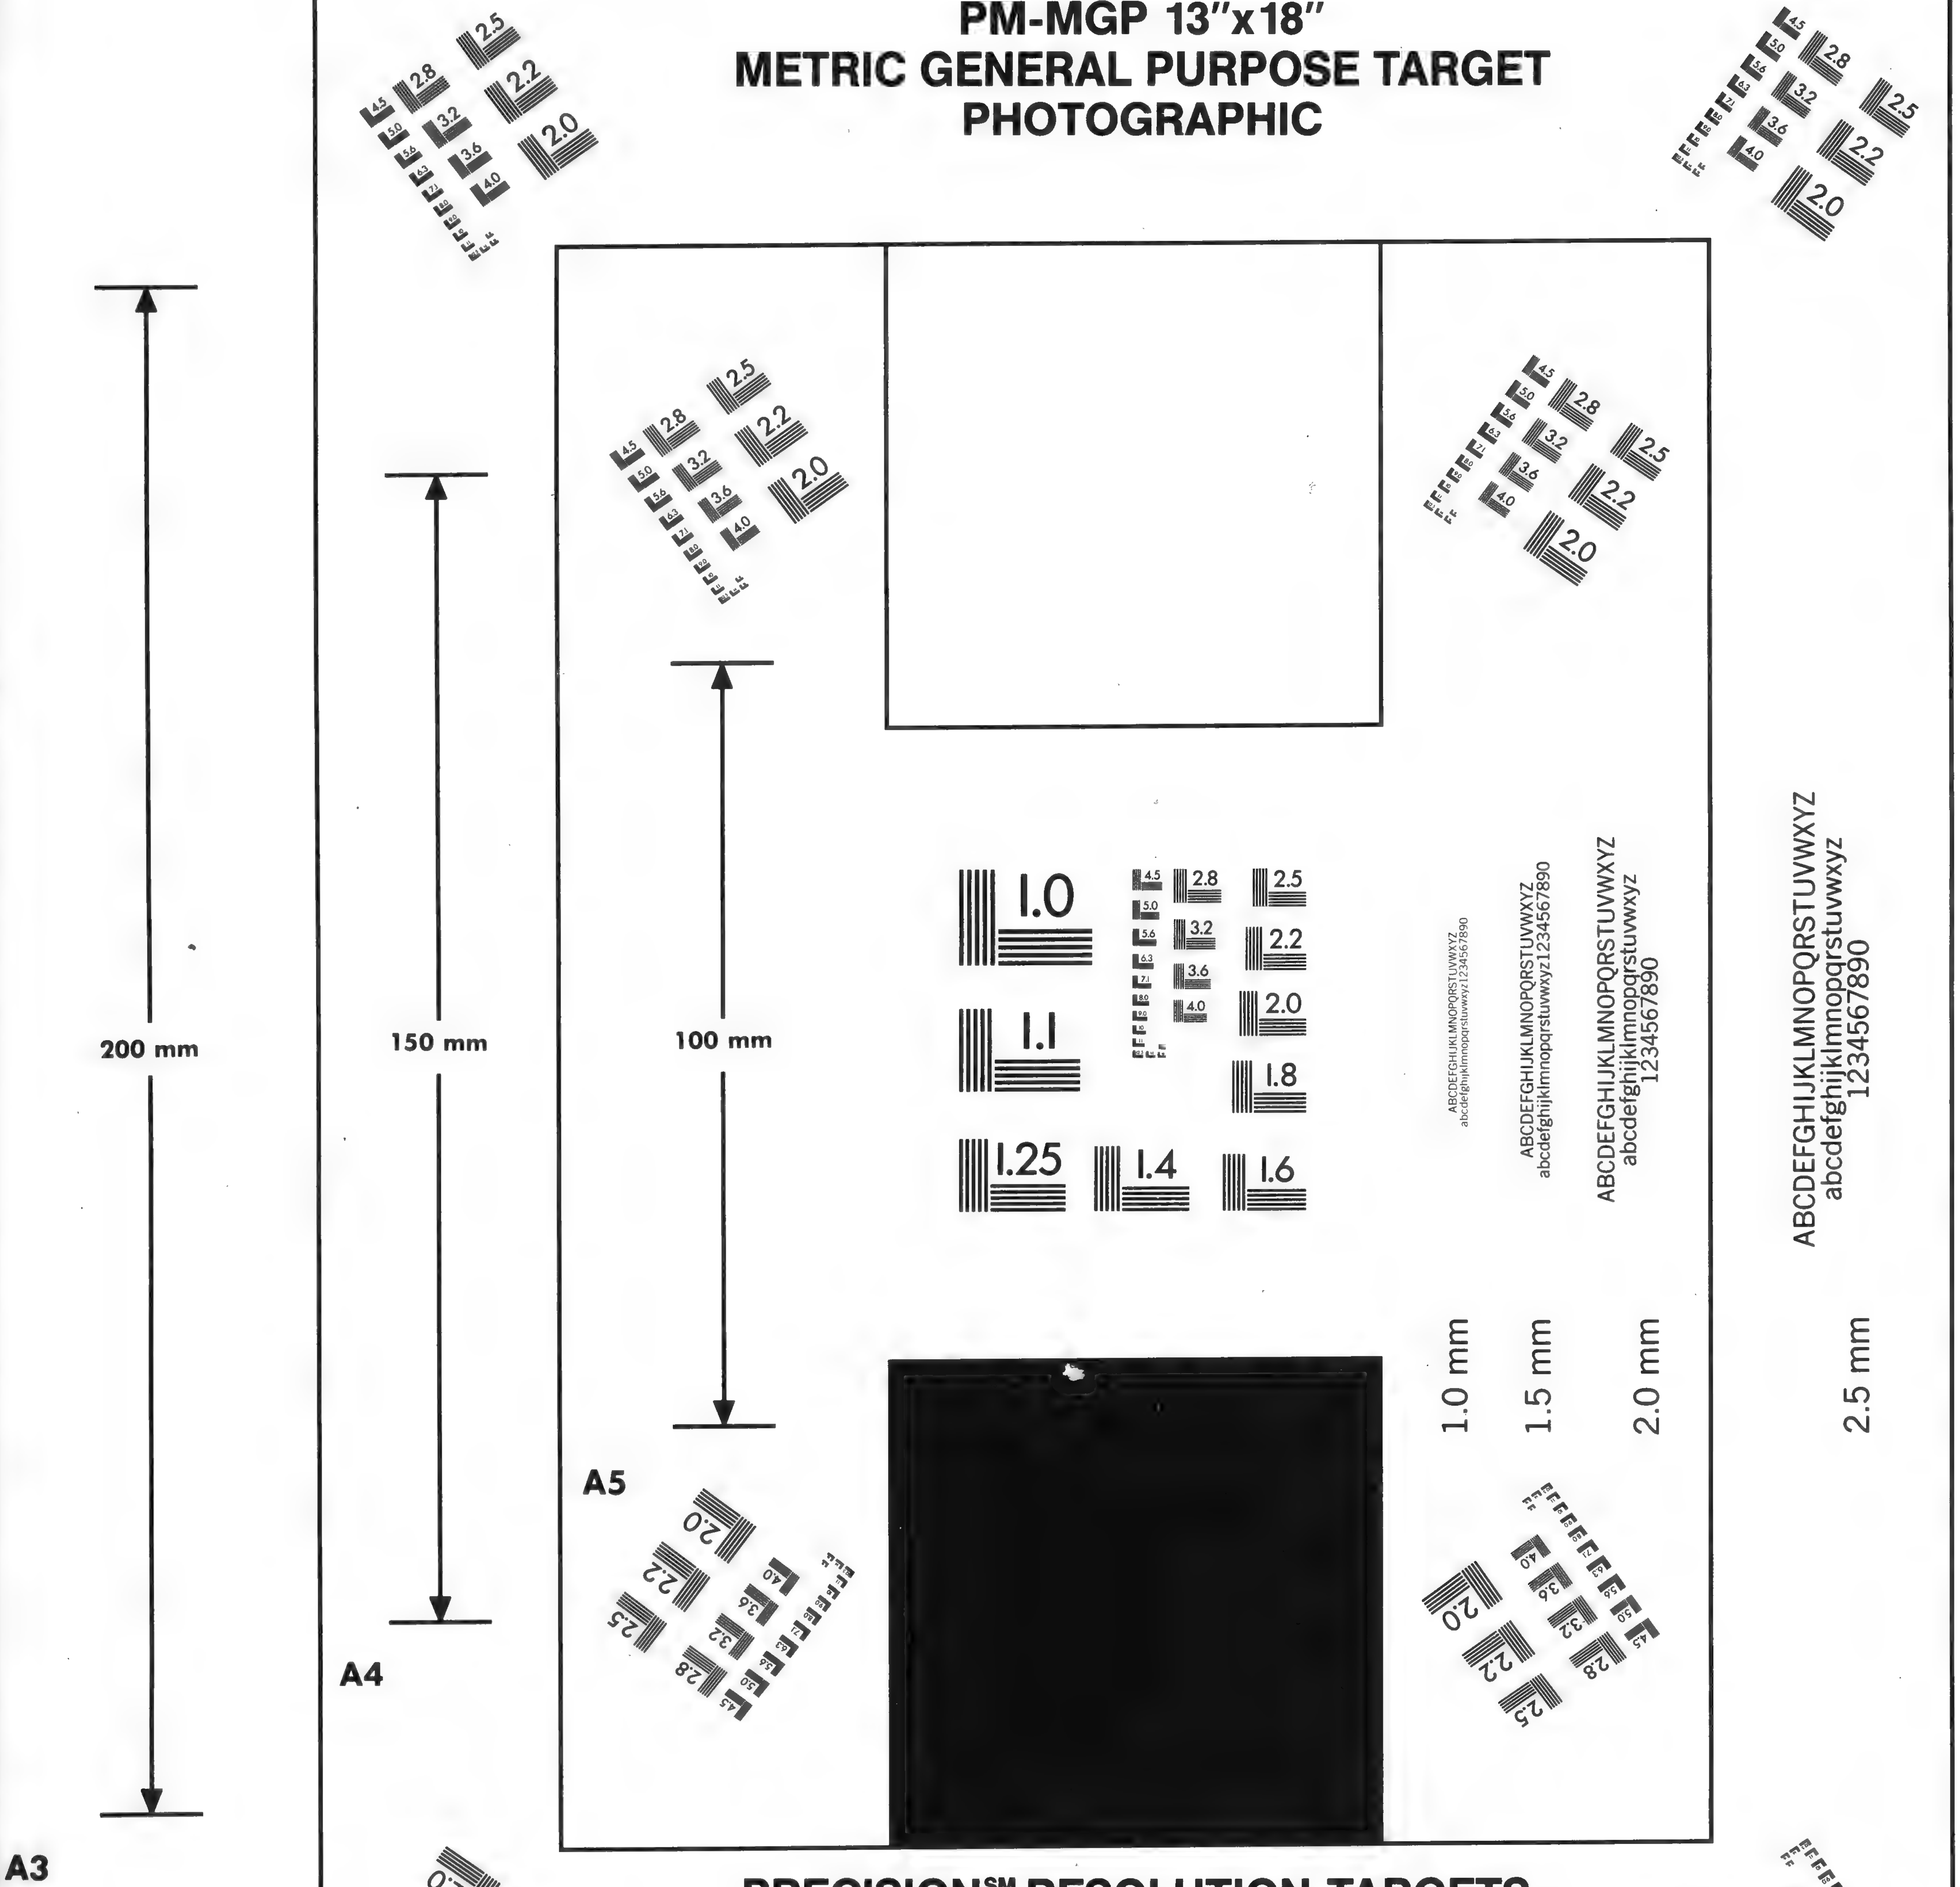
It has been said that Schumann's concerto is no longer suited to great audiences; that the meditations, the shy confessions and the dreams of Schumann are only for a small hall where intimate relations with the hearers may be established. We have heard performances of this concerto when the "dreams" of Schumann put the hearer a-sleep. Now there is virility in this concerto as well as tenderness, romantic beauty. It is not easy to speak of the performance by Mr. Cortot and the orchestra in measured terms. It was an unbaring of Schumann's soul. To mention details, to praise this or that feature of the interpretation, and here pianist and conductor were as one, would be impertinent. It is enough to say that the performance was unsurpassable, never to be forgotten.

Mlle. Tailleferre's concerto is short, melodious, entertaining, with hints here and there at 18th century moods and manner of expression. The lively passages for trumpet were brilliantly played by Mr. Mager, and Mr. Cortot, it is needless to say, was again admirable.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. The program of April 17, 18 will comprise "The Garden of Fand" by Arnold Bax; Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Strauss's "Heldenleben."

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Symphony Programs --- Music Abroad --- P

INGENUE OF THE SIX, ORIENT AND OCCIDENT, MORE STRANGE MUSIC

FRESH WINDS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Tailleferre, the Comely, with a New Concerto in the Ancient Manner and the Present Parisian Mode—Mr. Eichheim with an Orchestral Version of His Chinese Ballet, Legend of the Sixth Century—A Note About Each

ON a fine morning last January, Miss Germaine Tailleferre, in the thirty-third year of her age (as she cheerfully acknowledges in print) debarked in New York. Scrutinizing her, the pier-side reporters experienced an exceeding great joy. Forthwith one of them wrote: "She has the figure of a boy; a pair of soft and twinkling brown eyes; a golden brown bob with a slight natural curl. She has also an excellent dressmaker, and a feeling of her own for the harmonies of good taste. She was wearing a brown beaver that buttoned high at the throat. Underneath she had a heavy wool pull-over and a golden-brown, straight-line frock in faille silk. Her stockings were a shade lighter than her dress; her shoes a shade darker." Upon this radiant vision, now arrayed in an evening gown, Mr. Deems Taylor looked, when Mr. Cortot and the Philadelphia Orchestra played in New York Miss Tailleferre's Concerto for Piano. Not a line did he write in The World about the music until he had declared: "One thing is certain. After beholding Miss Tailleferre and remembering the portraits of her fellow-composers of The Six, she is by far the best-looking of them all." Tomorrow, Mr. Cortot and the Boston Orchestra repeat that same Concerto in Symphony Hall; but Miss Tailleferre cannot adorn the occasion, since that very afternoon she is taking the piano-part in her own piece, with Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Society in New York. Possibly we in Boston may see and applaud when the Concerto is repeated on Saturday evening.

Evidently informed as to American customs, Miss Tailleferre was prepared with a pier-head "statement" wherein she said:

> My Concerto is just one of many compositions I intend to write to bring back the lovely classics on to the time of Mozart. I do not belong to the impresionists but am a modern classiimpressionists but am a modern classitators. They try to reproduce the sounds of the wind, water, rain and the like. That isn't what I want to do. I want to write classical music that is self-explanatory. The old romantic music always had to have a story interpreted through literature. The music we modernists are writing doesn't need a written word.

Two weeks ago at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra in its own city. Mr. Cortot and Mr. Stokowski played the Concerto aforesaid, in D-major for pianoforte and small orchestra—the usual strings; paired flutes, oboes, bassoons; no horns; one trumpet; a pair of kettledrums. For preliminary word Mr. Gilman wrote in the program-book: "Germaine Tailleferre is one of the celebrated 'Groupe des Six'—that little band of young Parisian composers which consisted originally of Miss Tailleferre, Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, Francis Poulenc, Georges Auric and Louis Durey. Miss Tailleferre was a student of harmony and counterpoint at the Conservatory, where she won three first prizes. Among her compositions are a ballet, 'Le Marchand d'Oiseaux,' produced by the Swedish Company at Paris in 1923; a String Quertet; a Ballad for Piano and Orchestra; a Sonata for Violin and Piano; such shorter piano pieces as 'Pastorale' and 'Les Jeux de Plein Air.' [The last-named, music—suggested by games of children in the Gardens of the Luxembourg —has been played in Boston.] She is now at work upon a ballet in collaboration with the painter, Georges Barbier.

"Miss Tailleferre has been commended to the timorous by Henri Prunières's assurance that she 'has no revolutionary tendency, but follows the traditions of Fauré, Debussy and Ravel'; and she has been praised by that shrewd assessor for giving proof of 'an exquisite feminine sensibility and rare good taste.' Monsieur Prunières declares that she can 'write harmonies full of savor without outraging our ears.'

"The Piano Concerto is Miss Tailleferre's most recent piece. It was completed in January, 1924. She has kindly supplied the annotator with the following note:

> The classic form which I have used may be regarded as in a way a reaction against Impressionism and Orientalism, and as an indication of an attempt to find an expression purely musical, free from all literary implications. The music was written in three parts. The first movement (Allegro, D major, 4-4) begins with two themes, exposed concurrently by the orchestra and the piano, but developed separately. The second movement is an Adagio in B minor, 3-4 time. The songful theme is announced at once by the solo-instrument and is taken up at the fourth measure by the flute. The Finale (Allegro non trappo, D major, 6-8) opens with a pianissimo statement of the chief theme by the piano and horns, marcato. There is a second theme, of a more flowing nature, stated by the piano alone. The development section of this movement requires no special comment."

[illegible] ago last Tuesday Mr. Cortot, Mr. Stokow[illegible] and the Philadelphia Orchestra repeated Miss Tailleferre's Concerto in New York. Having heard it, Mr. Gilman departed to the office of The Herald-Tribune and set the keys of his typewriter aglow. He wrote: "The Concerto is a riant and charming music—the only product of the illustrious 'Six' we have ever heard that seems to have been composed for the sheer joy of writing, a blithe and jocund piece. The younger of Miss Tailleferre's male associates, Messieurs Auric and Poulenc, have a similar light-handedness; but they are so busy being satirical that they have little opportunity for mere self-expression; while Messieurs Honegger and Milhaud, able as they are in their several ways, have never given us anything so spontaneous and fresh as this piano concerto.

"It is quite possible that Miss Tailleferre started out with a Theory—in fact, she confided to the patiently plodding annotator of the Philadelphia programs that she was out to react 'against Impressionism and Orientalism, and to find an expression purely musical, exempt from all literary implications.' There is no evil in theories —even Wagner had them; but he often forgot them before he was well on his way in the composition of a score. To judge from the fluent gayety of Miss Tailleferre's music she, too, seems to have forgotten hers. Perhaps it is just as well that she did, and that her music is not too powerfully reactive; for we should hate to have had it make a dent in that reprehensible piece called 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' which immediately preceded hers, and which we are afraid must be classed as both 'impressionistic' and 'literary.'

"But these labels do not matter much one way or the other. Debussy's 'L'Après-midi' continues to be an enchantingly lovely piece of music, even though it does commit the deadly sin of being the two things that Miss Tailleferre doesn't like; and Miss Tailleferre's own pages, even though she offers them to us as a sort of 'Back to the Classics' gonfalon, continue to be, in spite of that, a delightful piece of music. But, after all, it is in her use of what she calls 'the classic form' that she imagines her reaction to consist; and there is no harm in that. 'The classic form' is an exceedingly flexible and companionable thing, and it is good to watch it snuggling up so brightly to Miss Tailleferre; and it is cheering to observe that she is not in the least awed by its momentous past.

"Miss Tailleferre has written in this concerto with an exhilarating buoyancy, handling the contrapuntal style of the Founding Fathers with fluency and distinction. She is content with an unventuresome harmonic scheme—you would never guess that she had dwelt in the den of the Polytonalists. She has captured something of the seventeenth-century manner at its freshest, and has caught an echo of its candid voice, and something of its cool and limpid charm. To be polyphonic with so poised a grace, melodious without banality, is to have pulled off something of an achievement. Miss Tailleferre and Debussy's Faun were born in the same year, and we can pay her no higher compliment than to say that they both seem equally youthful."

Mr. Taylor writing in The World, was not so amiable. He applauds the composer's comeliness and proceeds: "The musical implications were, likewise somewhat scanty. The Concerto is a diatonic music, built of thematic material that lies somewhere between Bach and Handel (it must flatter this venerable pair to be taken up in a serious way by the moderns as much as they have been recently) rather dry in harmony, faintly dissonant upon occasion, but generally quite harmless. And not very interesting." In turn, The Times outdoes itself in middle-class smugness:

> The music was for the greater part bland to the point of innocuousness. The fast movements are written with evident contrapuntal virtuosity, and the first movement has something of the gayety of old dances of the French countryside. Now and then there is a pinch of Stravinskian dissonance, or beneath the garb of the young novice appears the cloven hoof of Darius Milhaud. The slow movement is anything but formidable. It has a lisp, as who should say "mamma," "papa." And above all the music is cheerful, "healthy," especially if by "healthy" be meant an art devoid of sex and refraining specifically from the erratic moods and emotional cross-currents that afflict poor ordinary humanity. . . .
>
> It is "neo-classicism" that composers in France are hotly pursuing today. French music shall escape from the cloying impressionism of Debussy and the fevered romanticism that came with Richard Wagner and other leaders of the nineteenth century. It shall abjure "sentimentalism" and regain clarity, exuberance and logic of method. Hyper-emotionalism shall be vanquished, say they all, including Stravinsky, who has curiously associated with these people. The last survivor of the Debussian period, M. Ravel, shall be exterminated by the frank vigor and sanity of the new school.
>
> But this business is not new at all. It is a movement and a doctrine of a type usually encountered at the end of an artistic period. The romantic and emotional elements will never be absent in living art, whatever its æsthetic principles; the "neo-classicism" preached by Satie and his disciples has suspiciously the character of an attempt, vain and artificial, to substitute talk of the past for creative energy insufficient to build a future. Miss Tailleferre's Concerto inclines us more than ever to the belief that the influences which went to its making are fashions rather than true undercurrents of the period. Smart, "chic," this movement is no doubt felt to be; but we are after more than dilettantism in music.

Concerning the Chinese

"For the first time with full orchestra," the performance tomorrow afternoon of Mr. Henry Eichheim's Oriental ballet music might be labelled. Yet this miniature Chinese mimodrama has been performed, wth reduced score, in Chicago. No longer ago than New Year's Day last Mr. Bolm's ballet danced to it and upon that occasion Mr. Felix Borowski wrote concerning it in these columns.

"Having travelled extensively in Oriental countries," said Mr. Borowski, "Mr. Echheim not only has cultivated a love for the music of China, Japan, Java and other lands, but he has evolved a technic which permits him to set that music in modern and occidental environment without destroying its original effect.

"This ability to translate the East into the West the composer sets forth in his ballet, called in performance at Chicago 'The Rivals'. The action of the piece concerns two Chinese generals of ancient times who fight each other with fatal results to one. The wife of the stricken soldier arrives on the scene at the moment the fatal thrust had been made, and, taking her dead husband's spear, she commands his antagonist to continue the battle with her. The woman is very beautiful and the living general is very fair, and as they fight they look upon each other so that there are lulls in the duel. The wife prays for help so that she may resist the thing that makes

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

Amusements

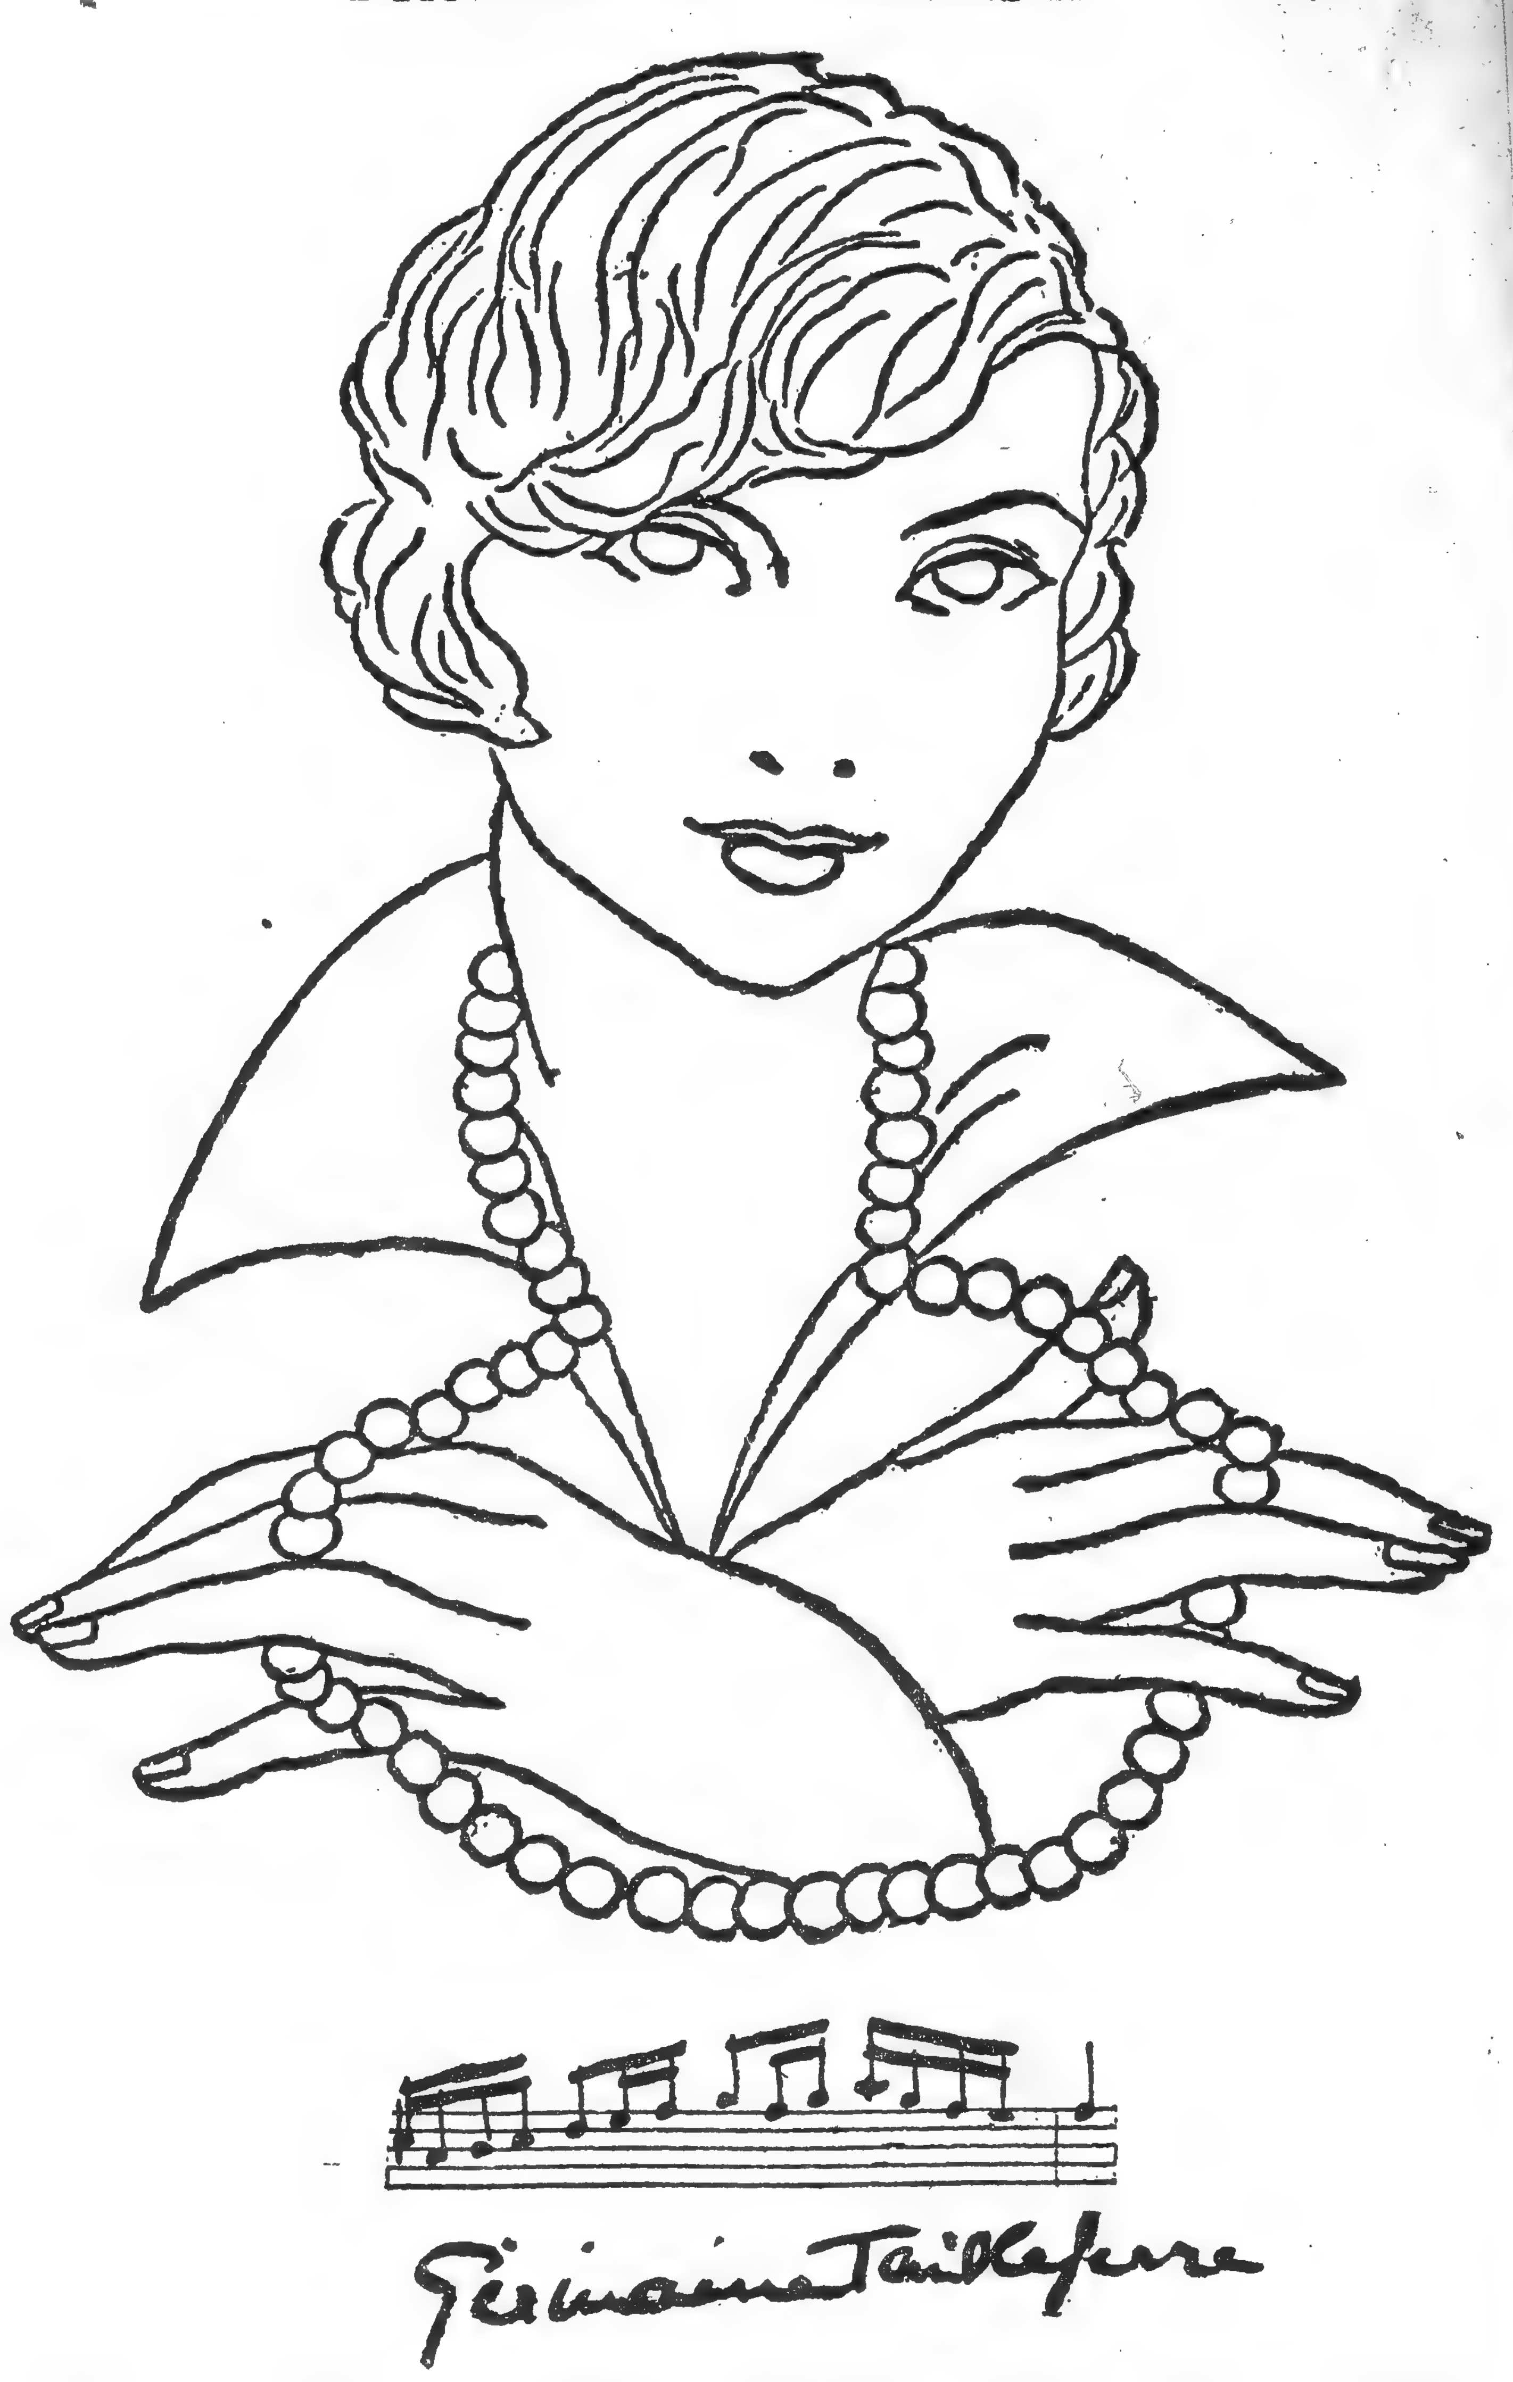
INGENUE OF THE SIX, ORIENT AND OCCIDENT, MORE STRANGE MUSIC

Continued from Preceding Page

her arm weak and her eyes tender instead of stern, and having prayed, she fights again. At length the battle ends, for the woman thrusts her adversary's spear into her own heart and the man draws her sword across his throat.

"In order to present this little tragedy Mr. Mr. Eichheim and his collaborator, Mr. Bolm, staged it in the fashion of the oriental heater, a sensible decision which lent ovelty and piquancy to the work. With e exception of the quiet prayer made by e wife before a shrine, the sole action f 'The Rivals' is accomplished with the hrust of spears; yet it cannot be said hat the lack of varied incident brought onotony upon the piece. The music is f modernity modern, but while neither of he Chinese generals, if they had been the genuine articles, might have recognized such music as their own, Mr. Eichheim made his orientalism convincing enough to people who have not even a bowing acquaintance with the natives of Kuei-tcheu or Kaiefung. Not only the composer's pungent harmony, but his bells and gongs made 'The Rivals' a fascinating score."

Priestess of Modernism



Likeness and Autograph of the Parisian Composer Whose Concerto for Piano and Orchestra Stands on Tomorrow's Symphony Program

---

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 4 1925

DAMROSCH & KOUSSEVITZKY.

Lawrence Tibbett, the American baritone of the Metropolitan Opera, appears as soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon at Aeolian Hall. He will sing the "Credo" from Verdi's "Otello," which won him his recognition at the opera, and Schumann's "Dichterliebe."

Mr. Damrosch will play the Dvorak "Carnival" overture, a pastoral scene, "Tuolumne," by a young Italian named Maganini (this being its first performance here), and the Franck symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky will bring the chorus of the Cecilia Society of Boston with him for the final pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next. At the first concert they will be heard in Seriabin's "Prometheus, the Poem of Fire," and at the second in the dance scene from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

The Thursday programme will otherwise include a Handel concerto grosso and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme of Haydn." The Saturday programme will hold Ottorine Respighi's arrangement of "Old Airs and Dances" and Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes."

Win Honors at Symphony

Advertiser Apr. 4

Cortot, Foote, Echheim and Koussevitzky All Share Applause at Brilliant Matinee Concert

One of the foremost French pianists, Alfred Cortot, is soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. His appearance at the matinee concert yesterday was a triumph.

Alfred Cortot

But the remarkably talented Frenchman by no means monopolized the honors. A large share of the applause went to Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducted in his most brilliant style, and to two of the composers represented on the program, Arthur Foote and Henry Eichheim.

Mr. Eichheim, who formerly played in the orchestra, conducted his "Chinese Legend," given for the first time in full orchestral form. It is bizarre, delightful, full of Oriental color and piquancy. Mr. Foote, much admired Bostonian, was applauded after the performance of his suave E major suite for string orchestra.

The brilliant Cortot was recalled half a dozen times, following his masterly performance of the Schumann concerto. He also played the solo part in the new concerto by Germaine Tailleferre, a young member of the Parisian modernist group. The concerto pleased the audience, being gay and supremely clever.

Koussevitzky, to close the concert, led the orchestra through a dazzling performance of Ravel's symphonic poem, "The Waltz," which tional success of the picture in Mexico City caused President Calles to ask that it be shown at his home.

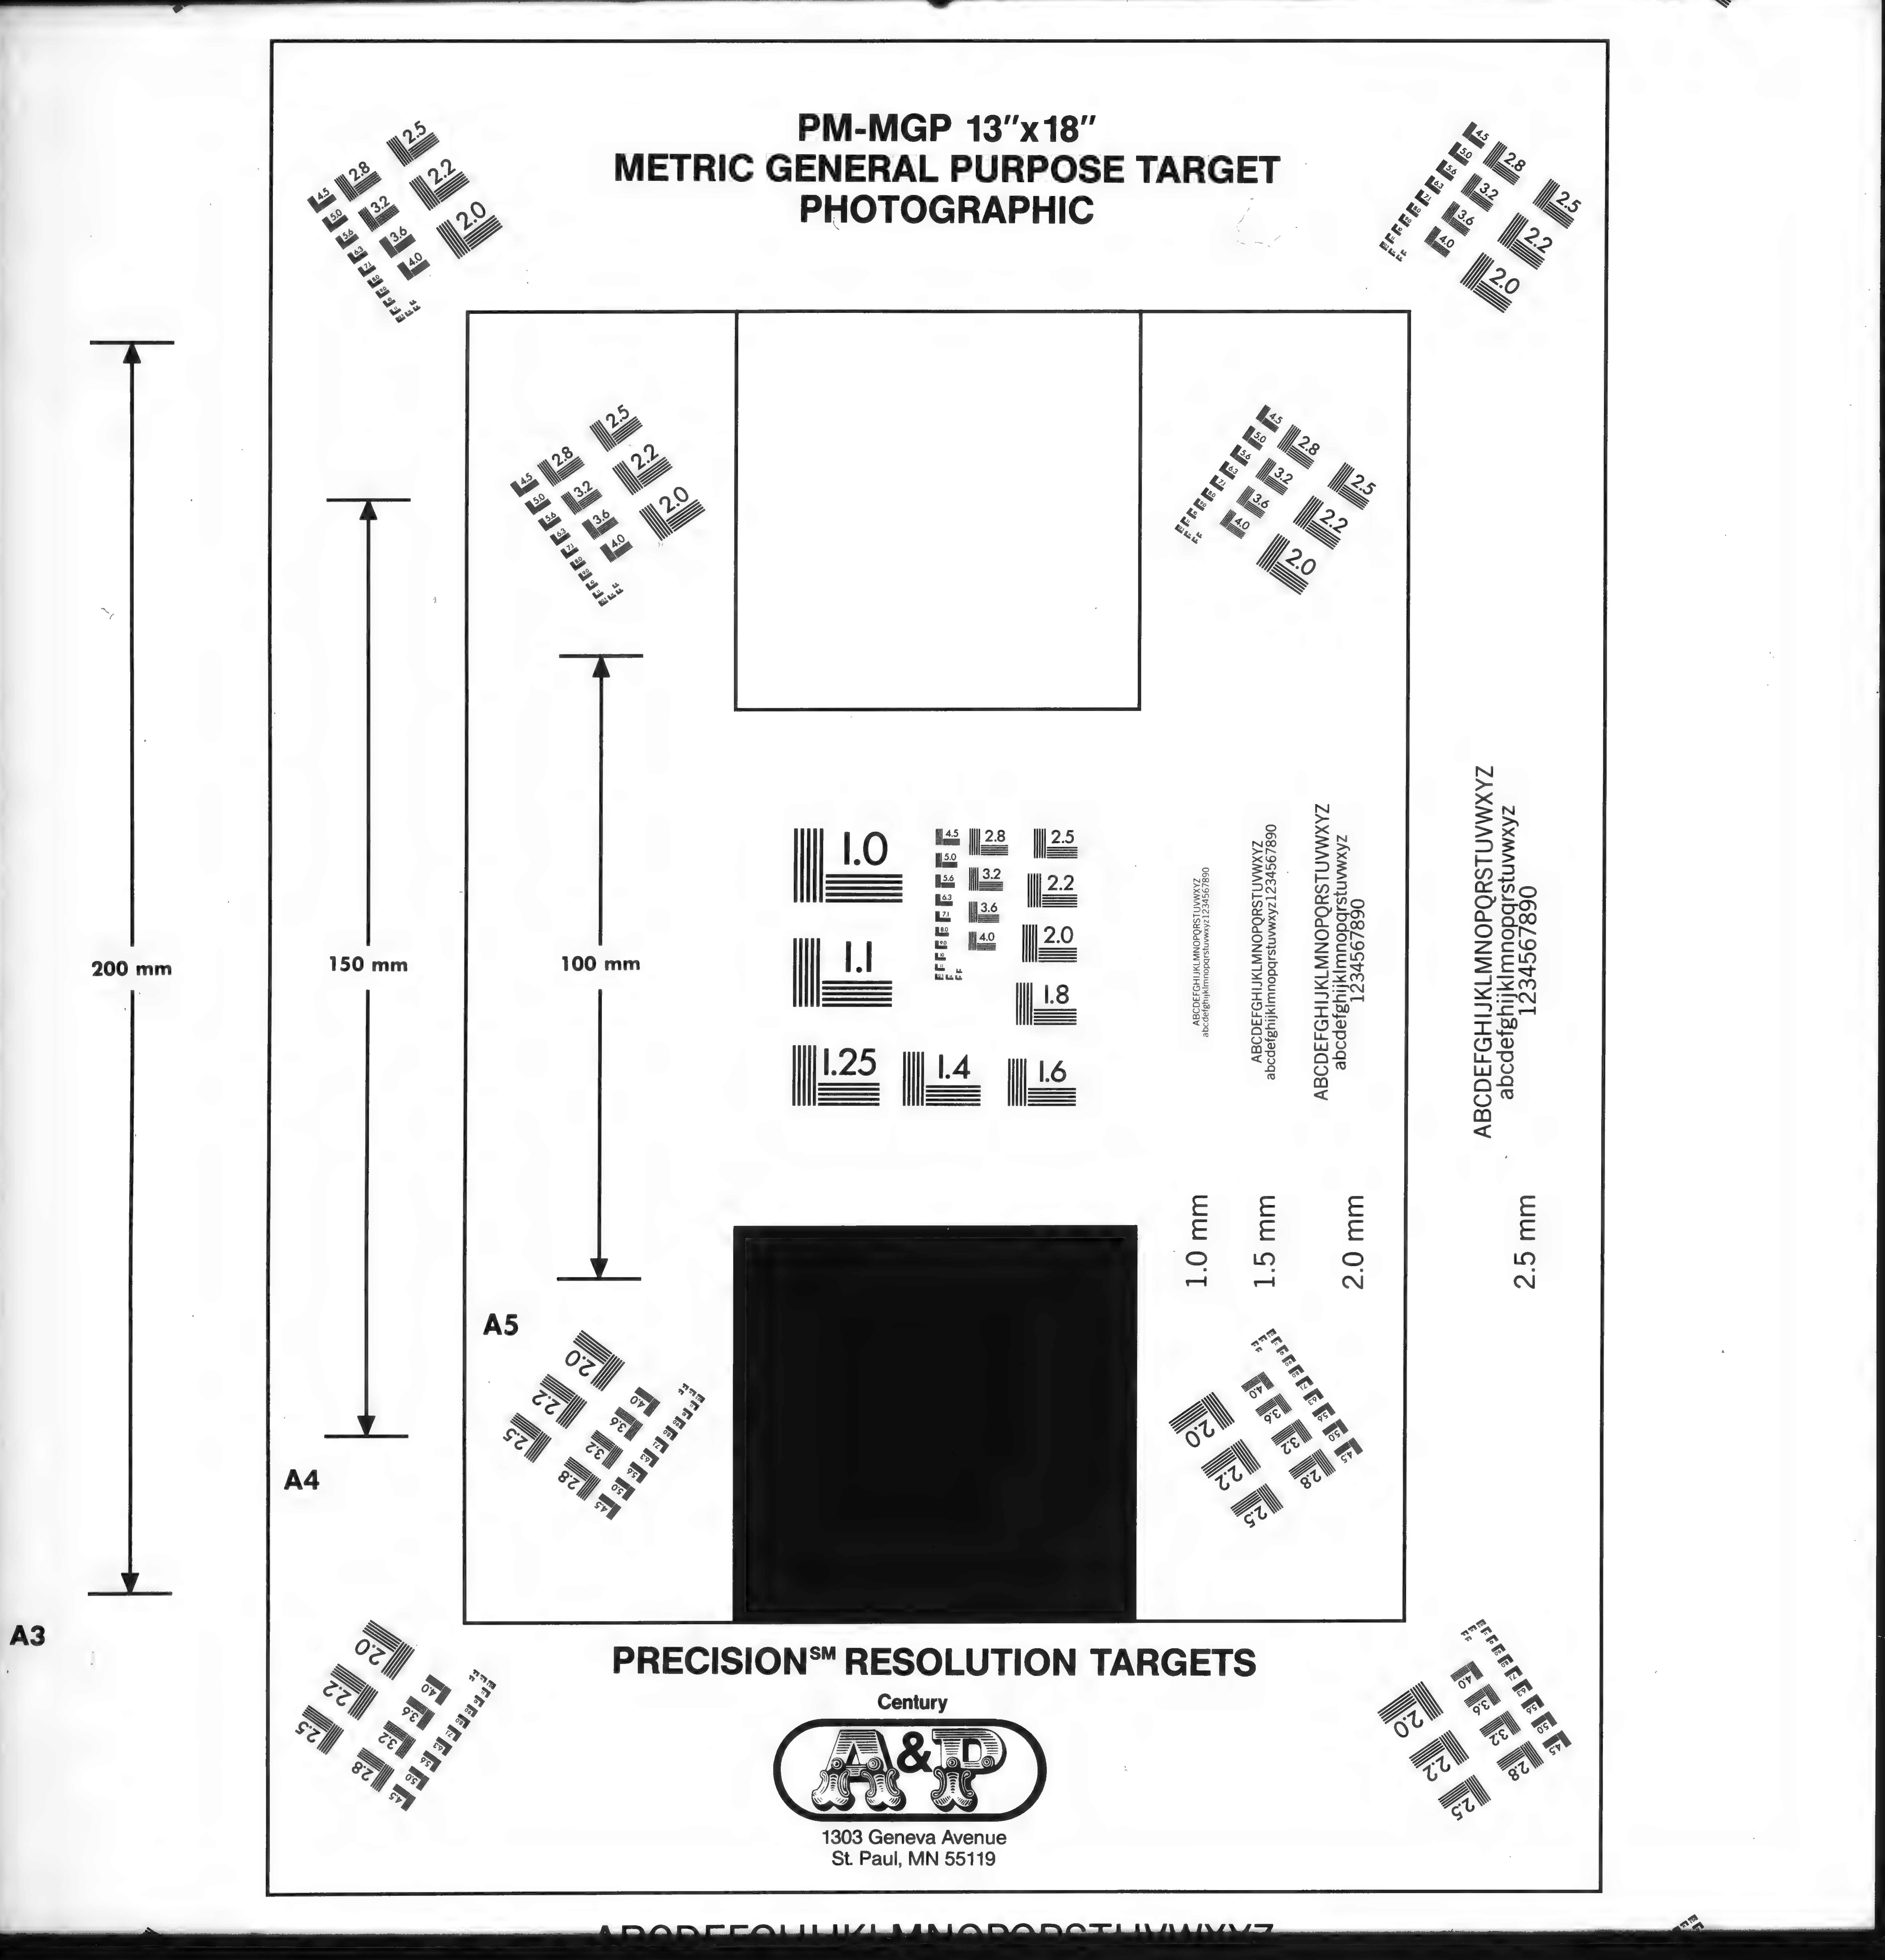
REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.2
2.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

76

CORTOT SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Novelties by Eichheim and Tailleferre Played

Globe Ap 4

Alfred Cortot, noted French pianist already heard here more than once with the Boston Symphony in the past few seasons was again the soloist at yesterday's concert. He was cordially applauded after Schumann's concerto. A new concerto by Germaine Tailleferre and "A Chinese Legend" by Henry Eichheim, for 20 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony and now living in California, were the novelties on the program. Mr Eichheim, who conducted his own piece, was warmly applauded both before and after it was performed.

Another Americon composer, Arthur Foote, rose in his place in the audience, when Mr Koussevitzky beckoned to him to share the applause that followed the revival of his suite for strings in E major, first performed in 1909. Ravel's "La Valse" was the other number.

Mr Cortot first came to Boston in 1918. The concert at which he made his debut here, given by the Paris Conservatoire orchestra, began with the National anthems of this country and of France. He seemed yesterday a less notable pianist than in 1918, when circumstances outside the musical world influenced opinions even within that world.

There is no doubt that Mr Cortot thoroughly understands Schumann's music. He played the more tranquil portions of it with marked delicacy of style. He felt the rhythmic urge of the final allegro. But he is unable to extort from the piano sonority and volume of tone, and not capable of effortless perfection of technique. One was more impressed by his well schooled musicianship than by his virtuosity. For Schumann's concerto both are needed.

He played Miss Tailleferre's concerto fluently. She has as a composer all the necessary gifts and knowledge except the talent of inventing or borrowing significant musical ideas. She has tried in this concerto "to escape from impressionism and from Orientalism, to find an expression purely musical, free from all literary implications." In this she is perfectly right, aesthetically as well as in accord with the latest musical fashion, set, in this case, by Stravinsky. But his concerto has significant and beautiful musical ideas, or themes in it and hers has not.

Music is indeed a world of its own, with no direct relationship to the world we live in. In music it is usually a mistake to sacrifice form in the hope of gaining expressiveness, as the modernists are beginning to discover and as Mozart perfectly knew. But Miss Tailleferre, unlike Mozart, has not the gift of creating new forms and of revivifying old ones. She has written music that is a cross between Dittersdorf 18th century and hackwork jazz 20th, music that is hopelessly dull.

Mr Eichheim's intelligent interest in Chinese and other Oriental music will be remembered by those who have heard his suite, "Oriental Impressions." The "Chinese Legend," played yesterday for the first time in a version for large orchestra, was originally a ballet performed in Chicago by Adolf Bolm's "Ballet Intime." Chinese ceremonial music is frequently employed in it, there is a section representing a scene in a Buddhist temple with many curious gongs and drums from China added to the orchestra. The authentic note of exoticism is in this music. A love theme not Oriental in origin is less successfully handled.

Ravel's "La Valse" was again brilliantly performed. Mr Foote's suite, scholarly in style yet agreeably light in substance, was given another Koussevitzky performance of marked excellence. In the Schumann, especially the finale, Koussevitzky's brilliant and dramatic conception of the music quite eclipsed the quieter mood of M. Cortot. Such achievements as these are continued proof that we have a conductor of genius at these

---

NEW YORK
WORLD

[illegible] 1925

Serge Koussevitzky will make his final appearance of the season here at the last pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At both performances Koussevitzky will perform two works with chorus; Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" and Borodin's Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor." Scriabin's last orchestral work had its premiere in Moscow and Leningrad under Koussevitzky; on this occasion the composer took the piano part. He also went with Koussevitzky on one of the tours of the Volga when several of Scriabin's scores were performed.

The choral part in "Prometheus" will be given by the Cecilia Society of Boston. Alexander Steinert will have the piano part.

On the Thursday program also will be Randel's Concerto Grosso in D major for string orchestra and solo string quartet and Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn.

The remaining numbers of the final matinee performance will be Respighi's arrangement of old dances and and Debussy's "Nocturnes, "Festivals."

Monitor
April 4

American Music From Koussevitzky

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, gave its twenty-first concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Foote—Suite in E major for string orchestra op. 63
Eichheim—"A Chinese Legend"
Schumann—Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra.
Tailleferre—Concerto for piano and orchestra
Ravel—"La Valse"

Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky turned his attention to American composers. To be sure he has already played Professor Hill's Scherzo for two pianos and orchestra and Aaron Copland's Symphony for organ and orchestra, but it is possible that these works were played at the suggestion of the soloists taking part in them rather than of his own volition.

The American composer has often been accused of having succumbed to this or that foreign influence. This may be all too true, but it is probably no more so than is the case with many a composer of other nationality. On the other hand, a certain glamour hangs round music from parts less familiar and it often happens that a distinctly unworthy composition by a Frenchman, Italian or German (to say nothing of a Russian) gets more than its deserving share of attention and praise.

The two American pieces played yesterday need fear no comparison with foreign production. They are skillfully and gratefully written and contain no small measure of interesting material, well put together and aptly expressed.

Mr. Foote's Suite is not altogether unfamiliar. Nevertheless it wears well. Conceived according to classical formulas, it is not conventional music. It mirrors the sensitive, imaginative, refined musical nature of its composer. Every page is a testimony to his high ideals and his mastery of his art. It is music which charms the ear and satsfies the intellect as well. It also touches the heart, for who can listen to the Adagietto, which interrupts the Pizzicato movement, and not feel with pleasure the delicate sentiment (none the less deep because of its delicacy) which underlies every measure? Surely America is not in such a bad way musically if an American (and who is more so than Mr. Foote?) can produce such genuine, sincere, music as this Suite!

Mr. Eichheim set himself an entirely different task in his "Chinese Legend." He has sought out new paths and new means of musical expression. Yet he has not sacrificed good taste for the sake of originality. The Orientalism of his music is not forced. It is not assumed. It is the natural means of expression of a nature deeply sensitive to such impressions. And for this reason it does not startle the hearer. This Legend is powerfully dramatic. It really stirs the emotions and the imagination, and is no less effective apart from the scenario which it was originally intended to accompany. Mr. Eichheim conducted his work unostentatiously but none the less effectively. He was content to let his music produce its own effect, without exuberance of gesture, with no attempt at visualizing its various measures. Such restraint is occasionally refreshing.

The other novelty of the afternoon was Miss Tailleferre's Concerto for piano and orchestra. No more simplicity, a recreation of a work somewhat time-worn. Mr. Cortot restored its pristime beauties. He likewise did his best with Miss Tailleferre's Concerto and contrived to work wonders with its ungrateful and uninteresting measures.

The program concluded with Ravel's "La Valse," which Mr. Koussevitzky had already played here this season. There seems to be no particular reason for the repetition of this composition after such a short interval. The same might be said of the repetition last week of Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne." These pieces are all very well in their way, but they do not present difficult problems to the listener. Many a new work played here this season deserves a second hearing, but hardly these two.

S. M.

Advertiser
April 5

PENSION PROGRAM

Music by Wagner and Richard Strauss will comprise the pension fund program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon, April 19. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and three Wagner numbers, the "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and "Tannhaeuser" overture.

NEXT SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week, playing in his own second concerto. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand," which is new to Boston.

Globe
April 5

Mr Koussevitzky's program for the next pair of Symphony concerts, April 17 and 18, includes Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," unheard here since Mengelberg conducted it two years ago with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Bax's "The Garden of Fand"; and Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, with the composer as soloist.

For the Pension Fund concert April 19, the program includes "Ein Heldenleben" and Wagnerian excerpts, including the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

There are no Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series this week, though the orchestra will offer two young people's concerts tomorrow and Tuesday at 4 before it departs on its last tour of the season.

In order that Mr Koussevitzky may catch a ship that will get him to Europe in time for important engagements there the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have shifted the date of the final concert in the Saturday series to Friday evening May 1. The final Friday concert will be given that afternoon. The Symphony has never before been in the "two a day" class.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The fifth and final appearance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music will take place Friday evening.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at this concert two choral works—Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor." Koussevitzky was the first to produce "Prometheus," and indeed, a number of Scriabin's principal works, in Russia. The composer took the piano part at the first Moscow performance of this score. The chorus at this performance will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

The remainder of the program will constitute Handel's "Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D Major," for string orchestra and solo string quartet; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," in observance of Good Friday, the date of the concert.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

APR 5 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKI and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making their final visit this season, will be heard at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening in Scriabin's "Promethues," assisted by a chorus; Borodin's Polovtsin Dances from "Prince Igor," concerto grosso, by Handel; variations on a Haydn theme, by Brahms. The Scriabin and Borodin works will be repeated at the Saturday matinee concert, the programme also including Respighi's Old Dances and Airs; and Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals."

1925 Post April 4

SYMPHONY LIST BEST AT EDGES

Eichheim Conducts Own Piece---Cortot Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Purely as a matter of personal opinion it may be here recorded that the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon began well and ended well and that between times—that is to say in the piano concertos of Schumann and of Miss Germaine Tailleferre—came frequent tepidity and dullness.

SUFFERS BY CONTRAST

Thus to disparage the central portion of yesterday's concert is to complain neither of the playing of that excellent pianist, Alfred Cortot, nor of the accompaniment afforded him by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Both were, in fact, admirable. But placed after the uncommonly stimulating "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim (in its first performance with enlarged orchestra), Schumann's fast fading romanticism seemed to have lost still another shade or two.

And although there were "moments" in Miss Tailleferre's piece, notably in the lively if thematically undistinguished Finale, yet this music in which the feminine member of the Parisian Groupe des Six would recapture the simplicity of an earlier day, may be inelegantly but not too inaccurately described, not as simple, but as "simp."

Mr. Foote in Audience

At the beginning of the rather oddly assorted programme of this week's pair of concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky has placed Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra, now making its third appearance at the Symphony Concerts—an unusual honor for an American composition, since native productions are so often given a single performance and thereafter consigned to oblivion, but one that Mr. Foote's gracious, well-made music eminently deserves. Present in the audience, the composer was twice summoned to rise from his seat in acknowledgment of the unmistakably hearty applause. Incidentally the performance was one to present this music to the best possible advantage.

Already some account of Mr. Eichheim's newest venture in orientalized music has appeared in these columns. It remains to be said that this score illustrates with remarkable graphicness the incidents of the mimed tragedy for which it was composed; that, whereas Mr. Eichheim's other Oriental pieces have been merely scenic, this Legend is music at once human and vividly dramatic; and finally that as music per se the score impresses by reason of its composer's absolute mastery of his material, which is in part original, in part traditional.

Conducted by Composer

To call Mr. Eichheim a mere arranger of Eastern tunes would in this instance be more than ever inaccurate. Both symphonically and dramatically this Legend is a notable achievement. And the composer, who conducted his music with authority although at the end he seemed scarcely to realize the dynamic possibilities of his own score, was many times recalled.

Mr. Koussevitzky, yesterday, had his chief innings in the final number, Ravel's melodically seductive and rhythmically intriguing "La Valse," already played earlier in the season. The performance of yesterday was, if such a thing be possible, even more brilliant and more intoxicating than that of a few weeks ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 5 1925

Closing Boston Orchestra Concert Next Friday Night.

The fifth and final Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, will be given next Friday evening at the Academy of Music. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at this concert two choral works, Scriabine's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and Borodine's Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

The remainder of the programme will constitute Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 (D major) for string orchestra and solo string quartet; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal" (in observance of Good Friday, the day of the concert).

Scriabine's "Prometheus," never before heard in Brooklyn, is the ultimate and most huge of the famous Russian composer's scores, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. The work was inspired by the theosophic divinity, the son of the God of fire who descends to enlighten struggling humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the God head. The culmination of this "poem of fire," revealing the final unification of the chosen with God, is considered one of the most stupendous climaxes in music.

The chorus at this performance wlli be that of the Cecilia Society of Boston, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 1925

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY will make his final appearance of the season here at the last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, April 10. At this concert Koussewitsky will perform two works with chorus, Scriabin's "Prometheus," a Poem of Fire, and Borodini's Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor." Scriabin's tone-poem had its first performances in Moscow and Petrograd under Koussewitsky's baton, the composer taking the piano part. The choral part in "Prometheus" will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm J. Lang, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert. The remainder of the program will constitute Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, for string orchestra and solo string quartet; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal" in observance of Good Friday, the date of the concert.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 5 1925

Last Concert of the Boston Orchestra Here

Serge Koussevitzky will make his final appearance of the season here at the last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, April 10.

At this concert Koussevitzky will perform two works with chorus, Scriabin's "Prometheus," "A Poem of Fire" and Borodini's Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor." Scriabin's ultimate orchestral work had its first performances in Moscow and Petrograd under Koussevitzky's baton, the composer taking the piano part. The late composer also went with him on one of his tours of the Volga when certain of Scriabin's scores were performed. The choral part in "Prometheus" will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm J. Lang, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

The remainder of the program will constitute Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D Major for string orchestra and solo string quartet, "Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries," and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," in observance of Good Friday, the date of the concert.

if taken is greataken with
, M. D.

CORTOT SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noveltles by Eichheim and Tailleferre Played

Globe Apr 4

Alfred Cortot, noted French pianist already heard here more than once with the Boston Symphony in the past few seasons was again the soloist at yesterday's concert. He was cordially applauded after Schumann's concerto. A new concerto by Germaine Tailleferre and "A Chinese Legend" by Henry Eichheim, for 20 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony and now living in California, were the novelties on the program. Mr Eichheim, who conducted his own piece, was warmly applauded both before and after it was performed.

Another Americon composer, Arthur Foote, rose in his place in the audience, when Mr Koussevitzky beckoned to him to share the applause that followed the revival of his suite for strings in E major, first performed in 1909. Ravel's "La Valse" was the other number.

Mr Cortot first came to Boston in 1918. The concert at which he made his debut here, given by the Paris Conservatoire orchestra, began with the National anthems of this country and of France. He seemed yesterday a less notable pianist than in 1918, when circumstances outside the musical world influenced opinions even within that world.

There is no doubt that Mr Cortot thoroughly understands Schumann's music. He played the more tranquil portions of it with marked delicacy of style. He felt the rhythmic urge of the final allegro. But he is unable to extort from the piano sonority and volume of tone, and not capable of effortless perfection of technique. One was more impressed by his well schooled musicianship than by his virtuosity. For Schumann's concerto both are needed.

He played Miss Tailleferre's concerto fluently. She has as a composer all the necessary gifts and knowledge except the talent of inventing or borrowing significant musical ideas. She has tried in this concerto "to escape from impressionism and from Orientalism, to find an expression purely musical, free from all literary implications." In this she is perfectly right, aesthetically as well as in accord with the latest musical fashion, set, in this case, by Stravinsky. But his concerto has significant and beautiful musical ideas, or themes in it and hers has not.

Music is indeed a world of its own, with no direct relationship to the world we live in. In music it is usually a mistake to sacrifice form in the hope of gaining expressiveness, as the modernists are beginning to discover and as Mozart perfectly knew. But Miss Tailleferre, unlike Mozart, has not the gift of creating new forms and of revivifying old ones. She has written music that is a cross between Dittersdorf 18th century and hackwork jazz 20th, music that is hopelessly dull.

Mr Eichheim's intelligent interest in Chinese and other Oriental music will be remembered by those who have heard his suite, "Oriental Impressions." The "Chinese Legend," played yesterday for the first time in a version for large orchestra, was originally a ballet performed in Chicago by Adolf Bolm's "Ballet Intime." Chinese ceremonial music is frequently employed in it, there is a section representing a scene in a Buddhist temple with many curious gongs and drums from China added to the orchestra. The authentic note of exoticism is in this music. A love theme not Oriental in origin is less successfully handled.

Ravel's "La Valse" was again brilliantly performed. Mr Foote's suite, scholarly in style yet agreeably light in substance, was given another Koussevitzky performance of marked excellence. In the Schumann, especially the finale, Koussevitzky's brilliant and dramatic conception of the music quite eclipsed the quieter mood of M. Cortot. Such achievements as these are continued proof that we have a conductor of genius at these con-

---

NEW YORK
WORLD

.925

Serge Koussevitzky will make his final appearance of the season here at the last pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At both performances Koussevitzky will perform two works with chorus; Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" and Borodin's Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor." Scriabin's last orchestral work had its premiere in Moscow and Leningrad under Koussevitzky; on this occasion the composer took the piano part. He also went with Koussevitzky on one of the tours of the Volga when several of Scriabin's scores were performed.

The choral part in "Prometheus" will be given by the Cecilia Society of Boston. Alexander Steinert will have the piano part.

On the Thursday program also will be Randel's Concerto Grosso in D major for string orchestra and solo string quartet and Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn.

The remaining numbers of the final matinee performance will be Respighi's arrangement of old dances and and Debussy's "Nocturnes," "Festivals."

Monitor Apr 4

American Music From Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, gave its twenty-first concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Foote—Suite in E major for string orchestra op. 63
Eichheim—"A Chinese Legend"
Schumann—Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra.
Tailleferre—Concerto for piano and orchestra
Ravel—"La Valse"

Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky turned his attention to American composers. To be sure he has already played Professor Hill's Scherzo for two pianos and orchestra and Aaron Copland's Symphony for organ and orchestra, but it is possible that these works were played at the suggestion of the soloists taking part in them rather than of his own volition.

The American composer has often been accused of having succumbed to this or that foreign influence. This may be all too true, but it is probably no more so than is the case with many a composer of other nationality. On the other hand, a certain glamour hangs round music from parts less familiar and it often happens that a distinctly unworthy composition by a Frenchman, Italian or German (to say nothing of a Russian) gets more than its deserving share of attention and praise.

The two American pieces played yesterday need fear no comparison with foreign production. They are skillfully and gratefully written and contain no small measure of interesting material, well put together and aptly expressed.

Mr. Foote's Suite is not altogether unfamiliar. Nevertheless it wears well. Conceived according to classical formulas, it is not conventional music. It mirrors the sensitive, imaginative, refined musical nature of its composer. Every page is a testimony to his high ideals and his mastery of his art. It is music which charms the ear and satsfies the intellect as well. It also touches the heart, for who can listen to the Adagietto, which interrupts the Pizzicato movement, and not feel with pleasure the delicate sentiment (none the less deep because of its delicacy) which underlies every measure? Surely America is not in such a bad way musically if an American (and who is more so than Mr. Foote?) can produce such genuine, sincere, music as this Suite!

Mr. Eichheim set himself an entirely different task in his "Chinese Legend." He has sought out new paths and new means of musical expression. Yet he has not sacrificed good taste for the sake of originality. The Orientalism of his music is not forced. It is not assumed. It is the natural means of expression of a nature deeply sensitive to such impressions. And for this reason it does not startle the hearer. This Legend is powerfully dramatic. It really stirs the emotions and the imagination, and is no less effective apart from the scenario which it was originally intended to accompany. Mr. Eichheim conducted his work unostentatiously but none the less effectively. He was content to let his music produce its own effect, without exuberance of gesture, with no attempt at visualizing its various measures. Such restraint is occasionally refreshing.

The other novelty of the afternoon was Miss Tailleferre's Concerto for piano and orchestra. No more inconplicity, a recreation of a work somewhat time-worn. Mr. Cortot restored its pristine beauties. He likewise did his best with Miss Tailleferre's Concerto and contrived to work wonders with its ungrateful and uninteresting measures.

The program concluded with Ravel's "La Valse," which Mr. Koussevitzky had already played here this season. There seems to be no particular reason for the repetition of this composition after such a short interval. The same might be said of the repetition last week of Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne." These pieces are all very well in their way, but they do not present difficult problems to the listener. Many a new work played here this season deserves a second hearing, but hardly these two.

S. M.

Advertiser April 5

PENSION PROGRAM

Music by Wagner and Richard Strauss will comprise the pension fund program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon, April 19. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and three Wagner numbers, the "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and "Tannhaeuser" overture.

NEXT SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week, playing in his own second concerto. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand," which is new to Boston.

April 5

Mr Koussevitzky's program for the next pair of Symphony concerts, April 17 and 18, includes Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," unheard here since Mengelberg conducted it two years ago with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Bax's "The Garden of Fand"; and Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, with the composer as soloist.

For the Pension Fund concert April 19, the program includes "Ein Heldenleben" and Wagnerian excerpts, including the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried"; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

There are no Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series this week, though the orchestra will offer two young people's concerts tomorrow and Tuesday at 4 before it departs on its last tour of the season.

In order that Mr Koussevitzky may catch a ship that will get him to Europe in time for important engagements there the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have shifted the date of the final concert in the Saturday series to Friday evening May 1. The final Friday concert will be given that afternoon. The Symphony has never before been in the "two a day" class.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 5 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The fifth and final appearance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music will take place Friday evening.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at this concert two choral works—Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor." Koussevitzky was the first to produce "Prometheus," and indeed, a number of Scriabin's principal works, in Russia. The compaser took the piano part at the first Moscow performance of this score. The chorus at this performance will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

The remainder of the program will constitute Handel's "Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D Major," for string orchestra and solo string quartet; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," in observance of Good Friday, the date of the concert.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

APR 5 1925

Serge Koussevitski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making their final visit this season, will be heard at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening in Scriabin's "Promethues," assisted by a chorus; Borodin's Polovtsin Dances from "Prince Igor," concerto grosso, by Hanuel; variations on a Haydn theme, by Brahms. The Scriabin and Borodin works will be repeated at the Saturday matinee concert, the programme also including Respighi's Old Dances and Airs; and Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals."

1925 Post April 4

SYMPHONY LIST BEST AT EDGES

Eichheim Conducts Own Piece---Cortot Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Purely as a matter of personal opinion it may be here recorded that the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon began well and ended well and that between times—that is to say in the piano concertos of Schumann and of Miss Germaine Tailleferre—came frequent tepidity and dullness.

SUFFERS BY CONTRAST

Thus to disparage the central portion of yesterday's concert is to complain neither of the playing of that excellent pianist, Alfred Cortot, nor of the accompaniment afforded him by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Both were, in fact, admirable. But placed after the uncommonly stimulating "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim (in its first performance with enlarged orchestra), Schumann's fast fading romanticism seemed to have lost still another shade or two.

And although there were "moments" in Miss Tailleferre's piece, notably in the lively if thematically undistinguished Finale, yet this music in which the feminine member of the Parisian Groupe des Six would recapture the simplicity of an earlier day, may be inelegantly but not too inaccurately described, not as simple, but as "simp."

Mr. Foote in Audience

At the beginning of the rather oddly assorted programme of this week's pair of concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky has placed Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra, now making its third appearance at the Symphony Concerts—an unusual honor for an American composition, since native productions are so often given a single performance and thereafter consigned to oblivion, but one that Mr. Foote's gracious, well-made music eminently deserves. Present in the audience, the composer was twice summoned to rise from his seat in acknowledgment of the unmistakably hearty applause. Incidentally the performance was one to present this music to the best possible advantage.

Already some account of Mr. Eichheim's newest venture in orientalized music has appeared in these columns. It remains to be said that this score illustrates with remarkable graphicness the incidents of the mimed tragedy for which it was composed; that, whereas Mr. Eichheim's other Oriental pieces have been merely scenic, this Legend is music at once human and vividly dramatic; and finally that as music per se the score impresses by reason of its composer's absolute mastery of his material, which is in part original, in part traditional.

Conducted by Composer

To call Mr. Eichheim a mere arranger of Eastern tunes would in this instance be more than ever inaccurate. Both symphonically and dramatically this Legend is a notable achievement. And the composer, who conducted his music with authority although at the end he seemed scarcely to realize the dynamic possibilities of his own score, was many times recalled.

Mr. Koussevitzky, yesterday had his chief innings in the final number, Ravel's melodically seductive and rhythmically intriguing "La Valse," already played earlier in the season. The performance of yesterday was, if such a thing be possible, even more brilliant and more intoxicating than that of a few weeks ago.

THIS CL
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 5 1925

Closing Boston Orchestra Concert Next Friday Night.

The fifth and final Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, will be given next Friday evening at the Academy of Music. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at this concert two choral works, Scriabine's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and Borodine's Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

The remainder of the programme will constitute Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 (D major) for string orchestra and solo string quartet; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal" (in observance of Good Friday, the day of the concert).

Scriabine's "Prometheus," never before heard in Brooklyn, is the ultimate and most huge of the famous Russian composer's scores, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. The work was inspired by the theosophic divinity, the son of the God of fire who descends to enlighten struggling humanity and finally succeeds in imparting to the elect the divine creative fire of the God head. The culmination of this "poem of fire," revealing the final unification of the chosen with God, is considered one of the most stupendous climaxes in music.

The chorus at this performance will be that of the Cecilia Society of Boston, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 1925

Serge Koussewitsky will make his final appearance of the season here at the last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, April 10. At this concert Koussewitsky will perform two works with chorus, Scriabin's "Prometheus," a Poem of Fire, and Borodini's Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor." Scriabin's tone-poem had its first performances in Moscow and Petrograd under Koussewitsky's baton, the composer taking the piano part. The choral part in "Prometheus" will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm J. Lang, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert. The remainder of the program will constitute Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, for string orchestra and solo string quartet; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal" in observance of Good Friday, the date of the concert.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 5 1925

Last Concert of the Boston Orchestra Here

Serge Koussevitzky will make his final appearance of the season here at the last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, April 10.

At this concert Koussevitzky will perform two works with chorus, Scriabin's "Prometheus," "A Poem of Fire" and Borodini's Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor." Scriabin's ultimate orchestral work had its first performances in Moscow and Petrograd under Koussevitzky's baton, the composer taking the piano part. The late composer also went with him on one of his tours of the Volga when certain of Scriabin's scores were performed. The choral part in "Prometheus" will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm J. Lang, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

The remainder of the program will constitute Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D Major for string orchestra and solo string quartet, "Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries," and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," in observance of Good Friday, the date of the concert.

Sewall

April 5

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the 22d regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 17 and 18. He will play his own Second Concerto.

Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero Life), and Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand," which was first played here by the Chicago Symphony orchestra early in 1921.

PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

The program of the spring pension fund program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, will include Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," the autobiographical tone poem, and Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Trans Apr 6

Bane of Fame?

Marginal Sketch of the Audience in New York for the Boston Orchestra

VISITING New York periodically, the Boston and the Philadelphia Orchestras have the misfortune to attract a host of "smart" subscribers who make life miserable for every one in their neighborhood. The boxholders at the last Philadelphia concert were bent upon making up the conversational arrears of half a lifetime, to judge from their noisy and incessant gabble. The Boston Symphony audience is almost as bad. Mr. Monteux used to rap the desk angrily in a vain attempt to get enough silence for an audible beginning. Mr. Koussevitzky merely folds his arms and waits until the old-home week celebrants have talked themselves hoarse. If this sort of thing keeps up, the humbler subscribers will have to raise a fund to provide sound-proof glass fronts for the boxes in Carnegie Hall. [Deems Taylor in The New York World

---

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
APR 7 - 1925

Georges Longy, first oboist of the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than 25 years and a great influence in musical circles in Boston and vicinity, was tendered a testimonial last evening at the Boston Art club. Mr. Longy will return to France, his native country, in May.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIC
APR8 1925

Boston Symphony Ends Season Here Friday Night

A feature of the last concert of the annual Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music (under Institute auspices) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on Friday night of this week, will be Scriabine's "Promethus: A Poem of Fire." This score, never before played in Brooklyn, is the ultimate and most huge of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. The climax is considered one of the most stupendous in music.

Mr. Koussevitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this mighty score since he was a close friend of the composer during the ripest part of Scriabine's career, and the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus" which was first performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part. For Friday night's Brooklyn performance, the choral part will be sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

The remainder of the programme will constitute Handel's Concerto Gross in D major, Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," this latter in special observance of the day of the concert.

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 5 1925

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will p[illegible] last visit of the season, bringing with them the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang. Two works with chorus, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," will be played at both Carnegie Hall concerts and in Brooklyn Friday evening. Handel's fifth Concerto Grosso and the Brahms Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, will also be played at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening; Respighi's arrangement of old Italian dances and airs and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" Saturday afternoon; the Handel concerto and Wagner numbers in Brooklyn.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will close its Carnegie Hall series on Tuesday evening, April 14.

THE MUSIC PREVAILS

Boston Transcript

A Young People's Concert Before a Rapt Audience—Sonorities, Rhythm and Color as They Fell Upon Boyish and Girlish Ears—Mr. Burgin as More Confident Conductor

Apr. 7

IN THE BRIEF DAYS, as yet, of the Young People's Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, there has been no such engrossed audience as that of yesterday afternoon. It was not uneasy; it did not chatter; under no compulsion did it listen and enjoy. To the casual eye, roaming Symphony Hall, girl-children distinctly predominated—circumstance which may or may not account for this uncommon interest and tranquillity. Closer at hand, it was encouraging to see these maidens in the early and the middle teens yielding to the music as to a spell, awakening, almost, from their delight of ear and dream, of a sudden and with heartiness, clapping responsive hands. Foreigners say—albeit unjustly—that without the women the arts would languish in America. Rather, be it agreed that with music, the men provide the funds; while the superior sex reaps the enjoyment. By this sign, in the fruition of the years, not a few of the absorbed girls of Monday will be the next generation of young listeners at the Symphony Concerts. They need them. And in the middle twenties may these younglings be as eager and receptive as they are in the middle teens!

As usual, it was interesting—and baffling—to watch the reactions of this boy-and-girl audience to the different pieces. Clearly the auguries are good for Wagner, since the slow, ascending surge of the processional music from the Second Act of "Lohengrin" held the youngsters rapt. Beyond mistaking, they felt the surface stateliness, the glowing depths. Sonorities again fared well when they heard Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," though whether they noted the cry of the oppressed in the anguished folk-tunes beneath, is another, more puzzling, matter. Plainly, too, these boys and maidens "love" rhythm, and "love" it more when it beats through exotic dress. They listened intently to the Chinese Dance from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker." Twice over would they have the succeeding Russian folk-dance. The tick-tick-tick of the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's "little" Eighth Symphony gave manifest pleasure; while the bright motion and the bubbling gayety of the Overture to "Figaro's Wedding" fell not far behind. For the first time, unless recollection slips, an audience at these concerts enjoyed an eighteenth-century piece.

The puzzle of puzzles was the mood of these young ears toward the solo-numbers. The silvery tinkle of Mr. Fiedler's celesta in the Dance—again from "Nutcracker"—of the Sugar-Plum Fairy seemed to fascinate them. With eager interest, they followed Mr. Holy's harp through a neat little Fantasia by Saint-Saëns. Long and warm was the clapping. Yet when that master flutist, Mr Laurent, played the Dance of the Spirits of the Blessed from Gluck's "Orpheus," the youngsters sat coldly by. A harp, suggests a disillusioned observer of the young, has a gilded and imposing presence; whereas a flute is but a silvery tube with holes punched in it—which may or may not be explanation.

Mr. Koussevitzky assembled this program, which did credit to his imaginative insight with young minds. Mr. Burk prepared the program-notes, which attained the happy mean of good reading for both the teens and the fifties. Mr. Surette proffered the usual explanations before each piece, and caught the youngsters' ears. A wearied conductor, however, handed the orchestra to Mr. Burgin, who is beginning to lead, not only safely, but with a confidence and a will of his own; while readily his comrades answer to him. Only a few superfluous adults, curious to hear what Mr. Koussevitzky would do with more Chaikovsky and more Wagner, were disappointed. The youngsters sat untroubled. Enough for them was the music—which, after all, is the proper attitude.

H. T. P.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last two Manhattan concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place during the coming week. The programs are arranged in the following manner:

Thursday evening, Carnegie hall:

Haendel .....Concerto Grosso in D minor
Scriabin ....“Promethus”
Brahms ...Variations on a Haydn Theme
Borodin ...... Dances from “Prince Igor”

Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall:

Resphighi ..Old Dances and Airs for Lute
Scriabine ....“Prometheus”
Debussy ....Two Nocturnes
Borodin .....Dances from “Prince Igor”

NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 5 1925

With the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky in their last visit of the season comes the Cecilia Society's chorus of that city, trained by Malcolm J. Lang. Program for Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall:

Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D........Handel
“Prometheus” ....Scriabin
“Haydn” variations ....Brahms
Choral dances, “Prince Igor” ....Borodin

Koussevitzky's farewell with the Boston Orchestra until next Fall takes place Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, with a program in part repeating Thursday's choral works, as follows:

Four Old Dances ....Respighi
“Prometheus” ....Scriabni
Nocturnes ....Debussy
s, “Prince Igor” ....Borodin

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
APR 10 1925

Boston Symphony's Concert

Orchestra Gives Admirable Performance of Scriabin's 'Prometheus.'

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The final evening concert of the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in D major, Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," the Brahms variations on the "Chorale St. Anthony" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The Cecilia Society of Boston and Alexander Steinert, pianist, assisted in the Scriabin music.

This "Prometheus" was the important number of the evening. It is not new here. No less a person than Modest Altschuler with his Russian Symphony Society introduced it to us and others have played it at us. There are many who read in it a profound message, and that is of course their blessed privilege.

In the first place, the underlying conception is not unmusical, though it is steeped in metaphysical mysticism. The tone poem does not deal merely with the ancient myth of Prometheus. It refers to it. In this work fire is the vitalizing element which breathes activity into the soul. The good soul becomes a power of beneficence; the evil one a menace to itself and others. Here are the contending elements out of which much good music has been made.

Mr. Scriabin, however, was not a genius despite the repeated asseverations of those to whom his cross chord puzzles seem to signify things beyond ordinary understandings. Mr. Scriabin was an honest, hard working musician whose doings greatly astonished Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull. The same gentleman was astonished by the doings of Cyril Scott. Now any one can create strange chords. Mr. Scriabin's one invention was the "harmonic" scale, a succession of tones developed from a fundamental and its overtones. There is material in such a scale for music and for originality in harmony.

But Mr. Scriabin never accomplished anything of poetic or symbolical import with his scale. He merely produced novel sounds. His poem of fire is a misfire. It starts from a chord built of all the tones in the harmonic scale and it arrives at an impalpable location in thin air. It is a curious muddle of unenlightening phrases and harmonic sequences. It makes no proclamation of the barren soul of man fired to activity.

Its best passages sound like Debussy and its worst like Stravinsky. One reads with amazement the pages of the essayists who have discerned in this barren prating the utterances of a seer. Mr. Philip Hale's program notes quote liberally from Dr. Hull and Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, but it does not need a detective to discover the incredulity of the learned annotator. He has to write the program notes, but without doubt he wishes that Sergei Koussevitzky would exercise his talents as a conductor on things more interesting to music lovers.

There is some strange charm about what common mortals know as "conductors' music." Conductors rave about it and insist on playing it whether audiences wish to hear it or not. They have been trying for years to educate us all up to the level of Scriabin, and we are still wallowing in our ignorance.

One thing can be said, and that is that the composition was admirably performed. Apparently the concerto grosso also was, but in the midst of insistent auditors thumping down aisles to their seats and slamming down the seats when they reached them it was not easy to be sure of how the music would have sounded in the midst of a polite silence.

'Pelleas et Melisande' Sung Again.

"Pelleas et Melisande" attracted another large audience which packed the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The cast was identical with that of the former performances. Miss Bori as Melisande was in excellent voice and was lovely to look upon, but her French pronunciation was not always what it should have been. Miss Louise Hunter as Little Yniold was not only effective but her artistry and finish in detail and style make her performance of the brief role one of the most convincing portraits of the performance.

Mr. Johnson was in better voice than usual as Pelleas. Mr. Whitehill's powerful and poignant portrait of the jealous Goland, Miss Howard as Genevieve, Mr. Rothier as Arkel and Mr. Ananian as the physician were other principals in the cast. And Claude Debussy's music wove a potent spell under Mr. Hasselmans's baton.

Herald

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra is away this week. New York will hear Scriabin's "Prometheus" this evening and on Saturday afternoon; Brooklyn will hear it tomorrow night; Boston will hear it twice on May 1, for the Saturday night concert will take place on Friday night to allow Mr. Koussevitzky to fulfil engagements on the other side of the Atlantic.

The program of next week is as follows: "Bat, the Garden of Pfand"—the "garden" being the sea; Rachmaninoff, piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben," which has not been performed by this orchestra in Foston since 1910. Strauss's tone-poem was performed here on March 16, 1922, by the N. Y. Philharmonic orchestra, led by Mr. Mengelberg, to whom the score is dedicated. Mr. Gericke brought out the work in Boston (1901). The performances in 1908 and 1910 were conducted by Mr. Fiedler.

77

NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 10 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alexander Nicholaevitch Scriabine's "Prometheus: the Poem of Fire" was the principal offering of the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. "Prometheus" was first produced in this city by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler in 1915. At that time, obedient to the intention of the composer, a color organ was used, rather unsuccessfully, with the orchestra, for in this composition Scriabine intended to combine effects of color and tone. Last night there was no color organ, but the forces which contributed to the performance were impressive. They included the singers of the Cecilia Society of Boston, with Malcolm Lang, their conductor, assisting; Alexander Steinert, who played the important piano part, and the immense number of instrumentalists that the score demands.

"Prometheus," as Scriabine's propagandists have now made fairly well known, is not inspired by the thought of the hero chained to the rock. "According to the teaching of Theosophy," says Rosa Newmarch, "the nascent races of mankind, not yet illuminated by the Promethean spark, were physically incomplete, possessing only the shadows of bodies; sinless, because devoid of conscious personality—in Theosophical terms, without Karma. From this condition they were liberated by the gift of Prometheus—the fire which awakened man's conscious creative power." The music, then, seeks to express "the crespuscular, invertebrate state of Karmaless humanity; the awakening of the will to create, in both its aspects; the strange moods of bliss and anguish which follow the acquisition of self-consciousness; probably, also, the last, fierce rebellion of the lower self preceding the final ecstasy of union, when the human mingles with the divine." At the climax of the work the chorus intones without words the leading motive of the composition, which, with the full sonority of the orchestra, reaches in this form its apotheosis.

A great deal has been said of this music by the Scriabine enthusiasts. It was heard with fear and trembling when Mr. Altschuler played it here ten years ago. Wells of ink have been spilled about it, in many languages, in many lands. Mr. Koussevitsky, that his audiences may have opportunity for closer acquaintance, will repeat "Prometheus" at his concert tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The announcement of its performance last night was undoubtedly the particular attraction which packed the hall to more than its seating capacity.

The writer, who does not ordinarily believe in rushing into print with an estimate of music heard for the first time, does not doubt his impression of the work heard last night. It is his opinion that "Prometheus," with all the propaganda that has been expended upon it, with all its high-falutin' and elaborateness of machinery, is one of the poorest orchestral compositions that Scriabine produced. It is musically thin and labored; in its best passages it is an echo of a much better effort by the same composed—the "Poème de l'Extase." The will to create is always there, but what comes forth is a remarkably pretentious piece of bombast.

We know that the harmonic scheme of this tone-poem is based upon the "mystic chord" which occupied the composer's imagination when he was compiling the score, a chord of which the notes are C, D, E, F sharp, A, B flat. We are told that this harmonic pattern underlies the whole composition, that in Scriabine's later days each particular composition was evolved from a certain chord. The effect, however, is neither novel nor exciting, barring the rather pleasing pungency of the chord itself. The actual impression is a pale echo of an earlier work. Neither the basic ideas nor their development carry conviction. The further the composer goes the further he is from genuine accomplishment. More and more does the sensation of fruitless effort and futility grow upon the listener.

And where did the talk of Scriabine being a "mystic" originate? Doubtless it came from Scriabine, who believed it himself. His mysticism, as a matter of fact, is of an extremely dubious quality. It seems to have its actual basis in a good strong sensuality which found energetic expression in the "Poème de l'Extase" and has become weak and uncreative in "Prometheus." As a matter of fact, regardless of harmonic ingenuities, the actual plan of "Prometheus" is largely the same as that of the former work. The dynamic scheme is the gradual, accumulating development of orchestral sonority from faint and mysterious beginnings to a resplendent fortissimo which employs every resource of chorus and orchestra. It is a simple and practical plan, and Scriabine was at one time a master of climax, but not in "Prometheus."

The performance was carefully prepared by Mr. Koussevitsky. It was evidently illuminative of detail. Whether it was too deliberately, meticulously carried through is a question better decided after performances by other conductors, though there are strong suspicions on this point. The final climax reached its mark in excellent style, and as effectively as such a passage may in the rather dead acoustics of Carnegie Hall. There were brilliant individual performances by players of the orchestra. Mr. Steinert was competent among them. Unquestionably the composer was well represented, and that very fact convinces this writer that there is little more to be discovered in his music after last night's revelation.

The remainder of the program consisted of Handel's "Concerto Grosso" number 5, a work well calculated to display the excellence of the strings of the orchestra, presenting Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz as solo violinists and Jean Bedetti as solo 'cellist; a perfectly smooth and respectable reading of the Brahms-Haydn Variations; and the (Polovtsian Dances" from Borodin's "Prince Igor," performed with the chorus parts. These dances made one of the most exciting moments of the concert although the chorus did not sing with unexceptionable precision of attack or with any very eloquent gra[illegible] of the wild and lordly music of Bor[illegible]in, wh[illegible] triumphed in spite of this inade[illegible] and because of its quen[illegible]ss [illegible] and splendor.

Herald

April 5

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the 22d regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 17 and 18. He will play his own Second Concerto.

Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero Life), and Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand," which was first played here by the Chicago Symphony orchestra early in 1921.

PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

The program of the spring pension fund program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, will include Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," the autobiographical tone poem, and Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Trans Apr 6

Bane of Fame?

Marginal Sketch of the Audience in New York for the Boston Orchestra

VISITING New York periodically, the Boston and the Philadelphia Orchestras have the misfortune to attract a host of "smart" subscribers who make life miserable for every one in their neighborhood. The boxholders at the last Philadelphia concert were bent upon making up the conversational arrears of half a lifetime, to judge from their noisy and incessant gabble. The Boston Symphony audience is almost as bad. Mr. Monteux used to rap the desk angrily in a vain attempt to get enough silence for an audible beginning. Mr. Koussevitzky merely folds his arms and waits until the old-home week celebrants have talked themselves hoarse. If this sort of thing keeps up, the humbler subscribers will have to raise a fund to provide sound-proof glass fronts for the boxes in Carnegie Hall. [Deems Taylor in The New York World

---

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
APR 7 - 1925

Georges Longy, first oboist of the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than 25 years and a great influence in musical circles in Boston and vicinity, was tendered a testimonial last evening at the Boston Art club. Mr. Longy will return to France, his native country, in May.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
APR8 1925

Boston Symphony Ends Season Here Friday Night

A feature of the last concert of the annual Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music (under Institute auspices) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on Friday night of this week, will be Scriabine's "Promethus: A Poem of Fire." This score, never before played in Brooklyn, is the ultimate and most huge of the famous Russian composer, requiring an enlarged orchestra, organ, solo piano and mixed chorus. The climax is considered one of the most stupendous in music.

Mr. Koussevitzky is looked upon as peculiarly fitted to interpret this mighty score since he was a close friend of the composer during the ripest part of Scriabine's career, and the first to introduce to the world his principal works, including "Prometheus" which was first performed under his baton in Moscow and Petrograd, the composer taking the solo part. For Friday night's Brooklyn performance, the choral part will be sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

The remainder of the programme will constitute Handel's Concerto Gross in D major, Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," this latter in special observance of the day of the concert.

NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 5 1925

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay their last visit of the season, bringing with them the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang. Two works with chorus, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," will be played at both Carnegie Hall concerts and in Brooklyn Friday evening. Handel's fifth Concerto Grosso and the Brahms Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, will also be played at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening; Respighi's arrangement of old Italian dances and airs and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" Saturday afternoon; the Handel concerto and Wagner numbers in Brooklyn.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will close its Carnegie Hall series on Tuesday evening, April 14.

THE MUSIC PREVAILS

A Young People's Concert Before a Rapt Audience—Sonorities, Rhythm and Color as They Fell Upon Boyish and Girlish Ears—Mr. Burgin as More Confident Conductor

Apr 7

IN THE BRIEF DAYS, as yet, of the Young People's Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, there has been no such engrossed audience as that of yesterday afternoon. It was not uneasy; it did not chatter; under no compulsion did it listen and enjoy. To the casual eye, roaming Symphony Hall, girl-children distinctly predominated—circumstance which may or may not account for this uncommon interest and tranquillity. Closer at hand, it was encouraging to see these maidens in the early and the middle teens yielding to the music as to a spell, awakening, almost, from their delight of ear and dream, of a sudden and with heartiness, clapping responsive hands. Foreigners say—albeit unjustly—that without the women the arts would languish in America. Rather, be it agreed that with music, the men provide the funds; while the superior sex reaps the enjoyment. By this sign, in the fruition of the years, not a few of the absorbed girls of Monday will be the next generation of young listeners at the Symphony Concerts. They need them. And in the middle twenties may these younglings be as eager and receptive as they are in the middle teens!

As usual, it was interesting—and baffling—to watch the reactions of this boy-and-girl audience to the different pieces. Clearly the auguries are good for Wagner, since the slow, ascending surge of the processional music from the Second Act of "Lohengrin" held the youngsters rapt. Beyond mistaking, they felt the surface stateliness, the glowing depths. Sonorities again fared well when they heard Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," though whether they noted the cry of the oppressed in the anguished folk-tunes beneath, is another, more puzzling, matter. Plainly, too, these boys and maidens "love" rhythm, and "love" it more when it beats through exotic dress. They listened intently to the Chinese Dance from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker." Twice over would they have the succeeding Russian folk-dance. The tick-tick-tick of the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's "little" Eighth Symphony gave manifest pleasure; while the bright motion and the bubbling gayety of the Overture to "Figaro's Wedding" fell not far behind. For the first time, unless recollection slips, an audience at these concerts enjoyed an eighteenth-century piece.

The puzzle of puzzles was the mood of these young ears toward the solo-numbers. The silvery tinkle of Mr. Fiedler's celesta in the Dance—again from "Nutcracker"—of the Sugar-Plum Fairy seemed to fascinate them. With eager interest, they followed Mr. Holy's harp through a neat little Fantasia by Saint-Saëns. Long and warm was the clapping. Yet when that master flutist, Mr Laurent, played the Dance of the Spirits of the Blessed from Gluck's "Orpheus," the youngsters sat coldly by. A harp, suggests a disillusioned observer of the young, has a gilded and imposing presence; whereas a flute is but a silvery tube with holes punched in it—which may or may not be explanation.

Mr. Koussevitzky assembled this program, which did credit to his imaginative insight with young minds. Mr. Burk prepared the program-notes, which attained the happy mean of good reading for both the teens and the fifties. Mr. Surette proffered the usual explanations before each piece, and caught the youngsters' ears. A wearied conductor, however, handed the orchestra to Mr. Burgin, who is beginning to lead, not only safely, but with a confidence and a will of his own; while readily his comrades answer to him. Only a few superfluous adults, curious to hear what Mr. Koussevitzky would do with more Chaikovsky and more Wagner, were disappointed. The youngsters sat untroubled. Enough for them was the music—which, after all, is the proper attitude.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last two Manhattan concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place during the coming week. The programs are arranged in the following manner:

Thursday evening, Carnegie hall:

Haendel .....Concerto Grosso in D minor
Scriabin ...."Prometheus"
Brahms ...Variations on a Haydn Theme
Borodin ...... Dances from "Prince Igor"

Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall:

Resphighi ..Old Dances and Airs for Lute
Scriabine ...."Prometheus"
Debussy ....Two Nocturnes
Borodin .....Dances from "Prince Igor"

NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 5 1925

With the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky in their last visit of the season comes the Cecilia Society's chorus of that city, trained by Malcolm J. Lang. Program for Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall:

Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D........Handel
"Prometheus" ....Scriabin
"Haydn" variations ....Brahms
Choral dances, "Prince Igor" ....Borodin

Koussevitzky's farewell with the Boston Orchestra until next Fall takes place Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, with a program in part repeating Thursday's choral works, as follows:

Four Old Dances ....Respighi
"Prometheus" ....Scriabni
Nocturnes ....Debussy
s, "Prince Igor" ....Borodin

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
APR 10 1925

Boston Symphony's Concert

Orchestra Gives Admirable Performance of Scriabin's 'Prometheus.'

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The final evening concert of the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in D major, Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," the Brahms variations on the "Chorale St. Anthony" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The Cecilia Society of Boston and Alexander Steinert, pianist, assisted in the Scriabin music.

This "Prometheus" was the important number of the evening. It is not new here. No less a person than Modest Altschuler with his Russian Symphony Society introduced it to us and others have played it at us. There are many who read in it a profound message, and that is of course their blessed privilege.

In the first place, the underlying conception is not unmusical, though it is steeped in metaphysical mysticism. The tone poem does not deal merely with the ancient myth of Prometheus. It refers to it. In this work fire is the vitalizing element which breathes activity into the soul. The good soul becomes a power of beneficence; the evil one a menace to itself and others. Here are the contending elements out of which much good music has been made.

Mr. Scriabin, however, was not a genius despite the repeated asseverations of those to whom his cross chord puzzles seem to signify things beyond ordinary understandings. Mr. Scriabin was an honest, hard working musician whose doings greatly astonished Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull. The same gentleman was astonished by the doings of Cyril Scott. Now any one can create strange chords. Mr. Scriabin's one invention was the "harmonic" scale, a succession of tones developed from a fundamental and its overtones. There is material in such a scale for music and for originality in harmony.

But Mr. Scriabin never accomplished anything of poetic or symbolical import with his scale. He merely produced novel sounds. His poem of fire is a misfire. It starts from a chord built of all the tones in the harmonic scale and it arrives at an impalpable location in thin air. It is a curious muddle of unenlightening phrases and harmonic sequences. It makes no proclamation of the barren soul of man fired to activity.

Its best passages sound like Debussy and its worst like Stravinsky. One reads with amazement the pages of the essayists who have discerned in this barren prating the utterances of a seer. Mr. Philip Hale's program notes quote liberally from Dr. Hull and Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, but it does not need a detective to discover the incredulity of the learned annotator. He has to write the program notes, but without doubt he wishes that Sergei Koussevitzky would exercise his talents as a conductor on things more interesting to music lovers.

There is some strange charm about what common mortals know as "conductors' music." Conductors rave about it and insist on playing it whether audiences wish to hear it or not. They have been trying for years to educate us all up to the level of Scriabin, and we are still wallowing in our ignorance.

One thing can be said, and that is that the composition was admirably performed. Apparently the concerto grosso also was, but in the midst of insistent auditors thumping down aisles to their seats and slamming down the seats when they reached them it was not easy to be sure of how the music would have sounded in the midst of a polite silence.

'Pelleas et Melisande' Sung Again.

"Pelleas et Melisande" attracted another large audience which packed the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The cast was identical with that of the former performances. Miss Bori as Melisande was in excellent voice and was lovely to look upon, but her French pronunciation was not always what it should have been. Miss Louise Hunter as Little Yniold was not only effective but her artistry and finish in detail and style make her performance of the brief role one of the most convincing portraits of the performance.

Mr. Johnson was in better voice than usual as Pelleas. Mr. Whitehill's powerful and poignant portrait of the jealous Goland, Miss Howard as Genevieve, Mr. Rothier as Arkel and Mr. Ananian as the physician were other principals in the cast. And Claude Debussy's music wove a potent spell under Mr. Hasselmans's baton.

Herald

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra is away this week. New York will hear Scriabin's "Prometheus" this evening and on Saturday afternoon: Brooklyn will hear it tomorrow night; Boston will hear it twice on May 1, for the Saturday night concert will take place on Friday night to allow Mr. Koussevitzky to fulfil engagements on the other side of the Atlantic.

The program of next week is as follows: "Bat, the Garden of Pfand"—the "garden" being the sea; Rachmaninoff, piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben," which has not been performed by this orchestra in Boston since 1910. Strauss's tone-poem was performed here on March 16, 1922, by the N. Y. Philharmonic orchestra, led by Mr. Mengelberg, to whom the score is dedicated. Mr. Gericke brought out the work in Boston (1901). The performances in 1908 and 1910 were conducted by Mr. Fiedler.

NEW YORK
TIMES 177
APR10 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alexander Nicholaevitch Scriabine's "Prometheus: the Poem of Fire" was the principal offering of the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. "Prometheus" was first produced in this city by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler in 1915. At that time, obedient to the intention of the composer, a color organ was used, rather unsuccessfully, with the orchestra, for in this composition Scriabine intended to combine effects of color and tone. Last night there was no color organ, but the forces which contributed to the performance were impressive. They included the singers of the Cecilia Society of Boston, with Malcolm Lang, their conductor, assisting; Alexander Steinert, who played the important piano part, and the immense number of instrumentalists that the score demands.

"Prometheus," as Scriabine's propagandists have now made fairly well known, is not inspired by the thought of the hero chained to the rock. "According to the teaching of Theosophy," says Rosa Newmarch, "the nascent races of mankind, not yet illuminated by the Promethean spark, were physically incomplete, possessing only the shadows of bodies; sinless, because devoid of conscious personality—in Theosophical terms, without Karma. From this condition they were liberated by the gift of Prometheus—the fire which awakened man's conscious creative power." The music, then, seeks to express "the crespuscular, invertebrate state of Karmaless humanity; the awakening of the will to create, in both its aspects; the strange moods of bliss and anguish which follow the acquisition of self-consciousness; probably, also, the last, fierce rebellion of the lower self preceding the final ecstasy of union, when the human mingles with the divine." At the climax of the work the chorus intones without words the leading motive of the composition, which, with the full sonority of the orchestra, reaches in this form its apotheosis.

A great deal has been said of this music by the Scriabine enthusiasts. It was heard with fear and trembling when Mr. Altschuler played it here ten years ago. Wells of ink have been spilled about it, in many languages, in many lands. Mr. Koussevitsky, that his audiences may have opportunity for closer acquaintance, will repeat "Prometheus" at his concert tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The announcement of its performance last night was undoubtedly the particular attraction which packed the hall to more than its seating capacity.

The writer, who does not ordinarily believe in rushing into print with an estimate of music heard for the first time, does not doubt his impression of the work heard last night. It is his opinion that "Prometheus," with all the propaganda that has been expended upon it, with all its high-falutin' and elaborateness of machinery, is one of the poorest orchestral compositions that Scriabine produced. It is musically thin and labored; in its best passages it is an echo of a much better effort by the same composed—the "Poème de l'Extase." The will to create is always there, but what comes forth is a remarkably pretentious piece of bombast.

We know that the harmonic scheme of this tone-poem is based upon the "mystic chord" which occupied the composer's imagination when he was compiling the score, a chord of which the notes are C, D, E, F sharp, A, B flat. We are told that this harmonic pattern underlies the whole composition, that in Scriabine's later days each particular composition was evolved from a certain chord. The effect, however, is neither novel nor exciting, barring the rather pleasing pungency of the chord itself. The actual impression is a pale echo of an earlier work. Neither the basic ideas nor their development carry conviction. The further the composer goes the further he is from genuine accomplishment. More and more does the sensation of fruitless effort and futility grow upon the listener.

And where did the talk of Scriabine being a "mystic" originate? Doubtless it came from Scriabine, who believed it himself. His mysticism, as a matter of fact, is of an extremely dubious quality. It seems to have its actual basis in a good strong sensuality which found energetic expression in the "Poème de l'Extase" and has become weak and uncreative in "Prometheus." As a matter of fact, regardless of harmonic ingenuities, the actual plan of "Prometheus" is largely the same as that of the former work. The dynamic scheme is the gradual, accumulating development of orchestral sonority from faint and mysterious beginnings to a resplendent fortissimo which employs every resource of chorus and orchestra. It is a simple and practical plan, and Scriabine was at one time a master of climax, but not in "Prometheus."

The performance was carefully prepared by Mr. Koussevitsky. It was evidently illuminative of detail. Whether it was too deliberately, meticulously carried through is a question better decided after performances by other conductors, though there are strong suspicions on this point. The final climax reached its mark in excellent style, and as effectively as such a passage may in the rather dead acoustics of Carnegie Hall. There were brilliant individual performances by players of the orchestra. Mr. Steinert was competent among them. Unquestionably the composer was well represented, and that very fact convinces this writer that there is little more to be discovered in his music after last night's revelation.

The remainder of the program consisted of Handel's "Concerto Grosso" number 5, a work well calculated to display the excellence of the strings of the orchestra, presenting Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz as solo violinists and Jean Bedetti as solo 'cellist; a perfectly smooth and respectable reading of the Brahms-Haydn Variations; and the "Polovtsian Dances" from Borodin's "Prince Igor," performed with the chorus parts. These dances made one of the most exciting moments of the concert although the chorus did not sing with unexceptionable precision of attack or with any very eloquent grasp of the wild and lordly music of Borodin, wh[illegible] triumphed in spite of this inadeq[illegible] and because of its quenchless [illegible] and splendor.

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

18 APR 10 1925

Prometheus Out of Boston.

The first series of Thursday evening concerts that Serge Koussevitzky has conducted in Carnegie Hall for the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end last evening with another of those strangely assorted programs that this conductor affects. It consisted of four movements from Handel's fifth concerto grosso (in D major) for string orchestra, edited by G. F. Kogel; Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire"; Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." The Cecilia Society of Boston came on to sing the choruses in the Scriabin and the Borodin numbers; likewise Alexander Lang Steinert to play the exacting piano part in the former work.

A glance at the list of compositions performed at these Thursday evening concerts of the Boston band might well surprise any one acquainted with the hitherto unbroken classical tradition of that organization. Nineteen composers of various times and climes figure in the list, but absent from their roster are the names of J. S. Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Wagner and Richard Strauss. Brahms appears once—represented not by a symphony but by the variations performed last evening, which likewise afford Haydn his only mention. The two standard symphonies of the entire list are Schubert's brief "Unfinished" and Tchaikovsky's fifth.

In fairness to Mr. Koussevitzky it must be said that the showing for the Carnegie Saturday matinees is stronger. A symphony each by Beethoven, by Brahms, by Haydn, are in this record. Schubert and Schumann are absent. J. S. Bach, Handel, Wagner and Richard Strauss, however, all appear. But Mr. Koussevitzky did not in either series bother to observe the Bruckner centenary.

The feature of yesterday's concert was the "Prometheus." When Mr. Altschuler introduced this "poem of fire" to New York ten years ago the light machine nominated in the composer's bond was used. That astonishingly feeble device has not shared in subsequent performances here. The chorus, which adds its sonority of human voices (without words) to the final apotheosis, participated for the first time in New York yesterday. Scriabin gave his sanction to the presentation of the work without chorus or light machine.

Mr. Koussevitzky, the original conductor of the "Prometheus," at Moscow in 1911, labored gallantly in its interest last evening. The performance had evidently been prepared with great care. On it the conductor lavished his famed vivacity and magnetism. The sonorous close won from the large audience the tribute of applause that always goes to noises which are exceptionally loud or surprisingly high of pitch. But it is hard to believe that many who applauded had not found much of what went before both ugly and boresome.

Let us forget about the "mysticism" of that opening chord and all the highfalutin' rigmarole of poor Scriabin's fevered religious aspiration and hammer right down to the brass tacks of every musical contrivance. What do we then find? Poverty and an astonishing ugliness of musical material; endless prefacing and preluding to a miracle which never happens; swollen, windy bombast until the very welkin rings with the rumor of its pretentious sham, and a manful, but only half successful, effort at all costs never to be Liszt!

Mr. Koussevitzky has been reported all along a Scriabin specialist. He may now gather such satisfaction as he can from the knowledge that in the course of five Carnegie Hall evenings he has treated his New York customers to both the "Poem of Ecstacy" and the "Prometheus" of his composer pre-elect and spared no pains to persuade of their greatness. In praising this devout performance one must not forget a special word due Mr. Steinert's competence in the prominent and tricky music allotted to the piano.

The rest of the concert added no glory to the honorable record of the Boston band. There was some beautiful playing in the Handel concerto (whose solo parts were assigned to Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti of the orchestra), but it was marred by overmannered conducting. The "St. Antoni" variations of Brahms have often been presented here with more sympathy and impressiveness. As for the familiar dances from "Prince Igor," to which the chorus contributed an insecure and ragged collaboration, never, perhaps, had they been performed here with so little of their just effect. Still, their inherent vitality and the stirring noise they make evoked plenty of applause.

They and the "Prometheus" are down for repetition at the concert in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon. The program offers also Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute" and Debussy's "Clouds and Festivals."

Further vain sacrifice at the altar of Scriabin.

PITTS SANBORN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 10 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

COMMENT on Mr. Koussewitsky's concert in Carnegie Hall last evening may be reserved for another day, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the ~~Academy tonight~~ presents an almost identical program. The Haendel Concerto, the Scriabine "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and the Borodin dances from "Prince Igor" will all be heard in Brooklyn. The only variation consists in two Wagnerian excerpts that will replace the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn played in Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

APR 10 1925

"POEM OF FIRE" BY SYMPHONY OF BOSTON

Scriabin's "Prometheus," Led by Koussevitzky, Full of Striking Themes—"Faust" and "Melisande" at the Opera

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

"PROMETHEUS, a Poem of Fire, for Orchestra and Piano, with Organ and Chorus," is the pretentious title of Alexander Scriabin's work, produced last night at Carnegie Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The composition is not new here and was produced on one occasion, I believe (I was not there), with the assistance of a screen on which the kaleidoscope arrangement of some kind threw multi-colored rays of light, to create the illusion of flames.

Scriabin's work attempts to tell an epical story, with mammoth reproductive means, and illustrated further by extraneous literary descriptions and philosophical comments. It is not necessary to detail the complete scheme of the composer, or to go into a discussion of Scriabin's theories of composition, as represented in "Prometheus" and others of his Brobdingnagian orchestral scores. His system is not unlike Mahler's, but on the whole the Russian uses an even weightier method of thought and a more mastodonic apparatus with which to express it.

"Prometheus" is stuffed full of striking themes, remarkable episodes, and arresting and effective orchestration, brilliantly complicated. It is work well worth hearing now and then. Whether its "programme" carries out its full intent with all its hearers is a matter for those individuals to decide.

Koussevitzky conducted with ardor and mastery and seemed to reveal everything the composition had to offer. The Cecilia Society, of Boston, sang the choral part with convincing gusto.

A Handel Concerto Grosso, Brahms's lovely Variations on a theme by Haydn, and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances completed the programme. On Saturday afternoon, the Bostonians will give their last concert here for the season, repeating the "Prometheus" offering.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

APR 10 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS 'POEM OF FIRE'

Scriabin's Choral Setting of "Prometheus" Legend Heard at Carnegie Hall

In the language of the French restaurants (in New York) Mr. Koussevitzky made the hors d'oeuvres the piece de resistance of his Boston Symphony programme at Carnegie Hall last night. Scriabin got most of his care and attention, whilst Handel and Brahms seemed considerably unpalatable to the conductor. And the Scriabin music was scarcely worth all the pains spent on it.

The piece was the Russian's "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire," the last orchestral work he wrote before his death ten years ago. It had not been done here since Modest Altschuler and his Russian Orchestra played it, just before the composer breathed his last in Moscow. Last night's was a far better performance, in many ways, but scarcely more convincing.

Scriabin, like Mahler (but without the Bohemian's relative simplicity of attack), tried to wrench the universe loose with his music. Nothing less would do him for his need of expression than all the hidden mysteries of time and space, the whole philosophical alpha and omega. Preceding the "Poem of Fire" came the "Poem of Ecstasy" and "The Divine Poem." After it, had he lived, would have come "The Poem of Mystery." They are all the old story of the little man trying desperately to fly by tugging at his bootstraps.

Up by the Bootstraps.

And the bootstraps became more elaborate and snarled the longer he tugged. In the "Poem of Fire" he calls for the largest orchestra he can think of, including piano and a chorus besides. But even that is not all. He conceived the notion that there was an esoteric and probably mystic correspondence between color and sound, and originally demanded that a clavier a lumieres—a color screen manipulated by a keyboard—should be used during the performance of "Prometheus." Mr. Altschuler used one when he played the work ten years ago, but it was a pathetic fiasco. In the "Poem of Mystery" Scriabin planned the use of varied perfumes as well as color.

As a fact, music to Scriabin was not music, but the ritual of his personal brand of theosophy. The "Poem of Fire" sets out to express the growth of humanity from animalism through the attainment of Karma, or consciousness, and its final merging with Agni, the fire which "receives unto itself all other sparks in the ultimate phase of development" preceding Nirvana.

Difficult as all this sounds, it is nothing to balk at any more than the pseudo-philosophical ideas in Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra." Reduced to its simplified terms for the purpose of a programmatic piece of music—which the "Prometheus" is—it becomes nothing more than a little story of spiritual evolution, and a great composer could probably make it soun valid and important in music; onl a great composer very likely would not bother with it.

Scriabin and Stravinsky.

The trouble with Scriabin is the vast discrepancy between his ideas and his capabilities. And this was further complicated by his belie that every combination of note held a mystic significance. Thus in "Prometheus," he begins with a chord that to him held a pregnan mystic meaning. But it holds thi to no one else. From this chord h develops an arbitrary scale an then goes ahead.

The outcome is strange musi but as weak as water. The mos interesting thing about it is that lets one into the secret of wher most of the modernists, includin Stravinsky, got their start. For arbitrarily, and seemingly fortuitously, invents a kind of new language which means nothing. And Stravinsky came along, picked it up, discarded the hocus-pocus about it, bent it to his purposes and made it mean a lot.

Mr. Koussevitzky quite plainly had spent a good deal of time and thought on the Scriabin piece and apparently let it have its say. Alexander Steinert of Boston and the Cecilia Society's mixed chorus took part. Mr. Steinert made what he had to do seem important.

The rest of the evening was given over to Handel's D major concerto grosso for strings, done with a clipped preciseness that was scarcely Handelian; Brahms's "Variations on a Theme of Haydn," that was downright slovenly, and, finally the second-act scene, with chorus, from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

I. W.

Transcript
April 11

Orchestral

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next, after the return of the orchestra from a visit to New York, Mr. Koussevitzky sets this program:

Tone-Poem, "The Garden of Fand" . . . . Bax
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra . . . . Rakhmaninov
(Pianist: The Composer).
Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben" . . . . Strauss

For the first times in Boston, the conductor will undertake one of the larger tone-poems of Strauss, "A Hero-Life," last heard here—and remembered—from Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Society of New York. The music is of Strauss most Straussian—for better and for worse. Mr. Bax's tone-poem would evoke a magic and fateful isle, far remote in the seas of Irish legend, strangely frequented withal. The piece is fanciful and romantic; multi-colored, deftly written—say by a Celtic Debussy. Several years ago, Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra, on visit to Boston, played it in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rakhmaninov's Concerto—a piece of symphonic dimensions—is like unto the presence and the playing of the composer, when he is most weighty and serious.

Choral

On Thursday and Friday evenings in Symphony Hall, a revival of Brahms's German Requiem by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Symphony Orchestra, assisting solo-singers. As guest, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct, building upon two years of preparation by Dr. Davison for the most exacting task yet undertaken by his student-choirs. It is long since the Requiem has been heard in Boston. It remains one of the monuments of nineteenth-century choral music, dividing the elder matter and manner from the new content and procedures to come. The graver power, the austerer beauty, of Brahms fill a truly exalted and universal music. Dr. Davison has spared no pains. His mind has quickened to the work. His heart has warmed to it. To Mr. Koussevitzky he hands a tuned instrument. Miss Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Mr. Boris Saslavsky baritone will sing the solo

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 11 1925

Boston Orchestra Closes Its Brooklyn Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last of its series of five concerts last night at the Academy of Music. The program was one thoroughly suited to a "last appearance" as it left the audience with a keen sense of expectation for the pleasures of the next season. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, who has put the Boston organization back among the peers, received a warm personal recognition from last night's audience.

Handel's Concerto in D major for string orchestra was the opening work on the program. It was followed by Scriabin's "Prometheus," a poem of fire. A chorus from the Cecilia Society of Boston supplied the vocal parts. Alexander Lang Steinert played the piano part, which the composer once played with Koussevitzky holding the baton. Koussevitzky was at home in the reading of "Prometheus."

Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries," played iwth immense good will; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" completed the program.

NEW YORK
WORLD

APR 10 1925

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last night's Boston Symphony concert was the last evening program of this year's series, and next Saturday's matinee will be the Bostonians' farewell until next fall. To celebrate the occasion, Mr. Koussevitzky arranged a program that was varied without being particularly interesting — just why, I don't know. It began with Haendel's fifth Concerto Grosso for strings, continued with Skryabin's "Prometheus" poem for orchestra and Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and concluded with the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." He had with him not only his orchestra, augmented, but the Cecilia Society of Boston, a mixed chorus of about 100 voices, which sang the vocal parts in the Skryabin and Borodin works.

The "Prometheus," sub-titled, "A Poem of Fire," has never yet been given here wholly in the form in which its composer wrote it. Skryabin, who had ideas regarding the relations between sound and color, incorporated n his orchestral score a part for a "light keyboard" of his own invention —a device for throwing various combinations of colored light upon a creen—so that colored light effects produced in accordance with an arbitrary scale in which red corresponded o the note C, yellow to D, and so on) —could be produced synchroneously with the music.

When the Russian Symphony Orhestra, under Modest Altschuler, rst played the work here, in March, 15, the light keyboard was emloyed, throwing its colors upon what looked like an ordinary motion picture screen placed behind and above the orchestra. The effect was a bit demoralizing—more frankly, it was meaningless—despite the fact that Mr. Altschuler played the whole thing twice through at the same concert. At that performance, however, the choral parts were omitted. Last night Mr. Koussevitzky included the chorus, but omitted the light effects.

"Prometheus" seems to me, in spite of the terrific loudness of some of its climaxes, essentially flabby, almost effeminate music. By rearing the entire harmonic structure of the work upon a single "mystic chord"—deriving both his harmonies and themes from that single combination of six tones—Skryabin of course reduced his music to a monochromaticism as absolute, in effect, as if he had dispensed with harmony altogether. If the melodic and rhythmic elements in "Prometheus" had been of absorbing interest, no harm would have been done. But they are not. The rhythms are nothing extraordinary and the themes sound scrappy and undeveloped.

Moreover, the absence of any harmonic contrast, coupled with the fragmentary nature of the melodic ine, make "Prometheus" one of the nost completely static pieces of nusic that I have ever heard. It roes on for minutes at a time withut producing any hint of that sense f life, of ceaseless pressing toward predestined goal, that is the essence of all great music and which as nothing to do with rhythm or netre.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a detailed nd remarkably controlled and modulated reading (and incidentally, Mr. ager, the first trumpeter, covered mself with glory by his amazing aying of the incredible trumpet los). The choristers sang the relavely unimportant wordless vocal arts with smoothness and skill, alhough the labor of bringing them all he way from Boston for less than ive minutes' singing seemed excesive. It was a long way to come, just o say "Ah."

Transcript
April 15

Seemingly, Mr. Koussevitzky believe at the public of the Symphony Concerts ares his passion for the tone-poems of riabin, or can be taught, by repetition, share it. He now purposes to end the son, on Friday, May 1, with two more formances of "Prometheus," again musing the forces of last month. Some will prove. More, it is within belief, may der. However, "Prometheus" is relatively rt, and there is but one more music of iabin to impose on this patient public— e Divine Poem," doubtless reserved for t year.

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

APR 10 1925

Koussevitzky Ends First Series With Boston Musicians

Imports Cecilians, Who Give Russian "Prometheus," a Piece of Rare Qualities, With Remarkable Skill

By F. D. Perkins

The musical forces of Boston were well represented in last night's concert at Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky wound up his first Thursday evening series here with a program of alternating German and Russian numbers. For the German, the orchestra sufficed, but for the Russian, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Mr. Koussevitzky imported the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang.

"Prometheus, the poem of fire," is a comparative stranger here. Its last hearing in these parts was three seasons ago, at the hands of the never conventional Mr. Stokowski, who had dispensed both with chorus and with the "symphony of color rays," which the composer had desired to attain the full Promethean effect. Under Mr. Koussevitzky, who directed the first performance of the work at Moscow in March, 1911, and with an excellent performance by the Bostonians, "Prometheus" was offered ~~last night~~ under the best conditions that an ardent Scribinite might hope to expect.

But it seemed, somehow, to miss fire. "Prometheus" is the strongest of the composer's three major orchestral works, it has the largest portion of the characteristic Scriabin flavor of the piano compositions; there are impressive passages, periods of considerable beauty. But the substance seemed too small for the framework. After the intriguing opening chord the music reached its climax languidly, its inspiration waxed only to wane again, until the rise to the climactic close—and this, impassive in its way, was disappointing after the extent of its preparation. The chorus, a little uncertain in the opening measures of its part, did its full share in emblazoning the high lights. More often, however, the chorus seems to be treated as a part of the orchestra and its notes merged in the ensemble.

Mr. Koussevitzky began with one of those very convenient concerti grossi which Handel had produced at record speed in 1739—the fifth, in D minor, excellently played, with a smooth, buoyant'y firm tone from the Boston Symphony's strings, neatness and precision in the execution. The Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn preceded the Borodin dances, an effective finale with a high content of vodka. The chorus strove valiantly, and its high notes were full, smooth and soaring, but its numbers seemed hardly sufficient to balance the orchestra. But, spurred on vigorously by Mr. Koussevitzky, the Polovtsian dances provided an enlivening close, and stirred large numbers to bid Mr. Koussevitzky farewell in repeated recalls.

The choral numbers will be played to-night in Brooklyn, and again in the orchestra's final appearance of the season to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 11 1925

Boston Orchestra Closes Its Brooklyn Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and ~~last of its~~ series of five concerts last night at the Academy of Music. The program was one thoroughly suited to a "last appearance" as it left the audience with a keen sense of expectation for the pleasures of the next season. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, who has put the Boston organization back among the peers, received a warm personal recognition from last night's audience.

Handel's Concerto in D major for string orchestra was the opening work on the program. It was followed by Scriabin's "Prometheus," a poem of fire. A chorus from the Cecilia Society of Boston supplied the vocal parts. Alexander Lang Steinert played the piano part, which the composer once played with Koussevitzky holding the baton. Koussevitzky was at home in the reading of "Prometheus."

Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries," played iwth immense good will; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" completed the program.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

APR 11 1925

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

WITH the sole exception of Wilhelm Furtwangler, the musical public of Philadelphia had the opportunity this season of hearing virtually every one of the "imported" conductors of American orchestras. There have been Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg [illegible] New York Philharmonic and Bruno Walter with the Symphony Society of New York.

Then we had three others, virtually all with the Philadelphia Orchestra, in fact, although not all three in name. These were Igor Stravinsky, who conducted a program of his own compositions; Willem van Hoogstraten, who also led the Philadelphia Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Stokowski, and Fritz Reiner, who appeared under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia, although the men whom he conducted were all Philadelphia Orchestra members.

HOWEVER, it was not always the case that the qualities of the conductors which have made them famous, were revealed and this was especially true of Mr. Koussevitsky and Mr. Walter. Each of them selected a program which was directly at odds with the kind of music in which his greatest conductorial laurels have been gained. Mr. Koussevitsky, the apostle of modernism and the conductor to whom the Parisian vogue of Stravinsky is the most largely indebted, selected the Beethoven seventh symphony for his principal number. Not that he did not do a fine piece of conducting in the work, but he would have shown his peculiar characteristics and those which he possesses in a greater degree than any other orchestral leader, in such works as "Till Eulenspiegel" of which his reading is said to be very wonderful, or in some of the Stravinsky compositions.

On the other hand, Bruno Walter, the exponent of the classic school, selected the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" one of the most impossible works in the legitimate orchestral repertoire, for the chief number of his program and a composition which, as it was soon evident was not at all adapted to his style either of conducting or of musical thinking. Had these two programs been reversed insofar as the chief numbers were concerned and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted the Berlioz and Mr. Walter, the Beethoven Seventh, the results would doubtless have been more satisfactory. Mr. Koussevitsky, by reason of temperament, training and inclination, would unquestionably have made more of the Berlioz number than could Mr. Walter with the German classic school thoroughly inculcated into his musical being.

THE most impressive feature of Mr. Koussevitsky's conducting is the perfect technique. Outside of an interesting reading of the Berlioz "Carneval Romain," in which he put some original touches, especially near the close, there was nothing in his program to indicate the qualities which have made him supreme as a conductor of the ultra-moderns, for the Debussy selection did not indicate anything very unusual in this respect.

Mr. Stravinsky, on the other hand, has little technique, but it does not appear to bother him greatly, as he is chiefly concerned with other matters. He, too, insists upon detail, but only in rhythm and tempo, despite the fact that not so long ago he declared that music was nothing but sound. Either he has changed his mind or else he does not believe it, because he paid little attention to the sound of the orchestra.

Mengelberg represents still another type of conductor, the one who strives for huge effects, not only of tone, but of overwhelming mental and emotional reactions. This probably explains in some measure his intense admiration for the music of Gustav Mahler, who always had this in mind.

MR. MENGLEBERG in his conducting strives for the heroic—and he usually attains his end. His Philadelphia program this year was entirely an heroic one, consisting of two very long works, with both of which he produced a great impression, although personally I felt occasionally that there seemed to be some overdoing of this essential idea of the compositions.

He is not greatly concerned with delicacy of tonal shading, although he is far more careful in this respect than Mr. Stravinsky. All his readings seem to have been very carefully considered for the effect of the composition as a whole, leaving details largely to take care of themselves. There can be no doubt that this is the real manner in which to read the classic symphonies—provided the composer has made the movements consecutive in thought, which is not always the case even in some very important orchestral works. In mental conception of a composition Mr. Mengleberg will rank fully as high as any conductor, who has been heard in this city.

Mr. von Hoogstraten made a most favorable impression, especially with his reading of the Brahms fourth symphony, which was exceedingly beautiful. His program also was not altogether well chosen for the display of his talents, which are undoubtedly very great.

FRITZ REINER labored under great disadvantages in his Philharmonic Society concert. Stravinsky was the soloist in his own impossibly difficult concerto, and Mr. Reiner had also scheduled the Bartok suite, with which the members of the orchestra were not familiar.

The result was astoundingly good and it speaks volumes not only for Mr. Reiner, but also for the routine and training of the Philadelphia Orchestra that such things can be accomplished with it.

Judged by a single hearing and under circumstances not altogether favorable to the showing of the best qualities of these great leaders, it would appear that of the visiting conductors Krousevitsky is the most brilliant. Mengleberg has the greatest grasp, and Walter and Reiner the better classical touch. Stravinsky may be omitted, as it would be impossible to conceive of his conducting any works except his own; and anyway, he is primarily a composer and not a conductor.

American
April 11

Rachmaninoff To Be Next Symphony Soloist

The twenty-second regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Rachmaninoff, as the soloist of the occasion, will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will also present Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Haldenleben," and Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The presence of a capable chorus, whose voices mingled and merged with the massed tones of many instruments, contributed interest to the fifth philharmonic concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music.

Serge Koussevitzky, well known hereabout, was the conductor.

It is difficult and ineffectual for a reviewer to declare against such talent as Koussevitzky that the evening lacked rather than gave. Yet this reviewer begs to say that at least, in some indefinable fashion, the performance failed to thrill.

There was perfect unison, marvelous technique and there was beauty of stringed tones.

But there occurred no thrill in last night's concert.

It may be that the visual fact of the singers, despite the splendid training of their voices, produced the thought of fault.

It occurs to the reviewer that a 50-50 proportion of singers and musicians destroys the power of both forms of music, inasmuch as it suggests comparison, and pursued to the last analysis, thus projects individualism.

The trap drummer wins out above all the rest in such a situation.

The program opened with the concerto grosso No. 5 in D major by Handel, for stringed instruments only. This was beautiful.

Prometheus, a poem of fire, by Scriabin, followed. Piano, organ and chorus occurred in this number. It did not impress this hearer. Ride of the Valkyries, by Wagner, occurred next. The composition is tuneful and pleasant.

The best phase of the evening was the Good Friday Spell, from Parsifal, by Wagner. This number has thunderous and resonant moments. It was well done. It was beautiful.

The evening concluded with the Polovtsian Dances, from "Prince Igor," by Borodin. The chorus here again took part. The choral part of the organization is the Cecelia Society of Boston. Malcolm Lang served as assistant conductor.

L. F. W.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 11 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

THE musical taste of Mr. Koussewitsky is in many ways similar to that of English music critics as a class. The fulgent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ~~played at the~~ Academy last evening, admires Scriabin. His admiration indeed reaches the pitch where he finds it desirable to present the master's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," at all three of his final New York concerts. He would convince us, if possible, that the Russian Theosophist-Composer was all that Dr. Hull and other eminent Britishers have thought him to be, and since the response to a performance of "Le Poeme de l'Extase" earlier in the season failed to reveal a cult of Scriabinists in this city, Mr. Koussewitsky carefully prepared his ground and then sprang on his public the last and most trying of the five "symphonies."

Perhaps the audience at the Academy last evening enjoyed the mystical presumptions of the Poem of Fire. The applause that followed the final triumphant chord (Dr. Hull points to it with baleful glee as an example of harmonic genius in his "Modern Harmony," a book for the most part sane and illuminating) testified to an enthusiasm which we hope was tribute to Koussewitsky rather than to Scriabin. For music such as "Prometheus" is not made of the stuff that endures. At one time, doubtless, it had a value that depended largely upon its novelty. That time has passed. Scriabin's harmonic system contributed to the development of the new texture but was in itself an insufficient ground base for unique achievement. The chord upon which the system is based permits of no variety (the accusation so wrongy leveled at the music of Debussy); its forms of construction may be varied, but the effect in sound remains largely the same. Monotony results, for Scriabin based his melodic line as well as his harmonic texture on this combination of tones.

So far as "Prometheus" itself is concerned, there are few things in the score to mark it as Scriabin's finest orchestral achievement. What it does represent is the most perfect exposition both of his system and of the extraneous Theosophical matter with which his art was wedded. Even the rather pathetic Mahler gives us no such glaring example of creative poverty in the face of the Idea. What, however, is present in Scriabin's music and absent in that of Mahler is the identity of the musical idiom with the thought it sought to express, and this accounts in a measure not only for Scriabin's enormous fad in some quarters but also for his ultimate failure to achieve distinction as a composer.

His early opus numbers, particularly those devoted to piano music, reveal gifts of a charming if derivative order. There is much Chopin in the piano Preludes and Poems of Scriabin's youth, but there is also an individual note of engaging quality. He might have lived to be an Anton Rubinstein or even Grieg had not Mme. Blavatsky's hand-made cult run off with his better judgment. The ideal eminence that his music now enjoys with many persons is easily explained, for the musical sheep fall for nothing more easily than cosmic thunders produced from an empty shell.

Mr. Koussewitsky must be credited with as persuasive a performance as Scriabin's famous score has ever received in this city. The enthusiasm which he feels for the music is easily discernible in the care and exactitude that he brings to its realization. The orchestra, for the occasion, was augmented by the chorus of the Cecilia Society of Boston. Alexander Steinert played the piano part.

The balance of the program was of a more conventional but nevertheless more agreeable nature. A Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor for quartet of strings and string orchestra showed both conductor and orchestra in their best light. Mr. Koussewitsky delights in the classics no less than he delights in Scriabin, and his readings of Haendel are notably fine. Two Wagnerian excerpts (the "Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Good Friday Spell") followed the intermission, and the concert closed with the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," in which the Cecilia Society again took a hand.

* * *

TIMES

APR 11 1925

Chenoweth.

Boston Symphony

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's closing concert of the season in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. The great conductor who is particularly admired both in Europe and America as an interpreter of Richard Wagner will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various musi cdramas at his Providence concert:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the in- [illegible] the third act of the same

"Tannhauser."

This concert will be the last [illegible] of Boston and one of the very last of the season, since the final Boston concert takes place May 1. Koussevitzky will immediately sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris, London and elsewhere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 11 1925

Last Symphony

The last of the Boston Symphony concerts here will occur Tuesday evening, April 21, in Infantry Hall, and the director, Serge Koussevitzky, announces that the program will be entirely of the compositions of Richard Wagner. The final concert by the orchestra in Boston occurs May 1. The popular director sails for Europe almost immediately after, to conduct a series of concerts in London and another in Paris.

The program to be given here is as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"; "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 11 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE ALL WAGNER PROGRAMME

Boston Symphony's Last Concert of Season April 21.

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra closing concert of the season in Providence, to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. He will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various music dramas of Richard Wagner at his Providence concert: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

This concert will be the last outside of Boston and one of the very last of the season, since the final Boston concert takes place May 1. Koussevitzky will immediately sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris, London and elsewhere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 11 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE ALL WAGNER PROGRAMME

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra closing concert of the season in Providence, to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. He will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various music dramas of Richard Wagner at his Providence concert: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the 179

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

APR10 1925

Koussevitzky Ends First Series With Boston Musicians

Imports Cecilians, Who Give Russian "Prometheus," a Piece of Rare Qualities, With Remarkable Skill

By F. D. Perkins

The musical forces of Boston were well represented in last night's concert at Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky wound up his first Thursday evening series here with a program of alternating German and Russian numbers. For the German, the orchestra sufficed, but for the Russian, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Mr. Koussevitzky imported the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang.

"Prometheus, the poem of fire," is a comparative stranger here. Its last hearing in these parts was three seasons ago, at the hands of the never conventional Mr. Stokowski, who had dispensed both with chorus and with the "symphony of color rays," which the composer had desired to attain the full Promethean effect. Under Mr. Koussevitzky, who directed the first performance of the work at Moscow in March, 1911, and with an excellent performance by the Bostonians, "Prometheus" was offered last night under the best conditions that an ardent Scribinite might hope to expect.

But it seemed, somehow, to miss fire. "Prometheus" is the strongest of the composer's three major orchestral works, it has the largest portion of the characteristic Scriabin flavor of the piano compositions; there are impressive passages, periods of considerable beauty. But the substance seemed too small for the framework. After the intriguing opening chord the music reached its climax languidly, its inspiration waxed only to wane again, until the rise to the climactic close and this, impassive in its way, was disappointing after the extent of its preparation. The chorus, a little uncertain in the opening measures of its part, did its full share in emblazoning the high lights. More often, however, the chorus seems to be treated as a part of the orchestra and its notes merged in the ensemble.

Mr. Koussevitzky began with one of those very convenient concerti grossi which Handel had produced at record speed in 1739—the fifth, in D minor, excellently played, with a smooth, buoyant's firm tone from the Boston Symphony's strings, neatness and precision in the execution. The Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn preceded the Borodin dances, an effective finale with a high content of vodka. The chorus strove valiantly, and its high notes were full, smooth and soaring, but its numbers seemed hardly sufficient to balance the orchestra. But, spurred on vigorously by Mr. Koussevitzky, the Polovtsian dances provided an enlivening close, and stirred large numbers to bid Mr. Koussevitzky farewell in repeated recalls.

The choral numbers will be played to-night in Brooklyn, and again in the orchestra's final appearance of the season to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR11 1925

Boston Orchestra Closes Its Brooklyn Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and ~~last of~~ its series of five concerts last night at the Academy of Music. The program was one thoroughly suited to a "last appearance" as it left the audience with a keen sense of expectation for the pleasures of the next season. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, who has put the Boston organization back among the peers, received a warm personal recognition from last night's audience.

Handel's Concerto in D major for string orchestra was the opening work on the program. It was followed by Scriabin's "Prometheus," a poem of fire. A chorus from the Cecilia Society of Boston supplied the vocal parts. Alexander Lang Steinert played the piano part, which the composer once played with Koussevitzky holding the baton. Koussevitzky was at home in the reading of "Prometheus."

Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries," played iwth immense good will; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" completed the program.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

APR11 1925

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

WITH the sole exception of Wilhelm Furtwangler, the musical public of Philadelphia had the opportunity this season of hearing virtually every one of the "imported" conductors of American orchestras. There have been Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg with the New York Philharmonic and Bruno Walter with the Symphony Society of New York.

Then we had three others, virtually all with the Philadelphia Orchestra, in fact, although not all three in name. These were Igor Stravinsky, who conducted a program of his own compositions; Willem van Hoogstraten, who also led the Philadelphia Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Stokowski, and Fritz Reiner, who appeared under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia, although the men whom he conducted were all Philadelphia Orchestra members.

HOWEVER, it was not always the case that the qualities of the conductors which have made them famous, were revealed and this was especially true of Mr. Koussevitsky and Mr. Walter. Each of them selected a program which was directly at odds with the kind of music in which his greatest conductorial laurels have been gained. Mr. Koussevitsky, the apostle of modernism and the conductor to whom the Parisian vogue of Stravinsky is the most largely indebted, selected the Beethoven seventh symphony for his principal number. Not that he did not do a fine piece of conducting in the work, but he would have shown his peculiar characteristics and those which he possesses in a greater degree than any other orchestral leader, in such works as "Till Eulenspiegel" of which his reading is said to be very wonderful, or in some of the Stravinsky compositions.

On the other hand, Bruno Walter, the exponent of the classic school, selected the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" one of the most impossible works in the legitimate orchestral repertoire, for the chief number of his program and a composition which, as it was soon evident was not at all adapted to his style either of conducting or of musical thinking. Had these two programs been reversed insofar as the chief numbers were concerned and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted the Berlioz and Mr. Walter, the Beethoven Seventh, the results would doubtless have been more satisfactory. Mr. Koussevitsky, by reason of temperament, training and inclination, would unquestionably have made more of the Berlioz number than could Mr. Walter with the German classic school thoroughly inculcated into his musical being.

THE most impressive feature of Mr. Koussevitsky's conducting is the perfect technique. Outside of an interesting reading of the Berlioz "Carneval Romain," in which he put some original touches, especially near the close, there was nothing in his program to indicate the qualities which have made him supreme as a conductor of the ultra-moderns, for the Debussy selection did not indicate anything very unusual in this respect.

Mr. Stravinsky, on the other hand, has little technique, but it does not appear to bother him greatly, as he is chiefly concerned with other matters. He, too, insists upon detail, but only in rhythm and tempo, despite the fact that not so long ago he declared that music was nothing but sound. Either he has changed his mind or else he does not believe it, because he paid little attention to the sound of the orchestra.

Mengelberg represents still another type of conductor, the one who strives for huge effects, not only of tone, but of overwhelming mental and emotional reactions. This probably explains in some measure his intense admiration for the music of Gustav Mahler, who always had this in mind.

MR. MENGLEBERG in his conducting strives for the heroic—and he usually attains his end. His Philadelphia program this year was entirely an heroic one, consisting of two very long works, with both of which he produced a great impression, although personally I felt occasionally that there seemed to be some overdoing of this essential idea of the compositions.

He is not greatly concerned with delicacy of tonal shading, although he is far more careful in this respect than Mr. Stravinsky. All his readings seem to have been very carefully considered for the effect of the composition as a whole, leaving details largely to take care of themselves. There can be no doubt that this is the real manner in which to read the classic symphonies—provided the composer has made the movements consecutive in thought, which is not always the case even in some very important orchestral works. In mental conception of a composition Mr. Mengleberg will rank fully as high as any conductor who has been heard in this city.

Mr. von Hoogstraten made a most favorable impression, especially with his reading of the Brahms fourth symphony, which was exceedingly beautiful. His program also was not altogether well chosen for the display of his talents, which are undoubtedly very great.

FRITZ REINER labored under great disadvantages in his Philharmonic Society concert. Stravinsky was the soloist in his own impossibly difficult concerto, and Mr. Reiner had also scheduled the Bartok suite, with which the members of the orchestra were not familiar.

The result was astoundingly good and it speaks volumes not only for Mr. Reiner, but also for the routine and training of the Philadelphia Orchestra that such things can be accomplished with it.

Judged by a single hearing and under circumstances not altogether favorable to the showing of the best qualities of these great leaders, it would appear that of the visiting conductors Krousevitsky is the most brilliant. Mengleberg has the greatest grasp, and Walter and Reiner the better classical touch. Stravinsky may be omitted, as it would be impossible to conceive of his conducting any works except his own; and anyway, he is primarily a composer and not a conductor.

American
April 11

Rachmaninoff To Be Next Symphony Soloist

The twenty-second regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Rachmaninoff, as the soloist of the occasion, will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will also present, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Haldenleben," and Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The presence of a capable chorus, whose voices mingled and merged with the massed tones of many instruments, contributed interest to the fifth philharmonic concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music.

Serge Koussevitzky, well known hereabout, was the conductor.

It is difficult and ineffectual for a reviewer to declare against such talent as Koussevitzky that the evening lacked rather than gave. Yet this reviewer begs to say that at least, in some indefinable fashion, the performance failed to thrill.

There was perfect unison, marvelous technique and there was beauty of stringed tones.

But there occurred no thrill in last night's concert.

It may be that the visual fact of the singers, despite the splendid training of their voices, produced the thought of fault.

It occurs to the reviewer that a 50-50 proportion of singers and musicians destroys the power of both forms of music, inasmuch as it suggests comparison, and pursued to the last analysis, thus projects individualism.

The trap drummer wins out above all the rest in such a situation.

The program opened with the concerto grosso No. 5 in D major by Handel, for stringed instruments only. This was beautiful.

Prometheus, a poem of fire, by Scriabin, followed. Piano, organ and chorus occurred in this number. It did not impress this hearer. Ride of the Valkyries, by Wagner, occurred next. The composition is tuneful and pleasant.

The best phase of the evening was the Good Friday Spell, from Parsifal, by Wagner. This number has thunderous and resonant moments. It was well done. It was beautiful.

The evening concluded with the Polovtsian Dances, from "Prince Igor," by Borodin. The chorus here again took part. The choral part of the organization is the Cecelia Society of Boston. Malcolm Lang served as assistant conductor.

L. F. W.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR11 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

THE musical taste of Mr. Koussewitsky is in many ways similar to that of English music critics as a class. The fulgent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played at the Academy last evening, admires Scriabin. His admiration indeed reaches the pitch where he finds it desirable to present the master's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," at all three of his final New York concerts. He would convince us, if possible, that the Russian Theosophist-Composer was all that Dr. Hull and other eminent Britishers have thought him to be, and since the response to a performance of "Le Poeme de l'Extase" earlier in the season failed to reveal a cult of Scriabinists in this city, Mr. Koussewitsky carefully prepared his ground and then sprang on his public the last and most trying of the five "symphonies."

Perhaps the audience at the Academy last evening enjoyed the mystical presumptions of the Poem of Fire. The applause that followed the final triumphant chord (Dr. Hull points to it with baleful glee as an example of harmonic genius in his "Modern Harmony," a book for the most part sane and illuminating) testified to an enthusiasm which we hope was tribute to Koussewitsky rather than to Scriabin. For music such as "Prometheus" is not made of the stuff that endures. At one time, doubtless, it had a value that depended largely upon its novelty. That time has passed. Scriabin's harmonic system contributed to the development of the new texture but was in itself an insufficient ground base for unique achievement. The chord upon which the system is based permits of no variety (the accusation so wrongy leveled at the music of Debussy); its forms of construction may be varied, but the effect in sound remains largely the same. Monotony results, for Scriabin based his melodic line as well as his harmonic texture on this combination of tones.

So far as "Prometheus" itself is concerned, there are few things in the score to mark it as Scriabin's finest orchestral achievement. What it does represent is the most perfect exposition both of his system and of the extraneous Theosophical matter with which his art was wedded. Even the rather pathetic Mahler gives us no such glaring example of creative poverty in the face of the Idea. What, however, is present in Scriabin's music and absent in that of Mahler is the identity of the musical idiom with the thought it sought to express, and this accounts in a measure not only for Scriabin's enormous fad in some quarters but also for his ultimate failure to achieve distinction as a composer.

His early opus numbers, particularly those devoted to piano music, reveal gifts of a charming if derivative order. There is much Chopin in the piano Preludes and Poems of Scriabin's youth, but there is also an individual note of engaging quality. He might have lived to be an Anton Rubinstein or even a Grieg had not Mme. Blavatsky's hand-made cult run off with his better judgment. The ideal eminence that his music now enjoys with many persons is easily explained; for the musical sheep fall for nothing more easily than cosmic thunders produced from an empty shell.

Mr. Koussewitsky must be credited with as persuasive a performance as Scriabin's famous score has ever received in this city. The enthusiasm which he feels for the music is easily discernible in the care and exactitude that he brings to its realization. The orchestra, for the occasion, was augmented by the chorus of the Cecilia Society of Boston. Alexander Steinert played the piano part.

The balance of the program was of a more conventional but nevertheless more agreeable nature. A Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor for quartet of strings and string orchestra showed both conductor and orchestra in their best light. Mr. Koussewitsky delights in the classics no less than he delights in Scriabin, and his readings of Haendel are notably fine. Two Wagnerian excerpts (the "Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Good Friday Spell") followed the intermission, and the concert closed with the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," in which the Cecilia Society again took a hand.

* * *

TIMES

APR 11 1925

Chenoweth.

Boston Symphony

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's closing concert of the season in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. The great conductor who is particularly admired both in Europe and America as an interpreter of Richard Wagner will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various musi cdramas at his Providence concert:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same

"Tannhauser" was a performance of

This concert will be the last outside of Boston and one of the very last of the season, since the final Boston concert takes place May 1. Koussevitzky will immediately sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris, London and elsewhere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR11 1925

Last Symphony

The last of the Boston Symphony concerts here will occur Tuesday evening, April 21, in Infantry Hall, and the director, Serge Koussevitzky, announces that the program will be entirely of the compositions of Richard Wagner. The final concert by the orchestra in Boston occurs May 1. The popular director sails for Europe almost immediately after, to conduct a series of concerts in London and another in Paris.

The program to be given here is as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"; "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR11 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE ALL WAGNER PROGRAMME

Boston Symphony's Last Concert of Season April 21.

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra closing concert of the season in Providence, to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. He will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various music dramas of Richard Wagner at his Providence concert: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

This concert will be the last outside of Boston and one of the very last of the season, since the final Boston concert takes place May 1. Koussevitzky will immediately sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris, London and elsewhere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR11 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE ALL WAGNER PROGRAMME

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra closing concert of the season in Providence, to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. He will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various music dramas of Richard Wagner at his Providence concert: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal,"

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

APR 1 0 1925

Koussevitzky Ends First Series With Boston Musicians

Imports Cecilians, Who Give Russian "Prometheus," a Piece of Rare Qualities, With Remarkable Skill

By F. D. Perkins

The musical forces of Boston were well represented in last night's concert at Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky wound up his first Thursday evening series here with a program of alternating German and Russian numbers. For the German, the orchestra sufficed, but for the Russian, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Mr. Koussevitzky imported the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang.

"Prometheus, the poem of fire," is a comparative stranger here. Its last hearing in these parts was three seasons ago, at the hands of the never conventional Mr. Stokowski, who had dispensed both with chorus and with the "symphony of color rays," which the composer had desired to attain the full Promethean effect. Under Mr. Koussevitzky, who directed the first performance of the work at Moscow in March, 1911, and with an excellent performance by the Bostonians, "Prometheus" was offered ~~last night~~ under the best conditions that an ardent Scribinite might hope to expect.

But it seemed, somehow, to miss fire. "Prometheus" is the strongest of the composer's three major orchestral works, it has the largest portion of the characteristic Scriabin flavor of the piano compositions; there are impressive passages, periods of considerable beauty. But the substance seemed too small for the framework. After the intriguing opening chord the music reached its climax languidly, its inspiration waxed only to wane again, until the rise to the climactic close—and this, impassive in its way, was disappointing after the extent of its preparation. The chorus, a little uncertain in the opening measures of its part, did its full share in emblazoning the high lights. More often, however, the chorus seems to be treated as a part of the orchestra and its notes merged in the ensemble.

Mr. Koussevitzky began with one of those very convenient concerti grossi which Handel had produced at record speed in 1739—the fifth, in D minor, excellently played, with a smooth, buoyant'y firm tone from the Boston Symphony's strings, neatness and precision in the execution. The Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn preceded the Borodin dances, an effective finale with a high content of vodka. The chorus strove valiantly, and its high notes were full, smooth and soaring, but its numbers seemed hardly sufficient to balance the orchestra. But, spurred on vigorously by Mr. Koussevitzky, the Polovtsian dances provided an enlivening close, and stirred large numbers to bid Mr. Koussevitzky farewell in repeated recalls.

The choral numbers will be played to-night in Brooklyn, and again in the orchestra's final appearance of the season to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 1 1 1925

Boston Orchestra Closes Its Brooklyn Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and ~~last of its~~ series of five concerts last night at the Academy of Music. The program was one thoroughly suited to a "last appearance" as it left the audience with a keen sense of expectation for the pleasures of the next season. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, who has put the Boston organization back among the peers, received a warm personal recognition from last night's audience.

Handel's Concerto in D major for string orchestra was the opening work on the program. It was followed by Scriabin's "Prometheus," a poem of fire. A chorus from the Cecilia Society of Boston supplied the vocal parts. Alexander Lang Steinert played the piano part, which the composer once played with Koussevitzky holding the baton. Koussevitzky was at home in the reading of "Prometheus."

Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries," played iwth immense good will; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" completed the program.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

APR 1 1 1925

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

WITH the sole exception of Wilhelm Furtwangler, the musical public of Philadelphia had the opportunity this season of hearing virtually every one of the "imported" conductors of American orchestras. There have been Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg ~~with the~~ New York Philharmonic and Bruno Walter with the Symphony Society of New York.

Then we had three others, virtually all with the Philadelphia Orchestra, in fact, although not all three in name. These were Igor Stravinsky, who conducted a program of his own compositions; Willem van Hoogstraten, who also led the Philadelphia Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Stokowski, and Fritz Reiner, who appeared under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia, although the men whom he conducted were all Philadelphia Orchestra members.

HOWEVER, it was not always the case that the qualities of the conductors which have made them famous, were revealed and this was especially true of Mr. Koussevitsky and Mr. Walter. Each of them selected a program which was directly at odds with the kind of music in which his greatest conductorial laurels have been gained. Mr. Koussevitsky, the apostle of modernism and the conductor to whom the Parisian vogue of Stravinsky is the most largely indebted, selected the Beethoven seventh symphony for his principal number. Not that he did not do a fine piece of conducting in the work, but he would have shown his peculiar characteristics and those which he possesses in a greater degree than any other orchestral leader, in such works as "Till Eulenspiegel" of which his reading is said to be very wonderful, or in some of the Stravinsky compositions.

On the other hand, Bruno Walter, the exponent of the classic school, selected the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" one of the most impossible works in the legitimate orchestral repertoire, for the chief number of his program and a composition which, as it was soon evident was not at all adapted to his style either of conducting or of musical thinking. Had these two programs been reversed insofar as the chief numbers were concerned and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted the Berlioz and Mr. Walter, the Beethoven Seventh, the results would doubtless have been more satisfactory. Mr. Kousevitsky, by reason of temperament, training and inclination, would unquestionably have made more of the Berlioz number than could Mr. Walter with the German classic school thoroughly inculcated into his musical being.

THE most impressive feature of Mr. Koussevitsky's conducting is the perfect technique. Outside of an interesting reading of the Berlioz "Carneval Romain," in which he put some original touches, especially near the close, there was nothing in his program to indicate the qualities which have made him supreme as a conductor of the ultra-moderns, for the Debussy selection did not indicate anything very unusual in this respect.

Mr. Stravinsky, on the other hand, has little technique, but it does not appear to bother him greatly, as he is chiefly concerned with other matters. He, too, insists upon detail, but only in rhythm and tempo, despite the fact that not so long ago he declared that music was nothing but sound. Either he has changed his mind or else he does not believe it, because he paid little attention to the sound of the orchestra.

Mengelberg represents still another type of conductor, the one who strives for huge effects, not only of tone, but of overwhelming mental and emotional reactions. This probably explains in some measure his intense admiration for the music of Gustav Mahler, who always had this in mind.

MR. MENGLEBERG in his conducting strives for the heroic—and he usually attains his end. His Philadelphia program this year was entirely an heroic one, consisting of two very long works, with both of which he produced a great impression, although personally I felt occasionally that there seemed to be some overdoing of this essential idea of the compositions.

He is not greatly concerned with delicacy of tonal shading, although he is far more careful in this respect than Mr. Stravinsky. All his readings seem to have been very carefully considered for the effect of the composition as a whole, leaving details largely to take care of themselves. There can be no doubt that this is the real manner in which to read the classic symphonies—provided the composer has made the movements consecutive in thought, which is not always the case even in some very important orchestral works. In mental conception of a composition Mr. Mengleberg will rank fully as high as any conductor who has been heard in this city.

Mr. von Hoogstraten made a most favorable impression, especially with his reading of the Brahms fourth symphony, which was exceedingly beautiful. His program also was not altogether well chosen for the display of his talents, which are undoubtedly very great.

FRITZ REINER labored under great disadvantages in his Philharmonic Society concert. Stravinsky was the soloist in his own impossibly difficult concerto, and Mr. Reiner had also scheduled the Bartok suite, with which the members of the orchestra were not familiar.

The result was astoundingly good and it speaks volumes not only for Mr. Reiner, but also for the routine and training of the Philadelphia Orchestra that such things can be accomplished with it.

Judged by a single hearing and under circumstances not altogether favorable to the showing of the best qualities of these great leaders, it would appear that of the visiting conductors Krousevitsky is the most brilliant. Mengleberg has the greatest grasp, and Walter and Reiner the better classical touch. Stravinsky may be omitted, as it would be impossible to conceive of his conducting any works except his own; and anyway, he is primarily a composer and not a conductor.

American
Apr 11

Rachmaninoff To Be Next Symphony Soloist

The twenty-second regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Rachmaninoff, as the soloist of the occasion, will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will also present Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Haldenleben," and Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The presence of a capable chorus, whose voices mingled and merged with the massed tones of many instruments, contributed interest to the fifth philharmonic concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music.

Serge Koussevitzky, well known hereabout, was the conductor.

It is difficult and ineffectual for a reviewer to declare against such talent as Koussevitzky that the evening lacked rather than gave. Yet this reviewer begs to say that at least, in some indefinable fashion, the performance failed to thrill.

There was perfect unison, marvelous technique and there was beauty of stringed tones.

But there occurred no thrill in last night's concert.

It may be that the visual fact of the singers, despite the splendid training of their voices, produced the thought of fault.

It occurs to the reviewer that a 50-50 proportion of singers and musicians destroys the power of both forms of music, inasmuch as it suggests comparison, and pursued to the last analysis, thus projects individualism.

The trap drummer wins out above all the rest in such a situation.

The program opened with the concerto grosso No. 5 in D major by Handel, for stringed instruments only. This was beautiful.

Prometheus, a poem of fire, by Scriabin, followed. Piano, organ and chorus occurred in this number. It did not impress this hearer. Ride of the Valkyries, by Wagner, occurred next. The composition is tuneful and pleasant.

The best phase of the evening was the Good Friday Spell, from Parsifal, by Wagner. This number has thunderous and resonant moments. It was well done. It was beautiful.

The evening concluded with the Polovtsian Dances, from "Prince Igor," by Borodin. The chorus here again took part. The choral part of the organization is the Cecelia Society of Boston. Malcolm Lang served as assistant conductor.

L. F. W.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 1 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

THE musical taste of Mr. Kousewitsky is in many ways similar to that of English music critics as a class. The fulgent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ~~played at the~~ Academy last evening, admires Scriabin. His admiration indeed reaches the pitch where he finds it desirable to present the master's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," at all three of his final New York concerts. He would convince us, if possible, that the Russian Theosophist-Composer was all that Dr. Hull and other western Britishers [illegible] novelists, who always wins the fight no matter how great the odds against him, is always a "square gambler," is the idol of his men and the true lover of the nice little girl who is as much lost in a mining camp as a wild rose would be [illegible] carefully [illegible] his ground and then sprang on his public the last and most trying of the five "symphonies."

Perhaps the audience at the Academy last evening enjoyed the mystical presumptions of the Poem of Fire. The applause that followed the final triumphant chord (Dr. Hull points to it with baleful glee as an example of harmonic genius in his "Modern Harmony," a book for the most part sane and illuminating) testified to an enthusiasm which we hope was tribute to Koussewitsky rather than to Scriabin. For music such as "Prometheus" is not made of the stuff that endures. At one time, doubtless, it had a value that depended largely upon its novelty. That time has passed. Scriabin's harmonic system contributed to the development of the new texture but was in itself an insufficient ground base for unique achievement. The chord upon which the system is based permits of no variety (the accusation so wrongy leveled at the music of Debussy); its forms of construction may be varied, but the effect in sound remains largely the same. Monotony results, for Scriabin based his melodic line as well as his harmonic texture on this combination of tones.

So far as "Prometheus" itself is concerned, there are few things in the score to mark it as Scriabin's finest orchestral achievement. What it does represent is the most perfect exposition both of his system and of the extraneous Theosophical matter with which his art was wedded. Even the rather pathetic Mahler gives us no such glaring example of creative poverty in the face of the Idea. What, however, is present in Scriabin's music and absent in that of Mahler is the identity of the musical idiom with the thought it sought to express, and this accounts in a measure not only for Scriabin's enormous fad in some quarters but also for his ultimate failure to achieve distinction as a composer.

His early opus numbers, particularly those devoted to piano music, reveal gifts of a charming if derivative order. There is much Chopin in the piano Preludes and Poems of Scriabin's youth, but there is also an individual note of engaging quality. He might have lived to be an Anton Rubinstein or even Grieg had not Mme. Blavatsky's hand-made cult run off with his better judgment. The ideal eminence that his music now enjoys with many persons is easily explained, for the musical sheep fall for nothing more easily than cosmic thunders produced from an empty shell.

Mr. Koussewitsky must be credited with as persuasive a performance as Scriabin's famous score has ever received in this city. The enthusiasm which he feels for the music is easily discernible in the care and exactitude that he brings to its realization. The orchestra, for the occasion, was augmented by the chorus of the Cecilia Society of Boston. Alexander Steinert played the piano part.

The balance of the program was of a more conventional but nevertheless more agreeable nature. A Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor for quartet of strings and string orchestra showed both conductor and orchestra in their best light. Mr. Koussewitsky delights in the classics no less than he delights in Scriabin, and his readings of Haendel are notably fine. Two Wagnerian excerpts (the "Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Good Friday Spell") followed the intermission, and the con-

---

TIMES

APR 1 1 1925

Chenoweth.

Boston Symphony

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's closing concert of the season in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. The great conductor who is particularly admired both in Europe and America as an interpreter of Richard Wagner will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various musi cdramas at his Providence concert:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

This concert will be the last outside of Boston and one of the very last of the season, since the final Boston concert takes place May 1. Koussevitzky will immediately sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris, London and elsewhere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 1 1 1925

Last Symphony

The last of the Boston Symphony concerts here will occur Tuesday evening, April 21, in Infantry Hall, and the director, Serge Koussevitzky, announces that the program will be entirely of the compositions of Richard Wagner. The final concert by the orchestra in Boston occurs May 1. The popular director sails for Europe almost immediately after, to conduct a series of concerts in London and another in Paris.

The program to be given here is as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"; "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 1 1 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE ALL WAGNER PROGRAMME

Boston Symphony's Last Concert of Season April 21.

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra closing concert of the season in Providence, to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. He will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various music dramas of Richard Wagner at his Providence concert: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

This concert will be the last outside of Boston and one of the very last of the season, since the final Boston concert takes place May 1. Koussevitzky will immediately sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris, London and elsewhere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 1 1 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE ALL WAGNER PROGRAMME

An all-Wagner programme will be the notable occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra closing concert of the season in Providence, to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, April 21. He will present the following generous array of excerpts from the various music dramas of Richard Wagner at his Providence concert: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal,"

80

Traveler April 11

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 22d regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Sergei Rachmaninoff as the soloist of the occasion will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will also present Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Haldenleben," and Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand."

PENSION FUND

Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), and various excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas, will comprise the notable program of the Boston Symphony orchestra for its pension fund concert to take place in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, April 19, at 3:30. This concert offers non-subscribers the only opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra under its remarkabe new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, this season, since all the series are fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky will also be heard at this concert in the following numbers of Richard Wagner: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

NEW YORK
TIMES

APR 12 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, again assisted by the Cecilia Society of Boston, repeated Scriabine's "Prometheus" at the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The "Polovstian Dances" from Borodin's "Prince Igor" also were repeated. The other compositions were the "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute" of Ottorino Respighi and two the three orchestral Nocturnes of Debussy. Why Mr. Koussevitsky did not also perform "Sirenes," the third of the Nocturnes, when he had a chorus at hand for the simple vocal parts, was not explained.

The second hearing of Scriabine's composition only emphasized the poverty of ideas and the singularly experimental character of the orchestration apparent at the first hearing last Thursday night. But "Prometheus," while it may promise much and perform little or nothing that is genuine or convincing, reaches at last a resounding climax, dearly loved by conductors—a climax which calls into play the utmost capacities of orchestra and chorus, and which may be relied upon to bring down the house. The audience applauded loudly the climax of Messrs. Scriabine and Koussevitsky when at last it came.

The remainder of the program was familiar, but very welcome, for it comprised several works of exceptional individuality. Mr. Koussevitsky had played the Debussy Nocturnes, as well as the works of Scriabine and Borodine, in earlier concerts here. Certainly these Nocturnes echo a beauty which is seldom audible and of which a genius catches a few distant vibrations which he reveals in his art. The patrician spirit of Italy of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, of an epoch which the world will not see again, is embodied in the pieces arranged by Respighi, and these pieces are admirably played by the virtuosi of Mr. Koussevitsky's orchestra. It is true that the women of the chorus sang the savage and splendid music of Borodine, music now wildly sweet and sensuous, now of earth-shaking rhythm and power, as if they were singing hymns at a Sunday school picnic or perhaps an oratorio by Horatio Parker.

This concert concluded the brilliant and uneven series of performances which Mr. Koussevitsky has directed in this city. In another column his qualities as a leader are discussed at greater length. Two members of the orchestra played for the last time here. George Longy, the remarkable first oboe and one of the most distinguished ornaments of the band of which he has been a member for so many years, retires at the end of the season to his home in France. K. Keller, the double-bass player and another veteran of long and excellent service, also will resign his position.

At the end of the concert the audience gave Mr. Koussevitsky an ovation.

Globe April 12

This week brings one of the major events of the rapidly waning musical season, the two performances of Brahms' "Requiem" to be given in Symphony Hall Thursday and Friday evenings by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and an orchestra of Boston Symphony members. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct both performances by invitation of Dr Davison, who has trained the chorus. The Handel and Haydn Society ends its season today with a performance of the late Horatio Parker's oratorio "Hora Novissima." Emil Mollenhauer will conduct and distinguished soloists are to assist. This oratorio is perhaps the most notable yet composed by an American.

Rachmaninoff will play his second ...rto, not one of his finest compo...ns, at this week's Symphony con... One would prefer his third con... ince he elects to perform his ...usic.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 12 1925

Scriabine's "Prometheus" Featured at Season's Farewell Boston Concert

Alexander Scriabine's "Prometheus, A Pôem of Fire" was the piece de resistance of an unusually varied programme presented at the Academy of Music Friday night, in the last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, under Institute auspices. The orchestra was assisted by a large chorus from the Cecilia Society of Boston, of which Malcolm Lang is the conductor, and also by Alexander Steinert at the Piano. The performance was given without the color organ, which the composer required, employed so unsuccessfully by Modest Altschuler at the first New York hearing of Scriabine's score in 1915.

It is not often that opportunity is presented to hear this much debated work by a much debated composer. Friday night's performance, it might be mentioned in passing, was the first in Brooklyn although the work already dates fourteen years. Some there are for whom it is an epochal creation, establishing undisputably the genius—the mystical genius—of Scriabine. Others there are for whom it is merely harmonic extravaganza, a somewhat interesting technical study of how a talented but not very lucid composer was able to shift the planes that betoken sobriety and mystery. Last night's hearing should be regarded as an authentic interpretation, for it was Serge Koussevitzky who conducted the first performance of the work in Moscow (March 2, 1911) with Scriabine himself at the piano.

Scriabine, as is generally known, was a dabbler in theosophical mechanics, and "Prometheus" is in some respects the fruit of those ponderings. It depicts, according to Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, that state in the evolution (not Darwinian) of humanity, in which "the nascent races of mankind, not yet illuminated by the Prometheus spark, were physically incomplete, possessing only the shadows of bodies: sinless because devoid of conscious personality — in Theosophical terms 'without Karma.' From this condition they were liberated by the gift of Prometheus—the fire which awakened man's creative power."

This then, is even a more dramatic theme than that propounded by Hellenic mythology. It goes to the essence of art, of humanity, it is the deification of the creative act: it is —or should be—an ecstatic transport to lift the hearer, not only figuratively, but literally, out of his seat, almost out of himself. It is a theme greater than ever Beethoven or Wagner essayed and verily, they were giants.

It was, alas, too much for Scriabine. Beginning with his "mystic chord" of fourths, a basic chord given out and sustained by woodwind instruments and tremulous strings, he sought to develop a complex, chaotic world—and chaotic it was. Unfortunately it never achieved that unity of line which art compels; therein lies its failure. The composer can be visualized, torn by his passions, trying to imprison his experience on the page before him; yet the feeling is never overcome that those divine passions are jousting with aesthetic theories. There is not that certainty of purpose that makes for greatness. The early scenes paint a desolation that is gay in comparison with the desolate interludes of Tshaikowsky's "Francesca de Rimini." The late movements of the creation are turgid, yet do not match the similar moods of even Stravinsky. Perhaps, Scriabine was on the road to genius—but he died too soon.

Handel's Concerto Grosso (No.5) in D major was given in a manner that reflected credit on the string orchestra, who played with a decisiveness and clarity that was a pleasure to hear.

In the second half of the evening, Richard Wagner was presented in two moods, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal." In the "Ride," conductor and orchestra labored manfully, yet the result was not full-blooded. In the Good Friday Spell, inspired by the day itself, possibly, Mr. Koussevitzky achieved a serenity, a sublimity that was beyond any elevation ever before heard by the present reviewer.

Borodine's Polovtsian Dance from "Prince Igor," given by the orchestra and chorus was carried through with noteworthy vigor. While less significant musically than the other numbers, its charm, its occasional fire, won for it the most obvious applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

APR 12 1925

Boston Symphony And Koussevitzky End Seasons Here

Cecilia Society Takes Part in Russian Numbers of Enthusiastically Received Program at Carnegie Hall

By F. D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky ended his first, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra its thirty-ninth New York season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, with the Cecilia Society of Boston again taking part in the two Russian numbers of the program, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." These were accompanied by a different set of purely instrumental offerings, Ottorino Respighi's "free transcription for orchestra" of four old Italian dances and airs for the lute, and the Debussy nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes."

The Respighi suite, first performed in Rome six years ago, had their first local hearing in 1921, with a performance of the latter three sections by Toscanini's "Scala" orchestra, and of the opening "Balletto detto il Conte Orlando" by the New York Symphony. The original Balletto is by Simone Molinaro, who, as Mr. Philip Hale's indispensable program notes point out, was appointed chapel-master of the Genoa Cathedral in 1599; the ensuing Gagliarda (citing the same notes) by Vincenzo Galilei, a sixteenth-century Florentine; the Vilanella and Passo Mezzo and Mascherada which form the last two movements by composers unknown.

Of these, Respighi has made a very agreeable suite, arranging them so as to obtain the maximum degree of variety obtainable. His orchestration is discreet and effective, not aiming to produce an archaic atmosphere, nor trying to clothe sixteenth century tunes in ultra-twentieth century garments. The orchestration is most elaborate in the last movement, but yet does not suggest a musical anachronism.

The performance of the Debussy works, which Mr. Koussevitzky had offered his evening audiences at his first local appearance, brought prolonged plaudits. Again, the entrance of the imaginary procession in "Fetes" was most effectively wrought, although at its climax that procession seemed distinctly real, headed by a vigorous, lusty-lunged brass band. After the orchestra had played, and the Cecilians had sung the Borodin excerpt, there was enthusiastic applause for the conductor and his standing cohorts, bidding the Bostonians farewell until next November.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

APR 12 1925

Boston Symphony Ends Season Here with Respighi Airs

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert for the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Conductor Koussevitzky, finishing his first New York series, featured a group of quaint and delicate early Italian dances and airs, enlarged by Respighi from the confined medium of an ancient lute to the strings of a modern orchestra. The numbers in this were a Balletto detto il Conte Orlando, Gagliarda, Villanella and Passo Mezzo e Mascherada, all by composers of the sixteenth century. The modern Italian's arrangement of these by his professional ancestors preserved their orginal charm and exquisite grace.

Scriabin's "Prometheus, a poem of fire, for orchestra and piano with organ and chorus," was held over from Thursday night's programme and its second hearing within a few days revealed anew the ardor and mastery of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting. The instrumentalists were again reinforced by the Cecilia Society of Boston, a chorus that rang with fervor and effectiveness.

Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals" formed a poetic contributoin to the list that ended with the lively, colorful dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

• • •

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 12 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FAREWELL.

Serge Koussevitzky will present an all Wagner program at the closing concert of the season here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, April 21.

The great Russian conductor has long held a particular reputation of an eloquent and stirring interpreter of the music of Richard Wagner, having on notable occasions in Europe conducted whole acts from certain music dramas, in concert form. He will in his program for Providence present the following generous array of excerpts: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction of the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie:" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Advertiser April 12

day.

STRAUSS-WAGNER PENSION FUND BILL

Music of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauss will be featured at the Symphony pension fund in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon

The "Flying Dutchman," overture will open the program. Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero Life," played this season for the first time since 1910: the "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture will be the other numbers.

BIG SALE FOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 12 1925

• • •

Wagner Concert by Symphony

The Boston Symphony is to give a Wagner programme for its final concert here this season on April 21.

The programme will be as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" prelude to "Lohengrin" and introduction to third act of the same piece; introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal;" overture to "Tannhauser."

• • •

Post April 12

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at this week's pair of Symphony Concerts, playing the piano—part of his own Second Concerto. For beginning will come Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand," and for conclusion Strauss gigantic tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," long unheard from the Boston Orchestra.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The music of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauss makes the programme announced for the second Pension Fund Concert next Sunday afternoon. From the later comes "Ein Heldenleben" from the former the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the excerpt entitled "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and, for brilliant conclusion, the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 12 1925

Boston Symphony Criticized.

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

Cannot something be done, I wonder, to restore the prestige of the Boston Symphony? The orchestra is always fine. But the programs we have been obliged to listen to all winter—awful. The one of last night, April 10, the limit. That chorus brought from Boston, at such an expense—for what? All they did was screech. I am a lover of music. Have had my seat since the B. S. first came to Brooklyn. Are we obliged to have this conductor for another year? His programs have no music. S. C.

Brooklyn, N. Y., April 11.

Transcript Apr 13

Place and Poetry

With the possible exception of Salome's Dance from Strauss's opera of the name, Mr. Koussevitzky's Cambridge program for yesterday evening's performance was admirably suited to the acoustical qualities of Sanders Theater. Beethoven resounds so full and measured, so joyously and buoyantly in Sanders; particularly the Pastoral. For Sanders Theater, with its strange architecture, its minikin dimensions, its homogeneity, owns far more of an atmosphere than Symphony Hall. It is further a hall of one mood. It is intimate with an older order, and more hospitable to such music as has been sifted through a good span of years or else struck from the classic die. Honegger's "Pacific" was markedly uncongenial in Sanders. Stravinsky or Copland, or even Bliss, would be terrible. Wagner seems about the pitch of emotion that it may weather in comfort. The elusives, Debussy and Ravel, for example, in some manner assume an older cloak when they are aired in Sanders. Mr. Koussevitzky, then, with the "Pastoral," Brahms and Wagner, was within bounds. Had not Strauss come as a strict incursion on the beauty of what had preceded, it too, might have suited as well.

For the fact, Mr. Kousevitzky's program as he read it was one of the most brilliant, perhaps the most so, that he has given in Cambridge. He has never before accorded the "Pastoral" such marked distinction. The beauty of the allegro has not seemed so ripe, so sure as this. The gradations and transitions evolved in one continuous flux of song. Particularly, the primitive sensuous voices of the Andante looked up with arresting freshness and transparency. The conductor put the last two movements together, without pause. A new rattling of the double-basses, an accumulation of fibrous sound ushered in the thunderstorm as one will seldom hear it. The oblique, swift rush of the storm itself, no less memorable, the symphony swept away to its gradual end. A performance not only of devout inspiration, but of the meticulous reading, of the polished and brilliant phrase. In another way Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to give as much here to Beethoven as he invariably does to Wagner.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin," reached another level. From the nobility of that shrill beginning on the strings through the climax of brass and on to the recession, the work proclaimed perfect coherence. It is never "on whose last steps I climb" with Mr. Koussevitzky in Wagner. It is always a winding to the peak or a swoop to the depths. Wagner in his hands is ineffably plastic, flexible, and tenuous. You are up before you know it; and down with the shouting memory of the ascent filling the mind. As we have listened to Mr. Koussevitzky, Wagner appears to be his great adventure. He never passes through such emotional Sturm und Drang as here; he never seems so palpably shaken. It is idle to imagine that one in fifty of his auditors escape the spell. They may disagree on his architectonic power; they may shudder at his structures, but they must be emo-

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued from Preceding Page

tionally impressed. It is unbelievable that they should not.

The Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," the second number on the program, found him in like mood. With that wide flare of the baton, or the tip of it striking for power, or tearing out the muscular, Haydnesque rhythms, he made it to sing or sweep in graceful, majestic curves. It is not unified as its title indicates; it coheres only under a certain relentless spirit. Mr. Koussevitzky met Strauss midway in the perfusion of sound. His tempo indeed seemed over slow, and the dance of it dragged. But the brilliant effects in so much less brilliant music than Wagner were attained with the same precision and care. Here, but less, too, than in Wagner, the poetry of the conductor's hands is a matter to conjure with; and one can no more lose sight of it in the passage of infinite emotion than in the quietest legato. The arc, the curve, the dip, the outflung arm arrest and hypnotize the eye.

D. Mc...

8D

Traveler April 11

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 22d regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Sergei Rachmaninoff as the soloist of the occasion will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto.

Serge Koussevitzky will also present Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Haldenleben," and Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand."

PENSION FUND

Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), and various excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas, will comprise the notable program of the Boston Symphony orchestra for its pension fund concert to take place in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, April 19, at 3:30. This concert offers non-subscribers the only opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra under its remarkabe new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, this season, since all the series are fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky will also be heard at this concert in the following numbers of Richard Wagner: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

NEW YORK
TIMES

APR 12 192

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, again assisted by the Cecilia Society of Boston, repeated Scriabine's "Prometheus" at the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The "Polovstian Dances" from Borodin's "Prince Igor" also were repeated. The other compositions were the "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute" of Ottorino Respighi and two the three orchestral Nocturnes of Debussy. Why Mr. Koussevitsky did not also perform "Sirenes," the third of the Nocturnes, when he had a chorus at hand for the simple vocal parts, was not explained.

The second hearing of Scriabine's composition only emphasized the poverty of ideas and the singularly experimental character of the orchestration apparent at the first hearing last Thursday night. But "Prometheus," while it may promise much and perform little or nothing that is genuine or convincing, reaches at last a resounding climax, dearly loved by conductors—a climax which calls into play the utmost capacities of orchestra and chorus, and which may be relied upon to bring down the house. The audience applauded loudly the climax of Messrs. Scriabine and Koussevitsky when at last it came.

The remainder of the program was familiar, but very welcome, for it comprised several works of exceptional individuality. Mr. Koussevitsky had played the Debussy Nocturnes, as well as the works of Scriabine and Borodine, in earlier concerts here. Certainly these Nocturnes echo a beauty which is seldom audible and of which a genius catches a few distant vibrations which he reveals in his art. The patrician spirit of Italy of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, of an epoch which the world will not see again, is embodied in the pieces arranged by Respighi, and these pieces are admirably played by the virtuosi of Mr. Koussevitsky's orchestra. It is true that the women of the chorus sang the savage and splendid music of Borodine, music now wildly sweet and sensuous, now of earth-shaking rhythm and power, as if they were singing hymns at a Sunday school picnic or perhaps an oratorio by Horatio Parker.

This concert concluded the brilliant and uneven series of performances which Mr. Koussevitsky has directed in this city. In another column his qualities as a leader are discussed at greater length. Two members of the orchestra played for the last time here. George Longy, the remarkable first oboe and one of the most distinguished ornaments of the band of which he has been a member for so many years, retires at the end of the season to his home in France. K. Keller, the double-bass player and another veteran of long and excellent service, also will resign his position.

At the end of the concert the audience gave Mr. Koussevitsky an ovation.

Globe April 12

This week brings one of the major events of the rapidly waning musical season, the two performances of Brahms' "Requiem" to be given in Symphony Hall Thursday and Friday evenings by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and an orchestra of Boston Symphony members. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct both performances by invitation of Dr Davison, who has trained the chorus. The Handel and Haydn Society ends its season today with a performance of the late Horatio Parker's oratorio "Hora Novissima." Emil Mollenhauer will conduct and distinguished soloists are to assist. This oratorio is perhaps the most notable yet composed by an American.

* * *

Rachmaninoff will play his second concerto, not one of his finest compositions, at this week's Symphony concert. One would prefer his third concerto, since he elects to perform his music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 12 1925

Scriabine's "Prometheus" Featured at Season's Farewell Boston Concert

Alexander Scriabine's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire" was the piece de resistance of an unusually varied programme presented at the Academy of Music Friday night, in the last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, under Institute auspices. The orchestra was assisted by a large chorus from the Cecilia Society of Boston, of which Malcolm Lang is the conductor, and also by Alexander Steinert at the Piano. The performance was given without the color organ, which the composer required, employed so unsuccessfully by Modest Altschuler at the first New York hearing of Scriabine's score in 1915.

It is not often that opportunity is presented to hear this much debated work by a much debated composer. Friday night's performance, it might be mentioned in passing, was the first in Brooklyn although the work already dates fourteen years. Some there are for whom it is an epochal creation, establishing undisputably the genius—the mystical genius—of Scriabine. Others there are for whom it is merely harmonic extravaganza, a somewhat interesting technical study of how a talented but not very lucid composer was able to shift the planes that betoken sobriety and mystery. Last night's hearing should be regarded as an authentic interpretation, for it was Serge Koussevitzky who conducted the first performance of the work in Moscow (March 2, 1911) with Scriabine himself at the piano.

Scriabine, as is generally known, was a dabbler in theosophical mechanics, and "Prometheus" is in some respects the fruit of those ponderings. It depicts, according to Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, that state in the evolution (not Darwinian) of humanity, in which "the nascent races of mankind, not yet illuminated by the Prometheus spark, were physically incomplete, possessing only the shadows of bodies: sinless because devoid of conscious personality — in Theosophical terms 'without Karma.' From this condition they were liberated by the gift of Prometheus—the fire which awakened man's creative power."

This then, is even a more dramatic theme than that propounded by Hellenic mythology. It goes to the essence of art, of humanity, it is the deification of the creative act: it is —or should be—an ecstatic transport to lift the hearer, not only figuratively, but literally, out of his seat, almost out of himself. It is a theme greater than ever Beethoven or Wagner essayed and verily, they were giants.

It was, alas, too much for Scriabine. Beginning with his "mystic chord" of fourths, a basic chord given out and sustained by woodwind instruments and tremulous strings, he sought to develop a complex, chaotic world—and chaotic it was. Unfortunately it never achieved that unity of line which art compels: therein lies its failure. The composer can be visualized, torn by his passions, trying to imprison his experience on the page before him; yet the feeling is never overcome that those divine passions are jousting with aesthetic theories. There is not that certainty of purpose that makes for greatness. The early scenes paint a desolation that is gay in comparison with the desolate interludes of Tshaikowsky's "Francesca de Rimini." The late movements of the creation are turgid, yet do not match the similar moods of even Stravinsky. Perhaps, Scriabine was on the road to genius—but he died too soon.

Handel's Concerto Grosso (No.5) in D major was given in a manner that reflected credit on the string orchestra, who played with a decisiveness and clarity that was a pleasure to hear.

In the second half of the evening, Richard Wagner was presented in two moods, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal." In the "Ride," conductor and orchestra labored manfully, yet the result was not full-blooded. In the Good Friday Spell, inspired by the day itself, possibly, Mr. Koussevitzky achieved a serenity, a sublimity that was beyond any elevation ever before heard by the present reviewer.

Borodine's Polovtsian Dance from "Prince Igor," given by the orchestra and chorus was carried through with noteworthy vigor. While less significant musically than the other numbers, its charm, its occasional fire, won for it the most obvious applause.

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

APR 12 19

Boston Symphony And Koussevitzky End Seasons Here

Cecilia Society Takes Part in Russian Numbers of Enthusiastically Received Program at Carnegie Hall

By F. D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky ended his first, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra its thirty-ninth New York season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, with the Cecilia Society of Boston again taking part in the two Russian numbers of the program, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." These were accompanied by a different set of purely instrumental offerings, Ottorino Respighi's "free transcription for orchestra" of four old Italian dances and airs for the lute, and the Debussy nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes."

The Respighi suite, first performed in Rome six years ago, had their first local hearing in 1921, with a performance of the latter three sections by Toscanini's "Scala" orchestra, and of the opening "Balletto detto il Conte Orlando" by the New York Symphony. The original Balletto is by Simone Molinaro, who, as Mr. Philip Hale's indispensable program notes point out, was appointed chapel-master of the Genoa Cathedral in 1599; the ensuing Gagliarda (citing the same notes) by Vincenzo Galilei, a sixteenth-century Florentine; the Vilanella and Passo Mezzo and Mascherada which form the last two movements by composers unknown.

Of these, Respighi has made a very agreeable suite, arranging them so as to obtain the maximum degree of variety obtainable. His orchestration is discreet and effective, not aiming to produce an archaic atmosphere, nor trying to clothe sixteenth century tunes in ultra-twentieth century garments. The orchestration is most elaborate in the last movement, but yet does not suggest a musical anachronism.

The performance of the Debussy works, which Mr. Koussevitzky had offered his evening audiences at his first local appearance, brought prolonged plaudits. Again, the entrance of the imaginary procession in "Fetes" was most effectively wrought, although at its climax that procession seemed distinctly real, headed by a vigorous, lusty-lunged brass band. After the orchestra had played, and the Cecilians had sung the Borodin excerpt, there was enthusiastic applause for the conductor and his standing cohorts, bidding the Bostonians farewell until next November.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

APR 12 192

Boston Symphony Ends Season Here with Respighi Airs

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~gave its~~ final concert for the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Conductor Koussevitzky, finishing his first ~~New York~~ series, featured a group of quaint and delicate early Italian dances and airs, enlarged by Respighi from the confined medium of an ancient lute to the strings of a modern orchestra. The numbers in this were a Balletto detto il Conte Orlando, Gagliarda, Villanella and Passo Mezzo e Mascherada, all by composers of the sixteenth century. The modern Italian's arrangement of these by his professional ancestors preserved their orginal charm and exquisite grace.

Scriabin's "Prometheus, a poem of fire, for orchestra and piano with organ and chorus," was held over from Thursday night's programme and its second hearing within a few days revealed anew the ardor and mastery of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting. The instrumentalists were again reinforced by the Cecilia Society of Boston, a chorus that rang with fervor and effectiveness.

Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals" formed a poetic contributoin to the list that ended with the lively, colorful dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

* * *

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 12 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FAREWELL.

Serge Koussevitzky will present an all Wagner program at the closing concert of the season here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, April 21.

The great Russian conducter has long held a particular reputation of an eloquent and stirring interpreter of the music of Richard Wagner, having on notable occasions in Europe conducted whole acts from certain music dramas, in concert form. He will in his program for Providence present the following generous array of excerpts: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the introduction to the third act of the same piece; the introduction of the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

---

day.

STRAUSS-WAGNER PENSION FUND BILL

Music of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauss will be featured at the Symphony pension fund in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon

The "Flying Dutchman," overture will open the program. Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero Life," played this season for the first time since 1910: the "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture will be the other numbers.

BIG SALE FOR

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

* * *

Wagner Concert by Symphony

The Boston Symphony is to give a Wagner programme for its final concert here this season on April 21.

The programme will be as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" prelude to "Lohengrin" and introduction to third act of the same piece; introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie;" "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried;" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal;" overture to "Tannhauser."

* * *

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at this week's pair of Symphony Concerts, playing the piano—part of his own Second Concerto. For beginning will come Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand," and for conclusion Strauss gigantic tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," long unheard from the Boston Orchestra.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The music of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauss makes the programme announced for the second Pension Fund Concert next Sunday afternoon. From the later comes "Ein Heldenleben" from the former the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the excerpt entitled "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and, for brilliant conclusion, the Overture to "Tannhauser."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 12 1925

Boston Symphony Criticized.

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

Cannot something be done, I wonder, to restore the prestige of the Boston Symphony? The orchestra is always fine. But the programs we have been obliged to listen to all winter— [illegible] The one of last night, [illegible], the limit. That chorus [illegible] from Boston, at such an expense for what? All they did was [illegible]. I am a lover of music. I have had my seat since the B. S. first came to Brooklyn. Are we obliged to have this conductor for another year? His programs have no music.

S. C.

Brooklyn, N. Y., April 11.

Transcript

Place and Poetry

With the possible exception of Salome's Dance from Strauss's opera of the name, Mr. Koussevitzky's Cambridge program for yesterday evening's performance was admirably suited to the acoustical qualities of Sanders Theater. Beethoven resounds so full and measured, so joyously and buoyantly in Sanders; particularly the Pastoral. For Sanders Theater, with its strange architecture, its minikin dimensions, its homogeneity, owns far more of an atmosphere than Symphony Hall. It is further a hall of one mood. It is intimate with an older order, and more hospitable to such music as has been sifted through a good span of years or else struck from the classic die. Honegger's "Pacific" was markedly uncongenial in Sanders. Stravinsky or Copland, or even Bliss, would be terrible. Wagner seems about the pitch of emotion that it may weather in comfort. The elusives, Debussy and Ravel, for example, in some manner assume an older cloak when they are aired in Sanders. Mr. Koussevitzky, then, with the "Pastoral," Brahms and Wagner, was within bounds. Had not Strauss come as a strict incursion on the beauty of what had preceded, it too, might have suited as well.

For the fact, Mr. Kousevitzky's program as he read it was one of the most brilliant, perhaps the most so, that he has given in Cambridge. He has never before accorded the "Pastoral" such marked distinction. The beauty of the allegro has not seemed so ripe, so sure as this. The gradations and transitions evolved in one continuous flux of song. Particularly, the primitive sensuous voices of the Andante looked up with arresting freshness and transparency. The conductor put the last two movements together, without pause. A new rattling of the double-basses, an accumulation of fibrous sound ushered in the thunderstorm as one will seldom hear it. The oblique, swift rush of the storm itself, no less memorable, the symphony swept away to its gradual end. A performance not only of devout inspiration, but of the meticulous reading, of the polished and brilliant phrase. In another way Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to give as much here to Beethoven as he invariably does to Wagner.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin," reached another level. From the nobility of that shrill beginning on the strings through the climax of brass and on to the recession, the work proclaimed perfect coherence. It is never "on whose last steps I climb" with Mr. Koussevitzky in Wagner. It is always a winding to the peak or a swoop to the depths. Wagner in his hands is ineffably plastic, flexible, and tenuous. You are up before you know it; and down with the shouting memory of the ascent filling the mind. As we have listened to Mr. Koussevitzky, Wagner appears to be his great adventure. He never passes through such emotional Sturm und Drang as here; he never seems so palpably shaken. It is idle to imagine that one in fifty of his auditors escape the spell. They may disagree on his architectonic power; they may shudder at his structures, but they must be emo-

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued from Preceding Page

tionally impressed. It is unbelievable that they should not.

The Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," the second number ~~on the~~ program, found him in like mood. With that wide flare of the baton, or the tip of it striking for power, or tearing out the muscular, Haydnesque rhythms, he made it to sing or sweep in graceful, majestic curves. It is not unified as its title indicates; it coheres only under a certain relentless spirit. Mr. Koussevitzky met Strauss midway in the perfusion of sound. His tempo indeed seemed over slow, and the dance of it dragged. But the brilliant effects in so much less brilliant music than Wagner were attained with the same precision and care. Here, but less, too, than in Wagner, the poetry of the conductor's hands is a matter to conjure with; and one can no more lose sight of it in the passage of infinite emotion than in the quietest legato. The arc, the curve, the dip, the outflung arm arrest and hypnotize the eye.

D. McC.

the melody of 'Traum
Dämmerung' against a theme fro

Continued on Following Page

MUSIC TO BE HEARD: BRAHMS'S GRAVITIES, STRAUSS'S HEROICS

Continued from Preceding Page

'Don Quixote,' as counterpoint, on the horns, 'cellos and English horn.

"VI. The Hero's Release from the World—The tubas mutter the uncouth and sinister phrase which speaks the dull contempt of the benighted adversaries. Even the glorious achievements of the Hero's brain, his spiritual conquests, have won him only envy and derision. Furiously he rebels, and the orchestra rages. But his anger subsides. Over a persistent tapping of the kettledrum, the English horn sings a gentler version of his theme. An agitating memory of storm and strife again disturbs his mood. But the solo-violin reminds him of the consoling presence of the beloved. Peace descends upon the spirit of the Hero There are pages of tender and exalted beauty, with an intimate dialogue between horn and violin—worthy of Beethoven in his supreme comments of rapt meditation. In the trumpets, the chief theme, immensely broadened, rises in solemn majesty to a climax of memorable splendor—a great chord of E-flat major that fills the orchestral heavens with dazzling light. This finale, majestic and serene, recalls the words of Shankara: 'For the circling world is like a dream, crowded with desires and hates; in its own time it shines as real, but on wakening it becomes unreal.'"

Irish Magic

Neither unheard or unremembered in Boston is the tone-poem of Arnold Bax, "The Garden of Fand." Once upon a time Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played it at Symphony Hall with the romantic and fantastic glamour that is the essence of the music. Now, by grace of Mr. Koussevitzky, it gains place in the impending Symphony Concerts. It is work of Bax's Celtic imagination and impassionistic hand, when he scans the sunlit Irish seas and cons the pages of Irish legend; when he would write a luminous, changeful, evanescent music; yet give it sustaining form and well marked progress. Says the composer in a note about the piece:

> The Garden of Fand is the sea. The ancient saga called "The Sickbed of Cuchulain" tells how that hero (the Achilles of the Gael) was lured away from the world of deeds and battles by the Lady Fand, daughter of Manannan, lord of the ocean; and how in the time of his country's direst need he forgot all but the enchantments of an immortal woman. The tale goes on to relate that Cuchulain's wife, Emer, pursued him to that wonderland and pleaded with the goddess for her husband's return. Then, with one of those touches of modern romanticism which are continualy occurring in the Irish pagan tales, the saga ends with Fand's pitying renunciation of her human love, and we read that Manannan shook his "Cloak of Forgetfulness" between Cuchulain and Fand, that the memory of each might be utterly blotted out from the mind of the other.
>
> This tone-poem has no special relation to the events of the above legend. In the earlier portion of the work the composer seeks to create the atmosphere of an enchanted Atlantic completely calm beneath the spell of the Otherworld. Upon its surface floats a small ship adventuring towards the sunset from the shores of Eirinn, as St. Brendan and the sons of O'Corra are said to have sailed in later times. The little craft is borne on beneath a sky of pearl and amethyst until on the crest of an immense, slowly surging wave it is tossed on to the shore of Fand's miraculous island. Here is unhuman revelry unceasing between the ends of time, and the voyagers are caught away, unresisting, into the maze of the dance. A pause comes, and Fand sings her song of immortal love, enchaining the hearts of her hearers forever. The dancing and feasting begins again. Finally, the sea, rising suddenly, overwhelms the whole island. The immortals ride in rapture on the green and golden waves, laughing carelessly amidst the foam at the fate of the mortals lost in the depths. Twilight falls; the sea subsides, and Fand's garden fades out of sight.

Transcript
April 13

Languors and Tediums

"Prometheus" [writes Mr. Perkins i The Herald-Tribune], was offered under th best conditions that an ardent Skriabinat might hope to expect. But it seemed, some how, to miss fire. "Prometheus" is th strongest of the composer's three major or chestral pieces. It has the largest portio of the characteristic flavor of his piano compositions. There are impressive passages, periods of considerable beauty. But the substance seemed too small for the framework. After the intriguing opening chord the music reached its climax languidly. Its inspiration waxed only to wane again, until the rise to the climactic close—and this, impassive in its way, was disappointing after the extent of the preparation. The chorus, a little uncertain in the opening measures, did its full share in emblazoning the high lights. More often, however, the chorus seems to be treated as a part of the orchestra, with its notes merged int the ensemble.

Muddle and Delusion

Skriabin was not a genius [continues Mr. Henderson in The Sun] despite the repeated asservations of those to whom his cross-chord puzzles seem to signify things beyond ordinary understanding. Skriabin was an honest, hard-working musician whose doings greatly astonished Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull. The same gentleman was also astonished by the doings of Cyril Scott. Now anyone can create strange chords. Skriabin's one invention was the "harmonic" scale, a succession of tones developed from a fundamental and its overtones. There is material in such a scale for music and for originality in harmony. But Skriabin never accomplished anything of poetic or symbolical import with his scale. He merely produced novel sounds. His poem of fire i a misfire. It starts from a chord built o all the tones in the harmonic scale and i arrives at an impalpable location in thi air. It is a curious muddle of unenlight ening phrases and harmonic sequences. I makes no proclamation of the barren sou of man fired to activity. Its best passage sound like Debussy and its worst like Stra vinsky . . . There is some strang charm about what common mortals know as "conductors' music." Conductors rav about it and insist on playing it whethe audiences wish to hear it or not. They have been trying for years to educate u to the level of Skriabin, and we are stil wallowing in our ignorance. One thing car be said, and that is that the tone-poem was admirably performed.

L'Envoi

The voices of the reviewers in New York, it is true, do not carry the final word about any music. Time is the only arbiter. Yet it is the openest of secrets that, when they write in the fashion above indicated, they speak for many Bostonians who have had their fill of "Prometheus" for one season. Why, then, should the tone-poem be repeated twice more at the final Symphony Concerts when so much other interesting and important music awaits Mr. Koussevitzky's hand? Does he believe of Skriabin, as Theodore Thomas believed of Wagner, that he must play his pieces till the public rises to them?

NEW YORK
POST
APR 13 1925

Boston Symphony Closes Season Here

The Boston Symphony closed its present New ~~York season~~ at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, assisted, as on Thursday evening, by the Cecilia Society of that city in the performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus," and the Polovtsian dances from Bordin's "Prince Igor." The remainder of the program was made up of four "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," by Respighi, and two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals."

The Debussy numbers and in particular the Respighi pieces were played beautifully. It was, in many respects, one of Mr. Koussevitsky's most brilliant and successful concerts in a somewhat uneven season. It has been announced that next year the Boston will be without two of its best-known players, George Longy, first oboe, who will return to his home in France, and K. Keller, a double-bass player, who has also resigned.

There was more than the usual enthusiasm at the conclusion of the concert.

SUN
APR 13 1925

Boston Symphony Ends Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its ~~New York season~~ with the concert of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky's well known admiration for Scriabin led him to repeat the "Prometheus," placing it second on the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is celebrated in Europe as an interpreter of this music and we may accept his reading as authoritative. He gives the work a brilliant and finished performance, but will probably find American music lovers somewhat slow in rising to his level of faith in the composition.

The other numbers were Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (freely arranged)," Debussy's "Clouds and Festivals" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The pianist was again Alexander Steinert and the chorus the Cecilia Society of Boston. The audience was large. The eminent Russian finished his first season here as conductor of the Boston organization in high favor. He will be welcomed if he returns to us next season.

Herald
April 15

PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

Music by Wagner and Strauss will be performed at one of the most noteworthy Boston Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon, April 19 at 3:30.

This, the spring concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's pension fund, offers virtually the only opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, since each series of concerts is fully subscribed and no tickets obtainable. He will open the concert with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The second number will be Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero Life"), one of the most imposing and significant in the list of Straussian tone poems. The program will also comprise Wagner's "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 15 1925

Non-subscribers to the regular concerts of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra will have an opportunity to hear the organization at an extra concert in aid of the pension fund to be given in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon, April 19, at 3.30. For this concert Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared a program including the Strauss tone poem "A Hero Life" and several numbers from the Wagner music dramas.

Columbia
Spectator
April 14

COLUM

Overtones

The Boston Symphony.

Last Saturday Mr. Koussevitsky retrieved the disappointment of the Boston Symphony's previous performance in one of the most extraordinary concerts of the season, if not of several years past. With their leader at his best the players were naturally responsive and the addition of the Cecelia Society Chorus in two of the numbers capped the completion of one tremendous musical unit.

The first number on the bill was a free orchestral transcription of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute by Ottorino Respighi. In this suite Respighi, a contemporary Italian composer, has done one of the most musical pieces of orchestration achieved by any of our moderns. There is no striving for effect; just a straightforward, yet original presentation of some of the most charming dances of sixteenth century Italy. Respighi for once in the history of modern orchestration has allowed his instrumentation to be dic-

his ru-of y's, eer
ari pe
no

hesitate to say this of Skryabin's Prometheus. The composition is con ceived on a scale so great as to ex haust all the active resources of th modern orchestra, chorus, pianofort solo and organ, as well as all th passive resources of the audience We may justly wonder whether th enormity of such a composition doe not serve to conceal some of it weaker points, but that cannot b determined at one hearing. Obv ously certain passages were marke by aimless wandering and restat ment, but we excuse this in Wagne and we may again in Skryabin, pr vided that he like Wagner has som thing more to offer us. This I b lieve he does. His music is not on sensuously beautiful, but is the e pression of a great and intense p sonality, a relief from the object ism of Stravinsky. True, Prom theus has a program, but it is r descriptive, it is introspective. short, this program is to represe the creative instinct which is t true soul of man, the fire whi Prometheus brought, and the ecsta of its constant striving toward t ideal. Skryabin with a poet's visi has expressed the glory of artist creation in music which for all i imperfection is overpowering. I has a message of hope and nobili which he delivers convincingly not concisely.

After so terrific an emotional perience as the Prometheus p duced, one might fear that Debuss Nuages and Fetes would appear p and aquarelle. On the contrary t were a relief; the intensity of Sk abin cannot be endured long. M over this is some of Debus strongest work. The greater ch and unity of these compositions v particularly evident following closely upon the Skryabin.

Borodin's Polovtsian Dances always seemed commonplace to not so, however, under Mr. Kous itsky's direction. The rhythm wa excellently, electrically sustained The healthy vigor of these dances made a very fitting close to so unusual a program.

We may take it for granted that the performance of the orchestra was masterly—it is never less; but last Saturday afternoon it was more than that: there was a sincerity and balance which are sometimes overshadowed by the verve and sparkle of Mr. Koussevitsky's interpretations. We must also add a word in

(Continued on page 4)

RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST

The 22d pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Rachmaninoff, as the soloist, will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand." Bax's symphonic poem will be heard for the first time at these concerts.

Transcript
April 16

MUSIC TO BE HEARD: BRAHMS'S GRAVITIES, STRAUSS'S HEROICS

BAX'S "GARDEN OF FAND" ALSO IMPENDING

The "German Requiem" for the First Times in Years and Under Unusual Circumstance—Dr. Davison's Share—The Revival of "Ein Heldenleben" According to Mr. Koussevitzky — Celtic Glamour, Irish Fable

BOSTON is not fortunate with the masterpieces of choral music. Only a long memory may recall a performance in this town of Bach's Mass in B minor or of Beethoven's "Missa Solenn's." It is eight years since it heard the Passion Music of Bach to the text of Matthew. It is even longer since Brahms's German Requiem sang in its ears. We lack choral companies capable and ambitious of such arduous tasks, willing to undergo the protracted preparation. The Handel and Haydn Society traverses a sanctified rut. The Cecilia sticks fast in part-songs and unaccompanied numbers. The war dissolved the chorus that Dr. Muck and Mr. Townsend were associating with the Symphony Orchestra. Nearest approach to it in these latter days is Dr. Davison's choir that joins the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Last spring in two concerts for the increase of the Pension Fund at Symphony Hall, it sang the choral parts in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with a volume, vitality, precision and plasticity that hereabouts they had never known.

Now the end will crown a work that through nearly two years has occupied these student-singers—the study and the rehearsal of Brahms's German Requiem. This evening, at Symphony Hall, they will sing the music in public for the first time. Tomorrow evening in the same room they will repeat it, since the inquiry for seats warrants a second concert. The Symphony Orchestra in necessary numbers will assist them; Miss Hayden and Mr. Saslavsky will carry the subordinated solo-parts; as guest, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct, secure upon the foundations that Dr. Davison has laid these many months. To him and to him only, will fall the greater glory. He dared and cherished the project—the singing of an exacting choral music by two collegiate choirs. (Unprecedented, preposterous, impossible, said the safe and sane, wagging their silly old heads.) He infused into the preparations his own eagerness and endurance of spirit. He pursued them gradually; he abated them only when the measures of the Requiem had become second nature to his singers. Then with the quiet gesture of a musician who sets music above himself, he handed his chairs to Mr. Koussevitzky, who has ached since last autumn to prove to Boston his prowess in choral music. There will be laurels aplenty at the two impending concerts; but they will be thickest upon Dr. Davison's calm forehead. By his will and deed, Boston after an interval of years, will hear the German Requiem as it has never heard it before.

Brahms wrote the music in memory of his mother. It was sung first in Bremen in the spring of 1868. It made its way through the northern world. It gave Brahms new prestige as serious and masterful composer. Half the title is misleading, since the music nowhere follows the rites for the dead in the Roman or any other church. It has been labelled a Protestant requiem; but it is by no means such. Indeed it was to distinguish it from churchly requiems that Brahms chose his adjective, "German." From the spirit of his folk, meditating upon the mysteries of life and death, this world and the next, would he have the music spring, through his voice finding speech.

"The circumstances and the piecemeal composition of the music," continues Mr. Langford of The Manchester Guardian, "lead one also to think that many feelings of a personal kind went to the choice of the text and the sequence of the numbers It has been suggested that it should rather be entitled a 'Protestant Requiem,' but Brahms has evidently been at great care to exclude nobody, not even himself, from the feelings and faith which it expresses. Though the Requiem includes certain words of Christ, they are not used in a way that attaches them definitely to Christian ideas or confines them to Christian doctrine, and one may judge that even this fact may not be wholly accidental. If we look at the serious and philosophical music of Brahms as a whole we shall find that he has regarded the problems of existence very deeply, quite apart from the consolations of religious doctrine, and has written many pages of this kind, which must leave an impression as profound as those of this sublime Requiem. To our mind we shall understand the music best if we regard it strictly as a personal document."

There are seven numbers, mainly choral and orchestral. The first, "Blessed are They that Go in Mourning," is broadly conceived and richly scored. The second, a Funeral March in triple time, rings with Brahms's breadths and glories, ending in a fugal climax. The third, "Lord, Make Know the Measure of my Days upon th," begins in the solo baritone voice h choral accompaniment; moves abrupt and wildly; comes again to fugal close. succeeding division, "How Lovely is Dwelling Place, O Lord of Hosts," tens the surrounding gravities with l The fifth number jo soprano voice to the chorus for the cation, "Ye Now Are Sorrowful, Not"; ascends through bold, sweepin alted measures. The sixth summon resurrection of the dead in pages multuous power. The seventh, "B Are the Faithful," brings calm and r close. . . . The last, as some say, older choral music, before the modern violent hands upon the sanctuary choral masterpiece, according to o from the days of Bach to the days are Bachless.

Heroic Strauss

Another, but a very different, sic, long unheard at the Symp Concerts, will fill the second pa Mr. Koussevitzky's program at phony Hall tomorrow afternoon Saturday evening—Strauss's tone-p "Ein Heldenleben," Dr. Muck ra through the lengths and breadths Strauss; but halted not at "A H Life," because he thoroughly dis the music. Mr. Monteux, who ha hesitated before "Don Quixote" or Z thustra," mistrusted himself with denleben" and avoided it. Not 1910, when Mr. Fiedler was conductor, the Symphony Orchestra played the poem. Once in the interim it has heard from another band and a more terful leader—from the Philharm Society of New York and Mr. Mengel in their single visit to Boston. The lander excels in the music; Strauss him dedicated it to him; within memory it not been so lucidly set forth, so viv characterized, so deeply charged with sion of mood and passion of uttera Often Mr. Mengelberg has put "Ein He leben" on his programs in New York, from Mr. Gilman's illuminating n comes the following summary of the co and content of the music.

"Strauss has said that in 'A Hero's he wished to present, 'not a realistic trait of a particular historical or poet figure, but rather a more general and ideal of great and manly heroism—not heroism to which one can apply an eve day maxim of valor, with its material exterior reward, but that heroism which lates to the inward battles of life, which aspires, through struggle and nouncement, towards the elevation of soul.' The tone-poem runs in six connec sections: The Hero, The Hero's Adversari The Hero's Courtship, The Hero's Batt field, The Hero's Works of Peace, T Hero's Release from the World, and t Conclusion.

"I. The Hero—We hear first the ch theme of The Hero; the great subject th sweeps up out of the bass in the l strings and horns, joined later by the vi lins. There are subsidiary themes, pictu ing different aspects of the Hero's nature his pride, depth of feeling, inflexibili sensitiveness, imagination. This sect comes to a defiant, heaven-storming cl with a hold on the dominant-chord of flat.

"II. The Hero's Adversaries—Herein pictured the Hero's opponents and d tors—an envious and malicious crew, with all uncharitableness. Flutes, piccolo, English horns, clarinets, shrill and snarling phrases. There is a malignly ponderous phrase, in fifths, tenor and bass tubas, intended to pictu the malevolence of the dull-witted amo the foe. The theme of the Hero appea in sad and meditative guise. But dauntless courage soon reasserts its and the mocking horde are put to rout.

"III. The Hero's Helpmate—A so violin introduces the Hero's beloved. S reveals herself at the start as capricio an inconsequent trifler, an elabor coquette. The directions printed above th violin part in the score—'flippantly, 'playfully,' 'insolently,' 'sedately', 'sooth ingly,' 'angrily,' 'scoldingly'—suggest th changing aspects of the emotional scene But a grave and earnest phrase—heard at first in the 'cellos, double-basses, trom bones and horns—recurs again and again with the effect of an increasingly ferve appeal. The discourse becomes more se ous, more impassioned. Then the orches breaks into one of the most magnific love-songs in all music. There are r turous phrases for the strings, gorgeou adorned with glissandi in the harps; oboe sings an ardently tender song. the ecstasy subsides, the mocking voices the foe are heard remotely, like the d tant croaking of night birds through enchanted dream.

"IV. The Hero's Battlefield—But sudd ly the call to arms is heard, and may not be ignored. Distant fan (trumpets behind the scenes) summon Hero to the conflict. The orchestra comes a battlefield; the music 'evokes picture of countless and waging hosts, forests of waving spears and clash blades,' wrote Huneker of this scene. din, heat and turmoil of conflict are spr over all, and the ground piled high the slain.' Through the dust and u we are reminded of the inspiration o Beloved, which sustains and heartens champion, whose theme contests for premacy with that of his adversaries, triumphant orchestral outburst proclai at last his victory. Yet he exults alo The world regards his conquest with c and cynical indifference.

"V. The Hero's Works of Peace—N begins a celebration of the Hero's victor of peace, suggesting his spiritual evolut and achievements. We hear—perhaps w delicately symbolic intent—quotations themes from Strauss's earlier mu reminiscences of 'Death and Transfigu tion,' 'Don Quixote,' 'Don Juan,' 'Till lenspiegel,' 'Macbeth,' 'Zarathustra,' t music-drama 'Guntram,' and the exquis song, 'Traum durch die Dämmerung.' appreciative hearer will esteem the and tranquil loveliness of tha where the tenor tuba,

Transcript
April 13

Languors and Tediums

"Prometheus" [writes Mr. Perkins i The Herald-Tribune], was offered under th best conditions that an ardent Skriabinat might hope to expect. But it seemed, some how, to miss fire. "Prometheus" is th strongest of the composer's three major or chestral pieces. It has the largest portio of the characteristic flavor of his piano compositions. There are impressive passages, periods of considerable beauty. But the substance seemed too small for the framework. After the intriguing opening chord the music reached its climax languidly. Its inspiration waxed only to wane again, until the rise to the climactic close—and this, impassive in its way, was disappointing after the extent of the preparation. The chorus, a little uncertain in the opening measures, did its full share in emblazoning the high lights. More often, however, the chorus seems to be treated as a part of the orchestra, with its notes merged int the ensemble.

Muddle and Delusion

Skriabin was not a genius [continues Mr. Henderson in The Sun] despite the repeated asservations of those to whom his cross-chord puzzles seem to signify things beyond ordinary understanding. Skriabin was an honest, hard-working musician whose doings greatly astonished Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull. The same gentleman was also astonished by the doings of Cyril Scott. Now anyone can create strange chords. Skriabin's one invention was the "harmonic" scale, a succession of tones developed from a fundamental and its overtones. There is material in such a scale for music and for originality in harmony. But Skriabin never accomplished anything of poetic or symbolical import with his scale. He merely produced novel sounds. His poem of fire i a misfire. It starts from a chord built o all the tones in the harmonic scale and i arrives at an impalpable location in thi air. It is a curious muddle of unenlight ening phrases and harmonic sequences. I makes no proclamation of the barren sou of man fired to activity. Its best passage sound like Debussy and its worst like Stra vinsky . . . There is some strang charm about what common mortals know as "conductors' music." Conductors rav about it and insist on playing it whethe audiences wish to hear it or not. They have been trying for years to educate u to the level of Skriabin, and we are stil wallowing in our ignorance. One thing car be said, and that is that the tone-poem was admirably performed.

L'Envoi

The voices of the reviewers in New York, it is true, do not carry the final word about any music. Time is the only arbiter. Yet it is the openest of secrets that, when they write in the fashion above indicated, they speak for many Bostonians who have had their fill of "Prometheus" for one season. Why, then, should the tone-poem be repeated twice more at the final Symphony Concerts when so much other interesting and important music awaits Mr. Koussevitzky's hand? Does he believe of Skriabin, as Theodore Thomas believed of Wagner, that he must play his pieces till the public rises to them?

NEW YORK
POST
APR 13 1925

Boston Symphony Closes Season Here

The Boston Symphony closed its present ~~New York season~~ at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, assisted, as on Thursday evening, by the Cecilia Society of that city in the performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus," and the Polovtsian dances from Bordin's "Prince Igor." The remainder of the program was made up of four "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," by Respighi, and two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals."

The Debussy numbers and in particular the Respighi pieces were played beautifully. It was, in many respects, one of ~~Mr. Koussevitsky's~~ most brilliant and ~~successful~~ concerts in a somewhat uneven season. It has been announced that next year the Boston will be without two of its best-known players, George Longy, first oboe, who will return to his home in France, and K. Keller, a double-bass player, who has also resigned.

There was more than the usual enthusiasm at the conclusion of the concert.

SUN
APR 13 1925

Boston Symphony Ends Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its ~~New York season~~ with the concert of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Mr. ~~Koussevitzky's~~ well known admiration for Scriabin led him to repeat the "Prometheus," placing it second on the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is celebrated in Europe as an interpreter of this music and we may accept his reading as authoritative. He gives the work a brilliant and finished performance, but will probably find American music lovers somewhat slow in rising to his level of faith in the composition.

The other numbers were Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (freely arranged)," Debussy's "Clouds and Festivals" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The pianist was again Alexander Steinert and the chorus the Cecilia Society of Boston. The audience was large. The eminent Russian finished his first season here as conductor of the Boston organization in high favor. He will be welcomed if he returns to us next season.

Herald
April 15

PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

Music by Wagner and Strauss will be performed at one of the most noteworthy Boston Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon, April 19 at 3:30.

This, the spring concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's pension fund, offers virtually the only opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, since each series of concerts is fully subscribed and no tickets obtainable. He will open the concert with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The second number will be Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero Life"), one of the most imposing and significant in the list of Straussian tone poems. The program will also comprise Wagner's "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST

The 22d pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Rachmaninoff, as the soloist, will play the piano part of his own Second Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand." Bax's symphonic poem will be heard for the first time at these concerts.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 15 1925

Non-subscribers to the regular concerts of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra will have an opportunity to hear the organization at an extra concert in aid of the pension fund to be given in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon, April 19, at 3.30. For this concert Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared a program including the Strauss tone poem "A Hero Life" and several numbers from the Wagner music dramas.

~~Columbia Sp~~
~~April 14~~

COLUM

Overtones

The Boston Symphony.

Last Saturday Mr. Koussevitsky retrieved the disappointment of the Boston Symphony's previous performance in one of the most extraordinary concerts of the season, if not of several years past. With their leader at his best the players were naturally responsive and the addition of the Cecelia Society Chorus in two of the numbers capped the completion of one tremendous musical unit.

The first number on the bill was a free orchestral transcription of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute by Ottorino Respighi. In this suite Respighi, a contemporary Italian composer, has done one of the most musical pieces of orchestration achieved by any of our moderns. There is no striving for effect; just a straightforward, yet original presentation of some of the most charming dances of sixteenth century Italy. Respighi for once in the history of modern orchestration has allowed his instrumentation to be dic-

his ru- of y's, eer ari- pe no

hesitate to say this of Skryabin's Prometheus. The composition is con ceived on a scale so great as to ex haust all the active resources of th modern orchestra, chorus, pianofort solo and organ, as well as all th passive resources of the audience We may justly wonder whether th enormity of such a composition doe not serve to conceal some of it weaker points, but that cannot b determined at one hearing. Obv ously certain passages were marke by aimless wandering and restat ment, but we excuse this in Wagne and we may again in Skryabin, pr vided that he like Wagner has som thing more to offer us. This I b lieve he does. His music is not on sensuously beautiful, but is the e pression of a great and intense pe sonality, a relief from the object ism of Stravinsky. True, Prom theus has a program, but it is r descriptive, it is introspective. short, this program is to represe the creative instinct which is t true soul of man, the fire whi Prometheus brought, and the ecsta of its constant striving toward t ideal. Skryabin with a poet's visi has expressed the glory of artist creation in music which for all i imperfection is overpowering. I has a message of hope and nobili which he delivers convincingly not concisely.

After so terrific an emotional perience as the Prometheus p duced, one might fear that Debuss Nuages and Fetes would appear p and aquarelle. On the contrary t were a relief; the intensity of Sk abin cannot be endured long. M over this is some of Debus strongest work. The greater ch and unity of these compositions v particularly evident following closely upon the Skryabin.

Borodin's Polovtsian Dances always seemed commonplace to not so, however, under Mr. Kous itsky's direction. The rhythm w excellently, electrically sustained. The healthy vigor of these dances made a very fitting close to so unusual a program.

We may take it for granted that the performance of the orchestra was masterly—it is never less; but last Saturday afternoon it was more than that: there was a sincerity and balance which are sometimes overshadowed by the verve and sparkle of Mr. Koussevitsky's interpretations. We must also add a word in

(Continued on page 4)

Transcript
April 16

MUSIC TO BE HEARD: BRAHMS'S GRAVITIES, STRAUSS'S HEROICS

BAX'S "GARDEN OF FAND" ALSO IMPENDING

The "German Requiem" for the First Times in Years and Under Unusual Circumstance—Dr. Davison's Share—The Revival of "Ein Heldenleben" According to Mr. Koussevitzky — Celtic Glamour, Irish Fable

BOSTON is not fortunate with the masterpieces of choral music. Only a long memory may recall a performance in this town of Bach's Mass in B minor or of Beethoven's "Missa Solenn's." It is eight years since it heard the Passion Music of Bach to the text of Matthew. It is even longer since Brahms's German Requiem sang in its ears. We lack choral companies capable and ambitious of such arduous tasks, willing to undergo the protracted preparation. The Handel and Haydn Society traverses a sanctified rut. The Cecilia sticks fast in part-songs and unaccompanied numbers. The war dissolved the chorus that Dr. Muck and Mr. Townsend were associating with the Symphony Orchestra. Nearest approach to it in these latter days is Dr. Davison's choir that joins the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Last spring in two concerts for the increase of the Pension Fund at Symphony Hall, it sang the choral parts in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with a volume, vitality, precision and plasticity that hereabouts they had never known.

Now the end will crown a work that through nearly two years has occupied these student-singers—the study and the rehearsal of Brahms's German Requiem. This evening, at Symphony Hall, they will sing the music in public for the first time. Tomorrow evening in the same room they will repeat it, since the inquiry for seats warrants a second concert. The Symphony Orchestra in necessary numbers will assist them; Miss Hayden and Mr. Saslavsky will carry the subordinated solo-parts; as guest, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct, secure upon the foundations that Dr. Davison has laid these many months. To him and to him only, will fall the greater glory. He dared and cherished the project—the singing of an exacting choral music by two collegiate choirs. (Unprecedented, preposterous, impossible, said the safe and sane, wagging their silly old heads.) He infused into the preparations his own eagerness and endurance of spirit. He pursued them gradually; he abated them only when the measures of the Requiem had become second nature to his singers. Then with the quiet gesture of a musician who sets music above himself, he handed his chairs to Mr. Koussevitzky, who has ached since last autumn to prove to Boston his prowess in choral music. There will be laurels aplenty at the two impending concerts; but they will be thickest upon Dr. Davison's calm forehead. By his will and deed, Boston after an interval of years, will hear the German Requiem as it has never heard it before.

Brahms wrote the music in memory of his mother. It was sung first in Bremen in the spring of 1868. It made its way through the northern world. It gave Brahms new prestige as serious and masterful composer. Half the title is misleading, since the music nowhere follows the rites for the dead in the Roman or any other church. It has been labelled a Protestant requiem; but it is by no means such. Indeed it was to distinguish it from churchly requiems that Brahms chose his adjective, "German." From the spirit of his folk, meditating upon the mysteries of life and death, this world and the next, would he have the music spring, through his voice finding speech.

"The circumstances and the piecemeal composition of the music," continues Mr Langford of The Manchester Guardian, "lead one also to think that many feelings of a personal kind went to the choice of the text and the sequence of the numbers. It has been suggested that it should rather be entitled a 'Protestant Requiem.' But Brahms has evidently been at great care to exclude nobody, not even himself, from the feelings and faith which it expresses. Though the Requiem includes certain words of Christ, they are not used in a way that attaches them definitely to Christian ideas or confines them to Christian doctrine, and one may judge that even this fact may not be wholly accidental. If we look at the serious and philosophical music of Brahms as a whole we shall find that he has regarded the problems of existence very deeply, quite apart from the consolations of religious doctrine, and has written many pages of this kind, which must leave an impression as profound as those of this sublime Requiem. To our mind we shall understand the music best if we regard it strictly as a personal document."

There are seven numbers, mainly choral and orchestral. The first, "Blessed are They that Go in Mourning," is broadly conceived and richly scored. The second, a Funeral March in triple time, rings with Brahms's breadths and glories, ending in a fugal climax. The third, "Lord, Make Know the Measure of My Days upon th," begins in the solo baritone voice h choral accompaniment; moves abrupt and wildly; comes again to fugal close. succeeding division, "How Lovely is Dwelling Place, O Lord of Hosts," tens the surrounding gravities with al st The fifth number joi soprano voice to the chorus for the cation, "Ye Now Are Sorrowful, Not"; ascends through bold, sweeping alted measures. The sixth summon resurrection of the dead in pages multuous power. The seventh, "B Are the Faithful," brings calm and r close. . . . The last, as some say, older choral music, before the modern violent hands upon the sanctuary choral masterpiece, according to o from the days of Bach to the days are Bachless.

Heroic Strauss

Another, but a very different, sic, long unheard at the Symph Concerts, will fill the second pa Mr. Koussevitzky's program at phony Hall tomorrow afternoon Saturday evening—Strauss's tone-p "Ein Heldenleben," Dr. Muck ra through the lengths and breadths Strauss; but halted not at "A H Life," because he thoroughly dis the music. Mr. Monteux, who h hesitated before "Don Quixote" or thustra," mistrusted himself with denleben" and avoided it. Not 1910, when Mr. Fiedler was conductor, the Symphony Orchestra played the poem. Once in the interim it has heard from another band and a more terful leader—from the Philharm Society of New York and Mr. Mengelb in their single visit to Boston. The lander excels in the music; Strauss him dedicated it to him; within memory it not been so lucidly set forth, so viv characterized, so deeply charged with sion of mood and passion of uttera Often Mr. Mengelberg has put "Ein He leben" on his programs in New York, from Mr. Gilman's illuminating n comes the following summary of the co and content of the music.

"Strauss has said that in 'A Hero's L he wished to present, 'not a realistic trait of a particular historical or poet figure, but rather a more general and ideal of great and manly heroism—not heroism to which one can apply an eve day maxim of valor, with its material exterior reward, but that heroism which lates to the inward battles of life, a which aspires, through struggle and nouncement, towards the elevation of soul.' The tone-poem runs in six connec sections: The Hero, The Hero's Adversari The Hero's Courtship, The Hero's Batt field, The Hero's Works of Peace, T Hero's Release from the World, and t Conclusion.

"I. The Hero—We hear first the ch theme of The Hero; the great subject th sweeps up out of the bass in the lo strings and horns, joined later by the vi lins. There are subsidiary themes, pictu ing different aspects of the Hero's nature his pride, depth of feeling, inflexibili sensitiveness, imagination. This sect comes to a defiant, heaven-storming cl with a hold on the dominant-chord of flat.

"II. The Hero's Adversaries—Herein pictured the Hero's opponents and d tors—an envious and malicious crew, with all uncharitableness. Flutes, piccolo, English horns, clarinets, shrill and snarling phrases. There is a malignly ponderous phrase, in fifths, tenor and bass tubas, intended to pictu the malevolence of the dull-witted amo the foe. The theme of the Hero appea in sad and meditative guise. But dauntless courage soon reasserts its and the mocking horde are put to rout.

"III. The Hero's Helpmate—A so violin introduces the Hero's beloved. S reveals herself at the start as caprici an inconsequent trifler, an elabor coquette. The directions printed above violin part in the score—'flippantly, 'playfully,' 'insolently,' 'sedately', 'sooth ingly,' 'angrily,' 'scoldingly'—suggest th changing aspects of the emotional scene But a grave and earnest phrase—hear at first in the 'cellos, double-basses, trom bones and horns—recurs again and again with the effect of an increasingly ferve appeal. The discourse becomes more se ous, more impassioned. Then the orches breaks into one of the most magnific love-songs in all music. There are r turous phrases for the strings, gorgeo adorned with glissandi in the harps; oboe sings an ardently tender song, the ecstasy subsides, the mocking voices the foe are heard remotely, like the c tant croaking of night birds through enchanted dream.

"IV. The Hero's Battlefield—But sudd ly the call to arms is heard, and may not be ignored. Distant fan (trumpets behind the scenes) summon Hero to the conflict. The orchestra comes a battlefield; the music 'evokes picture of countless and waging hosts, forests of waving spears and clash blades,' wrote Huneker of this scene. ' din, heat and turmoil of conflict are spr over all, and the ground piled high the slain.' Through the dust and up we are reminded of the inspiration of Beloved, which sustains and heartens champion, whose theme contests for premacy with that of his adversaries, triumphant orchestral outburst procla at last his victory. Yet he exults alo The world regards his conquest with and cynical indifference.

"V. The Hero's Works of Peace—N begins a celebration of the Hero's victor of peace, suggesting his spiritual evoluti and achievements. We hear—perhaps w delicately symbolic intent—quotations themes from Strauss's earlier mu reminiscences of 'Death and Transfig tion,' 'Don Quixote,' 'Don Juan,' 'Till lenspiegel,' 'Macbeth,' 'Zarathustra,' music-drama 'Guntram,' and the exquis song, 'Traum durch die Dämmerung.' appreciative hearer will esteem the and tranquil loveliness of the where the tenor tuba, viol

Transcript
April 13

Languors and Tediums

"Prometheus" [writes Mr. Perkins i The Herald-Tribune], was offered under th best conditions that an ardent Skriabinat might hope to expect. But it seemed, some how, to miss fire. "Prometheus" is th strongest of the composer's three major or chestral pieces. It has the largest portio of the characteristic flavor of his piano compositions. There are impressive passages, periods of considerable beauty. But the substance seemed too small for the framework. After the intriguing opening chord the music reached its climax languidly. Its inspiration waxed only to wane again, until the rise to the climactic close—and this, impassive in its way, was disappointing after the extent of the preparation. The chorus, a little uncertain in the opening measures, did its full share in emblazoning the high lights. More often, however, the chorus seems to be treated as a part of the orchestra, with its notes merged int the ensemble.

Muddle and Delusion

Skriabin was not a genius [continues Mr. Henderson in The Sun] despite the repeated asservations of those to whom his cross-chord puzzles seem to signify things beyond ordinary understanding. Skriabin was an honest, hard-working musician whose doings greatly astonished Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull. The same gentleman was also astonished by the doings of Cyril Scott. Now anyone can create strange chords. Skriabin's one invention was the "harmonic" scale, a succession of tones developed from a fundamental and its overtones. There is material in such a scale for music and for originality in harmony. But Skriabin never accomplished anything of poetic or symbolical import with his scale. He merely produced novel sounds. His poem of fire i a misfire. It starts from a chord built o all the tones in the harmonic scale and i arrives at an impalpable location in thi air. It is a curious muddle of unenlight ening phrases and harmonic sequences. I makes no proclamation of the barren sou of man fired to activity. Its best passage sound like Debussy and its worst like Stra vinsky . . . There is some strang charm about what common mortals know as "conductors' music." Conductors rav about it and insist on playing it whethe audiences wish to hear it or not. They have been trying for years to educate u to the level of Skriabin, and we are stil wallowing in our ignorance. One thing car be said, and that is that the tone-poem was admirably performed.

L'Envoi

The voices of the reviewers in New York, it is true, do not carry the final word about any music. Time is the only arbiter. Yet it is the openest of secrets that, when they write in the fashion above indicated, they speak for many Bostonians who have had their fill of "Prometheus" for one season. Why, then, should the tone-poem be repeated twice more at the final Symphony Concerts when so much other interesting and important music awaits Mr. Koussevitzky's hand? Does he believe of Skriabin, as Theodore Thomas believed of Wagner, that he must play his pieces till the public rises to them?

NEW YORK
POST
APR 13 1925

Boston Symphony Closes Season Here

The Boston Symphony closed its present New ~~York season~~ at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, assisted, as on Thursday evening, by the Cecilia Society of that city in the performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus," and the Polovtsian dances from Bordin's "Prince Igor." The remainder of the program was made up of four "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," by Respighi, and two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals."

The Debussy numbers and in particular the Respighi pieces were played beautifully. It was, in many respects, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most brilliant and successful concerts in a somewhat uneven season. It has been announced that next year the Boston will be without two of its best-known players, George Longy, first oboe, who will return to his home in France, and K. Keller, a double-bass player, who has also resigned.

There was more than the usual enthusiasm at the conclusion of the concert.

SUN
APR 13 1925

Boston Symphony Ends Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its ~~New York season~~ with the concert of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky's well known admiration for Scriabin led him to repeat the "Prometheus," placing it second on the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is celebrated in Europe as an interpreter of this music and we may accept his reading as authoritative. He gives the work a brilliant and finished performance, but will probably find American music lovers somewhat slow in rising to his level of faith in the composition.

The other numbers were Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (freely arranged)," Debussy's "Clouds and Festivals" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The pianist was again Alexander Steinert and the chorus the Cecilia Society of Boston. The audience was large. The eminent Russian finished his first season here as conductor of the Boston organization in high favor. He will be welcomed if he returns to us next season.

Herald
April 15

PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

Music by Wagner and Strauss will be performed at one of the most noteworthy Boston Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon, April 19 at 3:30.

This, the spring concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's pension fund, ...lly the only opportunity for ... the orchestra

S BUILDING

tionally Known Foo

"Goo... act of "Parsifal," "Tannhaeuser."

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 15 1925

Non-subscribers to the regular concerts of the ~~Boston Symph~~ony orchestra will have an opportunity to hear the organization at an extra concert in aid of the pension fund to be given in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon, April 19, at 3.30. For this concert Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared a program including the Strauss tone poem "A Hero Life" and several numbers from the Wagner music dramas.

Columbia Spectator
April 14

COLUM

Overtones

The Boston Symphony.

Last Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky retrieved the disappointment of the Boston Symphony's previous performance in one of the most extraordinary concerts of the season, if not of several years past. With their leader at his best the players were naturally responsive and the addition of the Cecelia Society Chorus in two of the numbers capped the completion of one tremendous musical unit.

The first number on the bill was a free orchestral transcription of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute by Ottorino Respighi. In this suite Respighi, a contemporary Italian composer, has done one of the most musical pieces of orchestration achieved by any of our moderns. There is no striving for effect; just a straightforward, yet original presentation of some of the most charming dances of sixteenth century Italy. Respighi for once in the history of modern orchestration has allowed his instrumentation to be dictated by the musical thought of his work; he has never used an instrument unless the underlying idea of the composition called for it.

In a program such as Saturday's, where every number could have been a specialty, it may appear temerarious to designate any one as the apex of the performance; yet I do no hesitate to say this of Skryabin' Prometheus. The composition is con ceived on a scale so great as to ex haust all the active resources of th modern orchestra, chorus, pianofort solo and organ, as well as all th passive resources of the audience We may justly wonder whether th enormity of such a composition doe not serve to conceal some of it weaker points, but that cannot b determined at one hearing. Obv ously certain passages were marke by aimless wandering and restat ment, but we excuse this in Wagne and we may again in Skryabin, pr vided that he like Wagner has som thing more to offer us. This I b lieve he does. His music is not on sensuously beautiful, but is the e pression of a great and intense pe sonality, a relief from the object ism of Stravinsky. True, Prom theus has a program, but it is n descriptive, it is introspective. short, this program is to represe the creative instinct which is t true soul of man, the fire whi Prometheus brought, and the ecsta of its constant striving toward t ideal. Skryabin with a poet's visi has expressed the glory of artist creation in music which for all i imperfection is overpowering. I has a message of hope and nobili which he delivers convincingly not concisely.

After so terrific an emotional perience as the Prometheus p duced, one might fear that Debuss Nuages and Fetes would appear p and aquarelle. On the contrary t were a relief; the intensity of Sk abin cannot be endured long. M over this is some of Debus strongest work. The greater ch and unity of these compositions v particularly evident following closely upon the Skryabin.

Borodin's Polovtsian Dances h always seemed commonplace to m not so, however, under Mr. Kousse itsky's direction. The rhythm wa excellently, electrically sustained The healthy vigor of these dances made a very fitting close to so unusual a program.

We may take it for granted that the performance of the orchestra was masterly—it is never less; but last Saturday afternoon it was more than that: there was a sincerity and balance which are sometimes overshadowed by the verve and sparkle of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations. We must also add a word in

(Continued on page 4)

Transcript
April 16

81

MUSIC TO BE HEARD: BRAHMS'S GRAVITIES, STRAUSS'S HEROICS

BAX'S "GARDEN OF FAND" ALSO IMPENDING

The "German Requiem" for the First Times in Years and Under Unusual Circumstance—Dr. Davison's Share—The Revival of "Ein Heldenleben" According to Mr. Koussevitzky — Celtic Glamour, Irish Fable

BOSTON is not fortunate with the masterpieces of choral music. Only a long memory may recall a performance in this town of Bach's Mass in B minor or of Beethoven's "Missa Solenn's." It is eight years since it heard the Passion Music of Bach to the text of Matthew. It is even longer since Brahms's German Requiem sang in its ears. We lack choral companies capable and ambitious of such arduous tasks, willing to undergo the protracted preparation. The Handel and Haydn Society traverses a sanctified rut. The Cecilia sticks fast in part-songs and unaccompanied numbers. The war dissolved the chorus that Dr. Muck and Mr. Townsend were associating with the Symphony Orchestra. Nearest approach to it in these latter days is Dr. Davison's choir that joins the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Last spring in two concerts for the increase of the Pension Fund at Symphony Hall, it sang the choral parts in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with a volume, vitality, precision and plasticity that hereabouts they had never known.

Now the end will crown a work that through nearly two years has occupied these student-singers—the study and the rehearsal of Brahms's German Requiem. This evening, at Symphony Hall, they will sing the music in public for the first time. Tomorrow evening in the same room they will repeat it, since the inquiry for seats warrants a second concert. The Symphony Orchestra in necessary numbers will assist them; Miss Hayden and Mr. Saslavsky will carry the subordinated solo-parts; as guest, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct, secure upon the foundations that Dr. Davison has laid these many months. To him and to him only, will fall the greater glory. He dared and cherished the project—the singing of an exacting choral music by two collegiate choirs. (Unprecedented, preposterous, impossible, said the safe and sane, wagging their silly old heads.) He infused into the preparations his own eagerness and endurance of spirit. He pursued them gradually; he abated them only when the measures of the Requiem had become second nature to his singers. Then with the quiet gesture of a musician who sets music above himself, he handed his chairs to Mr. Koussevitzky, who has ached since last autumn to prove to Boston his prowess in choral music. There will be laurels aplenty at the two impending concerts; but they will be thickest upon Dr. Davison's calm forehead. By his will and deed, Boston after an interval of years, will hear the German Requiem as it has never heard it before.

Brahms wrote the music in memory of his mother. It was sung first in Bremen in the spring of 1868. It made its way through the northern world. It gave Brahms new prestige as serious and masterful composer. Half the title is misleading, since the music nowhere follows the rites for the dead in the Roman or any other church. It has been labelled a Protestant requiem; but it is by no means such. Indeed it was to distinguish it from churchly requiems that Brahms chose his adjective, "German." From the spirit of his folk, meditating upon the mysteries of life and death, this world and the next, would he have the music spring, through his voice finding speech.

"The circumstances and the piecemeal composition of the music," continues Mr Langford of The Manchester Guardian, "lead one also to think that many feelings of a personal kind went to the choice of the text and the sequence of the numbers It has been suggested that it should rather be entitled a 'Protestant Requiem,' but Brahms has evidently been at great care to exclude nobody, not even himself, from the feelings and faith which it expresses. Though the Requiem includes certain words of Christ, they are not used in a way that attaches them definitely to Christian ideas or confines them to Christian doctrine, and one may judge that even this fact may not be wholly accidental. If we look at the serious and philosophical music of Brahms as a whole we shall find that he has regarded the problems of existence very deeply, quite apart from the consolations of religious doctrine, and has written many pages of this kind, which must leave an impression as profound as those of this sublime Requiem. To our mind we shall understand the music best if we regard it strictly as a personal document."

There are seven numbers, mainly choral and orchestral. The first, "Blessed are hey that Go in Mourning," is broadly nceived and richly scored. The second, Funeral March in triple time, rings with hms's breadths and glories, ending in fugal climax. The third, "Lord, Make Know the Measure of my Days upon th," begins in the solo baritone voice h choral accompaniment; moves abruptand wildly; comes again to fugal close. succeeding division, "How Lovely is Dwelling Place, O Lord of Hosts," tens the surrounding gravities with ... The fifth number joi...

soprano voice to the chorus for the cation, "Ye Now Are Sorrowful, Not"; ascends through bold, sweepin alted measures. The sixth summon resurrection of the dead in pages multuous power. The seventh, "B Are the Faithful," brings calm and r close. . . . The last, as some say, older choral music, before the modern violent hands upon the sanctuary choral masterpiece, according to o from the days of Bach to the days are Bachless.

Heroic Strauss

Another, but a very different, sic, long unheard at the Symp Concerts, will fill the second pa Mr. Koussevitzky's program at phony Hall tomorrow afternoon Saturday evening—Strauss's tone- "Ein Heldenleben," Dr. Muck ra through the lengths and breadths Strauss; but halted not at "A H Life," because he thoroughly dis the music. Mr. Monteux, who ha hesitated before "Don Quixote" or Z thustra," mistrusted himself with " denleben" and avoided it. Not 1910, when Mr. Fiedler was conductor, the Symphony Orchestra played the poem. Once in the interim it has heard from another band and a more terful leader—from the Philharm Society of New York and Mr. Mengel in their single visit to Boston. The lander excels in the music; Strauss him dedicated it to him; within memory it not been so lucidly set forth, so viv characterized, so deeply charged with sion of mood and passion of uttera Often Mr. Mengelberg has put "Ein He leben" on his programs in New York, from Mr. Gilman's illuminating n comes the following summary of the co and content of the music.

"Strauss has said that in 'A Hero's L he wished to present, 'not a realistic trait of a particular historical or poet figure, but rather a more general and ideal of great and manly heroism—not heroism to which one can apply an eve day maxim of valor, with its material exterior reward, but that heroism which lates to the inward battles of life, which aspires, through struggle and nouncement, towards the elevation of soul.' The tone-poem runs in six connec sections: The Hero, The Hero's Adversari The Hero's Courtship, The Hero's Batt field, The Hero's Works of Peace, T Hero's Release from the World, and t Conclusion.

"I. The Hero—We hear first the chi theme of The Hero; the great subject th sweeps up out of the bass in the lo strings and horns, joined later by the vi lins. There are subsidiary themes, pictu ing different aspects of the Hero's nature his pride, depth of feeling, inflexibili sensitiveness, imagination. This sect comes to a defiant, heaven-storming cl with a hold on the dominant-chord of flat.

"II. The Hero's Adversaries—Herein pictured the Hero's opponents and de tors—an envious and malicious crew, with all uncharitableness. Flutes, piccolo, English horns, clarinets, shrill and snarling phrases. There is a malignly ponderous phrase, in fifths, tenor and bass tubas, intended to pictu the malevolence of the dull-witted amo the foe. The theme of the Hero appea in sad and meditative guise. But dauntless courage soon reasserts itse and the mocking horde are put to rout.

"III. The Hero's Helpmate—A so violin introduces the Hero's beloved. Sh reveals herself at the start as capricio an inconsequent trifler, an elabor coquette. The directions printed above th violin part in the score—'flippantly, 'playfully,' 'insolently,' 'sedately', 'sooth ingly,' 'angrily,' 'scoldingly'—suggest th changing aspects of the emotional scene But a grave and earnest phrase—heard at first in the 'cellos, double-basses, trombones and horns—recurs again and again with the effect of an increasingly ferver appeal. The discourse becomes more se ous, more impassioned. Then the orches breaks into one of the most magnific love-songs in all music. There are turous phrases for the strings, gorgeou adorned with glissandi in the harps; oboe sings an ardently tender song. the ecstasy subsides, the mocking voices the foe are heard remotely, like the tant croaking of night birds through enchanted dream.

"IV. The Hero's Battlefield—But sudd ly the call to arms is heard, and may not be ignored. Distant fan (trumpets behind the scenes) summon Hero to the conflict. The orchestra comes a battlefield; the music 'evokes picture of countless and waging hosts, forests of waving spears and clash blades,' wrote Huneker of this scene. din, heat and turmoil of conflict are spr over all, and the ground piled high the slain.' Through the dust and u we are reminded of the inspiration o Beloved, which sustains and heartens champion, whose theme contests for premacy with that of his adversaries, triumphant orchestral outburst proclai at last his victory. Yet he exults alo The world regards his conquest with co and cynical indifference.

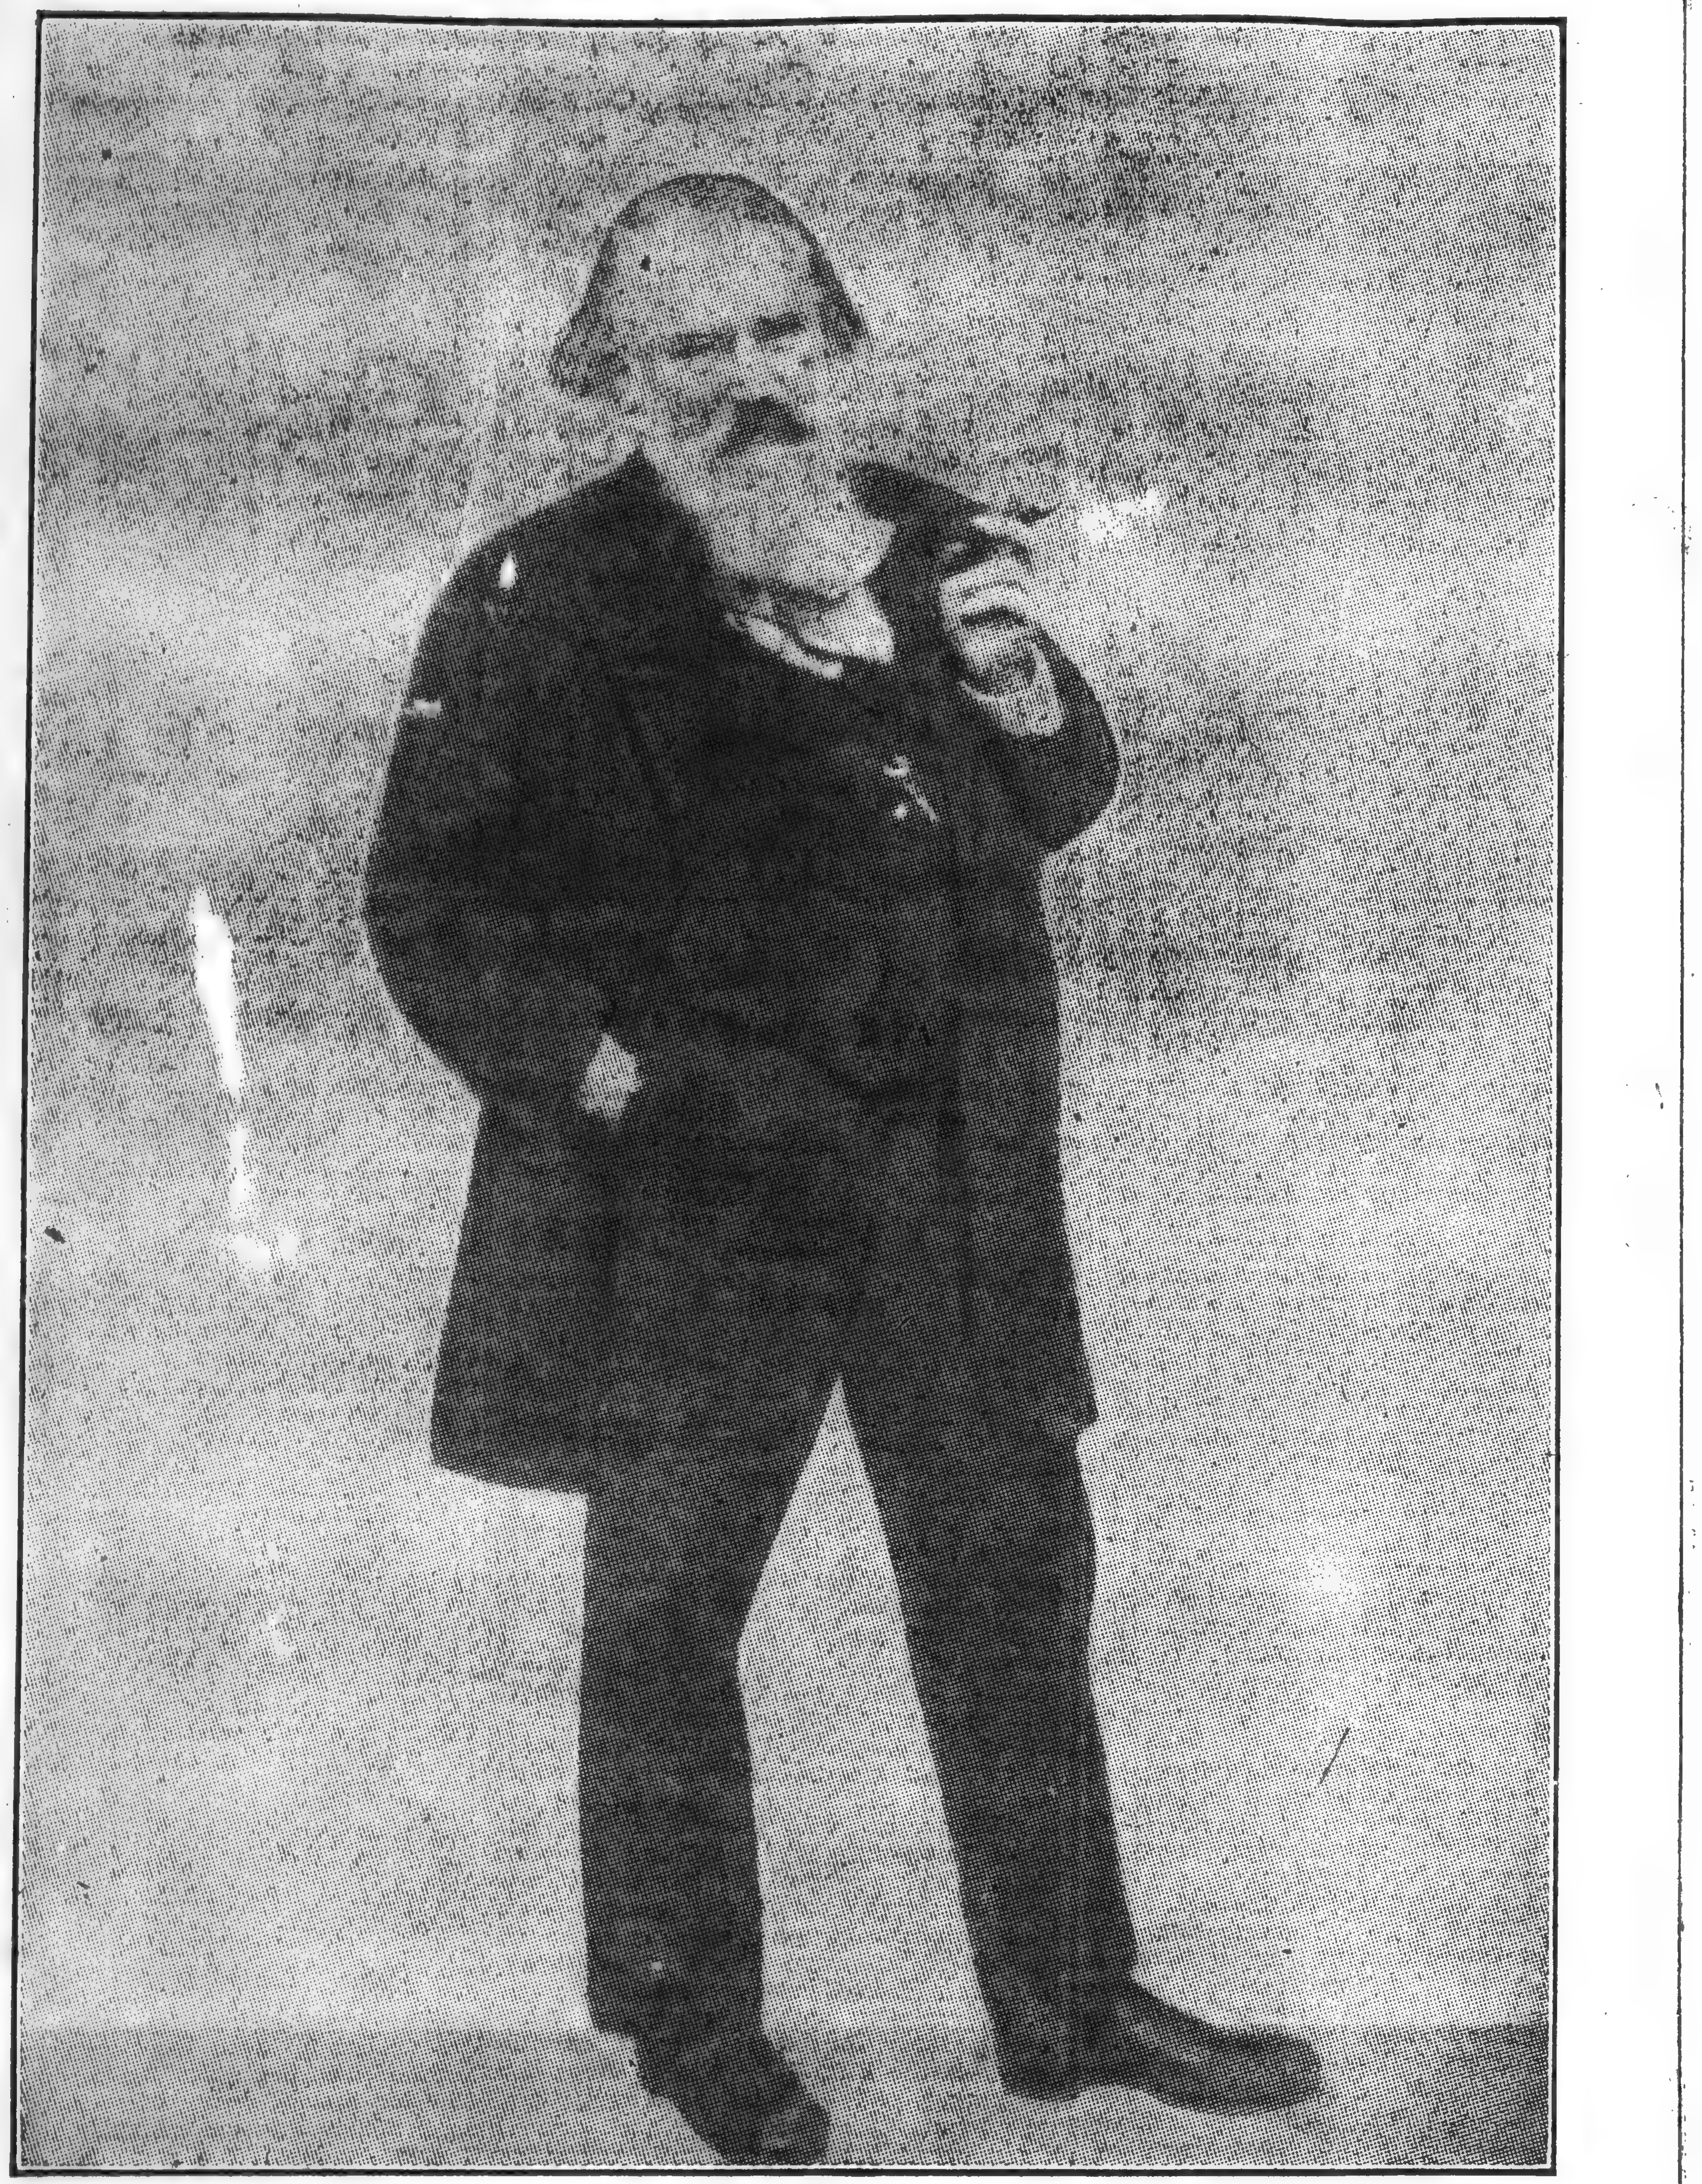
"V. The Hero's Works of Peace—N begins a celebration of the Hero's victor of peace, suggesting his spiritual evoluti and achievements. We hear—perhaps w delicately symbolic intent—quotations themes from Strauss's earlier mu reminiscences of 'Death and Transfigu tion,' 'Don Quixote,' 'Don Juan,' 'Till lenspiegel,' 'Macbeth,' 'Zarathustra,' music-drama 'Guntram,' and the exquis song, 'Traum durch die Dämmerung.' appreciative hearer will esteem the and tranquil loveliness of tha where the tenor tuba, vi... clarinet...

87

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1925

acine --- The Theater and Mus

Johannes---To His Friends



Brahms

In the Prime That Wrought the Requiem

(From a Rare Photograph in the Collection of Willem Willeke)

Monitor
April 18

'The Garden of Fand' Played in Boston

THE program of the twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Bax ...."The Garden of Fand"
Rachmaninoff
Concerto No. 2 in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra
Strauss
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem op. 40

Mr. Koussevitzky has again changed the seating of the orchestra. Last fall at the beginning of the season the double basses were moved from their former position at the back of the orchestra to the left of the stage. Yesterday it was to be noticed that the second violins have been given the space formerly allotted to the violoncellos, while the violas now sit at the conductor's right, with the violoncellos where the violas were.

There is much to commend in this new arrangement (which we believe has been adopted in other orchestras). The violins are now in a single group, which is altogether logical, and the violas (of heavier tone) are fully as prominent as before, in spite of the fact that the instruments are now turned away from the audience. As far as change in tone color or quality is concerned, it was hardly possible to perceive any appreciable difference. The violas may have sounded slightly more resonant in passages in which they came to the fore.

"The Garden of Fand"

Bax's "The Garden of Fand" was played for the first time at these concerts. His music is not altogether unfamiliar here, however. The underlying motive of the composition is of course the sea, and consequently it is hardly possible to avoid comparisons with the music of Mendelssohn, whose "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" will always remain a model of marine tone painting, or of Rimsky-Korsakoff, with his "Schéhérazade" and "Sadko."

Nevertheless Bax's seascape does not fall far behind those of his two illustrious predecessors. His music is not over-pictorial and skillfully suggests the atmosphere of magic which forms the basis of the argument of the old Celtic legend which his composition is intended to illustrate. It is fanciful, imaginative music; the music of a dreamer who nevertheless is too clever a musician to wander unduly from the subject in hand. The very brilliance of the orchestration somewhat defeats the composer's purpose, for the wealth of color ends by becoming slightly monotonous; yet as a whole the composition delights by reason of the delicacy of its workmanship, and the surety with which the composer's altogether poetical conception is realized.

Rachmaninoff's Concerto

Rachmaninoff's second concerto is a brilliant show-piece for soloist and orchestra as well. In it the composer has solved a somewhat difficult problem in musical composition. It does not belong to that class of compositions in which the "piano is not treated as a solo instrument, but rather as an instrument of the orchestra," one of those compositions in which the listener observes the pianist performing feats of agility which go by altogether unheard. Nor is it an old-fashioned concerto, in which the orchestra is practically an unnecessary adjunct, save for the playing of the customary Tuttis. Here both pianist and orchestra have their due share of prominence, yet each is absolutely indispensable to the other. Of the actual musical value of the contents of this concerto opinions may differ. There are pages of great beauty, as in the second movement, and again there are pages, as in the final Allegro, in which the composer piles one sonority on another with the greatest effectiveness, but in which upon sober second thought he is found to have said little of real interest.

Mr. Rachmaninoff himself was the pianist. Naturally he was able to give an interpretation of his work which was fairly overwhelming. It was playing, however, which astonished by its virtuosity rather than playing which stirred the deeper emotions.

Emotional depths were touched

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 18 1925

[illegible] night.

Boston Symphony

On Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, Serge Koussevitzky will make his final bow of the season in Providence at the closing concert here of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Russian conductor is concluding one of the most brilliant seasons this orchestra has ever had, nor have the symphony concerts ever been in greater demand, generally speaking and seats more difficult to obtain. Special choral concerts in Boston took place last Thursday and Friday. There will be a pension fund concert there tomorrow with a Strauss-Wagner programme, and a pair of choral concerts a week from Friday at the very close of the season, Koussevitzky immediately after to sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris and London.

The splendid Wagnerian programme for Tuesday will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to the first act (Holy Grail music) and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin;" the introduction to the third act of "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg" (contemplative music of Hans Sachs, the shoemaker); the ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" in which the winged horses of the warrior goddesses gallop through the [illegible] "Forest Murmurs" from the sec[illegible] of "Siegfried" in which the [illegible] the woods and bird calls [illegible] the "Good Friday Spell" [illegible]al;" and to close the sea-

---

American
April 18

RACHMANINOFF SCORES AGAIN AT SYMPHONY

Composer Plays Own "Second Piano Concerto" Accompanied by Orchestra

There are only three members on this week's Symphony program, but yesterday's concert lasted more than two hours. An appreciable part of this time was consumed in applause, especially for the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, after his rendition of his Second Piano Concerto.

The second movement of the work might be called sentimental, but for us it is honest emotion well presented. Of course the work of Rachmaninoff always owes much to his own personality in presenting it, so that it is hard to say how much is in the music and how much in the interpretation of the composer. There was an unusually sympathetic playing of the orchestral part of the Concerto by Koussevitzky and his men.

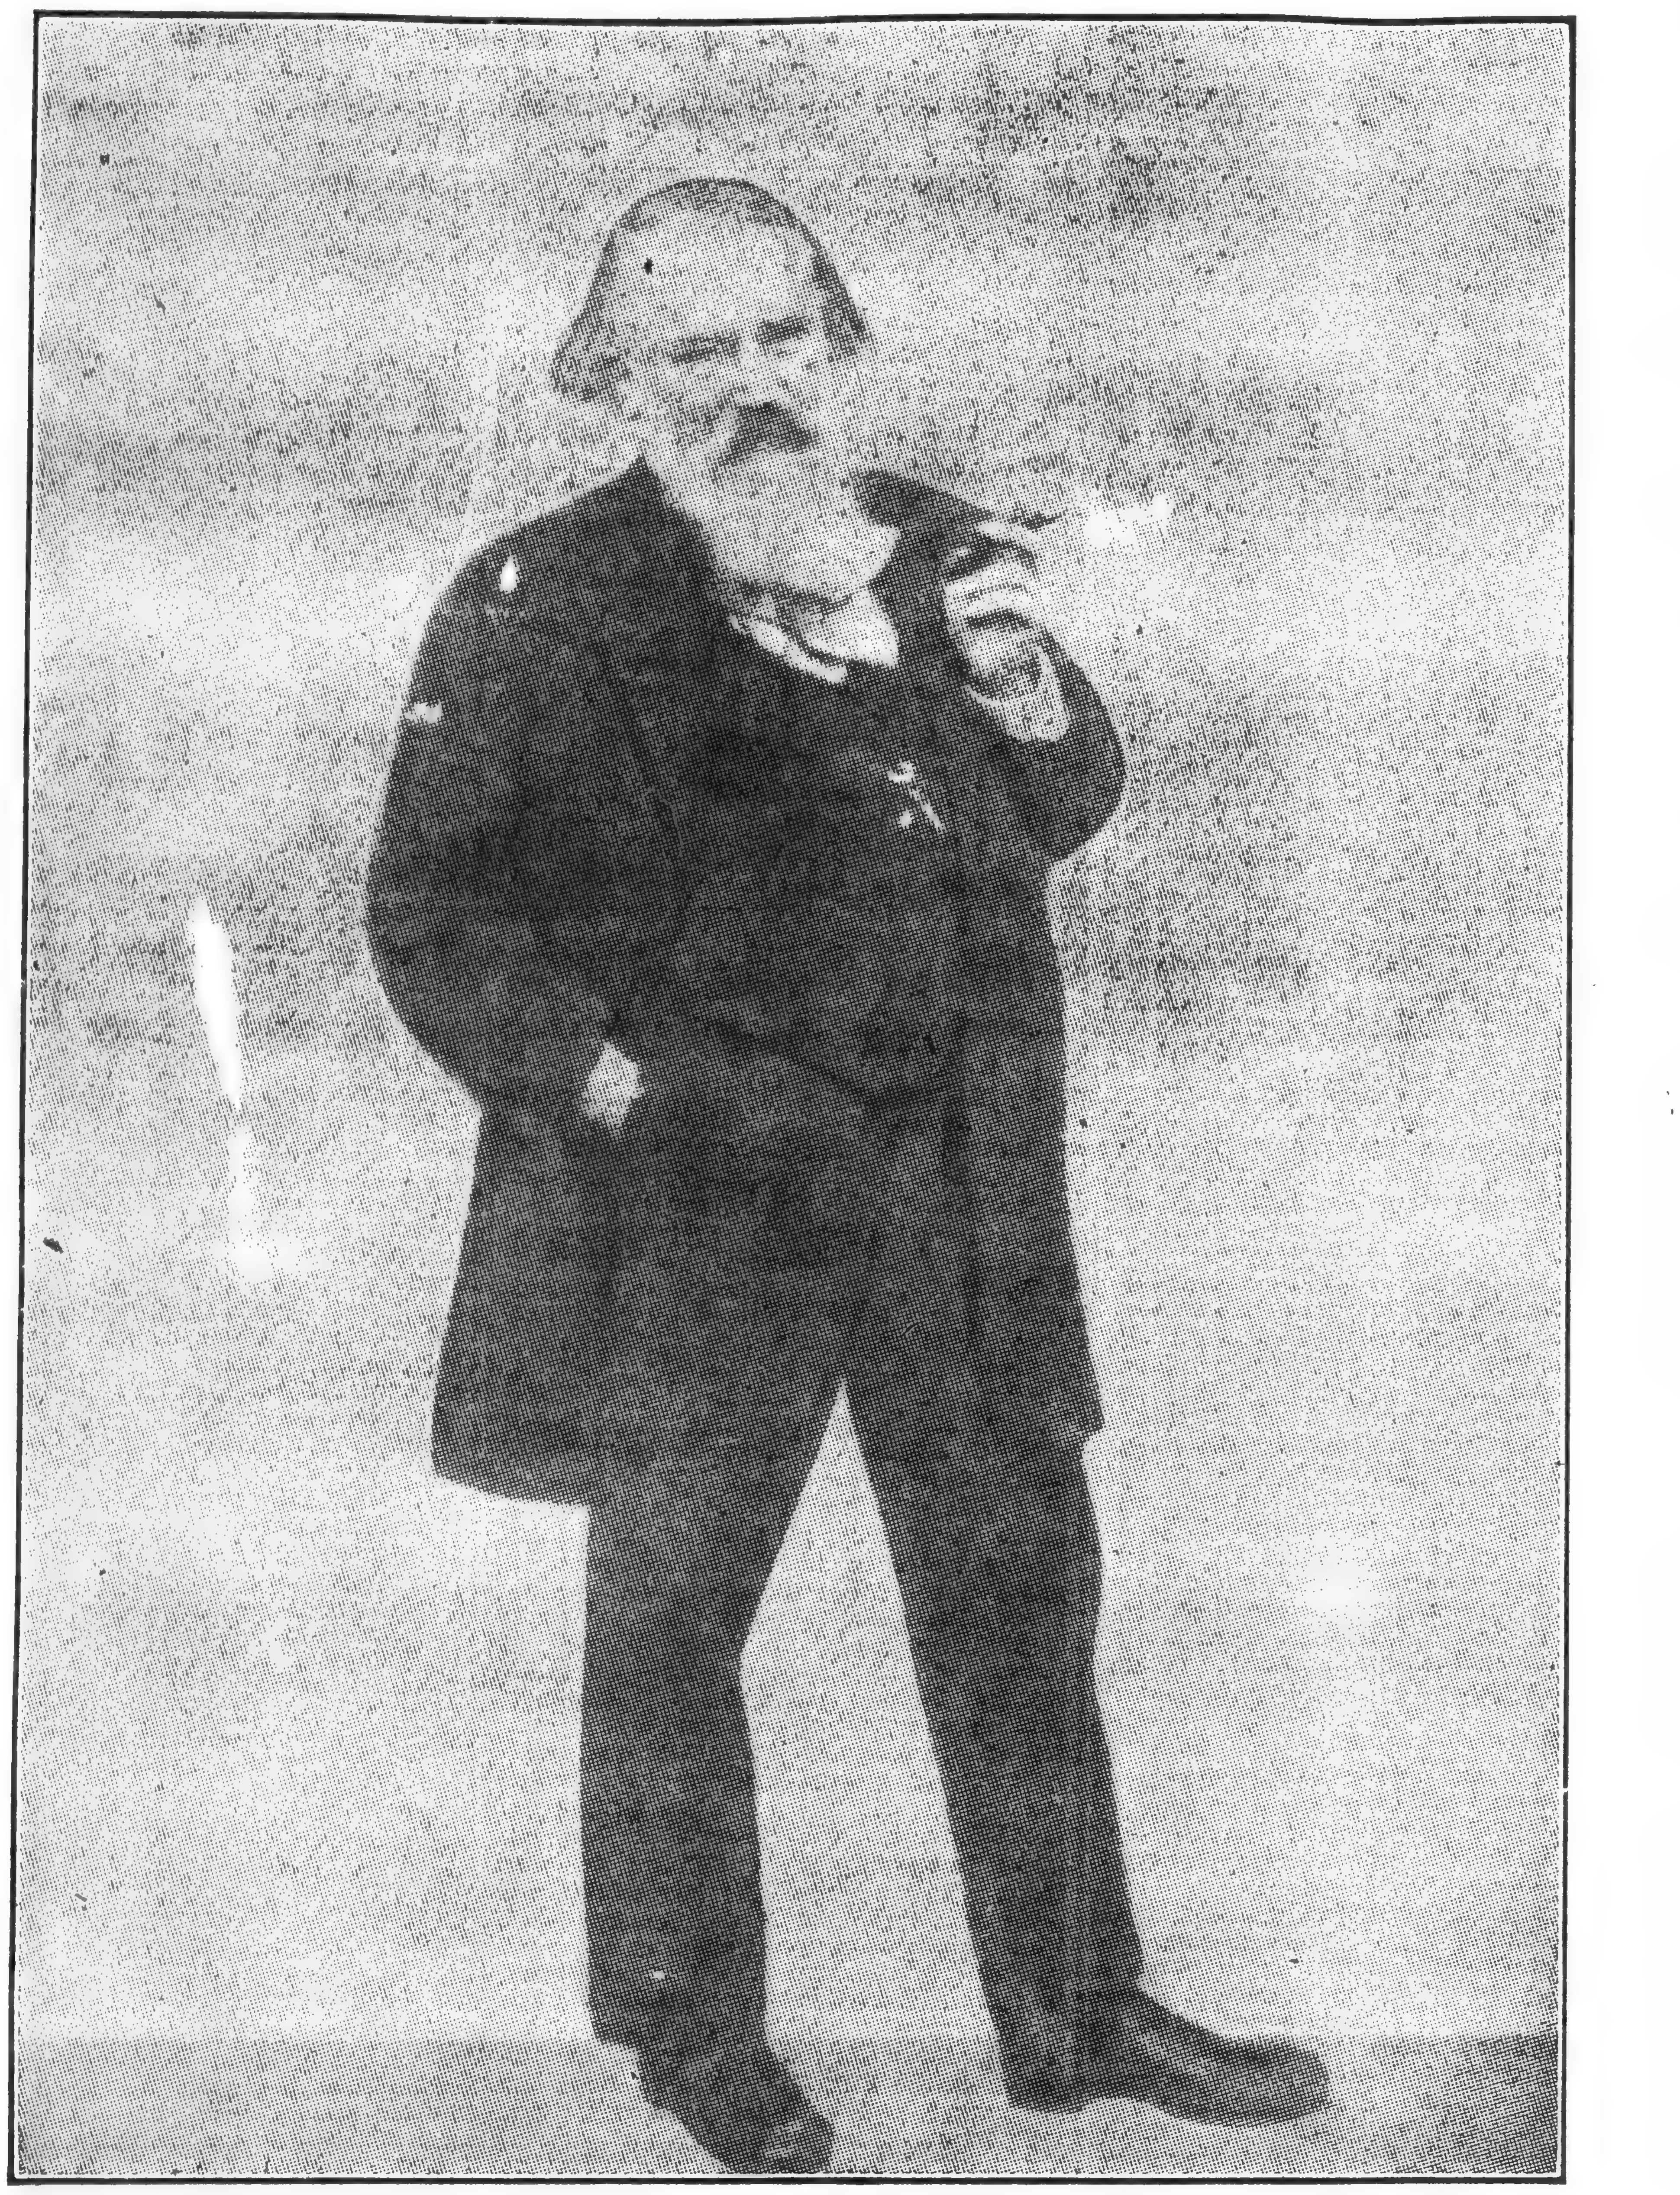
For the opening number Mr. Koussevitzky chose Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand," played for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. This work is written in Bax's usual style, which means Celtic style. The piece made a notable impression as a splendid hit of program-music.

The second half of the program was taken up by Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." This tone-poem has not appeared on the program of the Symphony Orchestra since 1910. Many a conductor is shy of testing his abilities in this exceedingly difficult work, but Mr. Koussevitzky apparently fears nothing. Strauss has much to say in this music depicting the life of a hero, but isn't it true that he takes too much space to say it in? There are moments of unforgettable beauty, such as the gorgeous love music constantly recurring, and there are moments of power.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1925

icine --- The Theater and Mus

Johannes---To His Friends



Brahms

In the Prime That Wrought the Requiem

(From a Rare Photograph in the Collection of Willem Willeke)

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 18 1925

Boston Symphony

On Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, Serge Koussevitzky will make his final bow of the season in Providence at the closing concert here of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Russian conductor is concluding one of the most brilliant seasons this orchestra has ever had, nor have the symphony concerts ever been in greater demand, generally speaking and seats more difficult to obtain. Special choral concerts in Boston took place last Thursday and Friday. There will be a pension fund concert there tomorrow with a Strauss-Wagner programme, and a pair of choral concerts a week from Friday at the very close of the season, Koussevitzky immediately after to sail for Europe to conduct his annual series in Paris and London.

The splendid Wagnerian programme for Tuesday will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" the prelude to the first act (Holy Grail music) and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin;" the introduction to the third act of "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg" (contemplative music of Hans Sachs, the shoemaker); the ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" in which the winged horses of the warrior goddesses gallop through the [illegible] "Forest Murmurs" from the sec[illegible] of "Siegfried" in which the [illegible] the woods and bird calls [illegible] the "Good Friday Spell" [illegible]al;" and to close the sea-

---

American
Apr 18

RACHMANINOFF SCORES AGAIN AT SYMPHONY

Composer Plays Own "Second Piano Concerto" Accompanied by Orchestra

There are only three members on this week's Symphony program, but yesterday's concert lasted more than two hours. An appreciable part of this time was consumed in applause, especially for the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, after his rendition of his Second Piano Concerto.

The second movement of the work might be called sentimental, but for us it is honest emotion well presented. Of course the work of Rachmaninoff always owes much to his own personality in presenting it, so that it is hard to say how much is in the music and how much in the interpretation of the composer. There was an unusually sympathetic playing of the orchestral part of the Concerto by Koussevitzky and his men.

For the opening number Mr. Koussevitzky chose Arnold Bax's "Garden of Fand," played for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. This work is written in Bax's usual style, which means Celtic style. The piece made a notable impression as a splendid hit of program-music.

The second half of the program was taken up by Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." This tone-poem has not appeared on the program of the Symphony Orchestra since 1910. Many a conductor is shy of testing his abilities in this exceedingly difficult work, but Mr. Koussevitzky apparently fears nothing. Strauss has much to say in this music depicting the life of a hero, but isn't it true that he takes too much space to say it in? There are moments of unforgettable beauty, such as the gorgeous love music constantly recurring, and there are moments of power.

Monitor
April 18

'The Garden of Fand' Played in Boston

THE program of the twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Bax .... "The Garden of Fand"
Rachmaninoff
Concerto No. 2 in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra
Strauss
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem op. 40

Mr. Koussevitzky has again changed the seating of the orchestra. Last fall at the beginning of the season the double basses were moved from their former position at the back of the orchestra to the left of the stage. Yesterday it was to be noticed that the second violins have been given the space formerly allotted to the violoncellos, while the violas now sit at the conductor's right, with the violoncellos where the violas were.

There is much to commend in this new arrangement (which we believe has been adopted in other orchestras). The violins are now in a single group, which is altogether logical, and the violas (of heavier tone) are fully as prominent as before, in spite of the fact that the instruments are now turned away from the audience. As far as change in tone color or quality is concerned, it was hardly possible to perceive any appreciable difference. The violas may have sounded slightly more resonant in passages in which they came to the fore.

"The Garden of Fand"

Bax's "The Garden of Fand" was played for the first time at these concerts. His music is not altogether unfamiliar here, however. The underlying motive of the composition is of course the sea, and consequently it is hardly possible to avoid comparisons with the music of Mendelssohn, whose "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" will always remain a model of marine tone painting, or of Rimsky-Korsakoff, with his "Schéhérazade" and "Sadko."

Nevertheless Bax's seascape does not fall far behind those of his two illustrious predecessors. His music is not over-pictorial and skillfully suggests the atmosphere of magic which forms the basis of the argument of the old Celtic legend which his composition is intended to illustrate. It is fanciful, imaginative music; the music of a dreamer who nevertheless is too clever a musician to wander unduly from the subject in hand. The very brilliance of the orchestration somewhat defeats the composer's purpose, for the wealth of color ends by becoming slightly monotonous; yet as a whole the composition delights by reason of the delicacy of its workmanship, and the surety with which the composer's altogether poetical conception is realized.

Rachmaninoff's Concerto

Rachmaninoff's second concerto is a brilliant show-piece for soloist and orchestra as well. In it the composer has solved a somewhat difficult problem in musical composition. It does not belong to that class of compositions in which the "piano is not treated as a solo instrument, but rather as an instrument of the orchestra," one of those compositions in which the listener observes the pianist performing feats of agility which go by altogether unheard. Nor is it an old-fashioned concerto, in which the orchestra is practically an unnecessary adjunct, save for the playing of the customary Tuttis. Here both pianist and orchestra have their due share of prominence, yet each is absolutely indispensable to the other. Of the actual musical value of the contents of this concerto opinions may differ. There are pages of great beauty, as in the second movement, and again there are pages, as in the final Allegro, in which the composer piles one sonority on another with the greatest effectiveness, but in which upon sober second thought he is found to have said little of real interest.

Mr. Rachmaninoff himself was the pianist. Naturally he was able to give an interpretation of his work which was fairly overwhelming. It was playing, however, which astonished by its virtuosity rather than playing which stirred the deeper emotions.

Emotional depths were touched 83

Herald
April 18

SYMPHONY GIVES GARDEN OF FAND

Bax Composition Presented First Time in Boston at 22d Concert

PERFORMANCE IS OF HIGHEST STANDARD

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bax, "The Garden of Fand" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto, No. 2, C minor (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Arnold Bax is the most interesting of modern English composers because he is the most romantically poetic. Saying this, one does not forget the haunting music, dripping with melancholy, that Vaughan Williams wrote for "On Wenlock Edge," and other verses from "A Shropshire Lad," but Bax in his symphonic poems, three of which have never been played in Boston, has a higher and more sustained flight of imagination than Vaughan Williams reached in his "London" symphony.

Is Bax of Irish descent? It is certain that he has been mightily influenced by Irish legends, folk lore and the wild western coast of Eirinn. He believes in "the good people"; he has seen the hosting of the Sidhe; he has heard the piping that leads mortal men to joy or destruction.

Writing an argument for "The Garden of Fand" he first tells how the hero Cuchulain fell under the spell of the enchantress, Fand, who dwells on a mysterious island; how his wife, Emer, finally won him back to the world of deeds and battles. And then Bax tells the hearer that this music has no relation to the legend and he relates another story in which Fand, the queen of the sea, holds with her strange companions unceasing revelry on this island, fatal to those tossed by the waves upon the mysterious shore; how voyagers, thrown there by the sea, joined, willingly or unwillingly, in the mad dance and the high feasting. Fand sings to them her intoxicating song of triumphant love. They listen and are lost forever. The sea rises, the island is overwhelmed, the victims sink to the depths, while the immortals, the waves their steeds, ride joyously and laugh at the fate of the intruders. At twilight the watery garden of Fand is no more to be seen.

Did Bax dream this tale or did he find it in some Celtic saga? It matters not. He tells it in beautiful music: music that is not fussily descriptive; music that needs no Baedeker; music that is not merely literary. Were the story not related in program notes, the music would still be enchanting by reason of its wildness, the fury following the calm, the demoniacal intensity of the revelers, the measures that prepare one for the apparition of Fand with the song that maddens with love-yearning.

And so Fand's island is like Prospero's,

"Full of noises,
Sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight, and hurt not."

Mr. Rachmaninoff gave a brilliant been played here several

at least before yesterday by the composer. The concerto is melodious, at times obviously so, with themes that, in Tchaikovskian vein are now charged with the melancholy that is supposed to be peculiarly Russian, now as they were vodka-inspired. It is a concerto, which, when played as Mr. Rachmaninoff played it, with Mr. Koussevitzky accompanying him admirably, is an exciting work, that makes an instantaneous appeal to an audience. It is not necessary to inquire pryingly into the contents themselves. Mr. Rachmaninoff by his superb performance gave unalloyed pleasure.

We doubt if "Ein Hildenleben," which had not been on a Symphony program since 1910, will be ranked among Strauss's important works, though some of the sections, notably "The Hero's Escape from the World and Conclusion," are impressive, having emotional depth, being the baring of a soul. No man is perhaps a hero to his valet; but Strauss is evidently a hero to himself. He is autobiographical in this tone poem as in his "Domestic Symphony." There is a certain presumption in asking one to hear musical descriptions of a composer's struggles, his feelings at being adversely criticised by wretched Philistines, who do not appreciate him, his sulking and withdrawal, like Achilles to his tent. And why drag Frau Strauss into the musical story and typify her, capricious, coquettish, by whimsical measures for the violin, even if they are played as well as Mr. Burgin played them yesterday? This tone poem, in spite of the sections just referred to, might be justly entitled "A Poseur's Life," and a blustering poseur at that.

No, the great Strauss will be known by his "Till Eulenspiegel," the scene of recognition in "Elektra," and "Der Rosen Kavalier." The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was of the highest standard.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. No. 425); Prokofieff, Violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Varlaine); Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

APR 18 1925

Thursday evening, April 9, marked the closing concert in the series of Boston Symphony programs at Carnegie Hall. Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky the numbers were a Handel Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D-major for String Orchestra; Scriabin's Prometheus, A Poem of Fire, in which the Orchestra had the assistance of Alexander Lang Steinert at the piano and the Cecilia Society of Boston; Variations on a Theme by Haydn, by Brahms, and for the finale, Polovtsian Dances from Prince Igor, by Borodin, for Orchestra and Chorus. The Handel number was beautifully interpreted with solo bits by R. Burgin and J. Theodorowicz, violinists, and J. Bedetti, cellist. The orchestra gave an excellent account of itself in the Poem of Fire under Mr. Koussevitzky's spirited direction, but the addition of the chorus in this number was hardly a necessary one. The noted conductor was recalled many times at the conclusion of this, the last concert in the current season in New York City.

---

transcript
April 18

Orchestral

At last it is at hand. Mr. Burgin is ready; Mr. Koussevitzky is eager; a certain curiosity is abroad about "the most difficult violin-piece in existence." Accordingly Prokoviev's Concerto will be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week probably for the first times in America. It is short; it enlists a relatively small orchestra; wherever it has been played of late in Europe, it has stirred debate. Seemingly, there is no middle way either in admiration or in contempt for the music. A Symphony of Mozart in C major (K. 425); Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; the Overture to "Tannhäuser" fill the remainder of the program.

Tomorrow afternoon, in Symphony Hall befalls the second of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its ever-needy and ever-useful pension fund. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct; the band will play—on its mettle. Strauss and Wagner will divide the program: "Ein Heldenleben"; the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the Forest-Music from "Siegfried"; the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal"; the Overture to "Tannhauser."

Apr 18

N DAILY ADVERTISER

Rachmaninoff Wins Honors At Symphony

Russian Pianist Plays His Well-Known Glinka Prize Concerto

Russia's brilliant refugee pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, now almost a full-fledged American, was the bright, particular hero of yesterday's Symphony concert.

S. Rachmaninoff

He shone as both soloist and composer, playing the piano part in his famous C minor Glinka prize concerto, which has been a favorite in Symphony concert halls for many years. He played it in Boston when he first visited this country, but he plays it still more impressively now. It is probably the most popular Rachmaninoff composition in the Symphony repertoire.

It easily led in popular favor at this 22nd matinee. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted enthusiastically, paying due tribute to his famous fellow-countryman.

Arnold Bax's fantastic tone-poem, "The Garden of Fand," which deals with an ancient Irish legend, and Richard Strauss' celebrated but seldom heard composition, "A Hero's Life," are the other numbers on the program. They are both remarkable works, and they were splendidly played, but they aroused no such enthusiasm as rewarded the Rachmaninoff number.

The gaunt and towering Russian pianist was in fine form. He again

---

Traveler
April 18

TOMORROW'S PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky to Conduct Strauss-Wagner Concert

Since the seats for each Boston Symphony series are subscribed for the season, the Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 will offer the only remaining chance for non-subscribers to hear Serge Koussevitzky this season.

This concert includes an array of Wagnerian excerpts—music in which Koussevitzky is considered to be particularly remarkable—and a repetition of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "A Hero Life," which has not been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a number of years. The tone poem describes the vicissitudes and triumphs of the composer's own artistic career, depicting the onslaught of his critics and enemies and reviewing his musical achievements by the quotation of themes from his principal tone poems.

Richard Wagner will be represented at this concert by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried"; the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Clauss Conservatory.)

"POPS"

The serious musical season having come to an abrupt close at the end of next week, the "Pop" concerts will take possession of Symphony Hall. The opening night, always a gala occasion of the "Pops," will take place on Monday evening, May 4, to continue each night through the spring and early summer months. This will be the 40th season of the "Pops" and the ninth under the most popular of "Pops" conductors, Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual large orchestra of Symphony players and programs rich in the most popular numbers of past seasons and sprinkled with interesting novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables, which will cover the floor of Symphony hall, and at the "Pops" bar at the rear of the first balcony.

Rachmaninoff Is Symphony Soloist

Sergei Rachmaninoff was soloist with the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at yesterday afternoon's concert, the first of the 22d pair of concerts of the season.

Rachmaninoff played the solo part in his own piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor. Although Rachmaninoff is often at his best in interpreting his own compositions, it is seldom that he is heard to such good advantage. There was the admirable orchestra to play with and the dynamic Koussevitzky to lead a magnificently clear and vital performance. The pianist's part in it was distinguished by the power with which he delivered his meaning, so that the concerto seemed a personal utterance rather than merely means for display of technical proficiency.

Arnold Bax's "The Garden of Fand" was played for the first time by this orchestra, although not for the first time in Boston, the Chicago symphony orchestra having introduced it during their visit here four years ago. It is music that has caught the fanciful charm of Celtic fairy lore, in its tonal picturization of the island where unhuman revelry is unceasing between the ends of time, where rash mortals are lured to the dance, only to be overwhelmed when the sea rises, bearing Fand and her immortals playfully away on its waves, while the island sinks out of sight.

The Strauss tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), was played for the first time in 15 years by this orchestra. Bostonians have found the combination of Strauss and Koussevitzky to their liking, and were enthusiastic over the stirring performance. Mr. Burgin played the violin solo beautifully.

Globe
April 17

This week brings several notable musical events, a concert by the Boston Symphony in aid of its Pension Fund today, one of the two chances this season for nonsubscribers to hear the orchestra under Koussevitzky; a performance Saturday afternoon at the Boston Opera House of Humperdinck's opera "Hansel and Gretel," the regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the next to the last of the series, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and recitals by Agnes Hope Pillsbury, pianist, and Lilian Prudden, soprano, both heard here before and favorably reviewed in the aud once each.

~~Globe~~
Apr 16

"HELDENLEBEN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss Tone Poem Heard, in Vivid Performance

Richard Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" was the chief number of yesterday's Symphony program. Koussevitzky's performance seemed quite as vivid in its way as that given here three years ago by Willem Mangelberg, to whom the music is dedicated, and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The Boston Symphony has not played this piece since 1910. It was coldly received yesterday by an audience not cordially disposed toward 20th century music.

Rachmaninoff, as soloist, gave a superb performance of his own second concerto, a performance almost eloquent enough to convince one that the music is a work of genius. The only other number on a curious and not too fortunately arranged program was Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand," played here previously only by the Chicago Symphony, which again left little impression.

His enemies will have it that the "hero life" depicted in this tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" is that of Richard Strauss, a theory the copious quotations from Strauss' earlier music in the section describing the hero's experience of the world may or may not support. After all the scraps from "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," and so on, cleverly woven into the polyphonic texture of this tone poem may merely mean that every hero has love affairs, is a bit of a buffoon, and sometimes quixotic; and not that Strauss has these tone poems as trophies of heroism to display.

There is one fundamental and hopeless defect in "Ein Heldenleben," which not all Strauss' prodigious knack at every trick of the composer's trade can mask successfully—the themes are insignificant. Now there can be no great music which is not based upon one or more fine themes, bits of melody which have come to the composer by inspiration or perspiration. He may snatch these themes in full perfection out of the unknown sources of creative imagination. They may just "come to him" as we say. Or he may like Beethoven toil patiently over many revisions of his themes until what was in the first sketch a rather banal bit of tune becomes in about the seventh sketch a supreme creative achievement.

But every great composer in musical history has had this power to create melody as the first essential of his genius. Strauss has shown it in some of the themes in his earlier work, notably one in "Don Juan," and two in "Till," but his creative talent has always been puny compared to his musical craftsmanship.

"Heldenleben" is well made music of the school of Liszt and Berlioz, whose influence one feels strongly in it, more strongly than that of Wagner. But it is essentially mediocre.

Arnold Bax is an English composer nowadays taken with some seriousness by his countrymen, and even by some outside the British Isles. The three tone poems, assorted songs, and piano pieces of his heard in Boston offer to the listener nothing beyond a pretty talent, wilful and undisciplined, for juggling chromatic harmonies, using bits of pseudo-Gaelic folk tunes and being "atmospheric" in the fashion of musical salons just before the war.

It seems preposterous to name Bax in the same breath with composers of real creative power, such as Holst and Elgar. The performance of "The Garden of Fand" was a bit heavy-handed, as though Koussevitzky were warping the fabric of the music in a vain search for profound emotionalism.

Rachmaninoff played his concerto better than one ever remembers hearing him play anything else. For once a listener who has never strongly admired the pianist felt that after all he is a performer to be numbered with the great. Koussevitzky's admirable leadership in the orchestral accompaniment notably aided the performance. There was prolonged enthusiasm on the part of the audience after the concerto, and also, to the obvious and justifiable displeasure of the pianist, between the movements of it.

P. R.

Globe
April 19

Monday night, May 4th, will mark the opening of the 40th season of the "Pop" concerts and the ninth under Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual orchestra of 80 Symphony players. Popular programs in which those old numbers which have the best claim to survival will mingle with notable novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall, and in the "Pop" bar in the lobby of the first balcony. Reservations are already being made for the opening night, always a gala occasion at the "Pops."

SYMPHONY HALL—Today at 3:30—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy, conductor. Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; "Ein Heldenleben," Richard Strauss; "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," "Good Friday Magic" from "Parsifal," overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. There is no soloist.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 19 1925

Season's Farewell to Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Next Tuesday. — "All-Wagner" Programme. — Concerts by Stringed Instrument Players.

Farewells for the season to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in order ~~next Tuesday~~ night, when the new conductor and his men give their fifth and last concert of this year's series in Infantry Hall. It will be an all-Wagner programme and no soloist is scheduled.

This is the order: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin," introduction to act III., "Lohengrin," introduction to act III., "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" (act II.), "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" (act III.), overture to "Tannhauser."

Already the schedule for next year is announced for Providence, the 44th season of the orchestra here, and Mr. Koussevitzky's second. The concerts will be on Tuesday evenings as usual, beginning Nov. 17 and continuing on Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16.

Present subscribers are given until May 15 to notify the management they wish to retain their seats for next season, and prospective subscribers may apply for seats from now on by writing to the manager, W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Koussevitzky is ending his first season with many events and honors. Last Thursday and Friday he led Brahm's Requiem in Boston, members of the orchestra joining forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. A pension fund concert to-day in Boston will have a Strauss-Wagner programme. Mr. Koussevitzky will conclude the season next week with a pair of choral concerts at the regular series.

Advertiser
April 19

PENSION FUND CONCERT TODAY

The pension fund program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon will include excerpts from Wagner's music dramas and Richard Strauss' mighty poem, "A Hero's Life."

The Wagnerian numbers are "The Flying Dutchman" overture, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

ller and Sears.

"POPS" OPENING

Monday night, May 4, will mark the opening of the "Pops" concerts at Symphony Hall. This will be the fortieth season of the "Pops" and the ninth under the conductorship of Agide Jacchia.

SCRANTON
PA.
SCRANTONIAN

APR 19 1925

o o o o

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its ~~New York~~ season with a concert in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky's well known admiration for Scriabin led him to repeat the "Prometheus," placing it second on the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is celebrated in Europe as an interpreter of this music and we may accept his reading as authoritative. He gives the work a brilliant and finished performance, but will probably find American music lovers somewhat slow in rising to his level of faith in the composition.

The other numbers were Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute" (freely arranged), Debussy's "Clouds and Festivals" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The pianist was again Alexander Steinert and the chorus the Cecilia society, of Boston. The audience was large. The eminent Russian finished his first season there as conductor of the Boston organization in high favor. He will be comed if he returns next seas

o o o o

Herald
April 18

SYMPHONY GIVES GARDEN OF FAND

Bax Composition Presented First Time in Boston at 22d Concert

PERFORMANCE IS OF HIGHEST STANDARD

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bax, "The Garden of Fand" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto, No. 2, C minor (Mr. Rachmaninoff, pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Arnold Bax is the most interesting of modern English composers because he is the most romantically poetic. Saying this, one does not forget the haunting music, dripping with melancholy, that Vaughan Williams wrote for "On Wenlock Edge," and other verses from "A Shropshire Lad," but Bax in his symphonic poems, three of which have never been played in Boston, has a higher and more sustained flight of imagination than Vaughan Williams reached in his "London" symphony.

Is Bax of Irish descent? It is certain that he has been mightily influenced by Irish legends, folk lore and the wild western coast of Eirinn. He believes in "the good people"; he has seen the hosting of the Sidhe; he has heard the piping that leads mortal men to joy or destruction.

Writing an argument for "The Garden of Fand" he first tells how the hero Cuchulain fell under the spell of the enchantress, Fand, who dwells on a mysterious island; how his wife, Emer, finally won him back to the world of deeds and battles. And then Bax tells the hearer that this music has no relation to the legend and he relates another story in which Fand, the queen of the sea, holds with her strange companions unceasing revelry on this island, fatal to those tossed by the waves upon the mysterious shore; how voyagers, thrown there by the sea, joined, willingly or unwillingly, in the mad dance and the high feasting. Fand sings to them her intoxicating song of triumphant love. They listen and are lost forever. The sea rises, the island is overwhelmed, the victims sink to the depths, while the immortals, the waves their steeds, ride joyously and laugh at the fate of the intruders. At twilight the watery garden of Fand is no more to be seen.

Did Bax dream this tale or did he find it in some Celtic saga? It matters not. He tells it in beautiful music; music that is not fussily descriptive; music that needs no Baedeker; music that is not merely literary. Were the story not related in program notes, the music would still be enchanting by reason of its wildness, the fury following the calm, the demoniacal intensity of the revelers, the measures that prepare one for the apparition of Fand with the song that maddens with love-yearning.

And so Fand's island is like Prospero's,

"Full of noises,
Sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight, and hurt not."

Mr. Rachmaninoff gave a brilliant been played here several times, at least before yesterday by the composer. The concerto is melodious, at times obviously so, with themes that, in Tchaikovskian vein are now charged with the melancholy that is supposed to be peculiarly Russian, now as they were vodka-inspired. It is a concerto, which, when played as Mr. Rachmaninoff played it, with Mr. Koussevitzky accompanying him admirably, is an exciting work, that makes an instantaneous appeal to an audience. It is not necessary to inquire pryingly into the contents themselves. Mr. Rachmaninoff by his superb performance gave unalloyed pleasure.

We doubt if "Ein Hildenleben," which had not been on a Symphony program since 1910, will be ranked among Strauss's important works, though some of the sections, notably "The Hero's Escape from the World, and Conclusion," are impressive, having emotional depth, being the baring of a soul. No man is perhaps a hero to his valet; but Strauss is evidently a hero to himself. He is autobiographical in this tone poem as in his "Domestic Symphony." There is a certain presumption in asking one to hear musical descriptions of a composer's struggles, his feelings at being adversely criticised by wretched Philistines, who do not appreciate him, his sulking and withdrawal, like Achilles to his tent. And why drag Frau Strauss into the musical story and typify her, capricious, coquettish, by whimsical measures for the violin, even if they are played as well as Mr. Burgin played them yesterday? This tone poem, in spite of the sections just referred to, might be justly entitled "A Poseur's Life," and a blustering poseur at that.

No, the great Strauss will be known by his "Till Eulenspiegel," the scene of recognition in "Elektra," and "Der Rosen Kavalier." The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was of the highest standard.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. No. 425); Prokofieff, Violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Varlaine); Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
APR 18 1925

Thursday evening, April 9, marked the closing concert in the series of Boston Symphony programs at Carnegie Hall. Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky the numbers were a Handel Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D-major for String Orchestra; Scriabin's Prometheus, A Poem of Fire, in which the Orchestra had the assistance of Alexander Lang Steinert at the piano and the Cecilia Society of Boston; Variations on a Theme by Huydn, by Brahms, and for the finale, Polovtsian Dances from Prince Igor, by Borodin, for Orchestra and Chorus. The Handel number was beautifully interpreted with solo bits by R. Burgin and J. Theodorowicz, violinists, and J. Bedetti, cellist. The orchestra gave an excellent account of itself in the Poem of Fire under Mr. Koussevitzky's spirited direction, but the addition of the chorus in this number was hardly a necessary one. The noted conductor was recalled many times at the conclusion of this, the last concert in the current season in New York City.

Traveler
April 18

TOMORROW'S PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky to Conduct Strauss-Wagner Concert

Since the seats for each Boston Symphony series are subscribed for the season, the Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 will offer the only remaining chance for non-subscribers to hear Serge Koussevitzky this season.

This concert includes an array of Wagnerian excerpts—music in which Koussevitzky is considered to be particularly remarkable—and a repetition of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "A Hero Life," which has not been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a number of years. The tone poem describes the vicissitudes and triumphs of the composer's own artistic career, depicting the onslaught of his critics and enemies and reviewing his musical achievements by the quotation of themes from his principal tone poems.

Richard Wagner will be represented at this concert by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried"; the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Clauss Conservatory.)

"POPS"

The serious musical season having come to an abrupt close at the end of next week, the "Pop" concerts will take possession of Symphony Hall. The opening night, always a gala occasion of the "Pops," will take place on Monday evening, May 4, to continue each night through the spring and early summer months. This will be the 40th season of the "Pops" and the ninth under the most popular of "Pops" conductors, Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual large orchestra of Symphony players and programs rich in the most popular numbers of past seasons and sprinkled with interesting novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables, which will cover the floor of Symphony hall, and at the "Pops" bar at the rear of the first balcony.

Rachmaninoff Is Symphony Soloist

Sergei Rachmaninoff was soloist with the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at yesterday afternoon's concert, the first of the 22d pair of concerts of the season.

Rachmaninoff played the solo part in his own piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor. Although Rachmaninoff is often at his best in interpreting his own compositions, it is seldom that he is heard to such good advantage. There was the admirable orchestra to play with and the dynamic Koussevitzky to lead a magnificently clear and vital performance. The pianist's part in it was distinguished by the power with which he delivered his meaning, so that the concerto seemed a personal utterance rather than merely means for display of technical proficiency.

Arnold Bax's "The Garden of Fand" was played for the first time by this orchestra, although not for the first time in Boston, the Chicago symphony orchestra having introduced it during their visit here four years ago. It is music that has caught the fanciful charm of Celtic fairy lore, in its tonal picturization of the island where unhuman revelry is unceasing between the ends of time, where rash mortals are lured to the dance, only to be overwhelmed when the sea rises, bearing Fand and her immortals playfully away on its waves, while the island sinks out of sight.

The Strauss tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), was played for the first time in 15 years by this orchestra. Bostonians have found the combination of Strauss and Koussevitzky to their liking, and were enthusiastic over the stirring performance. Mr. Burgin played the violin solo beautifully.

~~Globe~~

"HELDENLEBEN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss Tone Poem Heard, in Vivid Performance

Apr 16

Richard Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" was the chief number of yesterday's Symphony program. Koussevitzky's performance seemed quite as vivid in its way as that given here three years ago by Willem Mangelberg, to whom the music is dedicated, and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The Boston Symphony has not played this piece since 1910. It was coldly received yesterday by an audience not cordially disposed toward 20th century music.

Rachmaninoff, as soloist, gave a superb performance of his own second concerto, a performance almost eloquent enough to convince one that the music is a work of genius. The only other number on a curious and not too fortunately arranged program was Arnold Bax' "Garden of Fand," played here previously only by the Chicago Symphony, which again left little impression.

His enemies will have it that the "hero life" depicted in this tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" is that of Richard Strauss, a theory the copious quotations from Strauss' earlier music in the section describing the hero's experience of the world may or may not support. After all the scraps from "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," and so on, cleverly woven into the polyphonic texture of this tone poem may merely mean that every hero has love affairs, is a bit of a buffoon, and sometimes quixotic; and not that Strauss has these tone poems as trophies of heroism to display.

There is one fundamental and hopeless defect in "Ein Heldenleben," which not all Strauss' prodigious knack at every trick of the composer's trade can mask successfully—the themes are insignificant. Now there can be no great music which is not based upon one or more fine themes, bits of melody which have come to the composer by inspiration or perspiration. He may snatch these themes in full perfection out of the unknown sources of creative imagination. They may just "come to him" as we say. Or he may like Beethoven toil patiently over many revisions of his themes until what was in the first sketch a rather banal bit of tune becomes in about the seventh sketch a supreme creative achievement.

But every great composer in musical history has had this power to create melody as the first essential of his genius. Strauss has shown it in some of the themes in his earlier work, notably one in "Don Juan," and two in "Till," but his creative talent has always been puny compared to his musical craftsmanship.

"Heldenleben" is well made music of the school of Liszt and Berlioz, whose influence one feels strongly in it, more strongly than that of Wagner. But it is essentially mediocre.

Arnold Bax is an English composer nowadays taken with some seriousness by his countrymen, and even by some outside the British Isles. The three tone poems, assorted songs, and piano pieces of his heard in Boston offer to the listener nothing beyond a pretty talent, wilful and undisciplined, for juggling chromatic harmonies, using bits of pseudo-Gaelic folk tunes and being "atmospheric" in the fashion of musical salons just before the war.

It seems preposterous to name Bax in the same breath with composers of real creative power, such as Holst and Elgar. The performance of "The Garden of Fand" was a bit heavy-handed, as though Koussevitzky were warping the fabric of the music in a vain search for profound emotionalism.

Rachmaninoff played his concerto better than one ever remembers hearing him play anything else. For once a listener who has never strongly admired the pianist felt that after all he is a performer to be numbered with the great. Koussevitzky's admirable leadership in the orchestral accompaniment notably aided the performance. There was prolonged enthusiasm on the part of the audience after the concerto, and also, to the obvious and justifiable displeasure of the pianist, between the movements of it.

P. R.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 19 1925

Season's Farewell to Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Next Tuesday. — "All-Wagner" Programme. — Concerts by Stringed Instrument Players.

Farewells for the season to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in order ~~next Tuesday~~ night, when the new conductor and his men give their fifth and last concert of this year's series in Infantry Hall. It will be an all-Wagner programme and no soloist is scheduled.

This is the order: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin," introduction to act III., "Lohengrin," introduction to act III., "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" (act II.), "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" (act III.), overture to "Tannhauser."

Already the schedule for next year is announced for Providence, the 44th season of the orchestra here, and Mr. Koussevitzky's second. The concerts will be on Tuesday evenings as usual, beginning Nov. 17 and continuing on Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16.

Present subscribers are given until May 15 to notify the management they wish to retain their seats for next season, and prospective subscribers may apply for seats from now on by writing to the manager, W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Koussevitzky is ending his first season with many events and honors. Last Thursday and Friday he led Brahm's Requiem in Boston, members of the orchestra joining forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. A pension fund concert to-day in Boston will have a Strauss-Wagner programme. Mr. Koussevitzky will conclude the season next week with a pair of choral concerts at the regular series.

• • •

Apr 19

PENSION FUND CONCERT TODAY

The pension fund program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon will include excerpts from Wagner's music dramas and Richard Strauss' mighty poem, "A Hero's Life."

The Wagnerian numbers are "The Flying Dutchman" overture, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

'POPS" OPENING

Monday night, May 4, will mark the opening of the "Pops" concerts at Symphony Hall. This will be the fortieth season of the "Pops" and the ninth under the conductorship of Agide Jacchia.

---

transcript
Apr 18

Orchestral

At last it is at hand. Mr. Burgin is ready; Mr. Koussevitzky is eager; a certain curiosity is abroad about "the most difficult violin-piece in existence." Accordingly Prokoviev's Concerto will be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week probably for the first times in America. It is short; it enlists a relatively small orchestra; wherever it has been played of late in Europe, it has stirred debate. Seemingly, there is no middle way either in admiration or in contempt for the music. A Symphony of Mozart in C major (K. 425); Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; the Overture to "Tannhäuser" fill the remainder of the program.

Tomorrow afternoon, in Symphony Hall befalls the second of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its ever-needy and ever-useful pension fund. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct; the band will play—on its mettle. Strauss and Wagner will divide the program: "Ein Heldenleben"; the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the Forest-Music from "Siegfried"; the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal"; the Overture to "Tannhauser."

April 18

N DAILY ADVERTISER

Rachmaninoff Wins Honors At Symphony

Russian Pianist Plays His Well-Known Glinka Prize Concerto

Russia's brilliant refugee pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, now almost a full-fledged American, was the bright, particular hero of yesterday's Symphony concert.

S. Rachmaninoff

He shone as both soloist and composer, playing the piano part in his famous C minor Glinka prize concerto, which has been a favorite in Symphony concert halls for many years. He played it in Boston when he first visited this country, but he plays it still more impressively now. It is probably the most popular Rachmaninoff composition in the Symphony repertoire.

It easily led in popular favor at this 22nd matinee. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted enthusiastically, paying due tribute to his famous fellow-countryman.

Arnold Bax's fantastic tone-poem, "The Garden of Fand," which deals with an ancient Irish legend, and Richard Strauss' celebrated but seldom heard composition, "A Hero's Life," are the other numbers on the program. They are both remarkable works, and they were splendidly played, but they aroused no such enthusiasm as rewarded the Rachmaninoff number.

The gaunt and towering Russian pianist was in fine form. He again

---

Globe
Apr 17

This week brings several notable musical events, a concert by the Boston Symphony in aid of its Pension Fund today, one of the two chances this season for nonsubscribers to hear the orchestra under Koussevitzky; a performance Saturday afternoon at the Boston Opera House of Humperdinck's opera "Hansel and Gretel," the regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the next to the last of the series, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and recitals by Agnes Hope Pillsbury, pianist, and Lilian Prudden, soprano, both heard here before and favorably reviewed in the [illegible]

aud once each.

Monday night, May 4th, will mark the opening of the 40th season of the "Pop" concerts and the ninth under Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual orchestra of 80 Symphony players. Popular programs in which those old numbers which have the best claim to survival will mingle with notable novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall, and in the "Pop" bar in the lobby of the first balcony. Reservations are already being made for the opening night, always a gala occasion at the "Pops."

SYMPHONY HALL—Today at 3:30—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy, conductor. Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; "Ein Heldenleben," Richard Strauss; "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," "Good Friday Magic" from "Parsifal," overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. There is no soloist.

SCRANTON
PA.
SCRANTONIAN
APR 19 1925

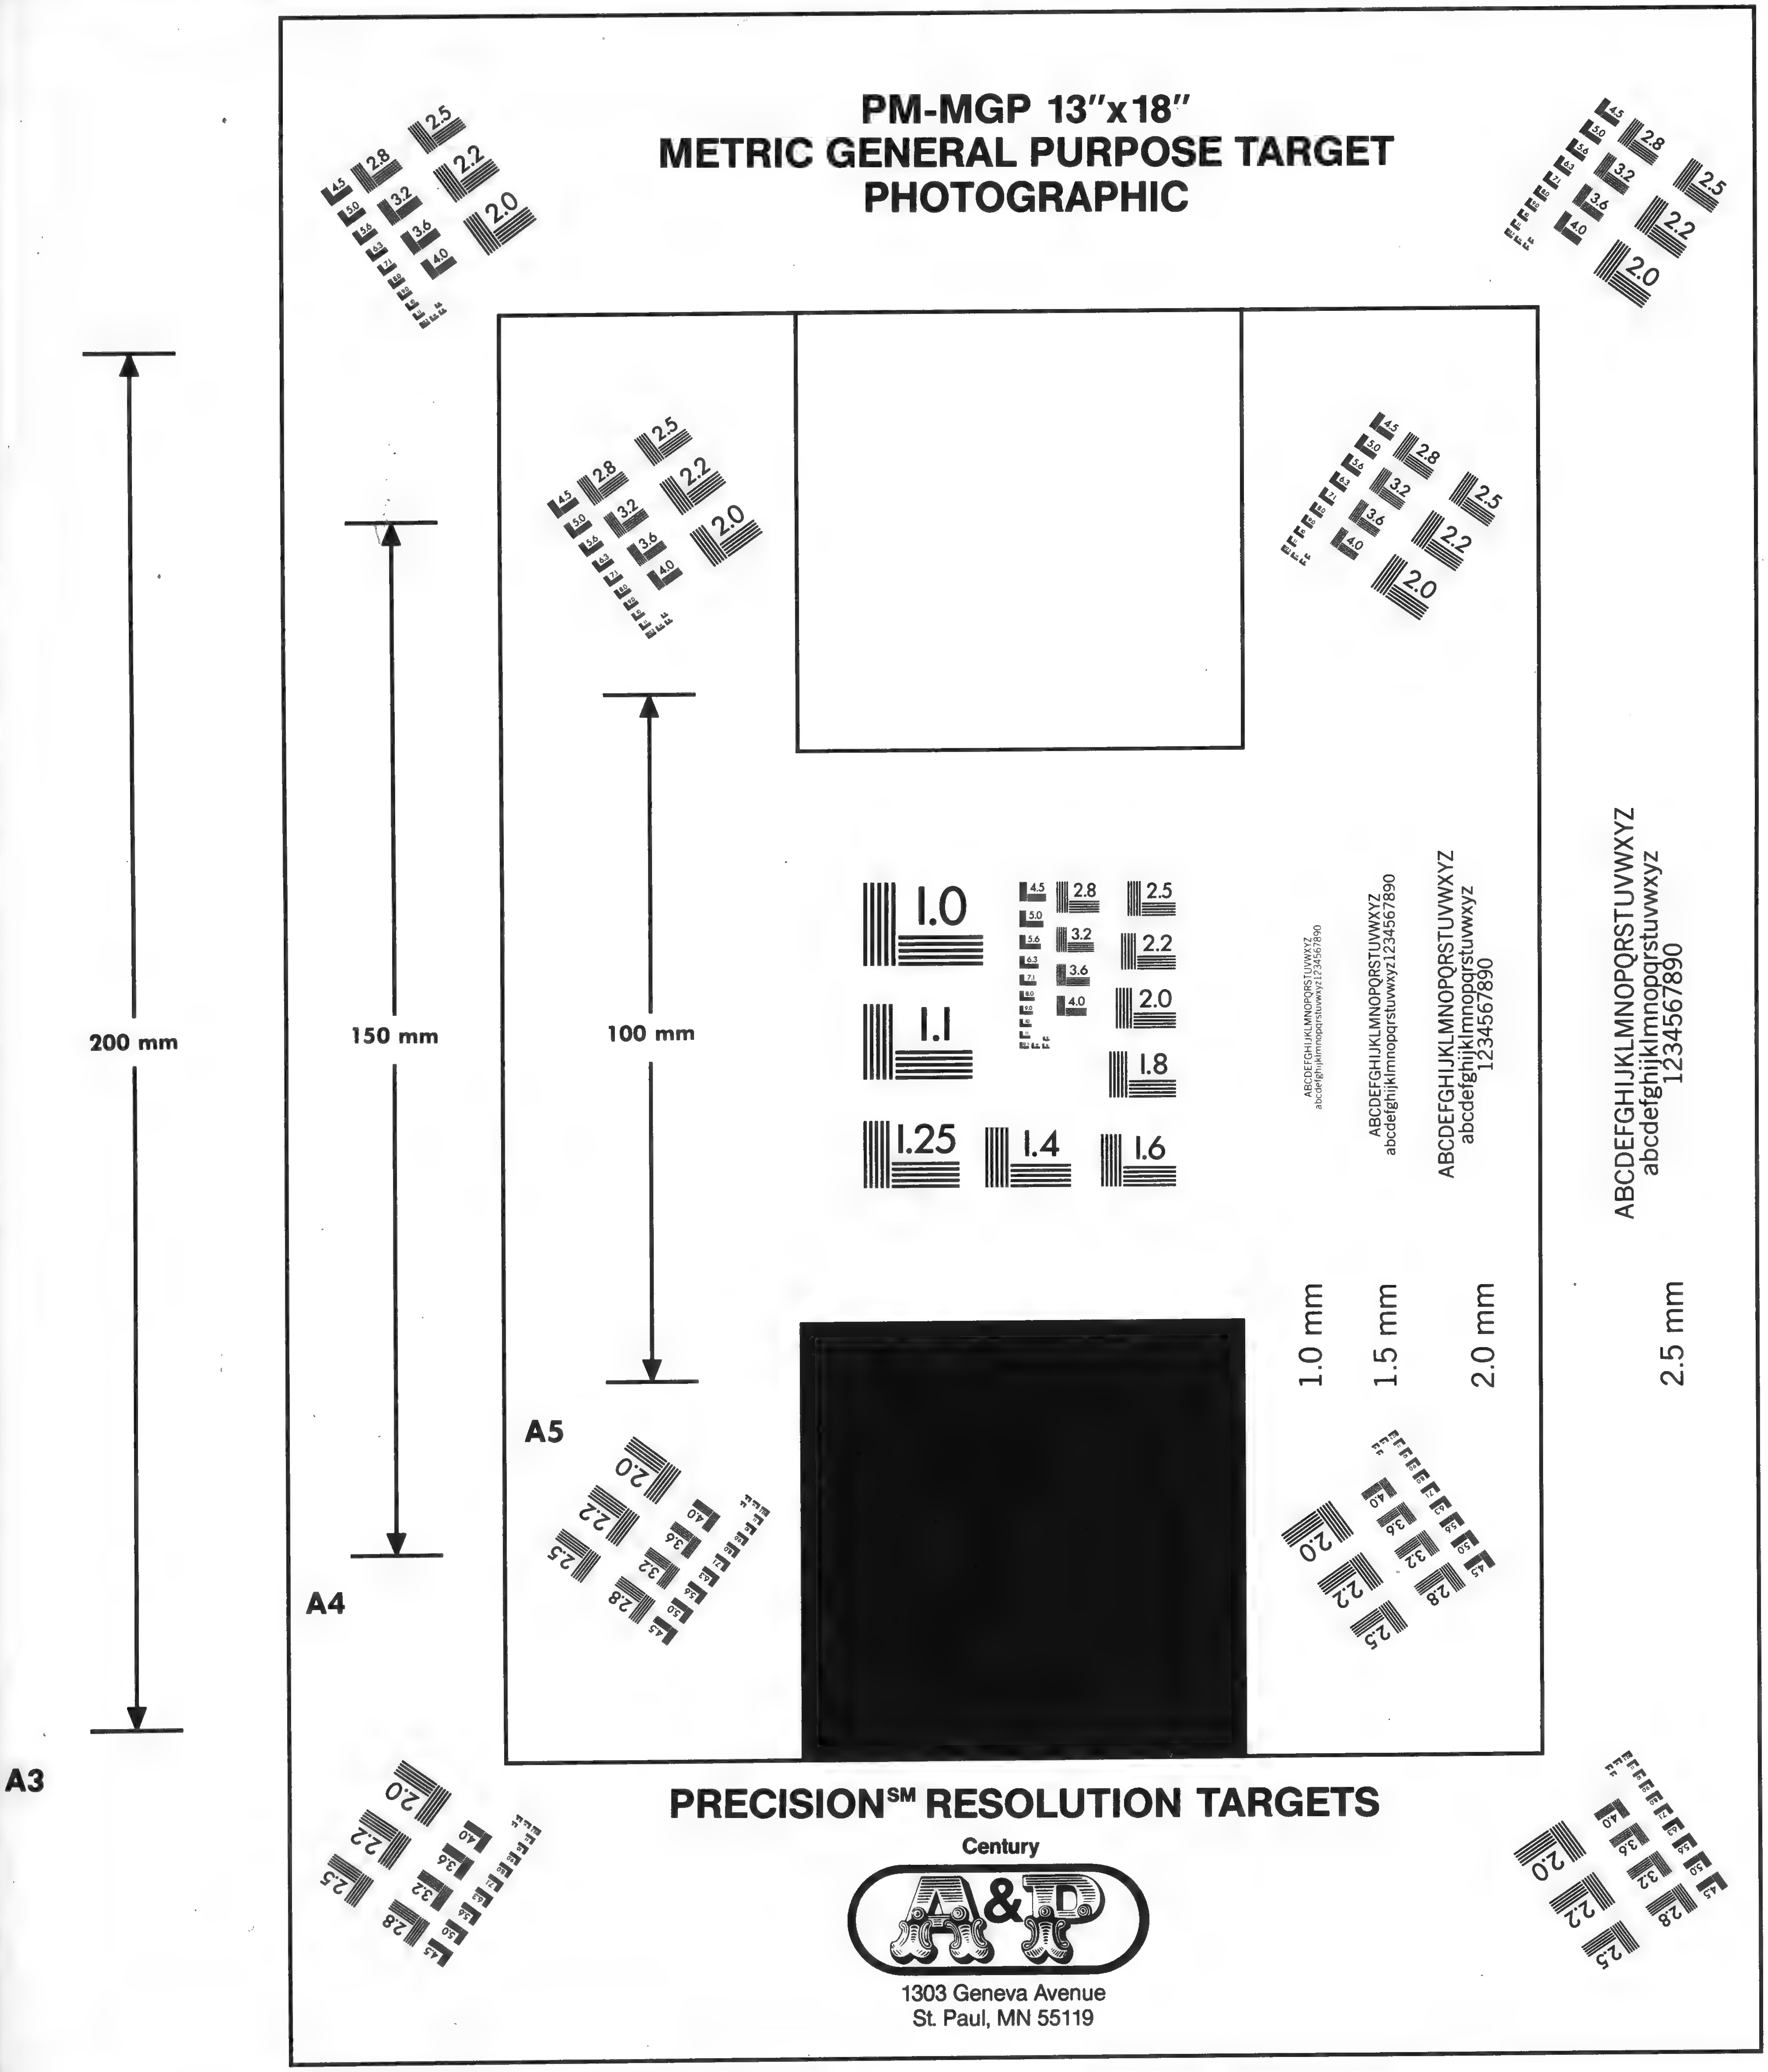
o o o o

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its ~~New York~~ season with a concert in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky's well known admiration for Scriabin led him to repeat the "Prometheus," placing it second on the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is celebrated in Europe as an interpreter of this music and we may accept his reading as authoritative. He gives the work a brilliant and finished performance, but will probably find American music lovers somewhat slow in rising to his level of faith in the composition.

The other numbers were Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute" (freely arranged), Debussy's "Clouds and Festivals" and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances. The pianist was again Alexander Steinert and the chorus the Cecilia society, of Boston. The audience was large. The eminent Russian finished his first season there as conductor of the Boston organization in high favor. He will be welcomed if he returns next season.

o o o o

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

84

Transcript
April 19

Concerts

ALTERED ORCHESTRA, STRAUSS FULL-LADEN, RAKHMANINOV AFRESH

VARIOUSLY GOES THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The String Choir Re-Seated—Bax's Tone-Poem, Out of Irish Legend, for Shimmer and Fantasy—Time, Change, the Pianist and His Concerto—Again "Ein Heldenleben" Reaffirms Its Powers and Glories

SPRING restlessness is upon the conductors. They would re-seat their men. Last Tuesday at the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York, Mr. Stokowski discarded the platforms that had raised the players in the customary tiers; placed them all upon the floor of the stage in Carnegie Hall—and awaited results. To the ears of Mr. Taylor and other reviewers there was none. "The innovation," he reports, "seemed in no wise to affect either the balance or the homogeneity of sound." Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky was also experimentally minded. To the left of the conductor, as the bystander faced the stage, was now arrayed the whole body of violins, firsts and seconds side by side from the edge of the platform inwards. To the right of the conductor sat the violas; beyond and above them the violoncellos and the harps. Of the whole string-choir only the basses kept accustomed place—to the left against the wall. Wood-winds, brass and percussion were likewise at the usual posts.

Again there is no distinctive change to report in the tonal mass. Possibly, the coagulated violins sounded more compactly, resonantly, homogeneously; but only the keenest ears might discover the betterment even in so adeptly scored a music as "Ein Heldenleben." The clearer gain was the economized command of the conductor over the string choir. To signal the violins, he had no longer to swing from left to right and back again; while with a single gesture he gave cue to violas and violoncellos. Years ago, Sir Henry Wood so re-seated the strings of the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, with little more audible result. None the less Mr. Koussevitzky's change was interesting. An innovating conductor is the best of all conductors at such an institution as the Symphony Concerts. Besides, the re-ordered orchestra was matter for gossip in the intermission.

In retrospect, the first half of the concert seems but a clearing of the ground for the revival of Strauss's tone-poem. A fortnight from the close of the season Mr. Koussevitzky has taken thought of the new generation of British composers. Hitherto he has given them only a side-glance when, at the suggestion of Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison he made room last autumn for Mr. Bliss's rough-tongued Concerto for Two Pianos. Yesterday his own choice lighted upon a tone-poem by Mr. Bax, "The Garden of Fand," first played in Boston four years ago by Mr Stock and the Chicago Orchestra en voyage; nearly lost in the shuffle of a program that began with a Symphony of Rakhmaninov and ended with the Prelude to "Tristan." Like many another piece by Mr. Bax, the new tone-poem was born of old Irish legend; swims in the "Celtic haze." This time, however, the haze is less misty than sunlit.

Mr. Bax has dwelt in these western isles and seen the Atlantic when it is a wondrous ocean from Donegal to Skye, from Skye to the northernmost Hebrides. He has looked upon it rain-torn and gale-swept; lapping and leaden under stilled winds and drooping mists. He has known it also in summer breeze and sunshine, myriad-rippled, cupped by the brown cliffs and hillsides, canopied by a heaven as radiant as itself. Upon these wavelets of June, Mr. Bax launches his ship of ancient tale, his music of modern voice. Into the sunset they sail, and sailing, debark upon an isle that is like no land of mortals. There the Lady Fand sings her song of uncanny enticement. There she and her women weave through wanton dances, strange to see and know. Snared of feast and revel and delight are the sons of men—until a great wave comes and the laughter of the immortals is mocking coronach to the dead upon the waters. As in sleep-chasings pass these things, and again it is sunset upon an amethystine sea.

Through this lambent air, through these trailing clouds of fable, Mr. Bax leads his tone-poem; while beneath the sheen and the fantasy, it remains a well-knit, well-favored, self-contained music. The outlines stand clear; from measure to measure unfolds the thematic the melodic progress. There is form for frame to color; body as well as glamour. Less diffuse and [illegible] than in many another piece [illegible] the composer's hand; while it keeps [illegible] skill, a shimmering subtlety [illegible] harmonies and timbres. Motion and [illegible] the sea-picture. If the hearer by [illegible] western ocean, [illegible] through the [illegible] the catastrophe. [illegible] delicate-fingered, tender-[illegible] Bax keeps all the music. The sea-picture glimmers and fades. Gone are these wraiths upon rippled waters. A finely touched poet is Arnold Bax. Not words, but tones, are his winged and wistful speech. To excess, he loves their motion and glamour. Fluid is he and fertile. Beside his book of Celtic legends may also be his volume of Shelley.

Time has not been kind to Mr. Rakhmaninov's Second Concerto in C minor, for Pianoforte with Orchestra, now nearly a quarter-century old. However it may have sounded when he and other pianists were playing it plenteously, it has dwindled into a well-made, conventional, obvious music, saying the expected thing at the foreseen moment in the anticipated way. A displayful Allegro Scherzando ends it. Babes and sucklings of the twentieth-century concert-hall may almost foretell when the songful measures will interrupt the ornate "passage-work"; recapitulate melody; give place to the exercises of virtuosity, swirling at last to climax. The Adagio Sostenuto sings a pretty pianistic song, set in gentle euphonies from the orchestra, bidding the pianist to suave touch and unruffled voice. Workaday fancy, not imagination delving to beauty, invents and conducts it. Patiently ear and mind follow the first movement. The large lines, the broad flow, of the workmanship hold them to the end; but workmanship the music remains. There is no spur to the listener's thought, no fillip to his feeling.

Mr. Rakhmaninov as composer has the knack of making the commonplace seem interesting, the platitudinous sound impressive. Tenfold, as pianist, he multiplies these serviceable powers. Fancy this Concerto played by a roly-poly virtuoso with a smiling mask. It would hardly prevail as it does when the composer himself, massive, sombre and austere, looms above it. With the little grinning fellow, it might even be discovered for the bourgeois music that it really is. The portentous pianist, however, has laid vast hold upon the average American imagination. Upon it, as well as upon the piano, does he also play. It loves "front," besides, and with that useful surface Mr. Rakhmaninov's symphonic music is thickly coated. Four times, was it, that the audience yesterday recalled him? Blessed be the obvious. "It gets there all the same."

Upon the echos of Rakhmaninov across a prolonged intermission sounded the sonorities of Strauss—Strauss of "Ein Heldeleben"; Strauss the imaginer of The Hero's theme, one of the great themes of music to stand beside Beethoven's at the outset of the Fifth Symphony or Chaikovsky's in the first movement of the Concerto in B-flat minor; Strauss of a love-music that is the ecstasy of tones, of the striding, clanging battle-piece, the brooding hush, the calm beatified, upon The Hero's Works of Peace; the exaltation and the splendors of the close. Time and again in the long course of the tone-poem, the Strauss that scales to greatness speaks or sings. In characterizing power and graphic fecundity the theme of The Hero outdoes even the measures flinging Don Juan upon the stage of music and imagination. The "love-scene" that pulses and glows across the "Sinfonia Domestica," slows and pales beside the incandescent rapture of Hero and Helpmate embraced. From the youthful tumults of "Til Eulenspiegel" Strauss goes forward to the far-spreading battle-fresco of "Ein Heldenleben." The trumpets of "Zarathustra" do not deeper rend the skies. Nowhere else does he sound the deep serenities of these Works of Peace: while upon the tones creep the shadows of twilight. Even the dance in "Zarathustra" knows not these tender felicities. The close of "Don Quixote" gains a more piercing beauty; the climax of "Death and Transfiguration" more sweeps and swells; but the end of "Ein Heldenleben" touches plangent majesty. To the heavens upon its own pinions in its ultimate glories, mounts the Hero-Theme. Commanded they open; in celestial calm the music dies. Nowhere has Strauss better sustained a vast and inwrought design; or worked such wonders of polyphony; so arrayed his power and passion of diatonic song. The works of prime, full fraught and full furnished, are "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote"—Strauss at acme before music-drama entered in and possessed him.

Descents there are, but descents that pass in performance and leave but trace in aftermath. The malign music of The Adversaries is losing edge and temper; tends to become, with the clouding years, no more than acrid exercise in instrumental virtuosity. Possibly, the tantalizing Helpmate coquets too long upon the solo-violin, since responsive imaginations do not always teem to the lengthier Strauss. No doubt there is a deal of "paper-music" in the quotations from the earlier tone-poems among the Works of Peace—music that, in the give-and-take of the concert-hall, sounds only for itself, with little or none of this under-suggestion. It was an error of taste, a warp of imagination, in Strauss so to identify himself with The Hero, even for the zest of these prodigies of polyphony. A little the music slackens before it rises at the end out of meditation into majesty. The modernists ply gleefully these weapons of detraction. From Strauss they are in the full tide of scornful reaction. Their merits, which are signal, are not his. Alien to them, professing and practising another gospel are his attributes of greatness. Yet upon "Till" and "Don Juan," upon "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote" they flail their fists in vain.

As the event unexpectedly proved Mr. Koussevitzky did not deepen glories, extenuate errors, cloak shortcomings. He approached "Ein Heldenleben" in April as he had approached "The Rite of Spring" in December—bent upon an over-lyrical, over-softened, appreciably sentimentalized performance. Beauty he courted at the expense of power; less searched than smoothed the music. Within memory the Hero-Theme was more vividly and vigorously outflung upon Bostonian ears. The Adversaries snarled more menacingly (Mr. Koussevitzky, as it seemed would have them stupid rather than sinister.) The Love-Scene beat higher with stark passion, by sentiment unalloyed. The battle-piece more clamored and strode the racked or triumphant air. Only in the serenities of the Works of Peace and the sublimities of the end did Mr. Koussevitzky rise to the full height of Strauss's "great argument." Little, relatively, did these shortcomings mar or cloud. "Ein Heldenleben," like "Le Sacre," is composers'—not conductors'—music.

H. T. P.

AGAIN THE BRAHMS REQUIEM

Harvard Men, Radcliffe Women, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Conductor for Second Time Attract Applauding Audience That Fills Hall

AGAIN last night Symphony Hall was filled, every seat in it, for the second performance of Brahms's German Requiem by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Club and an orchestra gathered from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. Again Mr. Koussevitzky conducted and again the audience listened with rapt delight and applauded with eager vigor. If it were possible to assemble singers and players for a third performance doubtless the hall would for a third time be crowded. For this was a most notable performance of notable music. Only on a few occasions in the course of a usual life span is one privileged to hear such choral singing. These young men and young [illegible] Harvard and Radcliffe [illegible] orchestra [illegible] expressive gesture of [illegible] conductor.

The Brahms of the Requiem is not the Brahms of the four symphonies, nor the Brahms of the Variations, nor the Brahms of the Song of Fate. He wrote this Requiem music from his heart, interested in no experiments, struggling through no barren passages. He used this music merely as the means for expressing his deep emotion, and in it he speaks very comfortably to all them that mourn. Freed from all liturgical restrictions through the use for text simply of quotations from Martin Luther's translation of the Bible, Brahms chose with care only those passages which, though they gave voice to the lament of the heart, turned always to the hope that underlies all grief. And in setting these to music Brahms wrote a strangely unified composition. That is, in handling the vocal parts, both solo and choral, he merely added a few staves to his score and treated the voices as another orchestral color. There is no particular glory to be won by the soloists engaged for the Requiem. But the music is typically that of Brahms. Little characteristics, such as much work for the first violins in the upper positions, and much syncopation, the preponderance of the oboe part, are apparent. Brahms was working with large means and he used them with the natural instinct of his feeling of the moment most effectively.

Only one other piece of Brahms's writing approaches the Requiem in sustained beauty and delicacy. That is the last opus of his published works, a little group of eleven choral preludes for the organ. These are the last writing Brahms did, and the last of these, written just before he died, was prophetically called "O Welt, ich muss dich lassen." In the rare beauty of the soprano solo and chorus beginning "Ye now are sorrowful" the Requiem touches the delicacy and haunting grace of the choral prelude "Es ist ein' Ros' entsprungen."

Miss Ethyl Hayden invested her brief part with a clear, resonant and beautiful tone, admirably controlled. Mr. Boris Saslawsky, again singing the baritone solos, lacked somewhat the resonant quality necessary to make his work stand out against the chorus. As on the previous evening, applause was frequent and sustained, by far the greatest part going to Dr. Davison when he was dragged before the audience by Mr. Koussevitzky.

C. M. S.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 19 1925

Symphony to Play All-Wagner Programme Here Tuesday

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

However much Mr. Koussevitsky may or may not have indulged in all-Wagner programmes before his coming to this country, he has not failed to recognize the American liking for such concerts, or for those in which Wagnerian excerpts preponderate. Thus to-day in Boston, in Symphony Hall, he is conducting at the Second Pension Fund Concert, a programme all from Wagner save for one number, Strauss's "Heldenleben," and in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening he will lead the Boston Orchestra through a programme devoted entirely to the music of Wagner.

Beyond any other composer of opera, Wagner enriched that art form, not always too dignified, with music of truly symphonic quality and character. It follows that, in addition to their overtures, preludes and orchestral introductions, his operas yield many fragments, designed as mere accompaniment, to scene or action, that are of a beauty or an impressiveness that well entitles them to a place in a symphony concert.

Of such excerpts, the programme of next Tuesday evening lists three: "The Ride of the Valkyries," a stirring if none too subtle bit of tone-painting; the poetic "Waldweben," or forest-murmurs, from "Siegfried," and the "Good Friday Music" out of "Parsifal," one of Wagner's rarest pages.

In the "Valkyries' Ride," which makes the introduction to the third act and the first scene in that act in "Die Walkure," Wagner sought to suggest in tone the wild riding upon winged steeds of the nine war-like daughters of Wotan. A sensational and technically stupendous achievement in its day, the "Ride" has perhaps lost with the passing of the years a little of its one-time splendid savagery. But in the opera house it still makes its effect, and he who hears it in the concert-hall may, with no great stretch of the imagination, see in his mind's eye the rugged mountain-peaks, the scudding clouds and the flying warrior-maids.

A compilation of various episodes in the second act of "Siegfried," the "Waldweben" is primarily a tonal setting forth of the forest-scene as Siegfried, wearied by his combat with the Dragon, reclines on a grassy mound. At length there comes the call of the bird from whom he learns of Brunnhilde, asleep on the fire-girt rock. And at the end the music is eloquent of Siegfried's determination to make his way, through whatever obstacles, to his fore-ordained bride.

A quite different scene is that depicted in the "Good Friday Spell." Spent from his long wondering, Parsifal returns to Monsalvat, where stands the Castle of the Holy Grail. Resting there in the spring quietude he is tended by Kundry, once his temptress, now released from her hideous bondage to the magician Klingsor. All nature smiles, and upon Parsifal, Kundry and the aged Gurnemanz, who has come to welcome back the wanderer, is that peace which passeth understanding.

The Wagner who wrote the music of a beauty to fit this scene was a far riper, more skillful composer than the youthful Wagner from whom came the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which heads Mr. Koussevitzky's programme for Tuesday. Yet this earlier music flames with genius, and it bears, too, the imprint of the latter Wagner's revising and revitalizing hand. As yet unequalled in kind is the music of storm that makes the main body of this Overture, while the closing pages give fitting expression to the selfless love of the maiden Senta who, through the sacrifice of her own life, lifts the curse which kept the Hollander upon his phantom ship.

"The Flying Dutchman" was the first of Wagner's genuinely significant works for the stage; "Lohengrin," the forerunner of "Parsifal," was the third. On Tuesday's programme "Lohengrin" is are represented by the Prelude, that would limn the descent to earth of the Holy Grail, borne by angel hands, and by them borne back once more to the heights from whence it came. From the technical standpoint this Prelude is a marvellously wrought crescendo and decrescendo, beginning and ending with ethereal chords of violin-harmonics.

Of quite different mood and manner is the second excerpt from "Lohengrin," the festive Introduction to the third act, that on this programme succeeds to the Prelude. It is the music that ushers in the wedding-procession of Elsa and Lohengrin, and in it is no hint of the unhappy fate so soon to overtake them.

Turn now to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner's only comedy-opera. Of all Wagner's opera none other is so rich in human appeal, and the Introduction to the third act, to be played at this concert, is a musical tribute to the good Hans Sachs, cobbler of Nuremberg, Meistersinger, and withal the idol of his townsfolk. Sachs's kindly nature and his half-melancholy musing upon his unrequited love for charming Eva both are to be felt in this Introduction, and in its course comes, too, the nobly beautiful chorale of homage in which the good folk of Nuremberg proclaim to Sachs their great affection for him.

Chronologically the closing number of this Tuesday's programme, the Overture to "Tannhauser" should stand between the Overtrue to "The Flying Dutchman" and the Prelude to "Lohengrin." [illegible]ly, however, Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen to make of it a brilliant finale. Undoubtedly the most widely liked of all Wagner's orchestral pieces, the "Tannhauser" Overture symbolizes the struggle between good and evil, with the ultimate and complete triumph of the good. Musically, the chief ingredients in this Overture are the broadly melodious Pilgrims' Chorus and the riotous, seductive music of the Hill of Venus, whereon Tannhauser yielded himself to unholy enjoyments.

This "Tannhauser" Overture is nearing its centenary. Yet to-day few pages in orchestral literature can match its brilliance, or the splendid power of its peroration.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

APR 19 1925

next fall.

# #

The music has not all been of a sacred character. Zoussewitsky and his Boston band said goodbye until next season with a program that intrigued people of varied tastes. The fragile, plaintive Respighi arrangements of four old dances and airs for the lute, by Italian composers of the 16th century, and the crepuscular loveliness of Debussy's "Nocturnes" contrasted strikingly with Scriabin's "Prometheus" and Borodin's gorgeously colorful "Polovtsian Dances," from Prince Igor, both of which had the assistance of the St. Cecilia society of Boston. Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," was the piece de resistance. That was what filled the house, and no one discussed anything else. Mr. Zoussewitsky performed the work in Moscow in 1911, when the composer played the piano part, played here by Alexander Steinert. Modest Altschuler gave it here with the Russian Symphony orchestra in 1915, at which time a "clavier a lumieres" was used, according to the intention of Scriabin, who was Altschuler's friend. Scriabin, who grew more mystical as time went on, wanted this work to be accompanied by a symphony of color rays synchronizing with the music, certain notes representing certain colors.

The "clavier a lumieres," which he invented, was a keyboard instrument by means of which colored light could be thrown on a screen—a forerunner of the astounding clavilux, which is now opening up a new field of art. "Prometheus," a work of the later Scriabin, transcends his hymn to art, his divine poem and his poem of ecstacy, but, according to Dr. Eaglefield Hall, the composer, at the time of his death, was projecting a work called "Mystery," which would have gone faster still, and combined sound, color movement and odor. It is impossible to discuss "Prometheus" after one hearing. I found it all interesting, much of it radiant, luminous; more of it hard to understand—perhaps more so than if one knew nothing at all about it. It is an obstacle to simple listening to be told that a composition is based on a mystic chord built up by fourths. Complexity is there, and tumult and terrible energy, ending with a tremendous climax which taxed the resources of the orchestra, raised the heavens and expanded the horizon, and I found myself trying to recapture its palpitating beauty, as we strain to remember a vanishing dream.

Herald
April 17

"POP" CONCERTS TO OPEN MAY 4

Monday night, May 4, will mark the expiration of the musical season in Boston and the opening of the season of "Pop" concerts, at Symphony hall, in which music of lighter vein holds complete musical sway in these parts during the spring and early summer. This will be the 40th season of the "Pop" concerts and the ninth under their most popular of leaders, Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual orchestra of 80 Symphony players. Popular programs, in which those old numbers which have the best claim to survival, will be found with notable novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables, which will cover the floor of Symphony hall, and in the "Pop" bar in the lobby of the first balcony. Reservations are already being made for the opening night, always a gala ocasion at the "Pops."

Globe
April 19

Those who have not already put their names on the waiting list for subscription tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts next season must do so at once to have any chance of securing seats if they are not among the present subscribers. Each subscriber has the right to re-engage the same seats he now occupies, within a stated time, and only a comparatively small number are at all likely to give up their present seats. This year all tickets for every series in Boston were subscribed

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 23d program. Symphony in C major (K 425), Mozart; violin concerto, Prokofiev; "La Bonne Chanson," Loeffler; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. Soloist, Richard Burgin.

STAR

Tucson Ariz

APR 19 1925

BOSTON.—The first performance here of Scriabin's Prometheus was given last week by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with the assistance of the Cecilia Society, directed by Malcolm Lang. Alexander Lang played the piano part.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 19 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An all Wagner program will be the occasion of a farewell appearance here of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new conductor, Serge Kousevitzy, in a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15.

Koussevitzky has been particularly praised for his stirring readings of Wagnerian music and a particular musical treat is expected in the fine array of excerpts from the music drama of the great master. There will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to the first act (Holy Grail music), and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin;" the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (contemplative music of Hans Sachs, the shoe maker); The Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" in which the winged horses of the warrior goddesses gallop through the sky; "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried" in which the sounds of the woods and bird calls are heard; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and to close the season, the overture to "Tannhauser."

Several notable events will mark the close of Koussevitzky's season in Boston. Brams' Requiem was performed there last Thursday and Friday under his baton with great success, members of the orchestra joining forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. A pension fund concert with a Strauss-Wagner program is scheduled for to-day, and a pair of final choral concerts at the close of the season next week.

84

Transcript April 19

Concerts

ALTERED ORCHESTRA, STRAUSS FULL-LADEN, RAKHMANINOV AFRESH

VARIOUSLY GOES THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The String Choir Re-Seated—Bax's Tone-Poem, Out of Irish Legend, for Shimmer and Fantasy—Time, Change, the Pianist and His Concerto—Again "Ein Heldenleben" Reaffirms Its Powers and Glories

SPRING restlessness is upon the conductors. They would re-seat their men. Last Tuesday at the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York, Mr. Stokowski discarded the platforms that had raised the players in the customary tiers; placed them all upon the floor of the stage in Carnegie Hall—and awaited results. To the ears of Mr. Taylor and other reviewers there was none. "The innovation," he reports, "seemed in no wise to affect either the balance or the homogeneity of sound." Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky was also experimentally minded. To the left of the conductor, as the bystander faced the stage, was now arrayed the whole body of violins, firsts and seconds side by side from the edge of the platform inwards. To the right of the conductor sat the violas; beyond and above them the violoncellos and the harps. Of the whole string-choir only the basses kept accustomed place—to the left against the wall. Wood-winds, brass and percussion were likewise at the usual posts.

Again there is no distinctive change to report in the tonal mass. Possibly, the coagulated violins sounded more compactly, resonantly, homogeneously; but only the keenest ears might discover the betterment even in so adeptly scored a music as "Ein Heldenleben." The clearer gain was the economized command of the conductor over the string choir. To signal the violins, he had no longer to swing from left to right and back again; while with a single gesture he gave cue to violas and violoncellos. Years ago, Sir Henry Wood so re-seated the strings of the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, with little more audible result. None the less Mr. Koussevitzky's change was interesting. An innovating conductor is the best of all conductors at such an institution as the Symphony Concerts. Besides, the re-ordered orchestra was matter for gossip in the intermission.

In retrospect, the first half of the concert seems but a clearing of the ground for the revival of Strauss's tone-poem. A fortnight from the close of the season Mr. Koussevitzky has taken thought of the new generation of British composers. Hitherto he has given them only a side-glance when, at the suggestion of Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison he made room last autumn for Mr. Bliss's rough-tongued Concerto for Two Pianos. Yesterday his own choice lighted upon a tone-poem by Mr. Bax, "The Garden of Fand," first played in Boston four years ago by Mr Stock and the Chicago Orchestra en voyage; nearly lost in the shuffle of a program that began with a Symphony of Rakhmaninov and ended with the Prelude to "Tristan." Like many another piece by Mr. Bax, the new tone-poem was born of old Irish legend; swims in the "Celtic haze." This time, however, the haze is less misty than sunlit.

Mr. Bax has dwelt in these western isles and seen the Atlantic when it is a wondrous ocean from Donegal to Skye, from Skye to the northernmost Hebrides. He has looked upon it rain-torn and gale-swept; lapping and leaden under stilled winds and drooping mists. He has known it also in summer breeze and sunshine, myriad-rippled, cupped by the brown cliffs and hillsides, canopied by a heaven as radiant as itself. Upon these wavelets of June, Mr. Bax launches his ship of ancient tale, his music of modern voice. Into the sunset they sail, and sailing, debark upon an isle that is like no land of mortals. There the Lady Fand sings her song of uncanny enticement. There she and her women weave through wanton dances, strange to see and know. Snared of feast and revel and delight are the sons of men—until a great wave comes and the laughter of the immortals is mocking coronach to the dead upon the waters. As in sleep-chasings pass these things, and again it is sunset upon an amethystine sea.

Through this lambent air, through these trailing clouds of fable, Mr. Bax leads his tone-poem; while beneath the sheen and the fantasy, it remains a well-knit well-favored, self-contained music. The outlines stand clear; from measure to measure unfolds the thematic the melodic progress. There is form for frame to color; body as well as glamour. Les diffuse and rambling than in many another piece from the composer's hand; while it keeps [illegible]ation, skill, a shimmering subtlety [illegible]rmonies and timbres. Motion and [illegible] the sea-picture. If the hearer by [illegible] western ocean, it [illegible] through th[illegible] the c[illegible]tastrophe. [illegible] find [illegible] delicate-fingered, tender[illegible] Bax keeps all the music The sea-picture glimmers and fades. Gone are these wraiths upon rippled waters A finely touched poet is Arnold Bax. Not words, but tones, are his winged and wistful speech. To excess, he loves their motion and glamour. Fluid is he and fertile. Beside his book of Celtic legends may also be his volume of Shelley.

Time has not been kind to Mr. Rakhmaninov's Second Concerto in C minor, for Pianoforte with Orchestra, now nearly a quarter-century old. However it may have sounded when he and other pianists were playing it plenteously, it has dwindled into a well-made conventional, obvious music, saying the expected thing at the foreseen moment in the anticipated way. A displayful Allegro Scherzando ends it. Babes and sucklings of the twentieth-century concert-hall may almost foretell when the songful measures will interrupt the ornate "passage-work"; recapitulate melody; give place to the exercises of virtuosity, swirling at last to climax. The Adagio Sostenuto sings a pretty pianistic song, set in gentle euphonies from the orchestra, bidding the pianist to suave touch and unruffled voice. Workaday fancy, not imagination delving to beauty, invents and conducts it. Patiently ear and mind follow the first movement. The large lines, the broad flow, of the workmanship hold them to the end; but workmanship the music remains. There is no spur to the listener's thought, no fillip to his feeling.

Mr. Rakhmaninov as composer has the knack of making the commonplace seem interesting, the platitudinous sound impressive. Tenfold, as pianist, he multiplies these serviceable powers. Fancy this Concerto played by a roly-poly virtuoso with a smiling mask. It would hardly prevail as it does when the composer himself, massive, sombre and austere, looms above it. With the little grinning fellow, it might even be discovered for the bourgeois music that it really is. The portentous pianist, however, has laid vast hold upon the average American imagination. Upon it, as well as upon the piano, does he also play. It loves "front," besides, and with that useful surface Mr. Rakhmaninov's symphonic music is thickly coated. Four times, was it, that the audience yesterday recalled him? Blessed be the obvious. "It gets there all the same."

Upon the echos of Rakhmaninov across a prolonged intermission sounded the sonorities of Strauss—Strauss of "Ein Heldeleben"; Strauss the imaginer of The Hero's theme, one of the great themes of music to stand beside Beethoven's at the outset of the Fifth Symphony or Chaikovsky's in the first movement of the Concerto in B-flat minor; Strauss of a love-music that is the ecstasy of tones, of the striding, clanging battle-piece, the brooding hush, the calm beatified, upon The Hero's Works of Peace; the exaltation and the splendors of the close. Time and again in the long course of the tone-poem, the Strauss that scales to greatness speaks or sings. In characterizing power and graphic fecundity the theme of The Hero outdoes even the measures flinging Don Juan upon the stage of music and imagination. The "love-scene" that pulses and glows across the "Sinfonia Domestica," slows and pales beside the incandescent rapture of Hero and Helpmate embraced. From the youthful tumults of "Til Eulenspiegel" Strauss goes forward to the far-spreading battle-fresco of "Ein Heldenleben." The trumpets of "Zarathustra" do not deeper rend the skies. Nowhere else does he sound the deep serenities of these Works of Peace: while upon the tones creep the shadows of twilight. Even the dance in "Zarathustra" knows not these tender felicities. The close of "Don Quixote" gains a more piercing beauty; the climax of "Death and Transfiguration" more sweeps and swells; but the end of "Ein Heldenleben" touches plangent majesty. To the heavens upon its own pinions in its ultimate glories, mounts the Hero-Theme. Commanded they open; in celestial calm the music dies. Nowhere has Strauss better sustained a vast and inwrought design; or worked such wonders of polyphony; so arrayed his power and passion of diatonic song. The works of prime, full fraught and full furnished, are "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote"—Strauss at acme before music-drama entered in and possessed him.

Descents there are, but descents that pass in performance and leave but trace in aftermath. The malign music of The Adversaries is losing edge and temper; tends to become, with the clouding years, no more than acrid exercise in instrumental virtuosity. Possibly, the tantalizing Helpmate coquets too long upon the solo-violin, since responsive imaginations do not always teem to the lengthier Strauss. No doubt there is a deal of "paper-music" in the quotations from the earlier tone-poems among the Works of Peace—music that, in the give-and-take of the concert-hall, sounds only for itself, with little or none of this under-suggestion. It was an error of taste, a warp of imagination, in Strauss so to identify himself with The Hero, even for the zest of these prodigies of polyphony A little the music slackens before it rises at the end out of meditation into majesty. The modernists ply gleefully these weapons of detraction. From Strauss they are in the full tide of scornful reaction. Their merits, which are signal, are not his. Alien to them, professing and practising another gospel are his attributes of greatness. Yet upon "Till" and "Don Juan," upon "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote" they flail their fists in vain.

As the event unexpectedly proved Mr. Koussevitzky did not deepen glories, extenuate errors, cloak shortcomings. He approached "Ein Heldenleben" in April as he had approached "The Rite of Spring" in December—bent upon an over-lyrical, oversoftened, appreciably sentimentalized performance. Beauty he courted at the expense of power; less searched than smoothed the music. Within memory the Hero-Theme was more vividly and vigorously outflung upon Bostonian ears. The Adversaries snarled more menacingly (Mr. Koussevitzky, as it seemed would have them stupid rather than sinister.) The Love-Scene beat higher with stark passion, by sentiment unalloyed. The battle-piece more clamored and strode the racked or triumphant air. Only in the serenities of the Works of Peace and the sublimities of the end did Mr. Koussevitzky rise to the full height of Strauss's "great argument." Little, relatively, did these shortcomings mar or cloud. "Ein Heldenleben," like "Le Sacre," is composers'—not conductors'—music.

H. T. P.

AGAIN THE BRAHMS REQUIEM

Harvard Men, Radcliffe Women, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Conductor for Second Time Attract Applauding Audience That Fills Hall

AGAIN last night Symphony Hall was filled, every seat in it, for the second performance of Brahms's German Requiem by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Club and an orchestra gathered from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. Again Mr. Koussevitzky conducted and again the audience listened with rapt delight and applauded with eager vigor. If it were possible to assem[illegible] singers and players for a third performan[illegible] doubtless the hall would for a third tim[illegible] be crowded. For this was a most notable performance of notable music. Only on a few occasions in the course of a usual life span is one privileged to hear such choral singing. These young men and young [illegible] Harvard and Radcliffe [illegible]estra [illegible]ve or expressive gesture of [illegible]tor.

The Brahms of the Requiem is not the Brahms of the four symphonies, nor the Brahms of the Variations, nor the Brahms of the Song of Fate. He wrote this Requiem music from his heart, interested in no experiments, struggling through no barren passages. He used this music merely as the means for expressing his deep emotion, and in it he speaks very comfortably to all them that mourn. Freed from all liturgical restrictions through the use for text simply of quotations from Martin Luther's translation of the Bible, Brahms chose with care only those passages which, though they gave voice to the lament of the heart, turned always to the hope that underlies all grief. And in setting these to music Brahms wrote a strangely unified composition. That is, in handling the vocal parts, both solo and choral, he merely added a few staves to his score and treated the voices as another orchestral color. There is no particular glory to be won by the soloists engaged for the Requiem. But the music is typically that of Brahms. Little characteristics, such as much work for the first violins in the upper positions, and much syncopation, the preponderance of the oboe part, are apparent. Brahms was working with large means and he used them with the natural instinct of his feeling of the moment most effectively.

Only one other piece of Brahms's writing approaches the Requiem in sustained beauty and delicacy. That is the last opus of his published works, a little group of eleven choral preludes for the organ. These are the last writing Brahms did, and the last of these, written just before he died, was prophetically called "O Welt, ich muss dich lassen." In the rare beauty of the soprano solo and chorus beginning "Ye now are sorrowful" the Requiem touches the delicacy and haunting grace of the choral prelude "Es ist ein' Ros' entsprungen."

Miss Ethyl Hayden invested her brief part with a clear, resonant and beautiful tone, admirably controlled. Mr. Boris Saslawsky, again singing the baritone solos, lacked somewhat the resonant quality necessary to make his work stand out against the chorus. As on the previous evening, applause was frequent and sustained, by far the greatest part going to Dr. Davison when he was dragged before the audience by Mr. Koussevitzky.

C. M. S.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 19 1925

Symphony to Play All-Wagner Programme Here Tuesday

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

However much Mr. Koussevitsky may or may not have indulged in all-Wagner programmes before his coming to this country, he has not failed to recognize the American liking for such concerts, or for those in which Wagnerian excerpts preponderate. Thus to-day in Boston, in Symphony Hall, he is conducting at the Second Pension Fund Concert, a programme all from Wagner save for one number, Strauss's "Heldenleben," and in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening he will lead the Boston Orchestra through a programme devoted entirely to the music of Wagner.

Beyond any other composer of opera, Wagner enriched that art form, not always too dignified, with music of truly symphonic quality and character. It follows that, in addition to their overtures, preludes and orchestral introductions, his operas yield many fragments, designed as mere accompaniment, to scene or action, that are of a beauty or an impressiveness that well entitles them to a place in a symphony concert.

Of such excerpts, the programme of next Tuesday evening lists three: "The Ride of the Valkyries," a stirring if none too subtle bit of tone-painting; the poetic "Waldweben," or forest-murmurs, from "Siegfried," and the "Good Friday Music" out of "Parsifal," one of Wagner's rarest pages.

In the "Valkyries' Ride," which makes the introduction to the third act and the first scene in that act in "Die Walkure," Wagner sought to suggest in tone the wild riding upon winged steeds of the nine war-like daughters of Wotan. A sensational and technically stupendous achievement in its day, the "Ride" has perhaps lost with the passing of the years a little of its one-time splendid savagery. But in the opera house it still makes its effect, and he who hears it in the concert-hall may, with no great stretch of the imagination, see in his mind's eye the rugged mountain-peaks, the scudding clouds and the flying warrior-maids.

A compilation of various episodes in the second act of "Siegfried," the "Waldweben" is primarily a tonal setting forth of the forest-scene as Siegfried, wearied by his combat with the Dragon, reclines on a grassy mound. At length there comes the call of the bird from whom he learns of Brunnhilde, asleep on the fire-girt rock And at the end the music is eloquent of Siegfried's determination to make his way, through whatever obstacles, to his fore-ordained bride.

A quite different scene is that depicted in the "Good Friday Spell." Spent from his long wondering, Parsifal returns to Monsalvat, where stands the Castle of the Holy Grail. Resting there in the spring quietude he is tended by Kundry, once his temptress, now released from her hideous bondage to the magician Klingsor. All nature smiles, and upon Parsifal, Kundry and the aged Gurnemanz, who has come to welcome back the wanderer, is that peace which passeth understanding.

The Wagner who wrote the music of a beauty to fit this scene was a far riper, more skillful composer than the youthful Wagner from whom came the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which heads Mr. Koussevitzky's programme for Tuesday. Yet this earlier music flames with genius, and it bears, too, the imprint of the latter Wagner's revising and revitalizing hand. As yet unequalled in kind is the music of storm that makes the main body of this Overture, while the closing pages give fitting expression to the selfless love of the maiden Senta who, through the sacrifice of her own life, lifts the curse which kept the Hollander upon his phantom ship.

"The Flying Dutchman" was the first of Wagner's genuinely significant works for the stage; "Lohengrin," the forerunner of "Parsifal," was the third. On Tuesday's programme "Lohengrin" is are represented by the Prelude, that would limn the descent to earth of the Holy Grail, borne by angel hands, and by them borne back once more to the heights from whence it came. From the technical standpoint this Prelude is a marvellously wrought crescendo and decrescendo, beginning and ending with ethereal chords of violin-harmonics

Of quite different mood and manner is the second excerpt from "Lohengrin," the festive Introduction to the third act, that on this programme succeeds to the Prelude. It is the music that ushers in the wedding-procession of Elsa and Lohengrin, and in it is no hint of the unhappy fate so soon to overtake them.

Turn now to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner's only comedy-opera. Of all Wagner's opera none other is so rich in huma[illegible] appeal, and the Introduction to the thi[illegible] act, to be played at this concert, is musical tribute to the good Hans Sa[illegible] cobbler of Nuremberg, Meistersinger, withal the idol of his townsfolk. Sa[illegible] kindly nature and his half-melan[illegible] musing upon his unrequited love fo[illegible] charming Eva both are to be felt in this Introduction, and in its course comes, too, the nobly beautiful chorale of homage in which the good folk of Nuremberg proclaim to Sachs their great affection for him.

Chronologically the closing number of this Tuesday's programme, the Overture to "Tannhauser" should stand between the Overtrue to "The Flying Dutchman" and the Prelude to "Lohengrin." Wisely, however, Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen to make of it a brilliant finale. Undoubtedly the most widely liked of all Wagner's orchestral pieces, the "Tannhauser" Overture symbolizes the struggle between good and evil, with the ultimate and complete triumph of the good. Musically, the chief ingredients in this Overture [illegible] broadly melodious Pilgrims' Chorus [illegible] the riotous, seductive music of the [illegible] Venus, whereon Tannhauser yields himself to unholy enjoyments.

This "Tannhauser" Overture is [illegible] nearing its centenary. Yet to-day [illegible] pages in orchestral literature can [illegible] its brilliance, or the splendid power [illegible] peroration.

STAR

APR 19 1925

BOSTON.—The first performance here of Scriabin's Prometheus was given last week by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with the assistance of the Cecilia Society, directed by Malcolm Lang. Alexander Lang played the piano part.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

APR 19 1925

* * *

The music has not all been of a sacred character. Zoussewitsky and his Boston band said goodbye until next season with a program that intrigued people of varied tastes. The fragile, plaintive Respighi arrangements of four old dances and airs for the lute, by Italian composers of the 16th century, and the crepuscular loveliness of Debussy's "Nocturnes" contrasted strikingly with Scriabin's "Prometheus" and Borodin's gorgeously colorful "Polovtsian Dances," from Prince Igor, both of which had the assistance of the St. Cecilia society of Boston. Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," was the piece de resistance. That was what filled the house, and no one discussed anything else. Mr. Zoussewitsky performed the work in Moscow in 1911, when the composer played the piano part, played here by Alexander Steinert. Modest Altschuler gave it here with the Russian Symphony orchestra in 1915, at which time a "clavier a lumieres" was used, according to the intention of Scriabin, who was Altschuler's friend. Scriabin, who grew more mystical as time went on, wanted this work to be accompanied by a symphony of color rays synchronizing with the music, certain notes representing certain colors.

The "clavier a lumieres," which he invented, was a keyboard instrument by means of which colored light could be thrown on a screen—a forerunner of the astounding clavilux, which is now opening up a new field of art. "Prometheus," a work of the later Scriabin, transcends his hymn to art, his divine poem and his poem of ecstacy, but, according to Dr. Eaglefield Hull, the composer, at the time of his death, was projecting a work called "Mystery," which would have gone faster still, and combined sound, color movement and odor. It is impossible to discuss "Prometheus" after one hearing. I found it all interesting, much of it radiant, luminous; more of it hard to understand—perhaps more so than if one knew nothing at all about it. It is an obstacle to simple listening to be told that a composition is based on a mystic chord built up by fourths, Complexity is there, and tumult and terrible energy, ending with a tremendous climax which taxed the resources of the orchestra, raised the heavens and expanded the horizon, and I found myself trying to recapture its palpitating beauty, as we strain to remember a vanishing dream.

[illegible] 17

"POP" CONCERTS TO OPEN MAY 4

Monday night, May 4, will mark the expiration of the musical season in Boston and the opening of the season of "Pop" concerts, at Symphony hall, in which music of lighter vein holds complete musical sway in these parts during the spring and early summer. This will be the 40th season of the "Pop" concerts and the ninth under their most popular of leaders, Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual orchestra of 80 Symphony players. Popular programs, in which those old numbers which have the best claim to survival, will be found with notable novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables, which will cover the floor of Symphony hall, and in the "Pop" bar in the lobby of the first balcony. Reservations are already being made for the opening night, always a gala ocasion at the "Pops."

[illegible] Apr 17

Those who have not already put their names on the waiting list for subscription tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts next season must do so at once to have any chance of securing seats if they are not among the present subscribers. Each subscriber has the right to re-engage the same seats he now occupies, within a stated time, and only a comparatively small number are at all likely to give up their present seats. This year all tickets for every series in Boston were subscribed

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 23d program. Symphony in C major (K 425), Mozart; violin concerto, Prokofiev; "La Bonne Chanson," Loeffler; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. Soloist, Richard Burgin.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 19 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An all Wagner program will be the occasion of a farewell appearance here of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, in a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15.

Koussevitzky has been particularly praised for his stirring readings of Wagnerian music and a particular musical treat is expected in the fine array of excerpts from the music drama of the great master. There will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to the first act (Holy Grail music), and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin;" the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (contemplative music of Hans Sachs, the shoe maker); The Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" in which the winged horses of the warrior goddesses gallop through the sky; "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried" in which the sounds of the woods and bird calls are heard; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and to close the season, the overture to "Tannhauser."

Several notable events will mark the close of Koussevitzky's season in Boston. Brams' Requiem was performe[illegible] there last Thursday and Friday unde[illegible] his baton with great success, membe[illegible] of the orchestra joining forces with t[illegible] Harvard Glee Club and the Radcli[illegible] Choral Society. A pension fund concer[illegible] with a Strauss-Wagner program [illegible] scheduled for to-day, and a pair of fina[illegible] choral concerts at the close of the sea[illegible]son next week.

84

Transcript
April 19

Concerts

ALTERED ORCHESTRA, STRAUSS FULL-LADEN, RAKHMANINOV AFRESH

VARIOUSLY GOES THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The String Choir Re-Seated—Bax's Tone-Poem, Out of Irish Legend, for Shimmer and Fantasy—Time, Change, the Pianist and His Concerto—Again "Ein Heldenleben" Reaffirms Its Powers and Glories

SPRING restlessness is upon the conductors. They would re-seat their men. Last Tuesday at the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York, Mr. Stokowski discarded the platforms that had raised the players in the customary tiers; placed them all upon the floor of the stage in Carnegie Hall—and awaited results. To the ears of Mr. Taylor and other reviewers there was none. "The innovation," he reports, "seemed in no wise to affect either the balance or the homogeneity of sound." Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky was also experimentally minded. To the left of the conductor, as the bystander faced the stage, was now arrayed the whole body of violins, firsts and seconds side by side from the edge of the platform inwards. To the right of the conductor sat the violas; beyond and above them the violoncellos and the harps. Of the whole string-choir only the basses kept accustomed place—to the left against the wall. Wood-winds, brass and percussion were likewise at the usual posts.

Again there is no distinctive change to report in the tonal mass. Possibly, the coagulated violins sounded more compactly, resonantly, homogeneously; but only the keenest ears might discover the betterment even in so adeptly scored a music as "Ein Heldenleben." The clearer gain was the economized command of the conductor over the string choir. To signal the violins, he had no longer to swing from left to right and back again; while with a single gesture he gave cue to violas and violoncellos. Years ago, Sir Henry Wood so re-seated the strings of the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, with little more audible result. None the less Mr. Koussevitzky's change was interesting. An innovating conductor is the best of all conductors at such an institution as the Symphony Concerts. Besides, the re-ordered orchestra was matter for gossip in the intermission.

In retrospect, the first half of the concert seems but a clearing of the ground for the revival of Strauss's tone-poem. A fortnight from the close of the season Mr. Koussevitzky has taken thought of the new generation of British composers. Hitherto he has given them only a side-glance when, at the suggestion of Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison he made room last autumn for Mr. Bliss's rough-tongued Concerto for Two Pianos. Yesterday his own choice lighted upon a tone-poem by Mr. Bax, "The Garden of Fand," first played in Boston four years ago by Mr Stock and the Chicago Orchestra en voyage; nearly lost in the shuffle of a program that began with a Symphony of Rakhmaninov and ended with the Prelude to "Tristan." Like many another piece by Mr. Bax, the new tone-poem was born of old Irish legend; swims in the "Celtic haze." This time, however, the haze is less misty than sunlit.

Mr. Bax has dwelt in these western isles and seen the Atlantic when it is a wondrous ocean from Donegal to Skye, from Skye to the northernmost Hebrides. He has looked upon it rain-torn and gale-swept; lapping and leaden under stilled winds and drooping mists. He has known it also in summer breeze and sunshine, myriad-rippled, cupped by the brown cliffs and hill-sides, canopied by a heaven as radiant as itself. Upon these wavelets of June, Mr. Bax launches his ship of ancient tale, his music of modern voice. Into the sunset they sail, and sailing, debark upon an isle that is like no land of mortals. There the Lady Fand sings her song of uncanny enticement. There she and her women weave through wanton dances, strange to see and know. Snared of feast and revel and delight are the sons of men—until a great wave comes and the laughter of the immortals is mocking coronach to the dead upon the waters. As in sleep-chasings pass these things, and again it is sunset upon an amethystine sea.

Through this lambent air, through these trailing clouds of fable, Mr. Bax leads his tone-poem; while beneath the sheen and the fantasy, it remains a well-knit, well-favored, self-contained music. The outlines stand clear; from measure to measure unfolds the thematic, the melodic progress. There is form for frame to color; [illegible] as well as glamour. Less diffuse and [illegible]bling than in many another piece [illegible] the composer's hand; while it keeps [illegible]ation, skill, a shimmering subtlety [illegible]rmonies and timbres. Motion and [illegible] the sea-picture. If the hearer by [illegible] western ocean, [illegible] through th[illegible] the catastrophe [illegible] delicate-fingered, tender-[illegible] Bax keeps all the music The sea-picture glimmers and fades. Gone are these wraiths upon rippled waters. A finely touched poet is Arnold Bax. Not words, but tones are his winged and wistful speech. To excess, he loves their motion and glamour. Fluid is he and fertile. Beside his book of Celtic legends may also be his volume of Shelley.

Time has not been kind to Mr. Rakhmaninov's Second Concerto in C minor, for Pianoforte with Orchestra, now nearly a quarter-century old. However it may have sounded when he and other pianists were playing it plenteously, it has dwindled into a well-made, conventional, obvious music, saying the expected thing at the foreseen moment in the anticipated way. A displayful Allegro Scherzando ends it. Babes and sucklings of the twentieth-century concert-hall may almost foretell when the songful measures will interrupt the ornate "passage-work"; recapitulate melody; give place to the exercises of virtuosity, swirling at last to climax. The Adagio Sostenuto sings a pretty pianistic song, set in gentle euphonies from the orchestra, bidding the pianist to suave touch and unruffled voice. Workaday fancy, not imagination delving to beauty, invents and conducts it. Patiently ear and mind follow the first movement. The large lines, the broad flow, of the workmanship hold them to the end; but workmanship the music remains. There is no spur to the listener's thought, no fillip to his feeling.

Mr. Rakhmaninov as composer has the knack of making the commonplace seem interesting, the platitudinous sound impressive. Tenfold, as pianist, he multiplies these serviceable powers. Fancy this Concerto played by a roly-poly virtuoso with a smiling mask. It would hardly prevail as it does when the composer himself, massive, sombre and austere, looms above it. With the little grinning fellow, it might even be discovered for the bourgeois music that it really is. The portentous pianist, however, has laid vast hold upon the average American imagination. Upon it, as well as upon the piano, does he also play. It loves "front," besides, and with that useful surface Mr. Rakhmaninov's symphonic music is thickly coated. Four times, was it, that the audience yesterday recalled him? Blessed be the obvious. "It gets there all the same."

Upon the echos of Rakhmaninov across a prolonged intermission sounded the sonorities of Strauss—Strauss of "Ein Heldeleben"; Strauss the imaginer of The Hero's theme, one of the great themes of music to stand beside Beethoven's at the outset of the Fifth Symphony or Chaikovsky's in the first movement of the Concerto in B-flat minor; Strauss of a love-music that is the ecstasy of tones, of the striding, clanging battle-piece, the brooding hush, the calm beatified, upon The Hero's Works of Peace; the exaltation and the splendors of the close. Time and again in the long course of the tone-poem, the Strauss that scales to greatness speaks or sings. In characterizing power and graphic fecundity the theme of The Hero outdoes even the measures flinging Don Juan upon the stage of music and imagination. The "love-scene" that pulses and glows across the "Sinfonia Domestica," slows and pales beside the incandescent rapture of Hero and Helpmate embraced. From the youthful tumults of "Til Eulenspiegel" Strauss goes forward to the far-spreading battle-fresco of "Ein Heldenleben." The trumpets of "Zarathustra" do not deeper rend the skies. Nowhere else does he sound the deep serenities of these Works of Peace; while upon the tones creep the shadows of twilight. Even the dance in "Zarathustra" knows not these tender felicities. The close of "Don Quixote" gains a more piercing beauty; the climax of "Death and Transfiguration" more sweeps and swells; but the end of "Ein Heldenleben" touches plangent majesty. To the heavens upon its own pinions in its ultimate glories, mounts the Hero-Theme. Commanded they open; in celestial calm the music dies. Nowhere has Strauss better sustained a vast and inwrought design; or worked such wonders of polyphony; so arrayed his power and passion of diatonic song. The works of prime, full fraught and full furnished, are "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote"—Strauss at acme before music-drama entered in and possessed him

Descents there are, but descents that pass in performance and leave but trace in aftermath. The malign music of The Adversaries is losing edge and temper; tends to become, with the clouding years, no more than acrid exercise in instrumental virtuosity. Possibly, the tantalizing Helpmate coquets too long upon the solo-violin, since responsive imaginations do not always teem to the lengthier Strauss. No doubt there is a deal of "paper-music" in the quotations from the earlier tone-poems among the Works of Peace—music that, in the give-and-take of the concert-hall, sounds only for itself, with little or none of this under-suggestion. It was an error of taste, a warp of imagination, in Strauss so to identify himself with The Hero, even for the zest of these prodigies of polyphony. A little the music slackens before it rises at the end out of meditation into majesty. The modernists ply gleefully these weapons of detraction. From Strauss they are in the full tide of scornful reaction. Their merits, which are signal, are not his. Alien to them, professing and practising another gospel are his attributes of greatness. Yet upon "Till" and "Don Juan," upon "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote" they flail their fists in vain.

As the event unexpectedly proved Mr. Koussevitzky did not deepen glories, extenuate errors, cloak shortcomings. He approached "Ein Heldenleben" in April as he had approached "The Rite of Spring" in December—bent upon an over-lyrical, over-softened, appreciably sentimentalized performance. Beauty he courted at the expense of power; less searched than smoothed the music. Within memory the Hero-Theme was more vividly and vigorously outflung upon Bostonian ears. The Adversaries snarled more menacingly (Mr. Koussevitzky, as it seemed would have them stupid rather than sinister.) The Love-Scene beat higher with stark passion, by sentiment unalloyed. The battle-piece more clamored and strode the racked or triumphant air. Only in the serenities of the Works of Peace and the sublimities of the end did Mr. Koussevitzky rise to the full height of Strauss's "great argument." Little, relatively, did these shortcomings mar or cloud. "Ein Heldenleben," like "Le Sacre," is composers'—not conductors'—music.

H. T. P.

AGAIN THE BRAHMS REQUIEM

Harvard Men, Radcliffe Women, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Conductor for Second Time Attract Applauding Audience That Fills Hall

AGAIN last night Symphony Hall was filled, every seat in it, for the second performance of Brahms's German Requiem by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Club and an orchestra gathered from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. Again Mr. Koussevitzky conducted and again the audience listened with rapt delight and applauded with eager vigor. If it were possible to assemble singers and players for a third performance doubtless the hall would for a third time be crowded. For this was a most notable performance of notable music. Only on a few occasions in the course of a usual life span is one privileged to hear such choral singing. These young men and young [illegible] Harvard and Radcliffe [illegible] [illegible] or expressive gesture of [illegible]ctor.

The Brahms of the Requiem is not the Brahms of the four symphonies, nor the Brahms of the Variations, nor the Brahms of the Song of Fate. He wrote this Requiem music from his heart, interested in no experiments, struggling through no barren passages. He used this music merely as the means for expressing his deep emotion, and in it he speaks very comfortably to all them that mourn. Freed from all liturgical restrictions through the use for text simply of quotations from Martin Luther's translation of the Bible Brahms chose with care only those passages which, though they gave voice to the lament of the heart, turned always to the hope that underlies all grief. And in setting these to music Brahms wrote a strangely unified composition. That is, in handling the vocal parts, both solo and choral, he merely added a few staves to his score and treated the voices as another orchestral color. There is no particular glory to be won by the soloists engaged for the Requiem. But the music is typically that of Brahms. Little characteristics, such as much work for the first violins in the upper positions, and much syncopation, the preponderance of the oboe part, are apparent. Brahms was working with large means and he used them with the natural instinct of his feeling of the moment most effectively.

Only one other piece of Brahms's writing approaches the Requiem in sustained beauty and delicacy. That is the last opus of his published works, a little group of eleven choral preludes for the organ. These are the last writing Brahms did, and the last of these, written just before he died, was prophetically called "O Welt, ich muss dich lassen." In the rare beauty of the soprano solo and chorus beginning "Ye now are sorrowful" the Requiem touches the delicacy and haunting grace of the choral prelude "Es ist ein' Ros' entsprungen."

Miss Ethyl Hayden invested her brief part with a clear, resonant and beautiful tone, admirably controlled. Mr. Boris Saslawsky, again singing the baritone solos, lacked somewhat the resonant quality necessary to make his work stand out against the chorus. As on the previous evening, applause was frequent and sustained, by far the greatest part going to Dr. Davison when he was dragged before the audience by Mr. Koussevitzky.

C. M. S.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 19 1925

Symphony to Play All-Wagner Programme Here Tuesday

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

However much Mr. Koussevitzky may or may not have indulged in all-Wagner programmes before his coming to this country, he has not failed to recognize the American liking for such concerts, or for those in which Wagnerian excerpts preponderate. Thus to-day in Boston, in Symphony Hall, he is conducting at the Second Pension Fund Concert, a programme all from Wagner save for one number, Strauss's "Heldenleben," and in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening he will lead the Boston Orchestra through a programme devoted entirely to the music of Wagner.

Beyond any other composer of opera, Wagner enriched that art form, not always too dignified, with music of truly symphonic quality and character. It follows that, in addition to their overtures, preludes and orchestral introductions, his operas yield many fragments, designed as mere accompaniment, to scene or action, that are of a beauty or an impressiveness that well entitles them to a place in a symphony concert.

Of such excerpts, the programme of next Tuesday evening lists three: "The Ride of the Valkyries," a stirring if none too subtle bit of tone-painting; the poetic "Waldweben," or forest-murmurs, from "Siegfried," and the "Good Friday Music" out of "Parsifal," one of Wagner's rarest pages.

In the "Valkyries' Ride," which makes the introduction to the third act and the first scene in that act in "Die Walkure," Wagner sought to suggest in tone the wild riding upon winged steeds of the nine war-like daughters of Wotan. A sensational and technically stupendous achievement in its day, the "Ride" has perhaps lost with the passing of the years a little of its one-time splendid savagery. But in the opera house it still makes its effect, and he who hears it in the concert-hall may, with no great stretch of the imagination, see in his mind's eye the rugged mountain-peaks, the scudding clouds and the flying warrior-maids.

A compilation of various episodes in the second act of "Siegfried," the "Waldweben" is primarily a tonal setting forth of the forest-scene as Siegfried, wearied by his combat with the Dragon, reclines on a grassy mound. At length there comes the call of the bird from whom he learns of Brunnhilde, asleep on the fire-girt rock. And at the end the music is eloquent of Siegfried's determination to make his way, through whatever obstacles, to his fore-ordained bride.

A quite different scene is that depicted in the "Good Friday Spell." Spent from his long wondering, Parsifal returns to Monsalvat, where stands the Castle of the Holy Grail. Resting there in the spring quietude he is tended by Kundry, once his temptress, now released from her hideous bondage to the magician Klingsor. All nature smiles, and upon Parsifal, Kundry and the aged Gurnemanz, who has come to welcome back the wanderer, is that peace which passeth understanding.

The Wagner who wrote the music of a beauty to fit this scene was a far riper, more skillful composer than the youthful Wagner from whom came the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which heads Mr. Koussevitzky's programme for Tuesday. Yet this earlier music flames with genius, and it bears, too, the imprint of the latter Wagner's revising and revitalizing hand. As yet unequalled in kind is the music of storm that makes the main body of this Overture, while the closing pages give fitting expression to the selfless love of the maiden Senta who, through the sacrifice of her own life, lifts the curse which kept the Hollander upon his phantom ship.

"The Flying Dutchman" was the first of Wagner's genuinely significant works for the stage; "Lohengrin," the forerunner of "Parsifal," was the third. On Tuesday's programme "Lohengrin" is here represented by the Prelude, that would limn the descent to earth of the Holy Grail, borne by angel hands, and by them borne back once more to the heights from whence it came. From the technical standpoint this Prelude is a marvellously wrought crescendo and decrescendo, beginning and ending with ethereal chords of violin-harmonics.

Of quite different mood and manner is the second excerpt from "Lohengrin," the festive Introduction to the third act, that on this programme succeeds to the Prelude. It is the music that ushers in the wedding-procession of Elsa and Lohengrin, and in it is no hint of the unhappy fate so soon to overtake them.

Turn now to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner's only comedy-opera. Of all Wagner's opera none other is so rich in human appeal, and the Introduction to the third act, to be played at this concert, is a musical tribute to the good Hans Sachs, cobbler of Nuremberg, Meistersinger, and withal the idol of his townsfolk. Sachs's kindly nature and his half-melancholy musing upon his unrequited love for the charming Eva both are to be felt in this Introduction, and in its course comes, too, the nobly beautiful chorale of homage in which the good folk of Nuremberg proclaim to Sachs their great affection for him.

Chronologically the closing number of this Tuesday's programme, the Overture to "Tannhauser" should stand between the Overtrue to "The Flying Dutchman" and the Prelude to "Lohengrin." [illegible]ly, however, Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen to make of it a brilliant finale. Undoubtedly the most widely liked of all Wagner's orchestral pieces, the "Tannhauser" Overture symbolizes the struggle between good and evil, with the ultimate and complete triumph of the good. Musically the chief ingredients in this Overture are the broadly melodious Pilgrims' Chorus and the riotous, seductive music of the [illegible] Venus, whereon Tannhauser yields him-self to unholy enjoyments.

This "Tannhauser" Overture is nearing its centenary. Yet to-day few pages in orchestral literature can match its brilliance, or the splendid power of its peroration.

Tucson

STAR

APR 19 1925

BOSTON.—The first performance here of Scriabin's Prometheus was given last week by the Boston Sym[illegible] orchestra, Serge Koussevitzk[illegible] with the assistance o[illegible] [illegible] Society, directed by [illegible]ng. Alexander Lang [illegible]e piano part.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

APR 19 1925

# #

The music has not all been of a sacred character. Zoussewitsky and his Boston band said goodbye until next season with a program that intrigued people of varied tastes. The fragile, plaintive Respighi arrangements of four old dances and airs for the lute, by Italian composers of the 16th century, and the crepuscular loveliness of Debussy's "Nocturnes" contrasted strikingly with Scriabin's "Prometheus" and Borodin's gorgeously colorful "Polovtsian Dances," from Prince Igor, both of which had the assistance of the St. Cecilia society of Boston. Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," was the piece de resistance. That was what filled the house, and no one discussed anything else. Mr. Zoussewitsky performed the work in Moscow in 1911, when the composer played the piano part, played here by Alexander Steinert. Modest Altschuler gave it here with the Russian Symphony orchestra in 1915, at which time a "clavier a lumieres" was used, according to the intention of Scriabin, who was Altschuler's friend. Scriabin, who grew more mystical as time went on, wanted this work to be accompanied by a symphony of color rays synchronizing with the music, certain notes representing certain colors.

The "clavier a lumieres," which he invented, was a keyboard instrument by means of which colored light could be thrown on a screen—a forerunner of the astounding clavilux, which is now opening up a new field of art. "Prometheus," a work of the later Scriabin, transcends his hymn to art, his divine poem and his poem of ecstacy, but, according to Dr. Eaglefield Hall, the composer, at the time of his death, was projecting a work called "Mystery," which would have gone faster still, and combined sound, color movement and odor. It is impossible to discuss "Prometheus" after one hearing. I found it all interesting, much of it radiant, luminous; more of it hard to understand—perhaps more so than if one knew nothing at all about it. It is an obstacle to simple listening to be told that a composition is based on a mystic chord built up by fourths, Complexity is there, and tumult and terrible energy, ending with a tremendous climax which taxed the resources of the orchestra, raised the heavens and expanded the horizon, and I found myself trying to recapture its palpitating beauty, as we strain to remember a vanishing dream.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 19 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An all Wagner program will be the occasion of a farewell appearance here of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its remarkable new conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, in a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15.

Koussevitzky has been particularly praised for his stirring readings of Wagnerian music and a particular musical treat is expected in the fine array of excerpts from the music drama of the great master. There will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to the first act (Holy Grail music), and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin;" the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (contemplative music of Hans Sachs, the shoe maker); The Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" in which the winged horses of the warrior goddesses gallop through the sky; "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried" in which the sounds of the woods and bird calls are heard; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and to close the season, the overture to "Tannhauser."

Several notable events will mark the close of Koussevitzky's season in Boston. Brams' Requiem was performed there last Thursday and Friday under his baton with great success, members of the orchestra joining forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. A pension fund concert with a Strauss-Wagner program scheduled for to-day, and a pair of final choral concerts at the close of the season next week.

Herald
April 17

"POP" CONCERTS TO OPEN MAY 4

Monday night, May 4, will mark the expiration of the musical season in Boston and the opening of the season of "Pop" concerts, at Symphony hall, in which music of lighter vein holds complete musical sway in these parts during the spring and early summer. This will be the 40th season of the "Pop" concerts and the ninth under their most popular of leaders, Agide Jacchia. There will be the usual orchestra of 80 Symphony players. Popular programs, in which those old numbers which have the best claim to survival, will be found with notable novelties. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables, which will cover the floor of Symphony hall, and in the "Pop" bar in the lobby of the first balcony. Reservations are already being made for the opening night, always a gala ocasion at the "Pops."

Globe
April 19

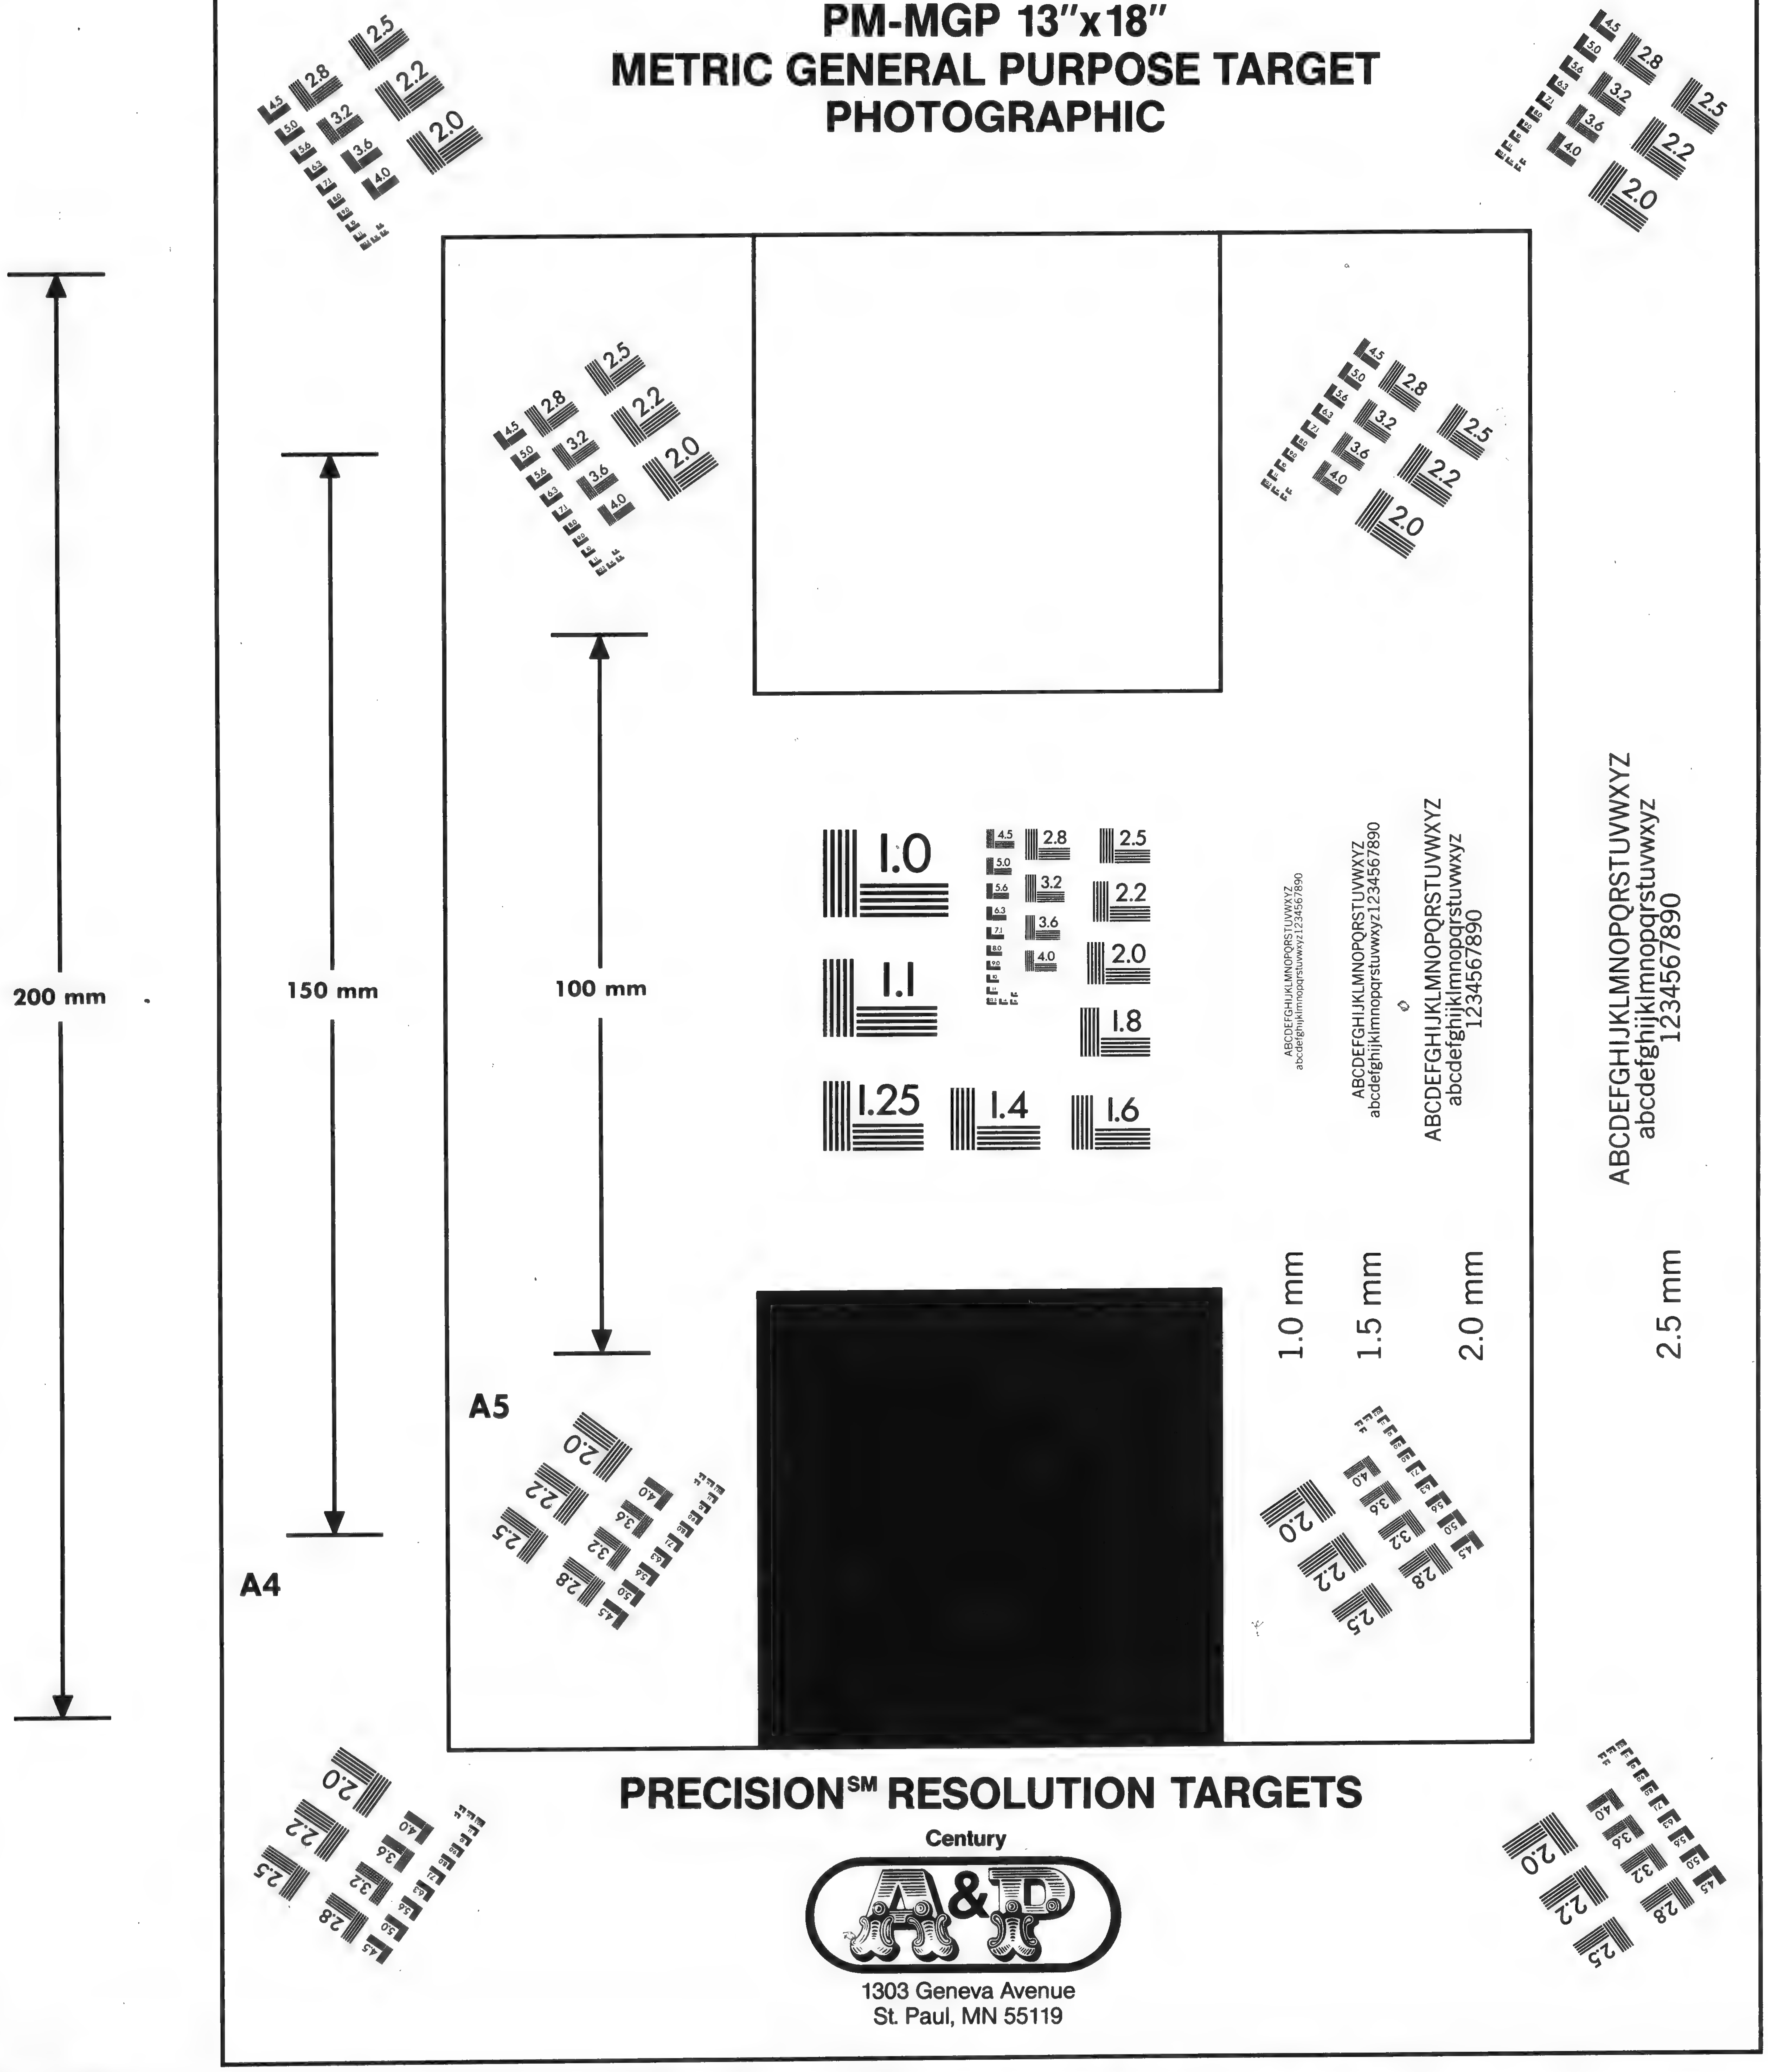
Those who have not already put their names on the waiting list for subscription tickets for the Boston Symphony concert next season must do so at once to have any chance of securing seats if they are not among the present subscribers. Each subscriber has the right to re-engage the same seats he now occupies, within a stated time, and only a comparatively small number are at all likely to give up their present seats. This year all tickets for every series in Boston were subscribed

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 23d program. Symphony in C major (K 425), Mozart; violin concerto, Prokofiev; "La Bonne Chanson," Loeffler; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. Soloist, Richard Burgin.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

APR 19 1925

The word comes that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will no longer go entour but will confine itself to its Boston concerts. This will be a great disappointment to Portland people who took the keenest delight in the recent concert given at City Hall and would rejoice at the prospect of an annual visit from this great organization. Koussevitzky has set a new record in popularity for the orchestra.

Not for many a year have the tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra been practically unobtainable as is the case in this, the first year of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. In fact, since all the series of concerts are completely sold out by the season, the extra concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, this afternoon at 3.30, the proceeds to go to the Orchestra's Pension Fund, offers the only chance for those who do not possess season tickets to hear this remarkable leader and the eloquent performances of the famed orchestra under his guidance.

The music editor of the Boston Globe of December 7th last thus describes the state of affairs at the Symphony concerts. After speaking of the tremendous success of Koussevitzky at his Boston and New York debuts, he continues:

"A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season—24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 5 Monday evenings in Boston, 9 Thursday evenings in Cambridge, 5 Thursday evenings in New York.

Herald
Apr 20

PENSION CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD

Wagner and Strauss Music at Symphony Hall

For the Pension Fund concert, yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Koussevitzky began the program with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." He followed it with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," and that in turn with three Wagner excerpts—the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser." The audience, very large, showed lively enthusiasm.

There was ample reason for it. The "Waldenleben," though probably no better played than on Friday and Saturday, came better by its own because of its more favorable place on the program, before people had been given their fill.

The stir it made, nearly 25 years ago! There were many who dammed it up and down. Some swore they liked it, though it was plain enough they did not, and some were genuinely thrilled by its surge and sound and sweetness—and they felt a pleasant conceit of themselves, for the modernity and their daring. Twenty-four years, after all, do little to human nature.

But they have done much to Richard Strauss. His "Heldenleben" yesterday showed pages worn very thin. Those episodes where he clung closest to the past, where he profited most from the work of his predecessors, like Wagner and Franz Liszt, they stand the test of time. Parts of the opening section are impressive still. Much of the helpmate episode retains its sweet sentimental charm. The escape from the world and the conclusion still thrill by their splendor of sound and their emotional depths.

But where Strauss would be an innovator whether he could or no—it's here his music shows its shallowness. The wildness of the opening has an empty sound today. Though the shrill cracking of the Adversaries sets one to marveling at Strauss's uncanny cleverness in foreseeing the trend that certain of his successors would take and so stepping in ahead, those brittle snaps and snarls exert slight force today. The experiment of the solo violin to suggest the helpmate seems no longer entirely successful. The field of battle, Liszt out-Liszted, by its added din shows but little power gained.

Innovators who lean too heavily on their innovations alone might well take warning by the example of Richard Strauss. Even he, a genius, with music of worth to his credit before the quest of novelty entered his head, found no enduring success when he carried too far afield his quest for new means of expression. Composers of lesser genius, to describe them politely, with little to their credit, would show their wisdom if they made haste in their experiments more slowly still than Strauss should have done.

It was an afternoon of beautiful playing, the "Flying Dutchman" marching brilliantly, with exquisite song in its Senta episode, the "Parsifal" excerpt proving notable for its lovely sound.

R. R. G.

Herald
April 19

23d SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 23d and last concert but one of the regular series of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 24 and 25. Mr. Koussevitzky will then present Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. No. 425); Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, the first performance in Boston (Richard Burgin, violinist); Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Post
April 20

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT

Wagner and Strauss Divide Rich List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gvies a concert in aid of its pension fund it is generally regarded as a foregone conclusion that band and conductor alike will be on their mettle.

And the pension fund concert of yesterday, the second of the present season, proved an overwhelming fulfillment of hopeful expectations. Indeed, in a symphony season extraordinarily rich in brilliant concerts, that of yesterday was conspicuous for its brilliancy.

WAGNER HOLDS OWN

Music by Wagner and Strauss made the programme: a happy choice for such an occasion, since these two, perhaps more than any other composers, have written for the symphonic orchestra with a sympathy and an understanding and a certainty of touch that tend to display to the best advantage its most engaging qualities.

From the later composer came the tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," restored last week, after long absence, to the Symphony Concerts in a performance of surpassing eloquence, a performance that, as some would have it, was deepened and intensified at yesterday's concert, if such bettering of the superlative be humanly possible.

Yet with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" for stirring beginning, the Overture to "Tannhauser" for exalted conclusion and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" between, the music of Wagner might yesterday well hold its own against the diverse excitements, the tonal splendors of "Ein Heldenleben."

Yesterday each of these four pieces was made to sound as it must seldom before have sounded in Symphony Hall. Justly and fully to appraise the playing of them would necessitate some reference to every page, to every phrase, of the several scores. Suffice it, then, to say that no potential eloquence escaped either Mr. Koussevitzky or his orchestra, that the Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" had full measure of storm and fury, the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Parsifal" their meed of tonal loveliness, poetizing fancy, and finally that the performance of the "Tannhauser" Overture, which evoked from the large audience a veritable tempest of applause, was a performance not soon to be forgotten.

---

vere and William Dawes, Jr., and the Battle of Lexington Green. A Bobby Vernon comedy is also billed.

Adv. Apr 20

Symphony Heard

Wagner-Strauss Program at Pension Concert

Wagner numbers were featured on the program played by the Symphony Orchestra at its pension fund concert yesterday. Richard Strauss was also represented by one of his titanic tone-poems, "A Hero's Life," which is more philosophical than lyrical and not any too appropriate a selection for a popular bill.

The program lacked drawing-power and for that reason the hall was not crowded. Many must have attended to see Serge Koussevitzky for the last time this season. He has four more symphony concerts to conduct, but they are sold out.

Of the Wagner numbers the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser" overture were especially well liked at yesterday's concert. But the "Forest Murmurs" scene from "Siegfried" and the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" were admirably played.

Globe
April 20

SYMPHONY CONCERT AIDS PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky Conducts Strauss-Wagner Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its pension fund concert to a large audience in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program consisted of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," "Good Friday Music" from "Parsifal" and Overture to "Tannhauser."

"Ein Heldenleben" was heard here last Friday in the regular series of concerts. Conductor and orchestra showed complete mastery of this intricate work, and Mr Burgin played the very difficult solo violin part admirably. This was apparently appreciated by the audience, which was not satisfied until he had acknowledged its applause.

In the Wagner numbers Mr Koussevitsky showed the qualities that have made him one of the outstanding conductors of the day. His treatment of every note and every phase as a separate thing, and yet as a part of an organic whole, again illustrated what has been so often remarked: his broad conception of every piece he conducts. The two overtures showed his genius for climaxes, each crescendo stronger than the one before, and yet in the final grand crash giving one the feeling of power held in reserve.

He has been accused of exaggerating contrasts in tempo and dynamics, but if he did so yesterday it was only consistent with the music and served to heighten its legitimate effects. The performance of the "Good Friday Spell" was unforgettable in its pure beauty and unity.

The most popular number was the overture to "Tannhauser," perhaps because of its familiarity. At its conclusion the conductor was recalled several times and the orchestra was made to share in the applause.

There were a few vacant seats on the floor yesterday, whether because of the unfamiliarity of the Strauss number, the inclement weather or the fact that many who ordinarily only hear the orchestra at these concerts heard one of the performances of the Brahms Requiem last week.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 20 1925

A number of musical events will take place during the week, the most important of which will be the final concert of a series given here during the winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The orchestra will appear at Infantry Hall Tuesday evening in an all-Wagner program.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 21 1925

Eighteen Composers Represented on Boston Symphony's Brooklyn Programmes During 1924-25 Season.

Serge Koussevitzky's programmes for the five Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last of which was given on April 10, were devoted to be compositions of eighteen composers. Four symphonies were played, namely, Beethoven's Fifth, Boccherini's in C major, Haydn's G Major (B. & H., No. 13) and Tschaikowsky's E minor.

Novelties for Brooklyn audiences were Scriabine's two major orchestral scores, "The Poem of Ecstasy" and "Prometheus: A Poem of Fire," respectively played at the opening and closing concerts. Also new to Brooklyn was Manuel de Falla's suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), played January 2, with Richard Strauss" "Till Eulenspiegel" and Ravel's "La Valse" on the same programme. Of other composers, Debussy figured four times, Wagner three times, Berlioz twice and J. S. Bach, C. P. E. Bach, Borodin, Dukas, Handel, Liszt and Rabaud once each.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 22 1925

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Throngs in Infantry Hall Pay Tribute to Director and Players.

Serge Koussevitzky led his players of the Boston Symphony orchestra in an alll-Wagner programme at the final Providence concert of the orchestra in Infantry Hall last evening. An audience that filled the hall enthusiastically applauded the conductor and his splendid company of musicians, and the demonstrations throughout the evening culminated in a real ovation at the close.

It was a concert without a symphony, the director selecting his programme from among the more popular of the shorter works of the great German master, concluding with the always effective "Tannhauser" overture. This was played with brilliant effect, with an elan that aroused the greatest enthusiasm.

It was a fitting close to a splendid series of concerts, a series which has made Koussevitzy one of the most popular directors that ever led the Boston players in Providence. This popularity was reflected several times during the concert, particularly after the playing of the "Ride of the Valkyries" and after the closing number referred to above. On each of these occasions the conductor shared his honors with the players, who at his direction arose and acknowledged the applause, which came in waves of handclapping from every corner of the crowded hall.

The programme follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman,"	Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin,"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"	Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie"	Wagner
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried" (Act II)	Wagner
"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal" (Act III)	Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"....	Wagner

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

APR 20 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra plays Bax's "The Garden of Fand."

PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

APR 22 1925

GLEE CLUB RANKED HIGH

The Harvard Glee Club which will appear at Carnegie Music Hall on Friday vening under its distinguished leader, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, is everywhere recognized as one of the foremost singing organizations of the world, and its concerts are of interest to everyone interested in high-class music. Last week, the organization appeared with the Radcliffe Cchoral Society in a performance of Brahm's "Requiem," assisted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dist ished soloists and condu

---

80

Herald Apr 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An all Wagner programme was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's offering last evening at its final appearance of the season here. Infantry hall held practically a capacity audience, quite the usual thing nowadays at these concerts, and anticipations aroused by the makeup of the programme were realized in the performance under Serge Koussevitzky. The Russian conductor, now completing his first season with the Boston orchestra, received proof of his popularity with Providence patrons in demonstrations at various points in the concert. After the brilliant playing of the "The Ride of the Valkyries" in mid programme and at the close of the final number he made his players rise and share in acknowledging the audience's enthusiastic applause.

It seems quite the rule with American concert orchestras to give an all Wagner programme when they would make a particular concert an outstanding event. This of course, is done in response to public liking and appreciation of the German master's music. In his great collection of orchestral works drawn from his operas there is ideal concert material. It it music that is uplifting, never trivial. Whatever the inspiration of these great tone pictures the effect as pure music takes firm hold upon the mind and heart. Without programme notes, without any aid whatever in explanation of the meaning of motif or text his music has power to deeply stir and satisfy the listener.

Last evening, the selections from his operatic scores offered contrast and contained some of the more frequently used pieces for concert use. "The Flying Dutchman" overture, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Tannhauser" overture provided the brilliant portion of the programme, and excerpts from "The Maestersingers," "Siegfried" and "Lohengrin" brought the more quiet moods.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"..	Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"	Wagner
"Waldweben" from "Siegfried" (Act. II)	Wagner
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" (Act III)	Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner

In playing numbers presenting brilliant effects Koussevitzky fully realizes the value of contrast. But he never is harsh or abrupt in bridging extremes of tone volume. With a pliable and responsive playing unit at his command he moves with grace and elegance in sudden crescendo or decrescendo. It is this smoothness, this seeming absence of effort in accomplishing desired effects that makes his work so interesting to the critical auditor apart from the imaginative side of his art. The etherial character of the music in the "Lohengrin" prelude and the beauty of the "Introduction to Act 3, 'The Mastersingers,'" were shown with the players in nice technical accord. The strings were delightfully delicate in the former number.

In the second part of the programme the "Waldweben," or "Sounds of the Forest," and the "Good Friday Spell" received careful and effective reading. In both of these excerpts, Koussevitzky was successful in bringing out in pleasing manner various individual instrumental voices. This ability to delicately adjust his many voiced choir gives him command of a myriad of tonal tints and results in a satisfying sense of completeness in the effects obtained.

The favorite "Tannhauser" overture brought the concert to a close. Koussevitzky's reading of this number while not one of unusual brilliance, was filled with kaleidoscopic effects. The men played it with fine unanimity and spirit.

A. F. P.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

APR 22 19

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SCORES BOSTON SUCCESS

Last Thursday and Friday evenings at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Harvard Glee Club, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the Brahms "Requiem" to two crowded houses.

The "Requiem" represents the pinnacle of the glee club's achievement, and the critics are lavish in their praises.

The appearance of M. Koussevitzky with the glee club is a great tribute to the club and its conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison since the conductor of the Boston Symphony has not appeared as guest conductor at any other time in this country.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

APR 19 1925

The word comes that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will no longer go entour but will confine itself to its Boston concerts. This will be a great disappointment to Portland people who took the keenest delight in the recent concert given at City Hall and would rejoice at the prospect of an annual visit from this great organization. Koussevitzky has set a new record in popularity for the orchestra.

Not for many a year have the tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra been practically unobtainable as is the case in this, the first year of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. In fact, since all the series of concerts are completely sold out by the season, the extra concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, this afternoon at 3.30, the proceeds to go to the Orchestra's Pension Fund, offers the only chance for those who do not possess season tickets to hear this remarkable leader and the eloquent performances of the famed orchestra under his guidance.

The music editor of the Boston Globe of December 7th last thus describes the state of affairs at the Symphony concerts. After speaking of the tremendous success of Koussevitzky at his Boston and New York debuts, he continues:

"A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season—24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 5 Monday evenings in Boston, 9 Thursday evenings in Cambridge, 5 Thursday evenings in New York.

Herald

PENSION CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD

Wagner and Strauss Music at Symphony Hall

For the Pension Fund concert, yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Koussevitzky began the program with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." He followed it with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," and that in turn with three Wagner excerpts—the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhauser." The audience, very large, showed lively enthusiasm.

There was ample reason for it. The "Waldenleben," though probably no better played than on Friday and Saturday, came better by its own because of its more favorable place on the program, before people had been given their fill.

The stir it made, nearly 25 years ago! There were many who dammed it up and down. Some swore they liked it, though it was plain enough they did not, and some were genuinely thrilled by its surge and sound and sweetness—and they felt a pleasant conceit of themselves, for the modernity and their daring. Twenty-four years, after all, do little to human nature.

But they have done much to Richard Strauss. His "Heldenleben" yesterday showed pages worn very thin. Those episodes where he clung closest to the past, where he profited most from the work of his predecessors, like Wagner and Franz Liszt, they stand the test of time. Parts of the opening section are impressive still. Much of the helpmate episode retains its sweet sentimental charm. The escape from the world and the conclusion still thrill by their splendor of sound and their emotional depths.

But where Strauss would be an innovator whether he could or no—it's here his music shows its shallowness. The wildness of the opening has an empty sound today. Though the shrill crackling of the Adversaries sets one to marveling at Strauss's uncanny cleverness in foreseeing the trend that certain of his successors would take and so stepping in ahead, those brittle snaps and snarls exert slight force today. The experiment of the solo violin to suggest the helpmate seems no longer entirely successful. The field of battle, Liszt out-Liszted, by its added din shows but little power gained.

Innovators who lean too heavily on their innovations alone might well take warning by the example of Richard Strauss. Even he, a genius, with music of worth to his credit before the quest of novelty entered his head, found no enduring success when he carried too far afield his quest for new means of expression. Composers of lesser genius, to describe them politely, with little to their credit, would show their wisdom if they made haste in their experiments more slowly still than Strauss should have done.

It was an afternoon of beautiful playing, the "Flying Dutchman" marching brilliantly, with exquisite song in its Senta episode, the "Parsifal" excerpt proving notable for its lovely sound.

R. R. G.

Herald April 19

23d SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 23d and last concert but one of the regular series of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 24 and 25. Mr. Koussevitzky will then present Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. No. 425); Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, the first performance in Boston (Richard Burgin, violinist); Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Post April 20

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT

Wagner and Strauss Divide Rich List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gvies a concert in aid of its pension fund it is generally regarded as a foregone conclusion that band and conductor alike will be on their nettle.

And the pension fund concert of yesterday, the second of the present season, proved an overwhelming fulfillment of hopeful expectations. Indeed, in a symphony season extraordinarily rich in brilliant concerts, that of yesterday was conspicuous for its brilliancy.

WAGNER HOLDS OWN

Music by Wagner and Strauss made the programme: a happy choice for such an occasion, since these two, perhaps more than any other composers, have written for the symphonic orchestra with a sympathy and an understanding and a certainty of touch that tend to display to the best advantage its most engaging qualities.

From the later composer came the tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," restored last week, after long absence, to the Symphony Concerts in a performance of surpassing eloquence, a performance that, as some would have it, was deepened and intensified at yesterday's concert, if such bettering of the superlative be humanly possible.

Yet with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" for stirring beginning, the Overture to "Tannhauser" for exalted conclusion and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" between, the music of Wagner might yesterday well hold its own against the diverse excitements, the tonal splendors of "Ein Heldenleben."

Yesterday each of these four pieces was made to sound as it must seldom before have sounded in Symphony Hall. Justly and fully to appraise the playing of them would necessitate some reference to every page, to every phrase, of the several scores. Suffice it, then, to say that no potential eloquence escaped either Mr. Koussevitzky or his orchestra, that the Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" had full measure of storm and fury, the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Parsifal" their meed of tonal loveliness and poetizing fancy, and finally that the performance of the "Tannhauser" Overture, which evoked from the large audience a veritable tempest of applause, was a performance not soon to be forgotten.

---

vere and William Dawes, Jr., and the Battle of Lexington Green. A Bobby Vernon comedy is also billed.

Adv. April 20

Symphony Heard

Wagner-Strauss Program at Pension Concert

Wagner numbers were featured on the program played by the Symphony Orchestra at its pension fund concert yesterday. Richard Strauss was also represented by one of his titanic tone-poems, "A Hero's Life," which is more philosophical than lyrical and not any too appropriate a selection for a popular bill.

The program lacked drawing-power and for that reason the hall was not crowded. Many must have attended to see Serge Koussevitzky for the last time this season. He has four more symphony concerts to conduct, but they are sold out.

Of the Wagner numbers the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser" overture were especially well liked at yesterday's concert. But the "Forest Murmurs" scene from "Siegfried" and the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" were admirably played.

Globe April 20

SYMPHONY CONCERT AIDS PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky Conducts Strauss-Wagner Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its pension fund concert to a large audience in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program consisted of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," "Good Friday Music" from "Parsifal" and Overture to "Tannhauser."

"Ein Heldenleben" was heard here last Friday in the regular series of concerts. Conductor and orchestra showed complete mastery of this intricate work, and Mr Burgin played the very difficult solo violin part admirably. This was apparently appreciated by the audience, which was not satisfied until he had acknowledged its applause.

In the Wagner numbers Mr Koussevitsky showed the qualities that have made him one of the outstanding conductors of the day. His treatment of every note and every phase as a separate thing, and yet as a part of an organic whole, again illustrated what has been so often remarked: his broad conception of every piece he conducts. The two overtures showed his genius for climaxes, each crescendo stronger than the one before, and yet in the final grand crash giving one the feeling of power held in reserve.

He has been accused of exaggerating contrasts in tempo and dynamics, but if he did so yesterday it was only consistent with the music and served to heighten its legitimate effects. The performance of the "Good Friday Spell" was unforgettable in its pure beauty and unity.

The most popular number was the overture to "Tannhauser," perhaps because of its familiarity. At its conclusion the conductor was recalled several times and the orchestra was made to share in the applause.

There were a few vacant seats on the floor yesterday, whether because of the unfamiliarity of the Strauss number, the inclement weather or the fact that many who ordinarily only hear the orchestra at these concerts heard one of the performances of the Brahms Requiem last week.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 20 1925

A number of musical events will take place during the week, the most important of which will be the final concert of a series given here during the winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The orchestra will appear at Infantry Hall Tuesday evening in an all-Wagner program.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 21 1925

Eighteen Composers Represented on Boston Symphony's Brooklyn Programmes During 1924-25 Season.

Serge Koussevitzky's programmes for the five Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last of which was given on April 10, were devoted to be compositions of eighteen composers. Four symphonies were played, namely, Beethoven's Fifth, Boccherini's in C major, Haydn's G Major (B. & H., No. 13) and Tschaikowsky's E minor.

Novelties for Brooklyn audiences were Scriabine's two major orchestral scores, "The Poem of Ecstasy" and "Prometheus: A Poem of Fire," respectively played at the opening and closing concerts. Also new to Brooklyn was Manuel de Falla's suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), played January 2, with Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Ravel's "La Valse" on the same programme. Of other composers, Debussy figured four times, Wagner three times, Berlioz twice and J. S. Bach, C. P. E. Bach, Borodin, Dukas, Handel, Liszt and Rabaud once each.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 22 1925

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Throngs in Infantry Hall Pay Tribute to Director and Players.

Serge Koussevitzky led his players of the Boston Symphony orchestra in an alll-Wagner programme at the final Providence concert of the orchestra in Infantry Hall last evening. An audience that filled the hall enthusiastically applauded the conductor and his splendid company of musicians, and the demonstrations throughout the evening culminated in a real ovation at the close.

It was a concert without a symphony, the director selecting his programme from among the more popular of the shorter works of the great German master, concluding with the always effective "Tannhauser" overture. This was played with brilliant effect, with an elan that aroused the greatest enthusiasm.

It was a fitting close to a splendid series of concerts, a series which has made Koussevitzy one of the most popular directors that ever led the Boston players in Providence. This popularity was reflected several times during the concert, particularly after the playing of the "Ride of the Valkyries" and after the closing number referred to above. On each of these occasions the conductor shared his honors with the players, who at his direction arose and acknowledged the applause, which came in waves of handclapping from every corner of the crowded hall.

The programme follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," ..... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin," ..... Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie" ..... Wagner
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried" (Act II) ..... Wagner
"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal" (Act III) ..... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

APR 20 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra plays Bax's "The Garden of Fand."

PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

APR 22 1925

GLEE CLUB RANKED HIGH

The Harvard Glee Club which will appear at Carnegie Music Hall on Friday vening under its distinguished leader, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, is everywhere recognized as one of the foremost singing organizations of the world, and its concerts are of interest to everyone interested in high-class music. Last week, the organization appeared with the Radcliffe Cchoral Society in a performance of Brahm's "Requiem," assisted by members of the Bost Symphony Orchestra and dist ished soloists, and condu

---

Herald Apr 22

85

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An all Wagner programme was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's offering last evening at its final appearance of the season here. Infantry hall held practically a capacity audience, quite the usual thing nowadays at these concerts, and anticipations aroused by the makeup of the programme were realized in the performance under Serge Koussevitzky. The Russian conductor, now completing his first season with the Boston orchestra, received proof of his popularity with Providence patrons in demonstrations at various points in the concert. After the brilliant playing of the "The Ride of the Valkyries" in mid programme and at the close of the final number he made his players rise and share in acknowledging the audience's enthusiastic applause.

It seems quite the rule with American concert orchestras to give an all Wagner programme when they would make a particular concert an outstanding event. This of course, is done in response to public liking and appreciation of the German master's music. In his great collection of orchestral works drawn from his operas there is ideal concert material. It it music that is uplifting, never trivial. Whatever the inspiration of these great tone pictures the effect as pure music takes firm hold upon the mind and heart. Without programme notes, without any aid whatever in explanation of the meaning of motif or text his music has power to deeply stir and satisfy the listener.

Last evening, the selections from his operatic scores offered contrast and contained some of the more frequently used pieces for concert use. "The Flying Dutchman" overture, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Tannhauser" overture provided the brilliant portion of the programme, and excerpts from "The Maestersingers," "Siegfried" and "Lohengrin" brought the more quiet moods.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .. Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" .. Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie" .... Wagner
"Waldweben" from "Siegfreid" (Act. II) .... Wagner
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" (Act III) .... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

In playing numbers presenting brilliant effects Koussevitzky fully realizes the value of contrast. But he never is harsh or abrupt in bridging extremes of tone volume. With a pliable and responsive playing unit at his command he moves with grace and elegance in sudden crescendo or decrecendo. It is this smoothness, this seeming absence of effort in accomplishing desired effects that makes his work so interesting to the critical auditor apart from the imaginative side of his art. The etherial character of the music in the "Lohengrin" prelude and the beauty of the "Introduction to Act 3, 'The Mastersingers,'" were shown with the players in nice technical accord. The strings were delightfully delicate in the former number.

In the second part of the programme the "Waldweben," or "Sounds of the Forest," and the "Good Friday Spell" received careful and effective reading. In both of these excerpts, Koussevitzky was successful in bringing out in pleasing manner various individual instrumental voices. This ability to delicately adjust his many voiced choir gives him command of a myriad of tonal tints and results in a satisfying sense of completeness in the effects obtained.

The favorite "Tannhauser" overture brought the concert to a close. Koussevitzky's reading of this number while not one of unusual brilliance, was filled with kaleidoscopic effects. The men played it with fine unanimity and spirit.

A. F. P.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

22 19

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SCORES BOSTON SUCCESS

Last Thursday and Friday evenings at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Harvard Glee Club, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the Brahms "Requiem" to two crowded houses.

The "Requiem" represents the pinnacle of the glee club's achievement, and the critics are lavish in their praises.

The appearance of M. Koussevitzky with the glee club is a great tribute to the club and its conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison since the conductor of the Boston Symphony has not appeared as guest conductor at any other time in this country.

86

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 22 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An all Wagner programme was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's offering last evening at its final appearance of the season here. Infantry hall held practically a capacity audience, quite the usual thing nowadays at these concerts, and anticipations aroused by the makeup of the programme were realized in the performance under Serge Koussevitzky. The Russian conductor, now completing his first season with the Boston orchestra, received proof of his popularity with Providence patrons in demonstrations at various points in the concert. After the brilliant playing of the "The Ride of the Valkyries" in mid programme and at the close of the final number he made his players rise and share in acknowledging the audience's enthusiastic applause.

It seems quite the rule with American concert orchestras to give an all Wagner programme when they would make a particular concert an outstanding event. This of course, is done in response to public liking and appreciation of the German master's music. In his great collection of orchestral works drawn from his operas there is ideal concert material. It it music that is uplifting, never trivial. Whatever the inspiration of these great tone pictures the effect as pure music takes firm hold upon the mind and heart. Without programme notes, without any aid whatever in explanation of the meaning of motif or text his music has power to deeply stir and satisfy the listener.

Last evening, the selections from his operatic scores offered contrast and contained some of the more frequently used pieces for concert use. "The Flying Dutchman" overture, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Tannhauser" overture provided the brilliant portion of the programme, and excerpts from "The Maestersingers," "Siegfried" and "Lohengrin" brought the more quiet moods.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"	Wagner
"Waldweben" from "Siegfreid" (Act. II)	Wagner
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" (Act III)	Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner

In playing numbers presenting brilliant effects Koussevitzky fully realizes the value of contrast. But he never is harsh or abrupt in bridging extremes of tone volume. With a pliable and responsive playing unit at his command he moves with grace and elegance in sudden crecendo or decrecendo. It is this smoothness, this seeming absence of effort in accomplishing desired effects that makes his work so interesting to the critical auditor apart from the imaginative side of his art. The etherial character of the music in the "Lohengrin" prelude and the beauty of the "Introduction to Act 3, 'The Mastersingers,'" were shown with the players in nice technical accord. The strings were delightfully delicate in the former number.

In the second part of the programme the "Waldweben," or "Sounds of the Forest," and the "Good Friday Spell" received careful and effective reading. In both of these excerpts, Koussevitzky was successful in bringing out in pleasing manner various individual instrumental voices. This ability to delicately adjust his many voiced choir gives him command of a myriad of tonal tints and results in a satisfying sense of completeness in the effects obtained.

The favorite "Tannhauser" overture brought the concert to a close. Koussevitzky's reading of this number while not one of unusual brilliance, was filled with kaleidoscopic effects. The men played it with fine unanimity and spirit.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING

WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVENING

APR 22 1925

HARVARD GLEE CLUB IN BRAHMS' REQUIEM

Last Thursday and Friday evenings at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Harvard Glee Club, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kousevitzky conducting; gave the Brahms "Requiem" to two crowded houses.

The "Requiem" represents the pinnacle of the glee club's achievement, and the critics are lavish in their praises.

The appearance of M. Kousevitzky with the glee club is a great tribute to the club and its conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison since the conductor of the Boston Symphony has not appeared as guest conductor at any other time in this country.

---

pianist the average it, as well as play. It loves "from that useful surface M symphonic music is thickly co

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 22 1925

Final Symphony Orchestra Concert

The final concert of the oBston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night brought out the largest crowd of the season, which vied with the audience of the opening concert in rendering tribute to M. Koussevitsky and his ensemble. He, very graciously, shared the loud applause with his men both at the pre-intermission number and at the close.

The program was in every way an excellent one. It follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; introduction to act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; introduction to act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie," Wagner; "Waldweben" from "Siegfreid" (Act. II), Wagner; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," (Act III), Wagner; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

An all-Wagnerian program is sufficient inducement for anybody to drop whatever work is in hand to sit at the feet of the great master in Providence as well as in Bayreuth. M. Koussevitsky selected the Wagner number to display, by contrast, the many facets of this great musical intelligence. The sustained richness, the exaltation of love as a guiding motive, in the prelude to "Lohengrin," with its lovely passages carried by the first strings and the virility, strength and wildness of the "Ride fof the Valkyries," the godesses bringing the dead heroes to Valhalla show Wagner in differing moods.

What can one say of Wagner that has not been said before, and better, than that he grows upon one with each new hearing, and there comes a deeper appreciation of the man who could write so much and such beautiful music. After getting a taste of Wagner last night, one can understand why Europe trekked to the Bayreuth shrine for the festival.

M. Kouusevitsky, of course, was at his best. Under his direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to increase in strength at each new hearing. The astounding energy of the man drew from the men a full and satisfying response. It takes energy to conduct an all-Wagnerian program, and M. Koussevitsky has it. The program announced that M. Koussevitsky will be heard in Providence next season, in a series of five concerts, which means that he has passed through the probation period and that we shall hear him for a few more seasons. This is pleasant news, and Providence will welcome him back next year with as much enthusiasm as it closed his season last night.

American Apr [illegible]

SYMPHONY TO END SEASON NEXT WEEK

The new week will have the last of the season's Symphony concerts under Serge Koussevitzky as conductor. Monday will bring the last of the Monday evening series in Symphony Hall; Thursday, the last of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theatre, and Friday afternoon and evening, the close of the regular season in Symphony Hall.

The Monday program will consist of Vivaldi's Organ Concerto which figured upon Koussevitzky's very first program of the season, Franck's Symphonic Variations in which Mieczyslaw Munz, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist with the orchestra, and Tckaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

At the last pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, the second to be given on Friday instead of Saturday evening, the Cecilia Chorus will again be added to the orchestra in a repetition of Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire," and Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

News

APR 22 1925

-:- MUSIC -:-

The Boston Symphony

At Infantry Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky gave its last concert of the season here. It was an all-Wagner programme.

Mr. Koussevitzky's opening number was the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Its unrivalled storm theme glowed and pulsed with vitality under his baton. Following it came the prelude to "Lohengrin." In that one listened to enchanted strings as the conductor drew sheer ecstasy from them.

Somewhat less interesting was the exposition of the introduction to Act III. of the same opera and the "Ride of the Valkyries," in itself one of the weirdest tonal dramas ever written. Last night it lost some of its epic quality. The vastness of the great elemental picture was not quite there.

Then came the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," which brought us again under Mr. Koussevitzky's spell, and the mystery of the forest was upon us.

One felt especially grateful to the conductor and his great group of musicians for the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal." Freed from all the theatrical effects inevitable to the production of the opera itself, one felt the sacred spell of what is often accounted Wagner's greatest music.

The "Tannhauser" overture was played last, and played brilliantly. The range of this programme thus covered the whole of Wagner's career. It included the introduction to Act III. of the only comedy he wrote, the "Mastersingers." In playing that superb work the Boston Symphony brought out all the wistfulness of the theme. One felt the throbbing life of the old master singer beloved of his townfolk and yearning for his Eva.

Mr. Koussevitzky is beyond doubt a great artist and a vividly intelligent orchestral leader. The dreamer is uppermost in his character, but he can at times give music a masterful dramatic force.

R. de A. J.

9-10

Herald Apr 23

25

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Siegfried's funeral music from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods" will be performed in memory of John Singer Sargent at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged this program: Mozart, Symphony C major (K. 425); Prokofieff, Violin Concerto (Mr. Burgin); Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser." When Prokofieff's violin concerto was performed for the first time at Mr. Koussevitzky's concert in the Paris Opera House on October 18, 1923, Marcel Darrieux was the violinist. The program contained this note: "The concerto was begun by the composer in 1913 and completed in that year. Like the piano concertos, the first and third of which are known by Parisian audiences, the violin concerto, in spite of its great technical difficulties, is not a virtuoso piece, it's symphonic. The concerto has not yet been performed at a symphony concert and the first performance of the work is at the same time the first on the platform of a symphony concert."

The other pieces on this week's program do not call for comment—they are more or less familiar: Schubert's symphony in B flat

A correspondent wishes to know if any "genuine pupils of Liszt" are now living. Yes, indeed. One of the more famous of the later generation is now in New York: Alexander Siloti. In the '80s some American students used to make a pilgrimage to Weimar. Having been allowed to hear some of Liszt's pupils play in the presence of Liszt, they returned to this country and called themselves his pupils.

The program of the extra Symphony concert next Monday night will be as follows: Vivaldi Concer or

---

ranscript apr 23

TEN

Curre

PROKOVIEV RETURNS, PIANISTS' PROGRESS, ROUND OF CONCERTS

NEW VIOLIN-CONCERTO FROM THE RUSSIAN

Mr. Burgin to Play It at Symphony Hall —Miss Williams and a Program—The Better Way of the Wiser Youngsters—Mr. Gershwin's Second Chance — Two "Isles of the Dead" — Incidents and Prospects

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will proffer his last novel piece for the season—Prokoviev's new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Here in Boston, Mr. Burgin, after long preparation, will play the violin-part. In Berlin, Paris and London Mr. Joseph Szigeti has lately played it—and somehow it has gained reputation as the most difficult music yet laid upon bow and strings. Of such matters only fiddlers may judge; while the audiences at Symphony Hall are likely to be more keen for pleasure than for prowess. The degree to which they will receive it, evidently depends upon the state of the listening mind. Mr. Scholes, for example, sat before the Concerto in London and next day wrote in The Observer:

> In his new violin-concerto, Prokoviev makes big demands. He asks for the utmost agility from the soloist and a constant alertness from the orchestra. As far as one could judge with such unfamiliar music, all responded. Mr. Szigeti in the Scherzo was as nimble as a grig. A good deal of his work here was of the nature of forcible prestissimo sawing, very wearing to the bow, and it would have been worth a deaf man's while to have been present to see the ready way in which the violin seized the opportunity of a short rest to snatch off the wisps of broken horse-hair, and of a long rest to whip the mute out of or into his waistcoat pocket. Some people grumbled about this movement, but "scherzo" means "joke" and never was scherzo more scherzoso. The preceding movement, despite some beauty, seemed a little tame; the finale had more force. It is plain that this violin-concerto is, in one way, of the same order as the piano-concerto of Stravinsky. It comprises in rather startling proximity passages that glance meditatively into history and others that gaze, wild-eyed, into futurity.

Mr. Scholes's colleague of The Morning Post was half indignant and half amused. "Music," he wrote, "can indulge in a wealth of fancies without seeking a clue outside itself, but here music broke away from its own argument and each listener had to discover a motive in the proceedings. At first the consequential, purposeless toddling to and fro suggested a child amusing itself with toys. One watched it on the border-line between marvelling at the infant's resource and wishing that it would do something definite. Then the imp receded into a Rackham drawing, and from the freakish Scherzo—with the violin half insect, half goblin—to the end this remained, for at least one listener, the clue to unquestioning enjoyment of Prokoviev's Concerto. If any doubts existed whether he is a creative musician or a poseur, that orchestral vision in the last movemen should have settled them."

Programs in Prospect

Mr. Koussevitzky has put by Mozart's Symphony in C major announced for the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday, and in Cambridge on the following Thursday. For it he has substituted an early and seldom-played Symphony of Schubert, Number Five, in B-flat major. If memory holds, Dr. Muck also revived it.

Novel

[illegible] Apr. 25

PROGRAM

The program announced for the opening night of the "Pops" will take place a week from Monday, May 4, in Symphony Hall.

This will be the 40th season of the "Pops," and the ninth under their no conductor, Agide Jacchia. There will the usual orchestra of 80 Symph players, and the usual accompanim of refreshments served at the ta which will cover the floor of the a auditorium. The "Pops," as usual will be given every night and on alternate Sundays.

The opening program follows:

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota from the suite "Hispania"	Stoe[illegible] Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation) (Orchestrated by A. Jacchia)	[illegible]-Zucca
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"	[illegible]kovsky
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Valse Triste	Sibelius
French Military March	[illegible]-Saens

86

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 22 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An all Wagner programme was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's offering last evening at its final appearance of the season here. Infantry hall held practically a capacity audience, quite the usual thing nowadays at these concerts, and anticipations aroused by the makeup of the programme were realized in the performance under Serge Koussevitzky. The Russian conductor, now completing his first season with the Boston orchestra, received proof of his popularity with Providence patrons in demonstrations at various points in the concert. After the brilliant playing of the "The Ride of the Valkyries" in mid programme and at the close of the final number he made his players rise and share in acknowledging the audience's enthusiastic applause.

It seems quite the rule with American concert orchestras to give an all Wagner programme when they would make a particular concert an outstanding event. This of course, is done in response to public liking and appreciation of the German master's music. In his great collection of orchestral works drawn from his operas there is ideal concert material. It it music that is uplifting, never trivial. Whatever the inspiration of these great tone pictures the effect as pure music takes firm hold upon the mind and heart. Without programme notes, without any aid whatever in explanation of the meaning of motif or text his music has power to deeply stir and satisfy the listener.

Last evening, the selections from his operatic scores offered contrast and contained some of the more frequently used pieces for concert use. "The Flying Dutchman" overture, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Tannhauser" overture provided the brilliant portion of the programme, and excerpts from "The Maestersingers," "Siegfried" and "Lohengrin" brought the more quiet moods.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"	Wagner
"Waldweben" from "Siegfreid" (Act. II)	Wagner
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" (Act III)	Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner

In playing numbers presenting brilliant effects Koussevitzky fully realizes the value of contrast. But he never is harsh or abrupt in bridging extremes of tone volume. With a pliable and responsive playing unit at his command he moves with grace and elegance in sudden crecendo or decrecendo. It is this smoothness, this seeming absence of effort in accomplishing desired effects that makes his work so interesting to the critical auditor apart from the imaginative side of his art. The etherial character of the music in the "Lohengrin" prelude and the beauty of the "Introduction to Act 3, 'The Mastersingers,'" were shown with the players in nice technical accord. The strings were delightfully delicate in the former number.

In the second part of the programme the "Waldweben," or "Sounds of the Forest," and the "Good Friday Spell" received careful and effective reading. In both of these excerpts, Koussevitzky was successful in bringing out in pleasing manner various individual instrumental voices. This ability to delicately adjust his many voiced choir gives him command of a myriad of tonal tints and results in a satisfying sense of completeness in the effects obtained.

The favorite "Tannhauser" overture brought the concert to a close. Koussevitsky's reading of this number while not one of unusual brilliance, was filled with kaleidoscopic effects. The men played it with fine unanimity and spirit.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING ...

WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVENING

APR 22 1925

HARVARD GLEE CLUB IN BRAHMS' REQUIEM

Last Thursday and Friday evenings at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Harvard Glee Club, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kousevitzky conducting; gave the Brahms "Requiem" to two crowded houses.

The "Requiem" represents the pinnacle of the glee club's achievement, and the critics are lavish in their praises.

The appearance of M. Kousevitzky with the glee club is a great tribute to the club and its conductor, Dr. A. T. Davison since the conductor of the Boston Symphony has not appeared as guest conductor at any other time in this country.

---

pianist... the average
it, as well as up... play. It loves "from...
that useful surface M... symphonic music is thickly co...

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 22 1925

Final Symphony Orchestra Concert

The final concert of the oBston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night brought out the largest crowd of the season, which vied with the audience of the opening concert in rendering tribute to M. Koussevitsky and his ensemble. He, very graciously, shared the loud applause with his men both at the pre-intermission number and at the close.

The program was in every way an excellent one. It follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; introduction to act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; introduction to act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie," Wagner; "Waldweben" from "Siegfreid" (Act. II), Wagner; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," (Act III), Wagner; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

An all-Wagnerian program is sufficient inducement for anybody to drop whatever work is in hand to sit at the feet of the great master in Providence as well as in Bayreuth. M. Kousseyitsky selected the Wagner number to display, by contrast, the many facets of this great musical intelligence. The sustained richness, the exaltation of love as a guiding motive, in the prelude to "Lohengrin," with its lovely passages carried by the first strings and the virility, strength and wildness of the "Ride fof the Valkyries," the godesses bringing the dead heroes to Valhalla show Wagner in differing moods.

What can one say of Wagner that has not been said before, and better, than that he grows upon one with each new hearing, and there comes a deeper appreciation of the man who could write so much and such beautiful music. After getting a taste of Wagner last night, one can understand why Europe trekked to the Bayreuth shrine for the festival.

M. Kouusevitsky, of course, was at his best. Under his direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to increase in strength at each new hearing. The astounding energy of the man drew from the men a full and satisfying response. It takes energy to conduct an all-Wagnerian program, and M. Koussevitsky has it. The program announced that M. Koussevitsky will be heard in Providence next season, in a series of five concerts, which means that he has passed through the probation period and that we shall hear him for a few more seasons. This is pleasant news, and Providence will welcome him back next year with as much enthusiasm as it closed his season last night.

SYMPHONY TO END SEASON NEXT WEEK

The new week will have the last of the season's Symphony concerts under Serge Koussevitzky as conductor. Monday will bring the last of the Monday evening series in Symphony Hall; Thursday, the last of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theatre, and Friday afternoon and evening, the close of the regular season in Symphony Hall.

The Monday program will consist of Vivaldi's Organ Concerto which figured upon Koussevitzky's very first program of the season, Franck's Symphonic Variations in which Mieczyslaw Munz, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist with the orchestra, and Tckaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

At the last pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, the second to be given on Friday instead of Saturday evening, the Cecilia Chorus will again be added to the orchestra in a repetition of Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire," and Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

News

APR 22 1925

-:- MUSIC -:-

The Boston Symphony

At Infantry Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky gave its last concert of the season here. It was an all-Wagner programme.

Mr. Koussevitzky's opening number was the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Its unrivalled storm theme glowed and pulsed with vitality under his baton. Following it came the prelude to "Lohengrin." In that one listened to enchanted strings as the conductor drew sheer ecstasy from them.

Somewhat less interesting was the exposition of the introduction to Act III. of the same opera and the "Ride of the Valkyries," in itself one of the weirdest tonal dramas ever written. Last night it lost some of its epic quality. The vastness of the great elemental picture was not quite there.

Then came the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," which brought us again under Mr. Koussevitzky's spell, and the mystery of the forest was upon us.

One felt especially grateful to the conductor and his great group of musicians for the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal." Freed from all the theatrical effects inevitable to the production of the opera itself, one felt the sacred spell of what is often accounted Wagner's greatest music.

The "Tannhauser" overture was played last, and played brilliantly. The range of this programme thus covered the whole of Wagner's career. It included the introduction to Act III. of the only comedy he wrote, the "Mastersingers." In playing that superb work the Boston Symphony brought out all the wistfulness of the theme. One felt the throbbing life of the old master singer beloved of his townfolk and yearning for his Eva.

Mr. Koussevitzky is beyond doubt a great artist and a vividly intelligent orchestral leader. The dreamer is uppermost in his character, but he can at times give music a masterful dramatic force.

R. de A. J.

25

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Siegfried's funeral music from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods" will be performed in memory of John Singer Sargent at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged this program: Mozart, Symphony C major (K. 425); Prokofieff, Violin Concerto (Mr. Burgin); Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser." When Prokofieff's violin concerto was performed for the first time at Mr. Koussevitzky's concert in the Paris Opera House on October 18, 1923, Marcel Darrieux was the violinist. The program contained this note: "The concerto was begun by the composer in 1913 and completed in that year. Like the piano concertos, the first and third of which are known by Parisian audiences, the violin concerto, in spite of its great technical difficulties, is not a virtuoso piece, it's symphonic. The concerto has not yet been performed at a symphony concert and the first performance of the work is at the same time the first on the platform of a symphony concert."

The other pieces on this week's program do not call for comment—they are more or less familiar: Schubert's symphony in B flat

A correspondent wishes to know if any "genuine pupils of Liszt" are now living. Yes, indeed. One of the more famous of the later generation is now in New York: Alexander Siloti. In the '80s some American students used to make a pilgrimage to Weimar. Having been allowed to hear some of Liszt's pupils play in the presence of Liszt, they returned to this country and called themselves his pupils.

The program of the extra Symphony concert next Monday night will be as follows: Vivaldi, Concer
org

Transcript Apr 23

TEN

Curre

PROKOVIEV RETURNS, PIANISTS' PROGRESS, ROUND OF CONCERTS

NEW VIOLIN-CONCERTO FROM THE RUSSIAN

Mr. Burgin to Play It at Symphony Hall—Miss Williams and a Program—The Better Way of the Wiser Youngsters—Mr. Gershwin's Second Chance—Two "Isles of the Dead"—Incidents and Prospects

At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will proffer his last novel piece for the season—Prokoviev's new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Here in Boston, Mr. Burgin, after long preparation, will play the violin-part. In Berlin, Paris and London Mr. Joseph Szigeti has lately played it—and somehow it has gained reputation as the most difficult music yet laid upon bow and strings. Of such matters only fiddlers may judge; while the audiences at Symphony Hall are likely to be more keen for pleasure than for prowess. The degree to which they will receive it, evidently depends upon the state of the listening mind. Mr. Scholes, for example, sat before the Concerto in London and next day wrote in The Observer:

> In his new violin-concerto, Prokoviev makes big demands. He asks for the utmost agility from the soloist and a constant alertness from the orchestra. As far as one could judge with such unfamiliar music, all responded. Mr. Szigeti in the Scherzo was as nimble as a grig. A good deal of his work here was of the nature of forcible prestissimo sawing, very wearing to the bow, and it would have been worth a deaf man's while to have been present to see the ready way in which the violin seized the opportunity of a short rest to snatch off the wisps of broken horse-hair, and of a long rest to whip the mute out of or into his waistcoat pocket. Some people grumbled about this movement, but "scherzo" means "joke" and never was scherzo more scherzoso. The preceding movement, despite some beauty, seemed a little tame; the finale had more force. It is plain that this violin-concerto is, in one way, of the same order as the piano-concerto of Stravinsky. It comprises in rather startling proximity passages that glance meditatively into history and others that gaze, wild-eyed, into futurity.

Mr. Scholes's colleague of The Morning Post was half indignant and half amused. "Music," he wrote, "can indulge in a wealth of fancies without seeking a clue outside itself, but here music broke away from its own argument and each listener had to discover a motive in the proceedings. At first the consequential, purposeless toddling to and fro suggested a child amusing itself with toys. One watched it on the border-line between marvelling at the infant's resource and wishing that it would do something definite. Then the imp receded into a Rackham drawing, and from the freakish Scherzo—with the violin half insect, half goblin—to the end this remained, for at least one listener, the clue to unquestioning enjoyment of Prokoviev's Concerto. If any doubts existed whether he is a creative musician or a poseur, that orchestral vision in the last movement should have settled them."

Programs in Prospect

Mr. Koussevitzky has put by Mozart's Symphony in C major announced for the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday, and in Cambridge on the following Thursday. For it he has substituted an early and seldom-played Symphony of Schubert, Number Five, in B-flat major. If memory holds, Dr. Muck also revived it.

Novel...

Traveler Apr. 25

PROGRAM

The program [illegible] for the opening night of the "Pops" will take [illegible]ce a week from Monday, May 4, in Symphony Hall.

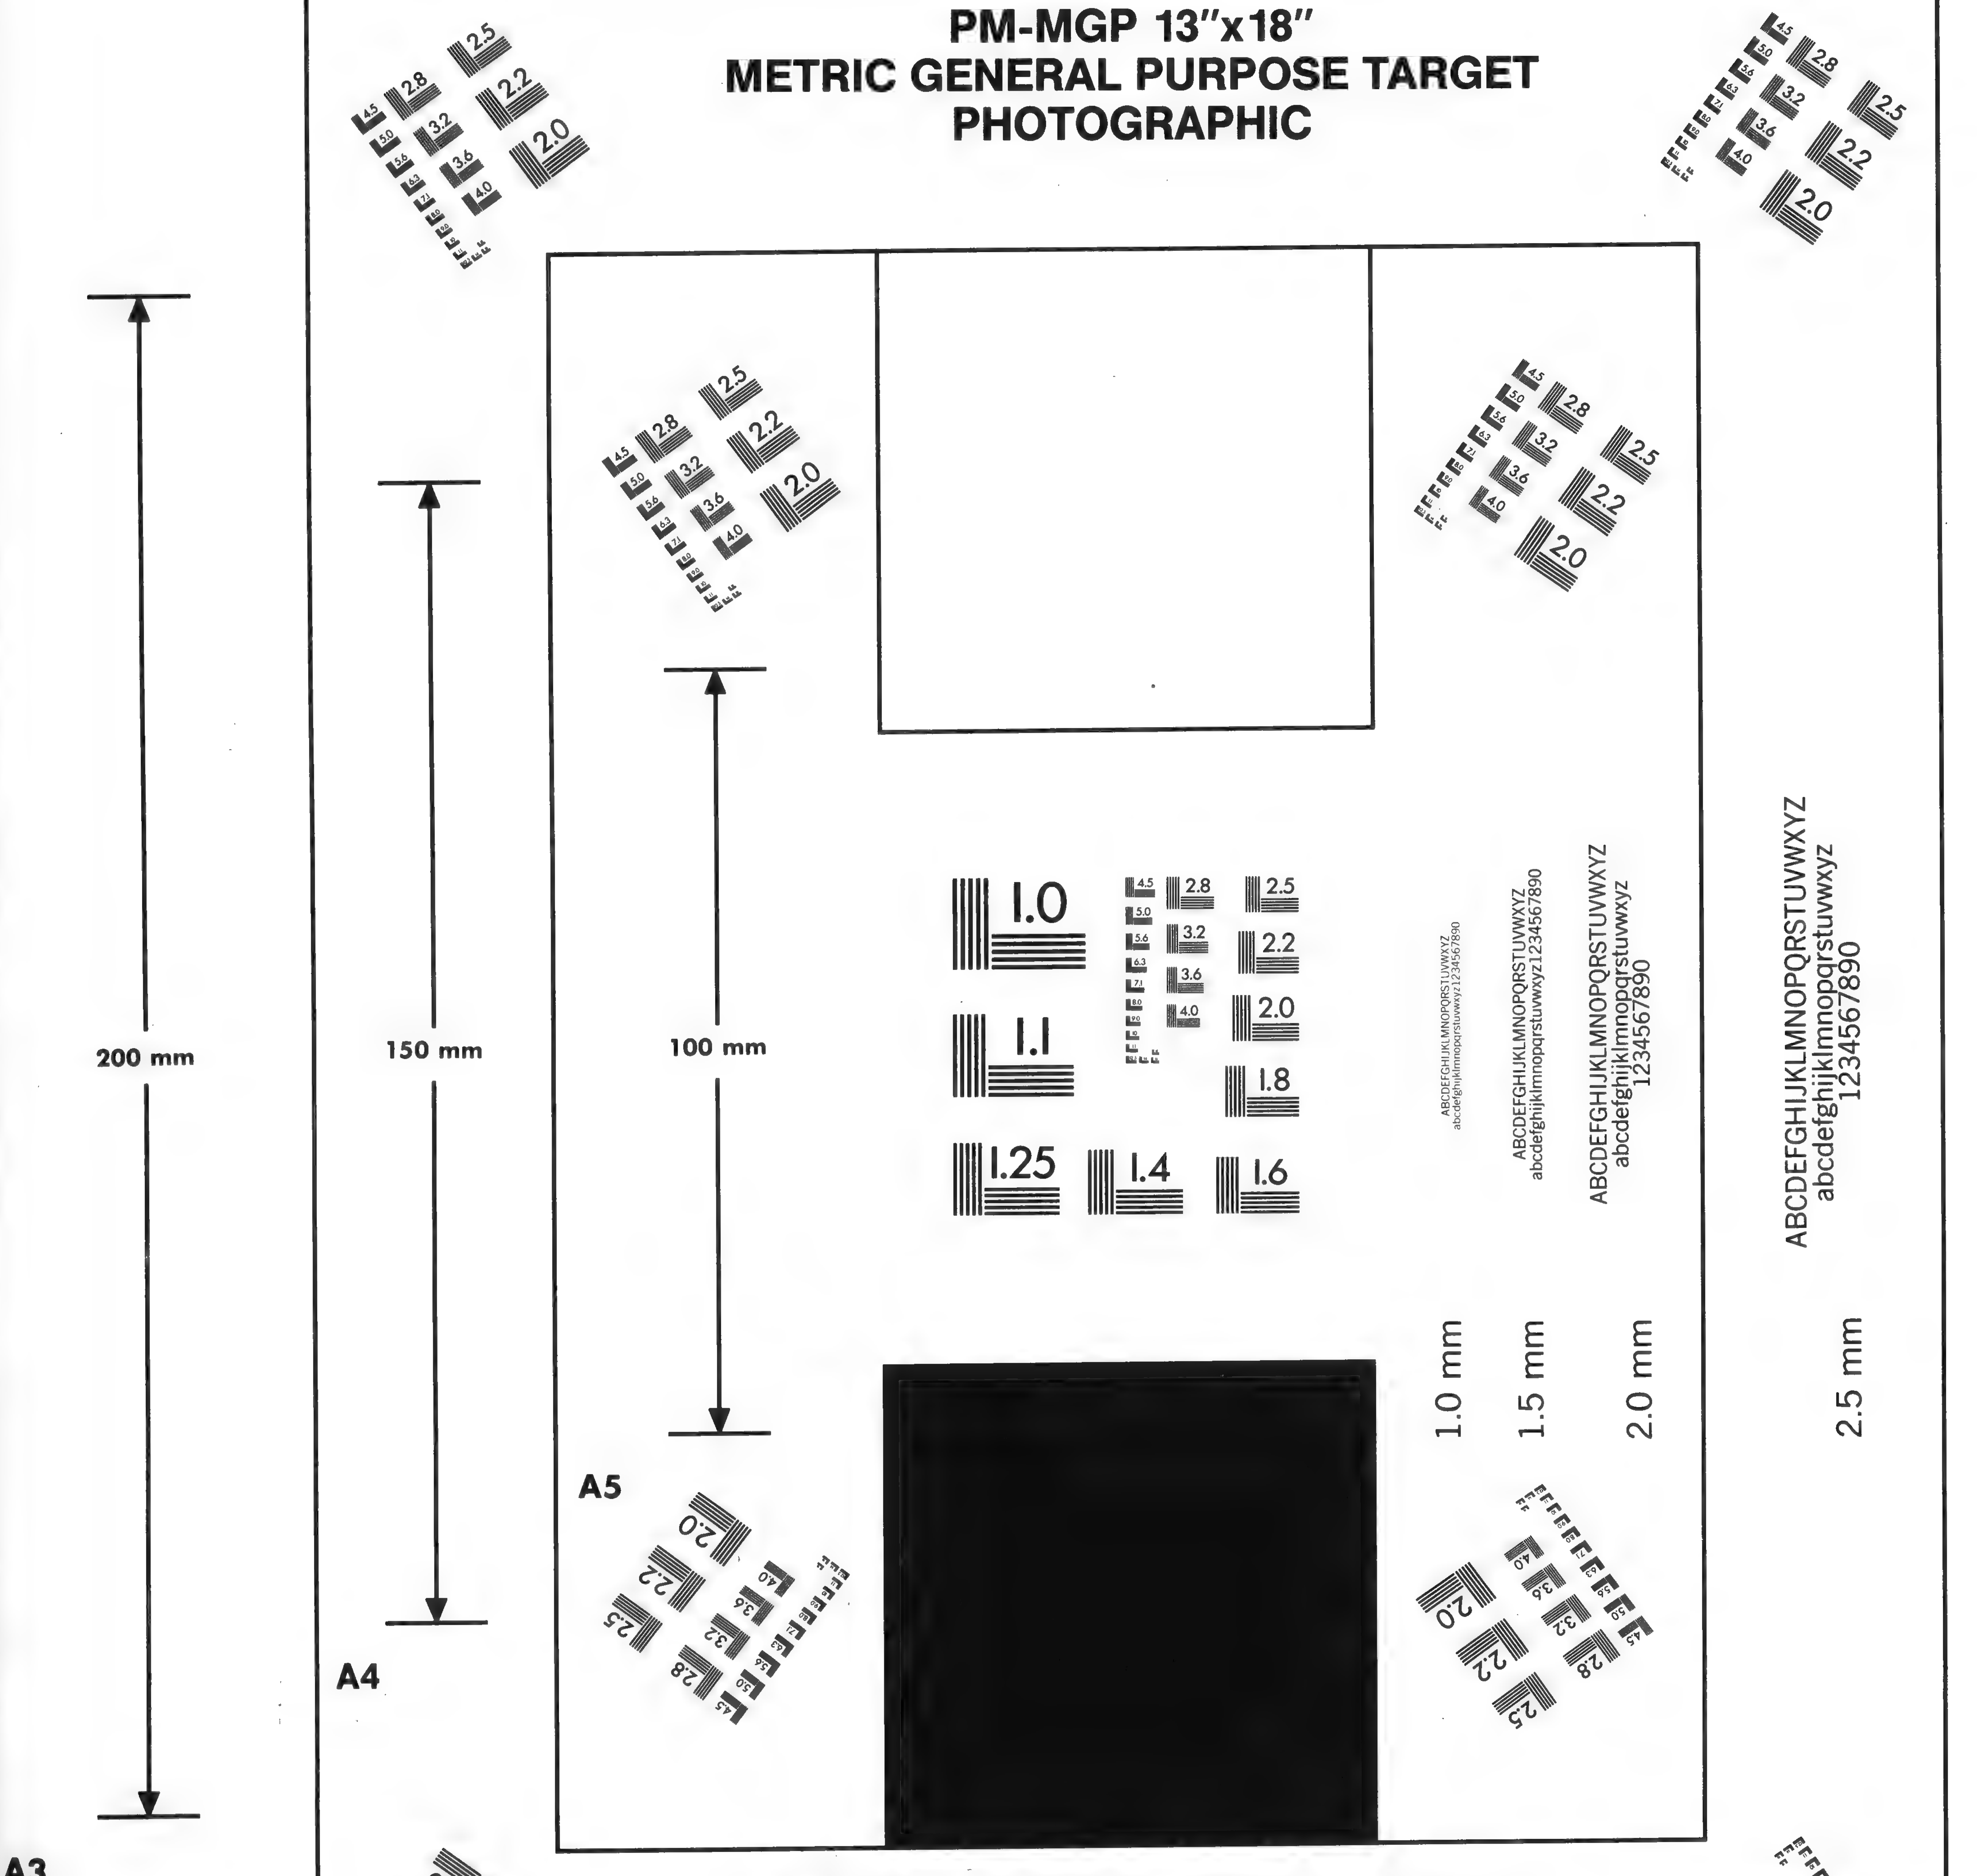
This will be the 40th season of [illegible] "Pops," and the ninth under their not[illegible] conductor, Agide Jacchia. There will [illegible] the usual orchestra of 80 Symph[illegible] players, and the usual accompanim[illegible] of refreshments served at the tables which will cover the floor of the august auditorium. The "Pops," as usual will be given every night and on alternate Sundays.

The opening program follows:

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota from the suite "Hispania"	Stoe[illegible]Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	[illegible]iordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation) (Orchestrated by A. Jacc[illegible])	[illegible]a-Zucca
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bum[illegible]e"	Rim[illegible]orsakov
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"	[illegible]kovsky
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
[illegible]alse Triste	[illegible]ibelius
[illegible]rench Military March	[illegible]t-Saens

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
6.3
3.6
7.1
4.0
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Transcript
April 25

DAY OF INCIDENT, DAY OF PLAUDITS, DAY OF PROKOVIEV

THE MANY SIDES OF A SYMPHONY CONCERT

Sargent Commemorated—Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Burgin Applauded—Shouts for an Overture Magnified—Schubert for Dullness—The Strange New Magic of the Russian's Violin-Concerto

THE WORLD do move." At last a memorial piece has been played at a Symphony Concert without a hand-clap for ill-timed sequence. Such commemorations by music more abounded in Mr. Higginson's day, and almost invariably ended in a patter of applause for piece and performance. Under the succeeding trustees they have been rarer, prudently reserved for memories both illustrious and familiar. Listeners have better understood; while in the present instance of Mr. Sargent, the painter, they needed no prompting. In the auditorium yesterday the only flaw upon ceremonial was the disposition of some to rise and of others to remain seated. In a sense, Mr. Koussevitzky gave cue, when he set the orchestra on its feet at the beginning of the memorial piece; but for two years past the public of Symphony Hall has not been of one mind as to these up-standings "of homage." With a Sargent-like independence, each hearer now chose his own posture.

Once more, however, as the music for the dead Siegfried sounded from the stage, there was reason to regret the lack of memorial pieces in current orchestral repertories. The second movement of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" is too long a preface to a concert; Mozart's "Masonic Mourning Music" has passed out of the fashion; Theodore Thomas's plangent arrangement of the Funeral March from Chopin's Piano-Sonata is well nigh forgotten. Not many of the dead warrant Wagner's mighty clamors across the darkening doom of the Teuton gods; while for not a few of the living the music bears insistent connotations. There pass the Volsungs longing and fated; Siegmund's sword flashes; Siegfried's horn sounds; to Brünnhilde's rock he mounts—and death is swallowed up in victory. Pagan pages, besides, is this glorification of Siegfried the Hero, last of Wotan's line. The summer-leisure of conductors draws near. They might advisedly ponder funeral-musics.

Commemorations passed, the warmth of applause, as the concert went forward, was both unusual and deserved. Mr. Richard Burgin is the valiant concert-master of the orchestra. From the first desk of the violins it is his habit both to steady and to spur the string choir. On either score few of his predecessors matched him. He excels likewise in incidental solo-measures, as when a week ago he was voice to the Hero's evasive Helpmate in Strauss's tone-poem. Yet an appreciating audience may single him out for reward only when he plays the solo-part in a Concerto. Last season, he put by the opportunity. Yesterday, he rose to it in the new and exacting music of Prokoviev. At every pause, and thrice and four times at the close, the audience clapped him; his mates of the orchestra joined their plaudits; the conductor warmly shook his hand. Such applause for such work is heart-warming. . . . Again, at the end of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," the hall rang with an unmistakable call for the composer. Contrary to his custom, he left his seat in the balcony; came upon the stage; was clapped there to the echo; almost embraced by the fervent conductor. As though all this were not enough for one afternoon, actual shouts acclaimed the playing of the Overture to "Tannhäuser." By a universal thrill, the performance was set instanter among Mr. Koussevitzky's masterly and magniloquent works.

Even here, the memoranda of the day may not end. For a quarter of a century Mr. Georges Longy has sat in the orchestra as first oboe. Yesterday, sitting in the auditorium, he was listener to it for the first time. He craved the opportunity before he retires at the end of next week, departing to France. With Mr. Speyer in his stead in the wind-choir, he received it. To record his sensations would be interesting. . . . Finally, a consequence or two of the new reseating of the violins stood clear. Their massed voices do gain in sonority and incisiveness when a Wagner or a Loeffler drives them firm and full and hard; while the sight of thirty-two unified and sweeping bows impresses both the seeing and the imagining eye.

There was also music—of a persistent, penetrating dullness in Schubert's Symphony in B-flat major; of a romantic spirit and a masterly hand in Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem; of an ancient and hackneyed eloquence, suddenly become new, strange and all-compelling in the Overture to "Tannhäuser." Seemingly, this early Symphony of Schubert has an unaccountable fascination for conductors. Sir Georg Henschel had not long led the orchestra in the eighties before he thrust it into the repertory. With him, it perished, until Dr. Muck revived it in 1908—to a boredom that more than one listener recalled when Mr. Koussevitzky substituted it for the announced Symphony of Mozart. Through half the season—the gossips said—he had been lusting to play it. Yet not a whit did he lessen the blank tedium, the hollow emptiness, to an audience of 1925. Rather he multiplied both, when he took the slow division, in itself long-drawn, at a bedraggling and sentimentalizing pace. Faithfully, Schubert follows the "best models" in his Vienna at the turn of the eighteenth into the nineteenth century. He works out the forms; he fills them to the brim with notes; prattles at his studious task; plays about in an innocent system of tuneful mathematics. Though the interval was brief, his affluence of instrumental melody, his exhaustless and spontaneous musical invention, the radiance, the charm, the passion and the pain of him, were all to come. Schubert of this Symphony in B-flat is only workaday (but tireless) music-maker according to a formula. As it happened the foreseeing program-book contained two entertaining essays. For almost the first time in the long course of twenty-three concerts, some listened, while others read.

Nor is Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" among the more characteristic and possessing of his symphonic pieces. Into music he would translate the moods and the motion of a poem by Verlaine, "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles"—verse of dewy freshness and loveliness, shimmering with the imagery of morning, stayed or spurred from suspension through suspension to expansive climax. The poet evokes sounds, sights, glints of dawn. They are counterpart to the evoking of his mistress still in sleep. Upon her, upon him, upon all the earth, breaks the golden day. Like the poet, Mr. Loeffler builds his music upon a single theme. Like the poetry, the music quickens, deepens, presses upward and forward. As Verlaine alternates his images of affection with his images of earth, so Mr. Loeffler contrives variants to his tonal progress. The scheme is the device of a poetically minded composer; the invention and workmanship, of a composer musically resourceful as well. The shortcoming seems to be a pursuit of recurring sonorities, an eagerness to match the poet's ardors with an equal propulsive power.

Now Mr. Loeffler up-piling tonal masses, driving hither, expanding thither, mounting yet again, is no more than admirable and effective composer. The Loeffler of poetized perception, super-sensitive play of mood, subtlety of means, rarefied or intensified imagination, sounds only in the details of "La Bonne Chanson"—a modulation here, a transition there, a sudden suffusion of harmonic and instrumental coloring. They tingle upon the waiting ear, warm the prepared spirit—but the commerce of the concert-room is give and take, swiftly. Once the sonorities are in motion, they will gain the upper hand. . . . And there were enough of them in Mr Koussevitzky's version of the Overture to "Tännhauser." He hymned the unfolding Pilgrims' Chorus; heated the Venusberg music into obsession. The revels steamed, writhed, bit, pierced by the clarinet's song to the goddess. Upon them crept, flooded, surged the returning chorus. Epical, universal, of all the sensuality and all the spirituality in us men, became this romantical Wagner, busy with his preluding to "Tannhäuser und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg." These parts and times have hardly heard such an exaltation of the music.

Yet the revelation of the day remained Prokoviev's Concerto for Violin. For he has done the miracle—written a music that sounds like no other in the kind, revitalizing a withered form, pursuing, and sometimes capturing, a fitful, evasive beauty; gaining new and strange sonorities, restless again but also magical. The attendant orchestra no more than pairs the wood-winds and trumpets; few and sparingly used are the instruments of percussion. The part for the solo-violin is abrupt, changeful, exacting, hard to keep in mind and at the fingers' ends, rather than of superlative difficulty. To a movement Andantino succeeds a Scherzo; to the Scherzo, a movement Moderato. All three are relatively brief, all three are spare-bodied and low-voiced. In the upper tones the violin remains persistently. Yet they are seldom sharp-edged, thin or shrill. Time and again, Prokoviev (and Mr. Burgin) win them to a soft brightness, a singular and penetrating bitter-sweetness. Low-scaled and as gently colored is the orchestral background. Often it has a silvery sheen across which threads the violin, warmer or deeper tinted. There are euphonies, there are dissonances, both hushed rather than outspoken. And new lustres, again gently blended or contrasted. The formal progress avoids the academic orthodoxies; the routined mechanics. Yet in a short-breathed and inconstant music, there is discoverable symphonic web.

More to the point is the impression upon the waiting ear and the answering imagination. It is keenest in the Scherzo, where the violin tosses about glints and flocks of sound; whirrs above the murmuring orchestra; flings this way and that as in a game of fancies and dexterities. The lightness, sportiveness, readiness of it all fascinate. Here is music softly scintillant gay with its own motion, teasingly wayward. The Finale speaks in deeper sensibility and warmer voice. There are restless measures, abruptly shifting between violin and orchestra, and back again. By some urgency of mood, they concentrate into briefly sustained song; dissolve and fly apart anew; while through them seems to run a strange and singular beauty, glimpsed, evasive, tempting, never quite ensnared. The first movement is yet more broken. Like the dove from the ark, nowhere does it find a resting place. The matter is ever in motion and ever in solution. There is no substance to hold the mind; but a rare and curious play of these new lusters of high tone, this low-voiced and insinuating bitter-sweetness—all in incessant mutability. The spell of wandering and change haunts the music, haunts the hearer.

Writing a Concerto for Violin neither Prokoviev's hand nor Prokoviev's imagination is like those of other composers—modernists included. He plies his own magic, follows his own gleam. Faithful to him, Mr. Burgin excelled himself. No large sonorities overtaxed his tone; no brilliancies over-sharpened it; no urgency of mood overdrove it. The soft brightness, the gentle glint, the changeful outline, the evasive moods, the flitting artifice lay all within his powers. Upon him and upon one and another in the audience, Prokoviev also conjured.

H. T. P.

NEW YORK, N. Y. ART NEWS, THE

APR 25 1925

Boston Museum Plans a Memorial Exhibition of Sargent's Pictures

BOSTON—A memorial exhibition in honor of John Singer Sargent is to be held at the Museum of Fine Arts next fall, according to a vote taken by the Museum trustees upon learning from London of Sargent's death. It is planned to open the exhibition at the same time the newest Sargent murals and other decorations for the main stairway are unveiled in the Museum. These were completed by the artist at his London studio just before his passing.

In honor of Sargent the officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed upon the regular Friday and Saturday subscription concerts of April 24 and 25 the Seigfried funeral music from the last act of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." One of Sargent's great works was his charcoal portrait of Major Henry L. Higginson, long the chief supporter of the orchestra.

Apr 25

THE BOSTON HERALD,

23D SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Includes Works by Schubert, Loeffler, Prokofieff, Wagner

WARM TRIBUTE PAID TO SARGENT, ARTIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. At the beginning the orchestra, standing, played Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods" in memory of John Singer Sargent. The audience stood during the performance.

The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony, B flat major, No. 5; Prokofieff, Violin Concerto (first time in America); Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 425 had been announced and notes about it were in the program book. As the book was in the press it was too late to substitute notes for Schubert's Symphony. Why the change was made is a question answered only by "So the conductor wished." Schubert's Symphony No. 5 is not unknown here. It was played from manuscript under Mr. Henschel's leadership in 1883. When it was performed at a Symphony concert in 1908, it was thought that it would be entombed, never to be exhumed again. Some have thought that the music was composed for a little orchestra, a private musical society that grew out of the concerts, at first chiefly of quartet music, given in the house of Schubert's father. The score calls only for a flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns and strings. Writing the symphony, Schubert had the music of Haydn and Mozart in his head, but not the music of their high estate. Occasionally there are hints at the Schubert to be: in this or that melodic figure; in a few modulations not common in the Vienna of 1816; and, alas, in the prolixity. Yesterday the audience was apparently in thankful mood, but when the symphony was played in 1873 at the Crystal Palace, a contemporary critic wrote: "The audience listened with very few signs of lively interest and applauded very slightly."

There are still in Boston men and women who believe in the plenary inspiration of the long-acknowledged great composers. To these believers the name "Schubert" was enough; anything signed by him must be good. And so there was clapping of hands, the customary, yet barbaric, manner of showing rapturous enjoyment.

These believers probably looked with dread on the production of Prokofieff's violin concerto. "Prokofieff"! Any man with a name like that must be a terrible, a dangerous fellow, given to nerve-rasping dissonances, moanings, shrieks, squeals, squeaks and grunts. But, lo, this concerto turned out to be a delightful work, as delightful as it is unusual and individual. Violin concertos in orthodox form are too often boresome. Even those by Beethoven and Brahms are distressingly long-winded, with pages of irritating repetition and yawn-compelling padding. The majority of these concertos should be put in a duck-press before serving. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is an exception, as Hans von Buelow remarked long ago when he freed his mind about Max Bruch and thus annoyed many respectable persons who were "fond of music."

Prokopieff's concerto is not too deliberately unusual. It is free and unconfined but not laboriously so; not from any want of technical skill in the composition. It abounds in ideas, in turn beautiful and joyously humorous. The treatment of these ideas for solo violin and orchestra is as refreshingly interesting as it is original. The "accompaniment" is more than an "accompaniment" in the common meaning of the word; it is symphonic; masterly in itself. There are charming effects of color, surprising but not extravagant; the unexpected is a fresh fascination. The effects in the whole work are gained with such audacious simplicity! Mr. Burgin played superbly and Mr. Koussevitzky reveled in the brilliance of the orchestral performance.

Mr. Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" is justly called a "poem." There are symphonic poems that are pedestrian prose. Mr. Loeffler's is shot through with beauty; there is the enthusiasm, the ex[illegible]ance of romantic feeling; not only [illegible]ine's break of day, but the dawn and the flush of amorous ecstasy. And so Verlaine's adorable little idyl becomes in music a sonorous, eloquent, long-sustained chant of passion. The audience was quick to appreciate the music itself and the character of the performance. Mr. Loeffler was summoned to the platform.

An impressive interpretation of Wagner's overture brought the end. In the final measures Mr. Koussevitzky followed the example of certain conductors and laid great stress on the inner voices for horns. Ah, the walls of Jericho! But those of Symphony hall are stoutly built; the statues in the niches were unshaken; great was the joy of the hearers, as always when there is a thunderous musical speech.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week Friday afternoon and evening (for the customary Saturday night concert will take place in the night before) will be as fololws: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and Siloti's arrangement for strings of the Adagio's from the Organ, Toccata in C major; Scriabin, "Prometheus," Debussy, nocturnes; "Clouds" and "Festivals;" Borodin. Dances with Chorus, from "Prince Izar

---

SYMPHONY IN TRIBUTE TO SARGENT

Post Apr 25

Mr. Burgin Soloist in Prokofiev's Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A ceremony in one respect unusual and in every respect impressive prefaced the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

As memorial tribute to the late John Singer Sargent, Mr. Koussevitzky has placed at the head of this week's programme the Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung" and, unexpectedly but appropriately and effectively, this music was played by a standing orchestra and heard by an audience also risen to its feet.

MR. BURGIN'S ARTISTRY

For no sooner had the orchestra stood—save for the players upon the violoncellos and the harps who, for very practical reasons, remained in their seats—than the audience followed suit. And, keeping unbroken the ceremonial spell, for the first time within memory at the Symphony Concerts this memorial exercise was unmarred by the applause of any thoughtless or unobservant individual who had assumed the music to be part of the day's entertainment.

Once the concert proper had begun, however, the afternoon was marked by by an enthusiasm on the part of the audience, unusual even for this season, wherein the staid Friday subscribers have developed a new responsiveness to music and conductor. To be sure, the Symphony of Schubert, in B-flat major, No. 5, that replaced the Symphony of Mozart, originally announced, was received with no uncommon degree of acclaim, although it was warmly enough applauded.

Tribute to Mr. Loeffler

But Mr. Burgin, both at his appearance upon the platform and at the conclusion of his performance of Prokofiev's enormously difficult Violin Concerto, was applauded with unmistakable heartiness; Mr. Loeffler, summoned to the stage after the performance of his tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," was no less cordially received; and the Overture to "Tannhauser," which brought the concert to a sonorous close, provoked, as it did at last Sunday's Pension Fund Concert, a veritable storm of applause.

Revived by Dr. Muck, several seasons ago, this little-known Symphony of Schubert seemed at that time hardly worth the trouble of the resurrecting. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky has made judicious cuts or whether his tempi were more happily chosen, the piece made yesterday a by no means unagreeable impression, though it were idle to claim for it an important place among Schubert's compositions.

Concerto 10 Years Old

The subject of much comment since its first performance in Paris under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky in the autumn of 1923, Prokofiev's Concerto is actually no new work. Indeed it was at that time already 10 years old. And while it is in many respects a striking and individual achievement, the Concerto is singularly free from that harmonic audacity which we now associate with the name of Prokofiev.

The Concerto runs in three movements, of which the first seems the least consequential; the second is fleet and fanciful, the last unaffe melodious. Music bristling with culties of every sort, it was play masterly fashion by Mr. Burgin this season, both as concertmast as assisting artist, has proved hi more than ever before a most va member of the orchestra.

The Loeffler Music

Played by the Symphony Orch in 1902 and in 1906, subsequently vised, and in its later form twice under Mr. Monteux, Mr. Loef Poem for Orchestra, as it was o nally called, is a richly textu adroitly fashioned music, that yet to, establish itself as of equal with that composer's "La Mort de tagiles" and "A Pagan Poem." Loeffler seems here as one who spe with consummate polish and addr but who has no new and vital thou to communicate.

From Wagner to Wagner, throu Schubert, Prokofiev and Loeffler, concert of yesterday was one of c tinuously brilliant orchestral play confirming yet again the present h estate of the band and once more closing Mr. Koussevitzky's versatil his sympathy with music of many widely varying styles.

blamed.

FUNERAL MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Impressive Tribute to John Singer Sargent

Globe Apr 25

Siegfried's Funeral Music, from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," was played at the beginning of yesterday's Symphony concert, in memory of John Singer Sargent. The orchestra rose to its feet as Koussevitzky came on the stage. After a moment of hesitation the audience also rose, something that has not happened on other occasions when commemorative music has been heard at these concerts.

The dead painter, who cared greatly for music, would perhaps have thought this superb performance of the greatest music Wagner wrote a tribute more splendid than any of the others now being paid his memory all over the world, a tribute even finer than the services in Westminster Abbey. The audience seemed deeply moved. At the end nobody stirred for a moment, and, for the first time on such an occasion, there were no applauders. Very rarely is a public tribute to the memory of a great man so dignified and so heartfelt.

The concert ended with Wagner, as it had begun with his music. Koussevitzky's performance of the "Tannhauser" overture is one of the most superb things he has done here. So to transfigure music as familiar as this that the listener finds it full of new meaning is an achievement. Koussevitzky emphasizes the dramatic values in the overture, brings out the significance of each theme in terms of the operatic situations it accompanies.

One saw the pilgrims marching past, Tannhauser singing his hymn to Venus and the rest of the pictures Wagner must have seen in his mind's eye far better from this illuminating performance in a concert hall than one has yet seen them in an opera house.

Prokofieff's violin concerto, played for the first time in America with Richard Burgin as soloist, is a clever youthful work, giving little indication of real originality but admirably calculated to sound daring in 1913, when it was written. As the work of a boy of 22 it shows promise, but one would have preferred to hear another work from the composer's present maturity. Or is Prokofieff another of the geniuses who has entered his 30s leaving a great future behind him?

Until Boston hears more of his music it would be rash to attempt to put him in his proper place. Mr Burgin played this very exacting music with a skill that was wholly admirable. He has not hitherto done any solo work so well as this here, except in some incidental solos in numbers which for program purposes are purely orchestral.

An early symphony by Schubert, his fifth in B flat major, substituted for the announced Mozart, proved in place curiously Mozartian. The first theme of the first allegro made one wonder whether after all Koussevitzky was not giving us Mozart, but in later passages the Beethovenish final cadences and the Schubertian shifts from major to minor showed the youthful composer playing the not too sedulous ape to others in alternation with attempts to develop his own style. This music was more than a mere historical curiosity. One wondered if after a century Prokofieff's music will sound as spirited and as charming as most of this.

Charles Martin Loeffler was very warmly applauded after the orchestra played his familiar symphonic poem "La Bonne Chanson." Mr Koussevitzky summoned him by a wave of the hand from his place in the balcony right to the stage. The conductor brought out as his predecessors have not done the intensity, the Wagnerian romanticism refined by French good taste, of this music. As with the music of Ravel and of Debussy Mr Koussevitzky finds in Loeffler's work depths of emotion beneath the carefully polished surfaces, the stylistic delicacies.

He brushes aside what may after all be a merely superficial reticence to show in the work of these Frenchmen (and musically speaking Mr Loeffler is French) something of the half-morbid passion of Tchaikovsky.

Next week the evening concert will by exception be given on Friday in order that Mr Koussevitzky may sail a day earlier for important European engagements. Skriabin's "Prometheus" and other music recently heard and liked fill the next program with repetitions.

P. R.

Transcript
Apr 25

CLOSE OF SYMPHONY SEASON

The pending week will bring to a [illegible]se the first season of Serge Kous[illegible]itzky as conductor of the Boston [illegible]phony orchestra. Monday will [illegible]g the last of the Monday evening [illegible]s in Symphony hall; Thursday, the [illegible] of the Cambridge series in Sanders T[illegible]tre; and Friday afternoon and e[illegible]ng, the close of the regular season in [illegible]mphony hall.

[illegible] Monday program will consist of Vi[illegible]'s Organ Concerto which figured upo[illegible] Koussevitzky's first program of the [illegible]son; Franck's Symphonic Variatio[illegible] in which Mieczyslaw Munz, the Po[illegible] pianist, will be the soloist with [illegible]orchestra, and Tckaikovsky's Fifth [illegible]mphony.

At the last pair of concerts in Symphony hall, the second to be given on Friday instead of Saturday evening the Cecilia chorus will again be added the orchestra in a repetition of Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Koussevitzky will also perform Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for strings, Bach's Adagio from Toccata in C major, arranged by Siloti, and Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

87

Transcript April 25

DAY OF INCIDENT, DAY OF PLAUDITS, DAY OF PROKOVIEV

THE MANY SIDES OF A SYMPHONY CONCERT

Sargent Commemorated—Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Burgin Applauded—Shouts for an Overture Magnified—Schubert for Dullness—The Strange New Magic of the Russian's Violin-Concerto

THE WORLD do move." At last a memorial piece has been played at a Symphony Concert without a hand-clap for ill-timed sequence. Such commemorations by music more abounded in Mr. Higginson's day, and almost invariably ended in a patter of applause for piece and performance. Under the succeeding trustees they have been rarer, prudently reserved for memories both illustrious and familiar. Listeners have better understood; while in the present instance of Mr. Sargent, the painter, they needed no prompting. In the auditorium yesterday the only flaw upon ceremonial was the disposition of some to rise and of others to remain seated. In a sense, Mr. Koussevitzky gave cue, when he set the orchestra on its feet at the beginning of the memorial piece; but for two years past the public of Symphony Hall has not been of one mind as to these up-standings "of homage." With a Sargent-like independence, each hearer now chose his own posture.

Once more, however, as the music for the dead Siegfried sounded from the stage, there was reason to regret the lack of memorial pieces in current orchestral repertories. The second movement of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" is too long a preface to a concert; Mozart's "Masonic Mourning Music" has passed out of the fashion; Theodore Thomas's plangent arrangement of the Funeral March from Chopin's Piano-Sonata is well nigh forgotten. Not many of the dead warrant Wagner's mighty clamors across the darkening doom of the Teuton gods; while for not a few of the living the music bears insistent connotations. There pass the Volsungs longing and fated; Siegmund's sword flashes; Siegfried's horn sounds; to Brünnhilde's rock he mounts—and death is swallowed up in victory. Pagan pages, besides, is this glorification of Siegfried the Hero, last of Wotan's line. The summer-leisure of conductors draws near. They might advisedly ponder funeral-musics.

Commemorations passed, the warmth of applause, as the concert went forward, was both unusual and deserved. Mr. Richard Burgin is the valiant concert-master of the orchestra. From the first desk of the violins it is his habit both to steady and to spur the string choir. On either score few of his predecessors matched him. He excels likewise in incidental solo-measures, as when a week ago he was voice to the Hero's evasive Helpmate in Strauss's tone-poem. Yet an appreciating audience may single him out for reward only when he plays the solo-part in a Concerto. Last season, he put by the opportunity. Yesterday, he rose to it in the new and exacting music of Prokoviev. At every pause, and thrice and four times at the close, the audience clapped him; his mates of the orchestra joined their plaudits; the conductor warmly shook his hand. Such applause for such work is heart-warming. . . . Again, at the end of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," the hall rang with an unmistakable call for the composer. Contrary to his custom, he left his seat in the balcony; came upon the stage; was clapped there to the echo; almost embraced by the fervent conductor. As though all this were not enough for one afternoon, actual shouts acclaimed the playing of the Overture to "Tannhäuser." By a universal thrill, the performance was set instanter among Mr. Koussevitzky's masterly and magniloquent works.

Even here, the memoranda of the day may not end. For a quarter of a century Mr. Georges Longy has sat in the orchestra as first oboe. Yesterday, sitting in the auditorium, he was listener to it for the first time. He craved the opportunity before he retires at the end of next week, departing to France. With Mr. Speyer in his stead in the wind-choir, he received it. To record his sensations would be interesting. . . . Finally, a consequence or two of the new reseating of the violins stood clear. Their massed voices do gain in sonority and incisiveness when a Wagner or a Loeffler drives them firm and full and hard; while the sight of thirty-two unified and sweeping bows impresses both the seeing and the imagining eye.

There was also music—of a persistent, penetrating dullness in Schubert's Symphony in B-flat major; of a romantic spirit and a masterly hand in Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem; of an ancient and hackneyed eloquence, suddenly become new, strange and all-compelling in the Overture to "Tannhäuser." Seemingly, this early Symphony of Schubert has an unaccountable fascination for conductors. Sir Georg Henschel had not long led the orchestra in the eighties before he thrust it into the repertory. With him, it perished, until Dr. Muck revived it in 1908—to a boredom that more than one listener recalled when Mr. Koussevitzky substituted it for the announced Symphony of Mozart. Through half the season—the gossips said—he had been lusting to play it. Yet not a whit did he lessen the blank tedium, the hollow emptiness, to an audience of 1925. Rather, he multiplied both, when he took the slow division, in itself long-drawn, at a bedraggling and sentimentalizing pace. Faithfully, Schubert follows the "best models" in his Vienna at the turn of the eighteenth into the nineteenth century. He works out the forms; he fills them to the brim with notes; prattles at his studious task; plays about in an innocent system of tuneful mathematics. Though the interval was brief, his affluence of instrumental melody, his exhaustless and spontaneous musical invention, the radiance, the charm, the passion and the pain of him, were all to come. Schubert of this Symphony in B-flat is only workaday (but tireless) music-maker according to a formula. As it happened the foreseeing program-book contained two entertaining essays. For almost the first time in the long course of twenty-three concerts, some listened, while others read.

Nor is Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" among the more characteristic and possessing of his symphonic pieces. Into music he would translate the moods and the motion of a poem by Verlaine, "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles"—verse of dewy freshness and loveliness, shimmering with the imagery of morning, stayed or spurred from suspension through suspension to expansive climax. The poet evokes sounds, sights, glints of dawn. They are counterpart to the evoking of his mistress still in sleep. Upon her, upon him, upon all the earth, breaks the golden day. Like the poet, Mr. Loeffler builds his music upon a single theme. Like the poetry, the music quickens, deepens, presses upward and forward. As Verlaine alternates his images of affection with his images of earth, so Mr. Loeffler contrives variants to his tonal progress. The scheme is the device of a poetically minded composer; the invention and workmanship, of a composer musically resourceful as well. The shortcoming seems to be a pursuit of recurring sonorities, an eagerness to match the poet's ardors with an equal propulsive power.

Now Mr. Loeffler up-piling tonal masses, driving hither, expanding thither, mounting yet again, is no more than admirable and effective composer. The Loeffler of poetized perception, supersensitive play of mood, subtlety of means, rarefied or intensified imagination, sounds only in the details of "La Bonne Chanson"—a modulation here, a transition there, a sudden suffusion of harmonic and instrumental coloring. They tingle upon the waiting ear, warm the prepared spirit—but the commerce of the concert-room is give and take, swiftly. Once the sonorities are in motion, they will gain the upper hand. . . . And there were enough of them in Mr Koussevitzky's version of the Overture to "Tännhauser." He hymned the unfolding Pilgrims' Chorus; heated the Venusberg music into obsession. The revels steamed, writhed, bit, pierced by the clarinet's song to the goddess. Upon them crept, flooded, surged the returning chorus. Epical, universal, of all the sensuality and all the spirituality in us men, became this romantical Wagner, busy with his preluding to "Tannhäuser und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg." These parts and times have hardly heard such an exaltation of the music.

Yet the revelation of the day remained Prokoviev's Concerto for Violin. For he has done the miracle—written a music that sounds like no other in the kind, revitalizing a withered form, pursuing, and sometimes capturing, a fitful, evasive beauty; gaining new and strange sonorities, restless again but also magical. The attendant orchestra no more than pairs the wood-winds and trumpets; few and sparingly used are the instruments of percussion. The part for the solo-violin is abrupt, changeful, exacting, hard to keep in mind and at the fingers' ends, rather than of superlative difficulty. To a movement Andantino succeeds a Scherzo; to the Scherzo, a movement Moderato. All three are relatively brief, all three are sparebodied and low-voiced. In the upper tones the violin remains persistently. Yet they are seldom sharp-edged, thin or shrill. Time and again, Prokoviev (and Mr. Burgin) win them to a soft brightness, a singular and penetrating bitter-sweetness. Low-scaled and as gently colored is the orchestral background. Often it has a silvery sheen across which threads the violin, warmer or deeper tinted. There are euphonies, there are dissonances, both hushed rather than outspoken. And new lustres, again gently blended or contrasted. The formal progress avoids the academic orthodoxies; the routined mechanics. Yet in a short-breathed and inconstant music, there is discoverable symphonic web.

More to the point is the impression upon the waiting ear and the answering imagination. It is keenest in the Scherzo, where the violin tosses about glints and flocks of sound; whirrs above the murmuring orchestra; flings this way and that as in a game of fancies and dexterities. The lightness, sportiveness, readiness of it all fascinate. Here is music softly scintillant gay with its own motion, teasingly wayward. The Finale speaks in deeper sensibility and warmer voice. There are restless measures, abruptly shifting between violin and orchestra, and back again. By some urgency of mood, they concentrate into briefly sustained song; dissolve and fly apart anew; while through them seems to run a strange and singular beauty, glimpsed, evasive, tempting, never quite ensnared. The first movement is yet more broken. Like the dove from the ark, nowhere does it find a resting place. The matter is ever in motion and ever in solution. There is no substance to hold the mind; but a rare and curious play of these new lusters of high tone, this low-voiced and insinuating bitter-sweetness—all in incessant mutability. The spell of wandering and change haunts the music, haunts the hearer.

Writing a Concerto for Violin neither Prokoviev's hand nor Prokoviev's imagination is like those of other composers—modernists included. He plies his own magic, follows his own gleam. Faithful to him, Mr. Burgin excelled himself. No large sonorities overtaxed his tone; no brilliancies over-sharpened it; no urgency of mood overdrove it. The soft brightness, the gentle glint, the changeful outline, the evasive moods, the fitting artifice lay all within his powers. Upon him and upon one and another in the audience, Prokoviev also conjured.

H. T. P.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
ART NEWS, THE

APR 25 1925

Boston Museum Plans a Memorial Exhibition of Sargent's Pictures

BOSTON—A memorial exhibition in honor of John Singer Sargent is to be held at the Museum of Fine Arts next fall, according to a vote taken by the Museum trustees upon learning from London of Sargent's death. It is planned to open the exhibition at the same time the newest Sargent murals and other decorations for the main stairway are unveiled in the Museum. These were completed by the artist at his London studio just before his passing.

In honor of Sargent the officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed upon the regular Friday and Saturday subscription concerts of April 24 and 25 the Seigfried funeral music from the last act of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." One of Sargent's great works was his charcoal portrait of Major Henry L. Higginson, long the chief supporter of the orchestra.

Apr 25

THE BOSTON HERALD,

23D SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Includes Works by Schubert, Loeffler, Prokofieff, Wagner

WARM TRIBUTE PAID TO SARGENT, ARTIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. At the beginning the orchestra, standing, played Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods" in memory of John Singer Sargent. The audience stood during the performance.

The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony, B flat major, No. 5; Prokofieff, Violin Concerto (first time in America); Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 425 had been announced and notes about it were in the program book. As the book was in the press it was too late to substitute notes for Schubert's Symphony. Why the change was made is a question answered only by "So the conductor wished." Schubert's Symphony No. 5 is not unknown here. It was played from manuscript under Mr. Henschel's leadership in 1883. When it was performed at a Symphony concert in 1908, it was thought that it would be entombed, never to be exhumed again. Some have thought that the music was composed for a little orchestra, a private musical society that grew out of the concerts, at first chiefly of quartet music, given in the house of Schubert's father. The score calls only for a flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns and strings. Writing the symphony, Schubert had the music of Haydn and Mozart in his head, but not the music of their high estate. Occasionally there are hints at the Schubert to be: in this or that melodic figure; in a few modulations not common in the Vienna of 1816; and, alas, in the prolixity. Yesterday the audience was apparently in thankful mood, but when the symphony was played in 1873 at the Crystal Palace, a contemporary critic wrote: "The audience listened with very few signs of lively interest and applauded very slightly."

There are still in Boston men and women who believe in the plenary inspiration of the long-acknowledged great composers. To these believers the name "Schubert" was enough; anything signed by him must be good. And so there was clapping of hands, the customary, yet barbaric, manner of showing rapturous enjoyment.

These believers probably looked with dread on the production of Prokofieff's violin concerto. "Prokofieff"! Any man with a name like that must be a terrible, a dangerous fellow, given to nerve-rasping dissonances, moanings, shrieks, squeals, squeaks and grunts. But, lo, this concerto turned out to be a delightful work, as delightful as it is unusual and individual. Violin concertos in orthodox form are too often boresome. Even those by Beethoven and Brahms are distressingly long-winded, with pages of irritating repetition and yawn-compelling padding. The majority of these concertos should be put in a duck-press before serving. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is an exception, as Hans von Buelow remarked long ago when he freed his mind about Max Bruch and thus annoyed many respectable persons who were "fond of music."

Prokofieff's concerto is not too deliberately unusual. It is free and unconfined but not laboriously so; not from any want of technical skill in the composition. It abounds in ideas, in turn beautiful and joyously humorous. The treatment of these ideas for solo violin and orchestra is as refreshingly interesting as it is original. The "accompaniment" is more than an "accompaniment" in the common meaning of the word; it is symphonic: masterly in itself. There are charming effects of color, surprising but not extravagant; the unexpected is a fresh fascination. The effects in the whole work are gained with such audacious simplicity! Mr. Burgin played superbly and Mr. Koussevitzky reveled in the brilliance of the orchestral performance.

Mr. Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" is justly called a "poem." There are symphonic poems that are pedestrian prose. Mr. Loeffler's is shot through with beauty; there is the enthusiasm, the ex-[illegible]nce of romantic feeling: not only [illegible]ine's break of day, but the dawn and the flush of amorous ecstasy. And so Verlaine's adorable little idyl becomes in music a sonorous, eloquent, long-sustained chant of passion. The audience was quick to appreciate the music itself and the [illegible]acter of the performance. Mr. Loeffler was summoned to the platform.

An impressive interpretation of Wagner's overture brought the end. In the final measures Mr. Koussevitzky followed the example of certain conductors and laid great stress on the inner voices for horns. Ah, the walls of Jericho! But those of Symphony hall are stoutly built; the statues in the niches were unshaken; great was the joy of the hearers, as always when there is a thunderous musical speech.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week Friday afternoon and evening (for the customary Saturday night concert will take place in the night before) will be as fololws: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and Siloti's arrangement for strings of the Adagio's from the Organ, Toccata in C major; Scriabin, "Prometheus," Debussy, nocturnes; "Clouds" and "Festivals;" Borodin. Dances with Chorus, from "Prince Izar

---

SYMPHONY IN TRIBUTE TO SARGENT

Post Apr 25

Mr. Burgin Soloist in Prokofiev's Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A ceremony in one respect unusual and in every respect impressive prefaced the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

As memorial tribute to the late John Singer Sargent, Mr. Koussevitzky has placed at the head of this week's programme the Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung" and, unexpectedly but appropriately and effectively, this music was played by a standing orchestra and heard by an audience also risen to its feet.

MR. BURGIN'S ARTISTRY

For no sooner had the orchestra stood—save for the players upon the violoncellos and the harps who, for very practical reasons, remained in their seats—than the audience followed suit. And, keeping unbroken the ceremonial spell, for the first time within memory at the Symphony Concerts this memorial exercise was unmarred by the applause of any thoughtless or unobservant individual who had assumed the music to be part of the day's entertainment.

Once the concert proper had begun, however, the afternoon was marked by by an enthusiasm on the part of the audience, unusual even for this season, wherein the staid Friday subscribers have developed a new responsiveness to music and conductor. To be sure, the Symphony of Schubert, in B-flat major, No. 5, that replaced the Symphony of Mozart, originally announced, was received with no uncommon degree of acclaim, although it was warmly enough applauded.

Tribute to Mr. Loeffler

But Mr. Burgin, both at his appearance upon the platform and at the conclusion of his performance of Prokofiev's enormously difficult Violin Concerto, was applauded with unmistakable heartiness; Mr. Loeffler, summoned to the stage after the performance of his tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," was no less cordially received; and the Overture to "Tannhauser," which brought the concert to a sonorous close, provoked, as it did at last Sunday's Pension Fund Concert, a veritable storm of applause.

Revived by Dr. Muck, several seasons ago, this little-known Symphony of Schubert seemed at that time hardly worth the trouble of the resurrecting. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky has made judicious cuts or whether his tempi were more happily chosen, the piece made yesterday a by no means unagreeable impression, though it were idle to claim for it an important place among Schubert's compositions.

Concerto 10 Years Old

The subject of much comment since its first performance in Paris under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky in the autumn of 1923, Prokofiev's Concerto is actually no new work. Indeed it was at that time already 10 years old. And while it is in many respects a striking and individual achievement, the Concerto is singularly free from that harmonic audacity which we now associate with the name of Prokofiev.

The Concerto runs in three movements, of which the first seems the least consequential; the second is fleet and fanciful, the last unaffe melodious. Music bristling with culties of every sort, it was pla masterly fashion by Mr. Burgin, this season, both as concertmaste as assisting artist, has proved hi more than ever before a most va member of the orchestra.

The Loeffler Music

Played by the Symphony Orch in 1902 and in 1903, subsequently vised, and in its later form twice under Mr. Monteux, Mr. Loef Poem for Orchestra, as it was o nally called, is a richly text adroitly fashioned music, that yet to, establish itself as of equal with that composer's "La Mort de tagiles" and "A Pagan Poem." Loeffler seems here as one who sp with consummate polish and addr but who has no new and vital thou to communicate.

From Wagner to Wagner, throu Schubert, Prokofiev and Loeffler, concert of yesterday was one of c tinuously brilliant orchestral play confirming yet again the present h estate of the band and once more closing Mr. Koussevitzky's versatil his sympathy with music of many widely varying styles.

FUNERAL MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Impressive Tribute to John Singer Sargent

Globe Apr 25

Siegfried's Funeral Music, from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," was played at the beginning of yesterday's Symphony concert, in memory of John Singer Sargent. The orchestra rose to its feet as Koussevitzky came on the stage. After a moment of hesitation the audience also rose, something that has not happened on other occasions when commemorative music has been heard at these concerts.

The dead painter, who cared greatly for music, would perhaps have thought this superb performance of the greatest music Wagner wrote a tribute more splendid than any of the others now being paid his memory all over the world, a tribute even finer than the services in Westminster Abbey. The audience seemed deeply moved. At the end nobody stirred for a moment, and, for the first time on such an occasion, there were no applauders. Very rarely is a public tribute to the memory of a great man so dignified and so heartfelt.

The concert ended with Wagner, as it had begun with his music. Koussevitzky's performance of the "Tanhauser" overture is one of the most superb things he has done here. So to transfigure music as familiar as this that the listener finds it full of new meaning is an achievement. Koussevitzky emphasizes the dramatic values in the overture, brings out the significance of each theme in terms of the operatic situations it accompanies.

One saw the pilgrims marching past, Tannhauser singing his hymn to Venus and the rest of the pictures Wagner must have seen in his mind's eye far better from this illuminating performance in a concert hall than one has yet seen them in an opera house.

Prokofieff's violin concerto, played for the first time in America with Richard Burgin as soloist, is a clever youthful work, giving little indication of real originality but admirably calculated to sound daring in 1913, when it was written. As the work of a boy of 22 it shows promise, but one would have preferred to hear another work from the composer's present maturity. Or is Prokofieff another of the geniuses who has entered his 30s leaving a great future behind him?

Until Boston hears more of his music it would be rash to attempt to put him in his proper place. Mr Burgin played this very exacting music with a skill that was wholly admirable. He has not hitherto done any solo work so well as this here, except in some incidental solos in numbers which for program purposes are purely orchestral.

An early symphony by Schubert, his fifth in B flat major, substituted for the announced Mozart, proved in place curiously Mozartian. The first theme the first allegro made one wonder whether after all Koussevitzky was not giving us Mozart, but in later passages the Beethovenish final cadences and the Schubertian shifts from major to minor showed the youthful composer playing the not too sedulous ape to others in alternation with attempts to develop his own style. This music was more than a mere historical curiosity. One wondered if after a century Prokofieff's music will sound as spirited and as charming as most of this.

Charles Martin Loeffler was very warmly applauded after the orchestra played his familiar symphonic poem "La Bonne Chanson." Mr Koussevitzky summoned him by a wave of the hand from his place in the balcony right to the stage. The conductor brought out as his predecessors have not done the intensity, the Wagnerian romanticism refined by French good taste of this music. As with the music of Ravel and of Debussy Mr Koussevitzky finds in Loeffler's work depths of emotion beneath the carefully polished surfaces, the stylistic delicacies.

He brushes aside what may after all be a merely superficial reticence to show in the work of these Frenchmen (and musically speaking Mr Loeffler is French) something of the half-morbid passion of Tchaikovsky.

Next week the evening concert will by exception be given on Friday in order that Mr Koussevitzky may sail a day earlier for important European engagements. Skriabin's "Prometheus" and other music recently heard and liked fill the next program with repetitions.

P. R.

Trans Apr 25

CLOSE OF SYMPHONY SEASON

The pending week will bring to a [illegible]se the first season of Serge Kous[illegible]itzky as conductor of the Boston [illegible]mphony orchestra. Monday will [illegible]g the last of the Monday evening [illegible]es in Symphony hall: Thursday, the [illegible] of the Cambridge series in Sanders T[illegible]tre: and Friday afternoon and e[illegible]ing, the close of the regular season in [illegible]mphony hall.

[illegible] Monday program will consist of Vi[illegible]'s Organ Concerto which figured upo[illegible] Koussevitzky's first program of the [illegible]son: Franck's Symphonic Variatio[illegible]in which Mieczyslaw Munz, the [illegible] pianist, will be the soloist with [illegible] orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth [illegible]mphony.

At the last pair of concerts in Symphony hall, the second to be given on Friday instead of Saturday evening the Cecilia chorus will again be added to the orchestra in a repetition of Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire," and Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Koussevitzky will also perform Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for strings, Bach's Adagio from Toccata in C major, arranged by Siloti, and Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

88

Sargent Tribute

Advertiser

Symphony Orchestra Plays Funeral Music

Apr 25

John Singer Sargent's memory was honored at yesterday's Symphony concert. Both orchestra and audience stood up while Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a special performance of the funeral music from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods."

Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, played the solo part in the first performance of the revised Prokofieff concerto for violin and orchestra. The young violinist scored a brilliant triumph. The concerto made a favorable impression.

Honors also were showered upon Charles Martin Loeffler, who formerly played in the orchestra, and who was represented on the program by his well-known tone poem, "La Bonne Chanson," suggested by one of the Verlaine poems.

Schubert's fifth symphony, in B flat, was an unexpected feature of the program. It was beautifully played under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction.

There was also a stirring performance of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Transcript Apr. 25

Orchestral

WITH two exceptions, repetitions fill Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the final pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and evening, May 1. The exceptions are the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for string choir and an orchestral arrangement by Siloti of the Adagio in Bach's Toccata in C major. The repeated pieces are Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fêtes"; the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor"; Skriabin's "Prometheus." Again The Cecilia will provide the assisting choir in the two Russian numbers and Mr. Alexander Steinert will be the incidental pianist.

The supplementary series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra will end for the season on Monday evening in Symphony Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct and Mr. Mieczylas Münz of the rising generation will be the assisting pianist. The program traverses Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra with Organ; Franck's Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra; Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor. No music discloses more clearly than does this Symphony the conductor's characteristic powers.

On Thursday evening, orchestra and conductor will end the current series of symphony concerts in Sanders Theater at Cambridge. Mozart, with the Overture to his opera, "Figaro's Wedding"; Schubert with an early Symphony, number five, in B-flat major; Chaikovsky, with the Symphony in E minor, share the program. Thus does one of the conductor's Russian masterpieces complete the Bostonian round.

Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Paul Whiteman, artf[illegible]

[illegible]

Apri 26

By special permission of the Boston Symphony trustees the final concert in the evening series will be given this week Friday instead of Saturday so that Mr Koussevitzky may sail from New York in time for important European engagements. Subscribers who find their plans upset by this change will no doubt feel that Mr Koussevitzky's most important engagement at present is in Boston and that he should have made his plans accordingly in advance. It is both gracious and politic of the trustees to grant his request, and the vast majority of the subscribers will probably not be inconvenienced by it.

◆◆◆◆◆

Skriabin's "Prometheus," whatever one may think of it, is a composition important enough and unfamiliar enough to deserve a repetition within the present season, but with so many masterpieces in the standard repertory unheard this season it is regrettable to find the final program filled with numbers already played this year. It also breaks a precedent of 44 years standing, but Mr Koussevitzky's strength and weaknesses depend largely upon his disregard for precedents of all kinds.

◆◆◆◆◆

Muenz, the young Polish pianist to be soloist at the final Monday concert tomorrow, has played here twice in recital and shown himself possessed of real if rather wayward talent.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 26 1925

Boston Symphony Coming.

Local music lovers are looking forward to the appearance here next Wednesday night in Memorial chapel at Wesleyan of the Boston Symphony orchestral group. Paul [illegible] will be the director of an exceptional program.

Herald Georges Longy Apr 26

His Beneficent Activity As Oboist and Conductor in Boston's Musical Life

The return of Mr. Georges Longy to France will be a serious loss to music in Boston, for not only has he been the distinguished first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; he has been untiring as an orchestral conductor and leader of the Longy Club in the introduction of many works which would otherwise have been unknown in this city.

Gustave Georges Leopold Longy was born in Abbeville, France, on Aug. 29, 1868. He was educated musically at the Paris Conservatory, where in 1886 he was awarded the first prize for playing the oboe. His oboe teacher was Georges Vital Victor Gillet, a famous virtuoso in his day.

Mr. Longy was not deterred from choosing the oboe for his instrument by the old French slang: "to play the oboe," i. e. be hanged. "Justice plays the oboe for she rigs the gallows for the mournful dance."

The French delighted in jests connected with executions. The hanged not only played the oboe, he "danced the branle of the bishops," for he gave by his feet a benediction to those standing near. The cord that knotted his neck was called the E string of the hangman. "To give the benediction with one's feet" is found in Rabelais. Another pleasant metaphor for hanging now in French use is "He died of the high disease." And so in English slang there are many ghastly jests from "To take one's last fling" and "to die of hempen fever," to "he preached at Tyburn cross." In "Slang and its Analogues" nearly two pages are devoted to English, French and Italian synonyms for "hanging." In New York a crook's curse was, "May he dance when he dies."

Mr. Longy before he joined the Boston Symphony orchestra as first oboist in the fall of 1898 had been associated in Paris with these orchestras: Lamoureux's, Colonne's, Folies Bergere and the Opera Comique. His artistry was often recognized in the reviews of the Parisian concerts. From 1898 to 1925—27 years of valiant service in the front rank of Boston's orchestral players.

In 1900 he founded the Longy Club for the purpose of performing music written for wind instruments. The original members were Messrs. Andre Maquarre and Selmer, Hackebarth, Litke, Gebhard (pianist), with Mr. Longy as leader. There were necessarily changes in the personnel from season to season until the club was disbanded in 1914. Major Higginson was interested in the club and gave it liberal support. Would that the Boston public had followed his example! A glance at the programs shows the catholicity of Mr. Longy's taste. Among the works heard here for the first time were compositions by Bernard, d'Indy, Loeffler, Caplet, Bird, Lazzari, Herzogenberg, Malherbe, de Wailly, Roentgen, Quef, Gouvy, Rietz, Longy, Hure, G. Faure, Lampe, Kovacek, Perilhou, Kauffmann, Klughardt, Woollett, Handel, Weber, Grieg, Mouquet, Lacroix, Hahn, R. Strauss, Schreck, Magnard, Bumcke, Wolf-Ferrari, Mozart, Falconi, Enesco, Pierne, Reger, Cossart, Ravel, Fried, Moreau, Dukas, Debussy, Eugene Wagner, Diemer, Rimsky-Korsakov, Kriens, Florent Schmitt, Weingartner, Flament, Strube, Loeillet, Juon.

But these names do not give one an idea of the richness of the programs, for many other composers were represented by works that had been played once or twice in former years. The club was assisted by capable artists from time to time in order to bring out the more elaborate works by players of stringed instruments from the Symphony orchestra, by Armand Forest, violinist of Paris, who played here for the first time; by that admirable singer, Charles Gilibert, and Mme. Gilibert; by Mme. Sundelius, soprano; by Mrs. Richard J. Hall, saxophone, who was constantly a staunch friend and supporter of Mr. Longy in all his undertakings.

These concerts, like the concerts of a similar nature heard many years before when the late Charles Mole, the first flute of the Symphony orchestra, was fired with a similar ambition, were caviar to the general. And in 1914 the war broke out.

As conductor of the Orchestral Club (1900-1906) Mr. Longy acquainted Bostonians with important modern works. He was the first to conduct here Enesco's "Poeme Roumain," Debussy's "Prelude to L'Apres midi d'un Faune," Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne" and "Eclogue," Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," Rameau's "Les Indes Galantes," Debussy's transcription of Satie's "Gymnopedies," Chausson's "Hymne Vedique" with chimes; Hue's suite from "Titania," G. Faure's "Pavane"; the preludes from Bruneau's "L'Ouragan," Bourgault-Ducoudray's "Cambodian Rhapsody," Berlioz's impressive "Hamlet's Funeral March," Loeffler's "Divertissement Espagnol," Rabaud's Fantasia on Russian songs, d'Indy's choral variations. The list is a long one, including compositions by Dubois, Saint-Saens, Lefebvre, Delibes, Marechal, Massenet, Chevillard, d'Ambrosio, Blockx, Augusta Holmes, Widor, Ten Brink, Georges, Sporck, Bordier, Guiraud, Caplet.

In 1908 Mr. Longy conducted a series of orchestral concerts organized by Mrs. Richard J. Hall. The programs again showed his broad mind, fine taste and courage. The first program is a fair sample of the others. Rabaud, Symphony No. 2; Chausson "Poem of Love and the Sea"; Balakirev, "In Bohemia."

He continued his good work as conductor of the Boston Musical Association and the Macdowell Club.

Thus he played a leading part in the musical life of Boston for nearly 25 years; often conducting in the face of discouragement, often achieving surprising results with the material at his disposal. Not as a chauvinist, for he recognized that music was not confined within the boundaries of France. To him there was good music and there was bad music. He did not inquire first of all into the nationality of a composer. He did not worship in any particular chapel of musical Paris.

As a master of the oboe his influence was equally beneficent. His phrasing in the Symphony concerts and in the club named after him was a gratuitous lesson to violinists, singers and pianists. For he was much more than a florid rhetorician. No matter how short and comparatively insignificant was the sentence, it was always a thing of beauty.

When Henri Brod, a famous oboe player, died in Paris, in his 38th year, some one at the Paris Conservatory acquainted Cherubini with the fact. "Master, Brod is dead!" "Who?" "Brod," "Ah! poor tone."

This could not have been said of Mr. Longy during his long career. But tone, after all, is not everything. In Mr. Longy's case, a thoroughly equipped musician chose the oboe as the medium for expressing a truly artistic nature.

P. H.

[illegible] CONCERT FOR ITALIAN SOLDIERS

A concert will be given in Symphony hall tonight, beginning at 8 o'clock, in aid of the Boston relief fund for Italian soldiers, incapacitated, still suffering from wounds received in the world war and now in Boston. The cause itself and the character of the artists engaged should insure a full house. Alessandro Bonci, the tenor, has long been acknowledged as a master of bel canto. Mme. Ester Ferrabini (Mrs. Agide Jacchia), soprano, is favorably known to Bostonians by her singing in opera and in concerts. Arthur Fiedler will be the pianist. The program will be as follows:

La Violetta .... Mozart
Air from "Matrimonio Segreto" .. Cimarosa
La Gita in Gondola .... Rossini
Mr Bonci.
La madre al figlio lontano .... Pizzetti
Nebbie .... Respighi
Mme. Ferrabini.
Africana: O Paradiso .... Meyerbeer
Mr Bonci.
Otello: Canzone del Salice .... Verdi
Mme. Ferrabini.
I Reve blanc .... Trucco
Reve noir .... Trucco
II Impressioni campestri toscane .....
Pieraccini
(a) [illegible] arriva
(b) E uno e due e tre
Mme. Ferrabini.
"La Boheme": Racconto .... Puccini
Mr Bonci.
Romanza: Connais-tu le pays .... Thomas
Mme. Ferrabini.
Manon: Duetto 1o atto .... Massenet
Mme. Ferrabini and Mr. Bonci.

"POPS" PROGRAM

A week from tomorrow, May 4, will bring the opening of the "Pops" season in Symphony hall, which will continue as usual every night, with alternate Sundays, through the spring and early summer. This musically and socially delightful institution, which is peculiar to Boston, will repeat the features which have in the past confirmed their universal success. Mr. Jacchia will retain tre best from his former extensiive repertory and add to it notably with a number of new arrangements of certain popular numbers which he has made. This will be the ninth season of the "Pops" under the leadership of the noted conductor. He will have, to do his bidding, an adequate Symphony orchestra of 80 players.

The music listed for the opening night furnishes an example of the variety and interest in Mr. Jacchia's programs:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..
Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Jota from the Suite "Hispania" ......
Stoessel-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"— .... Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Rachem (Invocation) .... Manna-Zucca
(Orchestrated by A. Jacchia)
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle "1812" .. Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
French Military March .... Saint-Saens

"MUSICAL MOSAICS"

"Musical Mosaics," incidents in the life of great composers impersonated by [illegible] artist-musiians, assisted by the [illegible] ensemble, Raffaelle Martino, conductor, and Berthe Braggiotti in Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils, will be performed at the Fine Arts Theatre on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, May 6, 7, and on Thursday afternoon, May 7, for the benefit of Settlement Music Schools.

The production will be supervised by E. E. Clive, director of the Copley Theatre. "Musical Mosaics" devised by Mrs. William Armes Fisher; Catherine S. Sweet, author; art director and stage management, Messrs. Lindergreen and Jackson.

Palestrina .... T. Francis Burke
Cathedral Choir—Cardinals from Boston College
Bach .... Richard Platt
Mozart .... Florence di Napoli
Beethoven .... Hayes Sturges
Schubert .... Richard G. Appel
Chopin .... Jesus Maria San Roma
Strauss—Salome .... Miss Braggiotti

Advertiser
Apr 26

Last Week of Symphony Season

THIS week's Symphony concerts will close Serge Koussevitzky's first season as conductor. It has been a brilliant season.

Tomorrow will come the final Monday concert. The program will comprise Vivaldi's organ concerto; Franck's "Symphonic Variations," with Mieczyslaw Munz, Polish pianist, as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

At the last pair of regular concerts, next Friday afternoon and evening, the Cecilia Society will again assist in a repetition of Scriabon's "Prometheus," and Borodin's "Polovtsian Dances," from "Prince Igor." Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3, for strings, Bach's adagio, arranged by Siloti; and Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," are also on this final program.

PROGRAM FOR FIRST POP CONCERT

A week from tomorrow night, will bring the opening of the "Pops" season in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia, in his ninth season as conductor, will have an orchestra of eighty players. The program for the opening night follows:

Introduction, Act. III., "Lohengrin,"
Wagner
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Jota, from "Hispana" .... Stoessel-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora" .... Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Rachem (Invocation) ...... Manna-Zucca
Scherzo, "Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Valse Trisste .... Sibelius
French Military March ...... Saint-Saens

Trav. Apr 25

MANY CHANGES IN SYMPHONY

Longy and Lenom, Great Oboe Players, Among Those Retiring

Faces familiar to concert goers for many years past at Symphony hall will be missing next season when the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

Georges Longy, one of the most famous oboe players in the world; Clement Lenom, who for many years shared the desk with Longy and worked with him in his well-known school of wood-wind music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncellist, will be replaced by new men from Europe.

Eight or ten other men will uodoubtedly sever their connections with the orchestra at the end of the present season, but the three mentioned are among the most conspicuous and important musically.

In nearly all cases the men are veteran players and entitled to share in the income from the pension fund which amounts to $140,000 at present.

Longy's retirement was received with regret by the trustees of the orchestra, it was stated by a prominent member of the board.

It was intimated that Longy's decision to retire caused Lenom to withdraw likewise from the orchestra.

With regard to the other men who are retiring, it was explained that the same process of change takes place practically every season.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STAR

APR 27 1925

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Loussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

April 26
Post

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Monday evening comes the last of the "extra series" of Symphony Concerts. As soloist, Mieczyslaw Munz will be heard in Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra. Two pieces already heard at the regular subscription concerts complete the programme: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, for orchestra and organ, edited by Siloti, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

* * * *

In order that Mr. Koussevitzky may sail from New York on Saturday to fulfil engagements on the other side of the Atlantic, the final pair of Symphony Concerts will take place on the afternoon and the evening of Friday next. As announced, the programme will be almost wholly made up of pieces already heard this season: Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Dances, with chorus, from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 and two of Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and, as the single new item, an Adagio from Bach's Organ Toccata, in C major, in an arrangement for string orchestra by Alexander Siloti

---

Transcript
Apr 27

WEEK-END PLEASURES, COATES FOR MASTERY, PROKOVIEV REPEATED

ORCHESTRA, VIOLINIST, SINGER, ENSEMBLE

The New Concerto Confirms Itself—The English Singer Arrays Voice, Abilities, Individual Quality and a Novel Program —The Infection of Him—The Flute-Players Not Too Interestingly — Ill-Considered Favors — Mr. Koussevitzky's Spring

PROKOVIEV'S Concerto for Violin was repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday before an audience plainly intent on the music and becomingly applausive to Mr. Burgin, playing the solo-part. As the quality of the piece suggested on Friday, a second hearing confirmed first impressions and added to them. More telling, for example, were the rude interjections of the hoarse-voiced tuba through the progress of the Scherzo. It was like a sour old man, sitting apart from the fun of the fair, irritated by it, intermittingly thrusting out a grumbling tongue. No very original humor, t is true, even for the narrow scope of nusic in such exercises; a freakish humor, f the listener so chooses; but amusing one the less, in keeping with the mood nd matter of the Scherzo, pleasing withal s a gibe at the superfluous dignity cusmary to the concerto-form. For offset, e ear, less occupied with the first freshss and exhilaration of the music, disvered that Prokoviev seems reluctant to ll together the first movement into the al flow of instrumental song; while the rd also wanders over-long before it sets t, as it were, on tonal terra firma.

In the intermission, those that resent the derns and all their works were launch a threadbare reproach at this newes stance. They complained that Prokovie ote an insistently rapid music. Only a end of the first and the third division l he pause to develop both a motiv and nood in an expanding, deepening music. arly all the new moderns—detracting ces averred—fall into this error of ste. Were the pace slower, the unfold ampler, their music would make more inite and deeper impression. It is quite e that Prokoviev's progress is often t and wayward, but this speed, disorder seeming irrelevance may also have place in his scheme of moods. Those king, flying, disjointed measures whip listening nerves, play upon anticipation ear and fancy, until like a climax come staying of the flight and the expansion song. Forthwith the perceptive faculties bathe deeply and gladly in it; the imagination is newly stirred; the exhilaration finds fresh outlet, as when a restive horse settles at last into long, unbroken stride, and there are only the full-drawn breath and the pulsing motion. Moreover, when a composer plies this "modernist" speed and lash of rhythm, the zest of the process possesses many a listener. In Prokoviev's Scherzo, for example, it is like champagne swallowed, not sipped. No doubt, the "classic masters" pondered and visioned; but the verve of motion happens to be a pleasure of life and also of music. Without motion, either is dead.

88

Sargent Tribute

Advertiser Apr 25

Symphony Orchestra Plays Funeral Music

John Singer Sargent's memory was honored at yesterday's Symphony concert. Both orchestra and audience stood up while Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a special performance of the funeral music from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods."

Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, played the solo part in the first performance of the revised Prokofieff concerto for violin and orchestra. The young violinist scored a brilliant triumph. The concerto made a favorable impression.

Honors also were showered upon Charles Martin Loeffler, who formerly played in the orchestra, and who was represented on the program by his well-known tone poem, "La Bonne Chanson," suggested by one of the Verlaine poems.

Schubert's fifth symphony, in B flat, was an unexpected feature of the program. It was beautifully played under Mr. Koussevitzy's direction.

There was also a stirring performance of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestral

WITH two exceptions, repetitions fill Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the final pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and evening, May 1. The exceptions are the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for string choir, and an orchestral arrangement by Siloti of the Adagio in Bach's Toccata in C major. The repeated pieces are Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fêtes"; the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor"; Skriabin's "Prometheus." Again The Cecilia will provide the assisting choir in the two Russian numbers and Mr. Alexander Steinert will be the incidental pianist.

The supplementary series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra will end for the season on Monday evening in Symphony Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct and Mr. Mieczylas Münz of the rising generation will be the assisting pianist. The program traverses Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra with Organ; Franck's Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra; Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor. No music discloses more clearly than does this Symphony the conductor's characteristic powers.

On Thursday evening, orchestra and conductor will end the current series of symphony concerts in Sanders Theater at Cambridge. Mozart, with the Overture to his opera, "Figaro's Wedding"; Schubert with an early Symphony, number five, in B-flat major; Chaikovsky, with the Symphony in E minor, share the program. Thus does one of the conductor's Russian masterpieces complete the Bostonian round.

Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Paul Whiteman, artfu

---

By special permission of the Boston Symphony trustees the final concert in the evening series will be given this week Friday instead of Saturday so that Mr Koussevitzky may sail from New York in time for important European engagements. Subscribers who find their plans upset by this change will no doubt feel that Mr Koussevitzky's most important engagement at present is in Boston and that he should have made his plans accordingly in advance. It is both gracious and politic of the trustees to grant his request, and the vast majority of the subscribers will probably not be inconvenienced by it.

◆

Skriabin's "Prometheus," whatever one may think of it, is a composition important enough and unfamiliar enough to deserve a repetition within the present season, but with so many masterpieces in the standard repertory unheard this season it is regrettable to find the final program filled with numbers already played this year. It also breaks a precedent of 44 years standing, but Mr Koussevitzky's strength and weaknesses depend largely upon his disregard for precedents of all kinds.

◆

Muenz, the young Polish pianist to be soloist at the final Monday concert tomorrow, has played here twice in recital and shown himself possessed of real if rather wayward talent.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 26 1925

Boston Symphony Coming.

Local music lovers are looking forward to the appearance here next Wednesday night in Memorial chapel at Wesleyan of the Boston Symphony orchestral group. Paul Shirley will be the director of an exceptional program.

Herald Apr 26

Georges Longy

His Beneficent Activity As Oboist and Conductor in Boston's Musical Life

The return of Mr. Georges Longy to France will be a serious loss to music in Boston, for not only has he been the distinguished first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; he has been untiring as an orchestral conductor and leader of the Longy Club in the introduction of many works which would otherwise have been unknown in this city.

Gustave Georges Leopold Longy was born in Abbeville, France, on Aug. 29, 1868. He was educated musically at the Paris Conservatory, where in 1886 he was awarded the first prize for playing the oboe. His oboe teacher was Georges Vital Victor Gillet, a famous virtuoso in his day.

Mr. Longy was not deterred from choosing the oboe for his instrument by the old French slang: "to play the oboe," i. e. be hanged. "Justice plays the oboe for she rigs the gallows for the mournful dance."

The French delighted in jests connected with executions. The hanged not only played the oboe, he "danced the branle of the bishops," for he gave by his feet a benediction to those standing near. The cord that knotted his neck was called the E string of the hangman. "To give the benediction with one's feet" is found in Rabelais. Another pleasant metaphor for hanging now in French use is "He died of the high disease." And so in English slang there are many ghastly jests from "To take one's last fling" and "to die of hempen fever," to "he preached at Tyburn cross." In "Slang and its Analogues" nearly two pages are devoted to English, French and Italian synonyms for "hanging." In New York a crook's curse was, "May he dance when he dies."

Mr. Longy before he joined the Boston Symphony orchestra as first oboist in the fall of 1898 had been associated in Paris with these orchestras: Lamoureux's, Colonne's, Folies Bergere and the Opera Comique. His artistry was often recognized in the reviews of the Parisian concerts. From 1898 to 1925—27 years of valiant service in the front rank of Boston's orchestral players.

In 1900 he founded the Longy Club for the purpose of performing music written for wind instruments. The original members were Messrs. Andre Maquarre and Selmer, Hackebarth, Litke, Gebhard (pianist), with Mr. Longy as leader. There were necessarily changes in the personnel from season to season until the club was disbanded in 1914. Major Higginson was interested in the club and gave it liberal support. Would that the Boston public had followed his example! A glance at the programs shows the catholicity of Mr. Longy's taste. Among the works heard here for the first time were compositions by Bernard, d'Indy, Loeffler, Caplet, Bird, Lazzari, Herzogenberg, Malherbe, de Wailly, Roentgen, Quef, Gouvy, Rietz, Longy, Hure, G. Faure, Lampe, Kovacek, Perilhou, Kauffmann, Klughardt, Woollett, Handel, Weber, Grieg, Mouquet, Lacroix, Hahn, R. Strauss, Schreck, Magnard, Bumcke, Wolf-Ferrari, Mozart, Falconi, Enesco, Pierne, Reger, Cossart, Ravel, Fried, Moreau, Dukas, Debussy, Eugene Wagner, Diemer, Rimsky-Korsakov, Kriens, Florent Schmitt, Weingartner, Flament, Strube, Loeillet, Juon.

But these names do not give one an idea of the richness of the programs, for many other composers were represented by works that had been played once or twice in former years. The club was assisted by capable artists from time to time in order to bring out the more elaborate works by players of stringed instruments from the Symphony orchestra, by Armand Forest, violinist of Paris, who played here for the first time; by that admirable singer, Charles Gilibert, and Mme. Gilibert; by Mme. Sundelius, soprano; by Mrs. Richard J. Hall, saxophone, who was constantly a staunch friend and supporter of Mr. Longy in all his undertakings.

These concerts, like the concerts of a similar nature heard many years before when the late Charles Mole, the first flute of the Symphony orchestra, was fired with a similar ambition, were caviar to the general. And in 1914 the war broke out.

As conductor of the Orchestral Club (1900-1903) Mr. Longy acquainted Bostonians with important modern works. He was the first to conduct here Enesco's "Poeme Roumain," Debussy's "Prelude to L'Apres midi d'un Faune," Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne" and "Eglogue," Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," Rameau's "Les Indes Galantes," Debussy's transcription of Satie's "Gymnopedies," [illegible] "Hymne Vedique" with chimes; Hue's suite from "Titania," G. Faure's "Pavane"; the preludes from Bruneau's "L'Ouragan," Bourgault-Ducoudray's "Cambodian Rhapsody," Berlioz's impressive "Hamlet" Funeral March," Loeffler's "Divertissement Espagnol," Rabaud's Fantasia on Russian songs, d'Indy's choral variations. The list is a long one, including compositions by Dubois, Saint-Saens, Lefebvre, Delibes, Marechal, Massenet, Chevillard, d'Ambrosio, Blockx, Augusta Holmes, Widor, [illegible], Georges, Sporck, Bordier, Guiraud, Caplet.

In 1908 Mr. Longy conducted a series of orchestral concerts organized by Mrs. Richard J. Hall. The programs again showed his broad mind, fine taste and courage. The first program is a fair sample of the others, Rabaud, Symphony No. 2; Chausson "Poem of Love and the Sea"; Balakirev, "In Bohemia."

He continued his good work as conductor of the Boston Musical Association and the Macdowell Club.

Thus he played a leading part in the musical life of Boston for nearly 25 years; often conducting in the face of discouragement, often achieving surprising results with the material at his disposal. Not a chauvinist, for he recognized that music was not confined within the boundaries of France. To him there was good music and there was bad music. He did not inquire first of all into the nationality of a composer. He did not worship in any particular chapel of musical Paris.

As a master of the oboe his influence was equally beneficent. His phrasing in the Symphony concerts and in the club named after him was a gratuitous lesson to violinists, singers and pianists. For he was much more than a florid rhetorician. No matter how short and comparatively insignificant was the sentence, it was always a thing of beauty.

When Henri Brod, a famous oboe player, died in Paris, in his 38th year, some one at the Paris Conservatory acquainted Cherubini with the fact. "Master, Brod is dead!" "Who?" "Brod," "Ah! poor tone."

This could not have been said of Mr. Longy during his long career. But tone, after all, is not everything. In Mr. Longy's case, a thoroughly equipped musician chose the oboe as the medium for expressing a truly artistic nature.

P. H.

[illegible]

FOR ITALIAN SOLDIERS

A concert will be given in Symphony hall tonight, beginning at 8 o'clock, in aid of the Boston relief fund for Italian soldiers, incapacitated, still suffering from wounds received in the world war and now in Boston. The cause itself and the character of the artists engaged should insure a full house. Alessandro Bonci, the tenor, has long been acknowledged as a master of bel canto. Mme. Ester Ferrabini (Mrs. Agide Jacchia), soprano, is favorably known to Bostonians by her singing in operas and in concerts. Arthur Fiedler will be the pianist. The program will be as follows:

La Violetta	Mozart
Air from "Matrimonio Segreto"	Cimarosa
La Gita in Gondola	Rossini
Mr Bonci.
La madre al figlio lontano	Pizzetti
Nebbie	Respighi
Mme. Ferrabini.
Africana: O Paradiso	Meyerbeer
Mr Bonci.
Otello: Canzone del Salice	Verdi
Mme. Ferrabini.
I Reve blanc	Trucco
Reve noir	Trucco
II Impressioni campestri toscane	Pieraccini
(a) [illegible] da arriva
(b) E uno e due e tre
Mme. Ferrabini.
"La Boheme": Racconto	Puccini
Mr Bonci.
Romanza: Connais-tu le pays	Thomas
Mme. Ferrabini.
Manon: Duetto 1o atto	Massenet
Mme. Ferrabini and Mr. Bonci.

"POPS" PROGRAM

A week from tomorrow, May 4, will bring the opening of the "Pops" season in Symphony hall, which will continue as usual every night, with alternate Sundays, through the spring and early summer. This musically and socially delightful institution, which is peculiar to Boston, will repeat the features which have in the past confirmed their universal success. Mr. Jacchia will retain tre best from his former extensiive repertory and add to it notably with a number of new arrangements of certain popular numbers which he has made. This will be the ninth season of the "Pops" under the leadership of the noted conductor. He will have, to do his bidding, an adequate Symphony orchestra of 80 players.

The music listed for the opening night furnishes an example of the variety and interest in Mr. Jacchia's programs:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota from the Suite "Hispana"	Stoessel-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation)	[illegible]
(Orchestrated by A. Jacchia)
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Valse Triste	Sibelius
French Military March	Saint-Saens

"MUSICAL MOSAICS"

"Musical Mosaics," incidents in the lives of great composers impersonated by [illegible] artist-musiians, assisted by the 18th [illegible] ensemble, Raffaelle Martino, conductor, and Berthe Braggiotti in Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils, will be performed at the Fine Arts Theatre on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, May 6, 7, and on Thursday afternoon, May 7, for the benefit of Settlement Music Schools.

The production will be supervised by E. E. Clive, director of the Copley Theatre. "Musical Mosaics" devised by Mrs. William Armes Fisher; Catherine S. Sweet, author; art director and stage management, Messrs. Lindergreen and Jackson.

Palestrina	T. Francis Burke
Cathedral Choir—Cardinals from Boston College
Bach	Richard Platt
Mozart	Florence di Napoli
Beethoven	Hayes Sturges
Schubert	Richard G. Appel
Chopin	Jesus Maria San Roma
Strauss—Salome	Miss Braggiotti

Advertiser Ap 26

Last Week of Symphony Season

THIS week's Symphony concerts will close Serge Koussevitzky's first season as conductor. It has been a brilliant season.

Tomorrow will come the final Monday concert. The program will conprise Vivaldi's organ concerto; Franck's "Symphonic Variations," with Mieczyslaw Munz, Polish pianist, as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

At the last pair of regular concerts, next Friday afternoon and evening, the Cecilia Society will again assist in a repetition of Scriabon's "Prometheus," and Borodin's "Polovtsian Dances," from "Prince Igor." Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3, for strings, Bach's adagio, arranged by Siloti; and Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," are also on this final program.

PROGRAM FOR FIRST POP CONCERT

A week from tomorrow night, will bring the opening of the "Pops" season in Symphony Hall, Agide Jacchia, in his ninth season as conductor, will have an orchestra of eighty players. The program for the opening night follows:

Introduction, Act. III., "Lohengrin,"	Wagner
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota, from "Hispana"	Stoessel-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation)	Manna-Zucca
Scherzo, "Bumble Bee,"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Valse Trisste	Sibelius
French Military March	Saint-Saens

MANY CHANGES IN SYMPHONY

Longy and Lenom, Great Oboe Players, Among Those Retiring

Faces familiar to concert goers for many years past at Symphony hall will be missing next season when the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

Georges Longy, one of the most famous oboe players in the world; Clement Lenom, who for many years shared the desk with Longy and worked with him in his well known school of wood-wind music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncellist, will be replaced by new men from Europe.

Eight or ten other men will undoubtedly sever their connections with the orchestra at the end of the present season, but the three mentioned are among the most conspicuous and important musically.

In nearly all cases the men are veteran players and entitled to share in the income from the pension fund which amounts to $140,000 at present.

Longy's retirement was received with regret by the trustees of the orchestra, it was stated by a prominent member of the board.

It was intimated that Longy's decision to retire caused Lenom to withdraw likewise from the orchestra.

With regard to the other men who are retiring, it was explained that the same process of change takes place practically every season.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STAR

APR 27 1925

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Loussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

April 26 Post

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Monday evening comes the last of the "extra series" of Symphony Concerts. As soloist, Mieczyslaw Munz will be heard in Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra. Two pieces already heard at the regular subscription concerts complete the programme: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, for orchestra and organ, edited by Siloti, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

* * * *

In order that Mr. Koussevitzky may sail from New York on Saturday to fulfil engagements on the other side of the Atlantic, the final pair of Symphony Concerts will take place on the afternoon and the evening of Friday next. As announced, the programme will be almost wholly made up of pieces already heard this season: Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Dances, with chorus, from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 and two of Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and, as the single new item, an Adagio from Bach's Organ Toccata, in C major, in an arrangement for string orchestra by Alexander Siloti

---

WEEK-END PLEASURES, COATES FOR MASTERY, PROKOVIEV REPEATED

ORCHESTRA, VIOLINIST, SINGER, ENSEMBLE

The New Concerto Confirms Itself—The English Singer Arrays Voice, Abilities, Individual Quality and a Novel Program—The Infection of Him—The Flute-Players Not Too Interestingly—Ill-Considered Favors — Mr. Koussevitzky's Spring

PROKOVIEV'S Concerto for Violin was repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday before an audience plainly intent on the music and becomingly applausive to Mr. Burgin, playing the solo-part. As the quality of the piece suggested on Friday, a second hearing confirmed first impressions and added to them. More telling, for example, were the rude interjections of the hoarse-voiced tuba through the progress of the Scherzo. It was like a sour old man, sitting apart from the fun of the fair, irritated by it, intermittingly thrusting out a grumbling tongue. No very original humor, t is true, even for the narrow scope of nusic in such exercises, a freakish humor, f the listener so chooses; but amusing one the less, in keeping with the mood nd matter of the Scherzo, pleasing withal s a gibe at the superfluous dignity cusmary to the concerto-form. For offset, e ear, less occupied with the first freshss and exhilaration of the music, disvered that Prokoviev seems reluctant to ll together the first movement into the al flow of instrumental song; while the ed also wanders over-long before it sets , as it were, on tonal terra firma.

In the intermission, those that resent the oderns and all their works were launch g a threadbare reproach at this news tance. They complained that Prokovi ote an insistently rapid music. Only a end of the first and the third division l he pause to develop both a motiv and nood in an expanding, deepening music. arly all the new moderns—detracting ces averred—fall into this error of ste. Were the pace slower, the unfold ampler, their music would make more nite and deeper impression. It is quite that Prokoviev's progress is often and wayward, but this speed, disorder seeming irrelevance may also have place in his scheme of moods. Those ing, flying, disjointed measures whip listening nerves, play upon anticipation ear and fancy, until like a climax come staying of the flight and the expansion song. Forthwith the perceptive faculties bathe deeply and gladly in it: the imagination is newly stirred: the exhilaration finds fresh outlet, as when a restive horse settles at last into long, unbroken stride, and there are only the full-drawn breath and the pulsing motion. Moreover, when a composer plies this "modernist" speed and lash of rhythm, the zest of the process possesses many a listener. In Prokoviev's Scherzo, for example, it is like champagne swallowed, not sipped. No doubt, the "classic masters" pondered and visioned; but the verve of motion happens to be a pleasure of life and also of music. Without motion, either is dead.

89

Ramp sacrificed, Petty to

SYMPHONY PLAYERS IN RECORD SHAKEUP

The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, the Boston Evening American is in a position to announce.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on

Continued on Page 6, Column 2.

Apr. 27

—BOSTON AMERICAN——A Paper for People

BIG SHAKEUP IN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Koussevitsky to Replace Som With Importations From Europe

Continued from First Page.

the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the Symphony, will be filled by European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

One of those who is going, but not because of the shakeup, is Georges Longy, oboist, with the orchestra for twenty-seven years. He has resigned, to retire to his old home in France.

Some musicians who were discharged were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted. The majority have already completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations next season.

OBJECTED TO SMOKING.

Trouble is said to have started at the second rehearsal over which the new Russian conductor presided and to have increased as the season went on.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during "breathing-spells" of that rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky.

Another rift came when, on November 11 he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert. This was in response to prolonged applause, for "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," a Scherzo from "Tsar-Sultan" by Rimsky-Korsakov. While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "No encores" rose to a storm.

MANY DEFENDERS.

In the heated discussion that followed Koussevitsky had many defenders among the temperamental musicians—indeed, those who were loudest in criticism of this incident were the first to concede his great ability and his devotion to his work.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and that his word was law. And the players, bowing to his will, gave him their best. The improvement in the general work of the orchestra was attested by a great wave of commendatory criticism.

Serge Koussevitsky had begun to do things totally at variance with the conducting principles of his predessors at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 104 artists discovered that he had a daring contempt for custom and tradition. In the music he put pauses where none had been written, whipped up the tempo where other conductors had played in metronomic pace, and made phrases stand out that heretofore had been but humble parts of the structure.

ADMIT HIS GENIUS.

In short they discovered in this man great musical genius, they all admit.

But underneath calm and stoical exteriors fires of dissatisfaction burned.

And then the wrath of Koussevitsky was displayed.

When before the public an extremely hard-working and self-effacing conductor, he became a stern rehearsal task master.

Erring musicians of the orchestra were reprimanded in pointed French or German terms for all errors.

Eventually a committee of the players waited upon the conductor and the trustees. It is understood the players felt that before the season closed, many changes might be effected by the conductor—his alleged caustic comment on the abilities of certain artists, being construed as "advance notice" of their dismissal.

They sought six weeks notice of such action. Each of the players is under contract and, perforce, the modus operandi of discharge would be merely the failure of the trustees to offer new contracts for next season.

The discussion was amicable, and it was finally agreed that, in the event of changes being made, ample notice would be given.

ON 2 WEEKS' NOTICE.

So, in keping with the agreement, the trustees mailed on Friday, April 17, two weeks' notices of dismissal to 12 vetran membrs of the orchestra.

The trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Ernest S. Dane, M. A. De Wolf Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer, Galen Stone, Bentley W. Warren and E. Sohier Welch were in apparent accord with Conductor Koussevitsky's ideas, or if they were not, they failed to interfere in the cases of the veterans discharged.

News of the "firing" and the "resigning" spread like wildfire among the musicians when they gathered at Symphony Hall for rehearsal last week.

Not many of the veterans now forced out of the orchestra are endowed with riches. While the stars have received as high as $200 weekly, other salaries are as low as $55 weekly for the regular Symphony season and no more than $40 per week for the "Pops" season of ten weeks.

THE PENSION FUND.

There is the pension for veterans, drawn from a fund of approximately $140,000 which has been amassed by assessment upon the salaries of the players. The average assessment is about $34 yearly per man and the maximum yearly pension payment is $600, but only for those of long years of service.

At his home, No. 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, Conductor Koussevitsky said through an interpreter to Boston Evening American reporter in answer to a question as to why he discharged members of the orchestra:

LEADER'S ATTITUDE.

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men. I have no personal feeling in the matter. I intend to bring some artists here from European orchestras to fill some of the places. The trustees will have to pay these men good salaries but they will be worth every cent paid.

"The artists dismissed ought to have no difficulty in getting places in other organizations. That is my sincere hope. They are able musicians.

"Discipline I must have! It was a tremendous shock to my sense of the esthetic when I entered Symphony Hall for my first rehearsal to find the artists smoking pipes, cigars and cigarettes.

"Real artists should consider the stage and theatre as their temple. As well visualize worshippers smoking in church as to consider great musicians puffing at pipes and cigarettes while engaged in their meeting place in contemplation and rehearsal of beautiful music.

"But I must smile. I think mor than 90 per cent. of the Boston tists agree I am right in this c clusion.

BACKED BY TRUSTEES.

"And please let me omit di of the encore rendition o Flight of the Bumble-Bee.' it, the artists liked to play the audience wanted it repe Why not?

"Now as to my policy with

Freeman Kingston N.Y.

APR 27 1925

Shakeup in Great Orchestra

By Telegraph to The Freeman.

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the Symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

One of those who is going, but not because of the shakeup, is Georges Longy, oboeist with the orchestra for 27 years. He resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked" but Koussevitsky, it was stated, let the temperamental musicians know he was "captain."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

APR 27 1925

Shake-up in Boston Symphony With Score of Musicians Quitting

Boston, April 27—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of near a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shake-up, it was states, was engineered by Serge Kousevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

ST. LOUIS
MO.
STAR

APR 27 1925

SHAKEUP IS REFORTED IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, April 27.—(By I. N. S.)—A shakeup in the Boston Symphony Orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians has just occurred, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

APR 27 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS BIG SHAKEUP

April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

WATERLOO
IOWA
COURIER
APR 27 1925

Shakeup in Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Mass., April 27.—The reatest shakeup in the history of he Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a core of famous musicians, has just een accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was said, was engineered by Sergt. Koussevisky, briliant Russian conductor, with the upport of the trustees.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM,
ALA.
NEWS
APR 27 1925

ORCHESTRA JOLTED

Score Of Far is Musicians Involved In Boston Shake-up

BOSTON, April 27.—(I.N.S.)—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to The Boston Evening American Monday.

The shake-up, it is said, was engieered by Serg Koussevitcky, brilliant ussian conductor, with the support of he trustees.

ATLANTA, GA.
GEORGIAN

APR 27 1925

SHAKE-UP STIRS WHOLE BOSTON SYMPHONY

By International News Service.

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American Monday.

The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

APR 27 1925

20 Fired in Boston Symphony Shakeup

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shake up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was stated was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
SENTINEL

APR 27 1925

NEARLY SCORE MUSICIANS LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Boston Globe
Apr 28

TRUSTEE DENIES SYMPHONY RIFT

Judge Cabot Says Story of Shakeup Myth

Withdrawals From Orchestra Not Due to Koussevitsky

Three Members Retiring, Substitutes for Others

Rumors of disagreements in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of a "shakeup," insisted upon by Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, were flatly contradicted last evening by Judge Frederick Cabot, one of the trustees. These rumors, which persisted in musical circles yesterday, were that 12 players had been refused new contracts, at the behest of Koussevitsky.

The story ran that the trouble between Koussevitsky and members of the orchestra began when he forbade smoking on the stage during rest periods at rehearsals.

It was said that he flew into a rage, declaring the musicians should regard the concert hall as a shrine, and should no more think of smoking there than they would in church.

12 Not Offered Renewals

The rift widened, according to reports, when Mr Koussevitsky violated all custom and ordered an encore to a number, Nov 11, 1924. The players, it was said, demanded adherence to custom. Differences arose which caused minor feuds between the conductor and some of the players, it was said.

Then, when on April 17 notices were mailed to 12 veteran members of the orchestra that their contracts would not be renewed, many persons claimed to see the results of Koussevitsky's wrath. They said his opponents had been punished.

Among those who will not be with the orchestra in its next season are: Georges Longy, one of the world's most famous oboe players; Clement Lenom, who for many years shared a desk with Longy and worked with him in his school of wood-wind music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violincellist. These will be replaced by new men from Europe. It is said that as far as these players are concerned, the termination of their connection was wholly voluntary.

Judge Cabot Gives Denial

Judge Cabot said last night that the report of a "shakeup" was "wholly an invention."

"It is true," he said, "that certain members of the orchestra will not have their contracts renewed this year, but the condition is a normal one. Every year about the same number of players do not have their contracts renewed, either at their wish or because, for one reason or another, they are unable to play as well as once they could.

"This year's number is no greater than the average. It is absurd to talk of friction between Mr Koussevitsky and his players. The rumors are absolutely without foundation."

NEW YORK
MIRROR

APR 28 1925

Shakeup in Boston Symphony Group

BOSTON.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American yesterday. The shakeup was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores."

89

Kamp sacrificed, Petty to

SYMPHONY PLAYERS IN RECORD SHAKEUP

The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, the Boston Evening American is in a position to announce.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on

Continued on Page 6, Column 2.

Apr. 27

—BOSTON AMERICAN——A Paper for People

BIG SHAKEUP I SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Koussevitsky to Replace Som With Importations From Europe

Continued from First Page.

the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the Symphony, will be filled by European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

One of those who is going, but not because of the shakeup, is Georges Longy, oboist, with the orchestra for twenty-seven years. He has resigned, to retire to his old home in France.

Some musicians who were discharged were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted. The majority have already completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations next season.

OBJECTED TO SMOKING.

Trouble is said to have started at the second rehearsal over which the new Russian conductor presided and to have increased as the season went on.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during "breathing-spells" of that rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky.

Another rift came when, on November 11 he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert. This was in response to prolonged applause, for "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," a Scherzo from "Tsar-Sultan" by Rimsky-Korsakov. While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "No encores" rose to a storm.

MANY DEFENDERS.

In the heated discussion that followed Koussevitsky had many defenders among the temperamental musicians—indeed, those who were loudest in criticism of this incident were the first to concede his great ability and his devotion to his work.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and that his word was law. And the players, bowing to his will, gave him their best. The improvement in the general work of the orchestra was attested by a great wave of commendatory criticism.

Serge Koussevitsky had begun to do things totally at variance with the conducting principles of his predessors at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 104 artists discovered that he had a daring contempt for custom and tradition. In the music he put pauses where none had been written, whipped up the tempo where other conductors had played in metronomic pace, and made phrases stand out that heretofore had been but humble parts of the structure.

ADMIT HIS GENIUS.

In short they discovered in this man great musical genius, they all admit.

But underneath calm and stoical exteriors fires of dissatisfaction burned.

And then the wrath of Koussevitsky was displayed.

When before the public an extremely hard-working and self-effacing conductor, he became a stern rehearsal task master.

Erring musicians of the orchestra were reprimanded in pointed French or German terms for all errors.

Eventually a committee of the players waited upon the conductor and the trustees. It is understood the players felt that before the season closed, many changes might be effected by the conductor—his alleged caustic comment on the abilities of certain artists, being construed as "advance notice" of their dismissal.

They sought six weeks notice of such action. Each of the players is under contract and, perforce, the modus operandi of discharge would be merely the failure of the trustees to offer new contracts for next season.

The discussion was amicable, and it was finally agreed that, in the event of changes being made, ample notice would be given.

ON 2 WEEKS' NOTICE.

So, in keping with the agreement, the trustees mailed on Friday, April 17, two weeks' notices of dismissal to 12 vetran membrs of the orchestra.

The trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Ernest S. Dane, M. A. De Wolf Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer, Galen Stone, Bentley W. Warren and E. Sohier Welch were in apparent accord with Conductor Koussevitsky's ideas, or if they were not, they failed to interfere in the cases of the veterans discharged.

News of the "firing" and the "resigning" spread like wildfire among the musicians when they gathered at Symphony Hall for rehearsal last week.

Not many of the veterans now forced out of the orchestra are endowed with riches. While the stars have received as high as $200 weekly, other salaries are as low as $55 weekly for the regular Symphony season and no more than $40 per week for the "Pops" season of ten weeks.

THE PENSION FUND.

There is the pension for veterans, drawn from a fund of approximately $140,000 which has been amassed by assessment upon the salaries of the players. The average assessment is about $34 yearly per man and the maximum yearly pension payment is $600, but only for those of long years of service.

At his home, No. 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, Conductor Koussevitsky said through an interpreter to Boston Evening American reporter in answer to a question as to why he discharged members of the orchestra:

LEADER'S ATTITUDE.

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men. I have no personal feeling in the matter. I intend to bring some artists here from European orchestras to fill some of the places. The trustees will have to pay these men good salaries but they will be worth every cent paid.

"The artists dismissed ought to have no difficulty in getting places in other organizations. That is my sincere hope. They are able musicians.

"Discipline I must have! It was a tremendous shock to my sense of the esthetic when I entered Symphony Hall for my first rehearsal to find the artists smoking pipes, cigars and cigarettes.

"Real artists should consider the stage and theatre as their temple. As well visualize worshippers smoking in church as to consider great musicians puffing at pipes and cigarettes while engaged in their meeting place in contemplation and rehearsal of beautiful music.

"But I must smile. I think mor than 90 per cent. of the Boston tists agree I am right in this c clusion.

BACKED BY TRUSTEES.

"And please let me omit di of the encore rendition o Flight of the Bumble-Bee.' it, the artists liked to play the audience wanted it repe Why not?

"Now as to my policy with

Free

APR 27 1925

Shakeup in Great Orchestra

By Telegraph to The Freeman.

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the Symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

One of those who is going, but not because of the shakeup, is Georges Longy, oboeist with the orchestra for 27 years. He resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked" but Koussevitsky, it was stated, let the temperamental musicians know he was "captain."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

APR 27 1925

Shake-up in Boston Symphony With Score of Musicians Quitting

Boston, April 27—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of near a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shake-up, it was states, was engineered by Serge Kousevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

ST. LOUIS
MO.
STAR

APR 27 1925

SHAKEUP IS REPORTED IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, April 27.—(By I. N. S.)—A shakeup in the Boston Symphony Orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians has just occurred, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

APR 27 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS BIG SHAKEUP

April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

WATERLOO
IOWA
COURIER
APR 27 1925

Shakeup in Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Mass., April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was said, was engineered by Sergt. Koussevisky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM,
ALA.
NEWS

APR 27 1925

ORCHESTRA JOLTED

Score Of Famous Musicians Involved In Boston Shake-up

BOSTON, April 27.—(I.N.S.)—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to The Boston Evening American Monday.

The shake-up, it is said, was engineered by Serg Koussevitcky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

ATLANTA, GA.
GEORGIAN

APR 27 1925

SHAKE-UP STIRS WHOLE BOSTON SYMPHONY

By International News Service.

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American Monday.

The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

APR 27 1925

20 Fired in Boston Symphony Shakeup

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was stated was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
SENTINEL

APR 27 1925

NEARLY SCORE MUSICIANS LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Boston Globe
Apr 28

TRUSTEE DENIES SYMPHONY RIFT

Judge Cabot Says Story of Shakeup Myth

Withdrawals From Orchestra Not Due to Koussevitsky

Three Members Retiring, Substitutes for Others

Rumors of disagreements in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of a "shakeup," insisted upon by Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, were flatly contradicted last evening by Judge Frederick Cabot, one of the trustees. These rumors, which persisted in musical circles yesterday, were that 12 players had been refused new contracts, at the behest of Koussevitsky.

The story ran that the trouble between Koussevitsky and members of the orchestra began when he forbade smoking on the stage during rest periods at rehearsals.

It was said that he flew into a rage, declaring the musicians should regard the concert hall as a shrine, and should no more think of smoking there than they would in church.

12 Not Offered Renewals

The rift widened, according to reports, when Mr Koussevitsky violated all custom and ordered an encore to a number, Nov 11, 1924. The players, it was said, demanded adherence to custom. Differences arose which caused minor feuds between the conductor and some of the players, it was said.

Then, when on April 17 notices were mailed to 12 veteran members of the orchestra that their contracts would not be renewed, many persons claimed to see the results of Koussevitsky's wrath. They said his opponents had been punished.

Among those who will not be with the orchestra in its next season are: Georges Longy, one of the world's most famous oboe players; Clement Lenom, who for many years shared a desk with Longy and worked with him in his school of wood-wind music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violincellist. These will be replaced by new men from Europe. It is said that as far as these players are concerned, the termination of their connection was wholly voluntary.

Judge Cabot Gives Denial

Judge Cabot said last night that the report of a "shakeup" was "wholly an invention."

"It is true," he said, "that certain members of the orchestra will not have their contracts renewed this year, but the condition is a normal one. Every year about the same number of players do not have their contracts renewed, either at their wish or because, for one reason or another, they are unable to play as well as once they could.

"This year's number is no greater than the average. It is absurd to talk of friction between Mr Koussevitsky and his players. The rumors are absolutely without foundation."

NEW YORK
MIRROR

APR 28 1925

Shakeup in Boston Symphony Group

BOSTON.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American yesterday. The shakeup was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores."

90

[illegible] FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
APR 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS TORN APART

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian Director, Dismisses Many Veterans of Notable Orchestra.

AND SEVERAL OTHERS RESIGN

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., April 27.

The greatest shakeup in the history of local musical circles, involving the discharge and departure of more than a score of famous and veteran musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was accomplished to-day.

The shakeup, which is certain to create an unprecedented sensation here, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

The discharged musicians were given two week's notice on April 17, which time the resignations of several others were accepted. The majority have already completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations next season.

Trouble at Rehearsal.

Trouble started at the second rehearsal over which the new Russian conductor presided and is said to have increased as the season went on.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during "breathing spells" of that rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky.

Another rift came when, on November 11, he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert. This was in response to prolonged applause for "The Flight of the Bumble Bee." While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes, the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "no encores" rose to a storm.

In the heated discussion that followed Koussevitsky had many defenders among the temperamental musicians—indeed, those who were loudest in criticism of this incident were the first to concede

(Continued on Page 2, Column 2.)

ıwdust Show But Many Rounds

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER-DISPATCH
APR 28 1925

Orchestra Head Fires Members Who Offend Him

Boston, April 28—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American.

The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

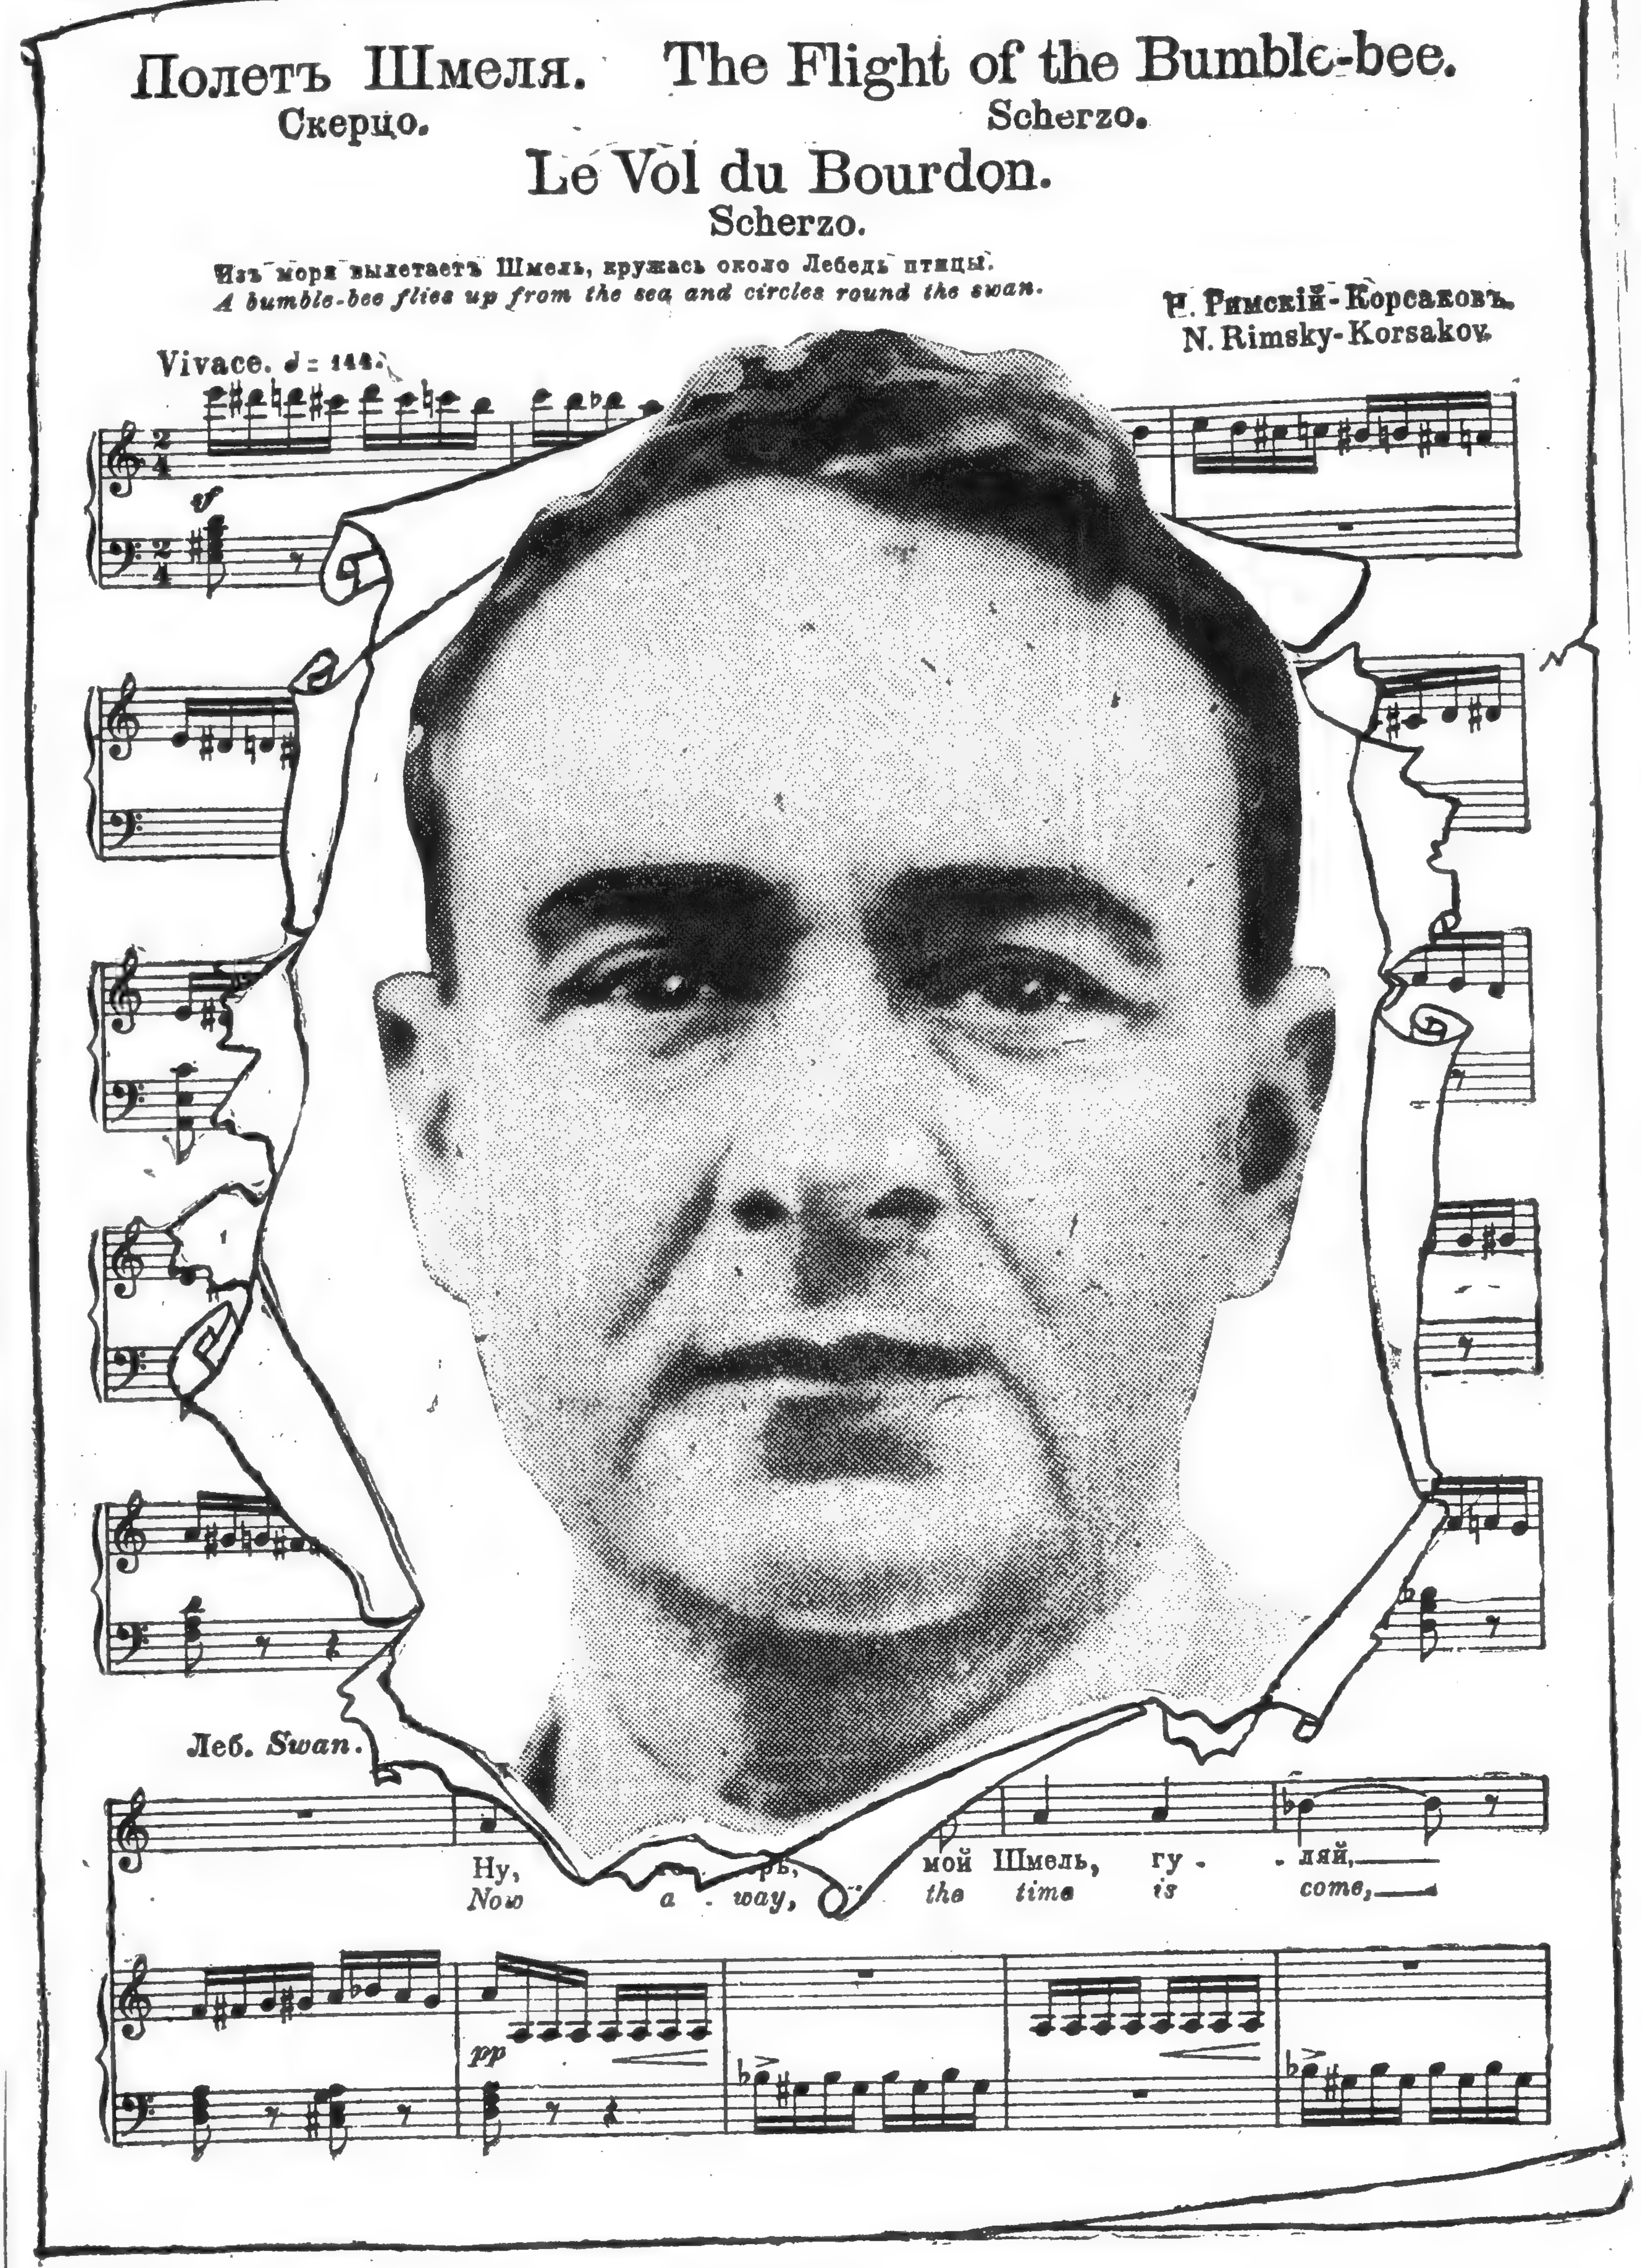
Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connection with the symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarets on the stage at symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal, brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honor[illegible]ustom of "no encores." Some of [illegible]chestra of 104 musicians [illegible] Koussevitsky, it was [illegible] useful [illegible] Mr. [illegible]ntal mu[illegible] symphonic music is thickly

---

IT PUT THE BUZZ IN SYMPHONY



An encore ordered by Serge Koussevitsky (above), conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after the rendition of Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee" on November 11, is said to have caused a split between some of the players and the conductor. Twelve of the veteran members of the famous orchestra have been refused contracts for next year and will be replaced by men from Europe by Mr. Koussevitsky.

NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO LOSE MANY MEN

Longy, Famous Oboe Player; Schroeder, Cellist, and Lenom Among Them.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 27.—Faces familiar to concertgoers for many years at Symphony Hall will be missing next season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes its concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

Georges Longy, one of the world's most famous oboe players; Clement Lenom, who shared the desk with Longy and worked with him in his School of Woodwind Music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncellist, will be replaced by new men from Europe.

Eight or ten other men undoubtedly will sever their connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. Nearly all are veteran players, entitled to share in the income from the pension fund, which now amou[illegible] $140,000.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
APR 28 1925

Boston Symphony Musicians Ousted

Boston, April 28.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American. The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarets on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians balked.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 28 1925

KOUSSEVITSKY LETS MUSICIANS KNOW HE IS BOSS

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American to-day.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connection with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the greatest orchestras in the world.

One of those who is going because of the shakeup is George Longy, oboist, with the orchestra twenty-seven years. He resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encore." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked," but Koussevitsky, it was stated, let the temperamental musicians know he was "captain."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitsky through an interpreter. "I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
APR [illegible]

ORCHESTRA HIT BY SHAKEUP

BOSTON, April 27. — (International News Service.)—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston "Evening American," today.

The shakeup, it was said, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitstky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the "American."

Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked," but Koussevitsky, it was said, let the musicians know he was "captain."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitsky through an interpreter. "I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

graph

TO-DAY'

RUDELY ASKED.

—Miss Jewel
Miss Carmen
save. On Her
Veek and An-

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS TORN APART

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian Director, Dismisses Many Veterans of Notable Orchestra.

AND SEVERAL OTHERS RESIGN

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., April 27.

The greatest shakeup in the history of local musical circles, involving the discharge and departure of more than a score of famous and veteran musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was accomplished to-day.

The shakeup, which is certain to create an unprecedented sensation here, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

The discharged musicians were given two week's notice on April 17, which time the resignations of several others were accepted. The majority have already completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations next season.

Trouble at Rehearsal.

Trouble started at the second rehearsal over which the new Russian conductor presided and is said to have increased as the season went on.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during "breathing spells" of that rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky.

Another rift came when, on November 11, he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert. This was in response to prolonged applause for "The Flight of the Bumble Bee." While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes, the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "no encores" rose to a storm.

In the heated discussion that followed Koussevitsky had many defenders among the temperamental musicians—indeed, those who were loudest in criticism of this incident were the first to concede

(Continued on Page 2, Column 2.)

---

awdust Show But Many Rounds

Who Offend Him

Boston, April 28—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American.

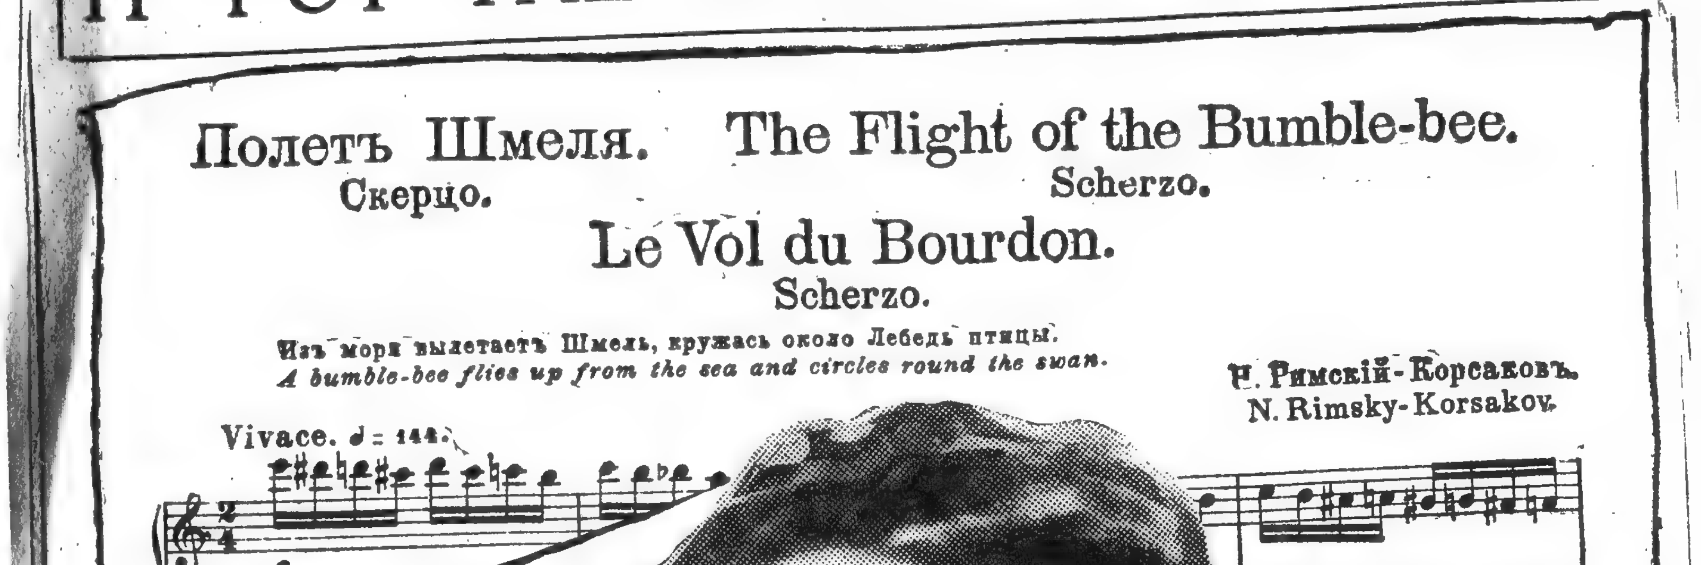
The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connection with the symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarets on the stage at symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal, brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honor- the [illegible] custom of "no encores." Some of [illegible] orchestra of 104 musicians [illegible] play, [illegible] Koussevitsky. It was that [illegible] symphonic music is [illegible]

IT PUT THE BUZZ IN SYMPHONY



Полетъ Шмеля.
Скерцо.
The Flight of the Bumble-bee.
Scherzo.
Le Vol du Bourdon.
Scherzo.
Изъ моря вылетаетъ Шмель, кружась около Лебедь птицы.
A bumble-bee flies up from the sea and circles round the swan.
Н. Римскій-Корсаковъ.
N. Rimsky-Korsakov.
Vivace. 𝅗𝅥 = 144.
Леб. Swan.
Ну, Now a-way, мой Шмель, the time гу-ляй, is come,

An encore ordered by Serge Koussevitsky (above), conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after the rendition of Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee" on November 11, is said to have caused a split between some of the players and the conductor. Twelve of the veteran members of the famous orchestra have been refused contracts for next year and will be replaced by men from Europe by Mr. Koussevitsky.

NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO LOSE MANY MEN

Longy, Famous Oboe Player; Schroeder, Cellist, and Lenom Among Them.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 27.—Faces familiar to concertgoers for many years at Symphony Hall will be missing next season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes its concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

George Longy, one of the world's most famous oboe players; Clement Lenom, who shared the desk with Longy and worked with him in his School of Woodwind Music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncellist, will be replaced by new men from Europe.

Eight or ten other men undoubtedly will sever their connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. Nearly all are veteran players, entitled to share in the income from the pension fund, which now amou[illegible] $140,000.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
APR 28 1925

Boston Symphony Musicians Ousted

Boston, April 28.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American. The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarets on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians balked.

NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 28 1925

KOUSSEVITSKY LETS MUSICIANS KNOW HE IS BOSS

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American to-day.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connection with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the greatest orchestras in the world.

One of those who is going because of the shakeup is George Longy, oboist, with the orchestra twenty-seven years. He resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encore." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked," but Koussevitsky, it was stated, let the temperamental musicians know he was "captain."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitsky through an interpreter. "I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
APR 28 192

ORCHESTRA HIT BY SHAKEUP

BOSTON, April 27. — (International News Service.)—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston "Evening American," today.

The shakeup, it was said, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitstky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the "American."

Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked," but Koussevitsky, it was said, let the musicians know he was "captain."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitsky through an interpreter. "I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

APR 28 1925

KOUSSEVITSKY LETS MUSICIANS KNOW HE IS BOSS

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American to-day.

The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connection with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the greatest orchestras in the world.

One of those who is going because of the shakeup is George Longy, oboist, with the orchestra twenty-seven years. He resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage at Symphony Hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encore." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked," but Koussevitsky, it was stated, let the temperamental musicians know he was "captain."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitsky through an interpreter. "I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

ORCHESTRA HIT BY SHAKEUP

BOSTON, April 27. — (International News Service.)—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston "Evening American," today.

The shakeup, it was said, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

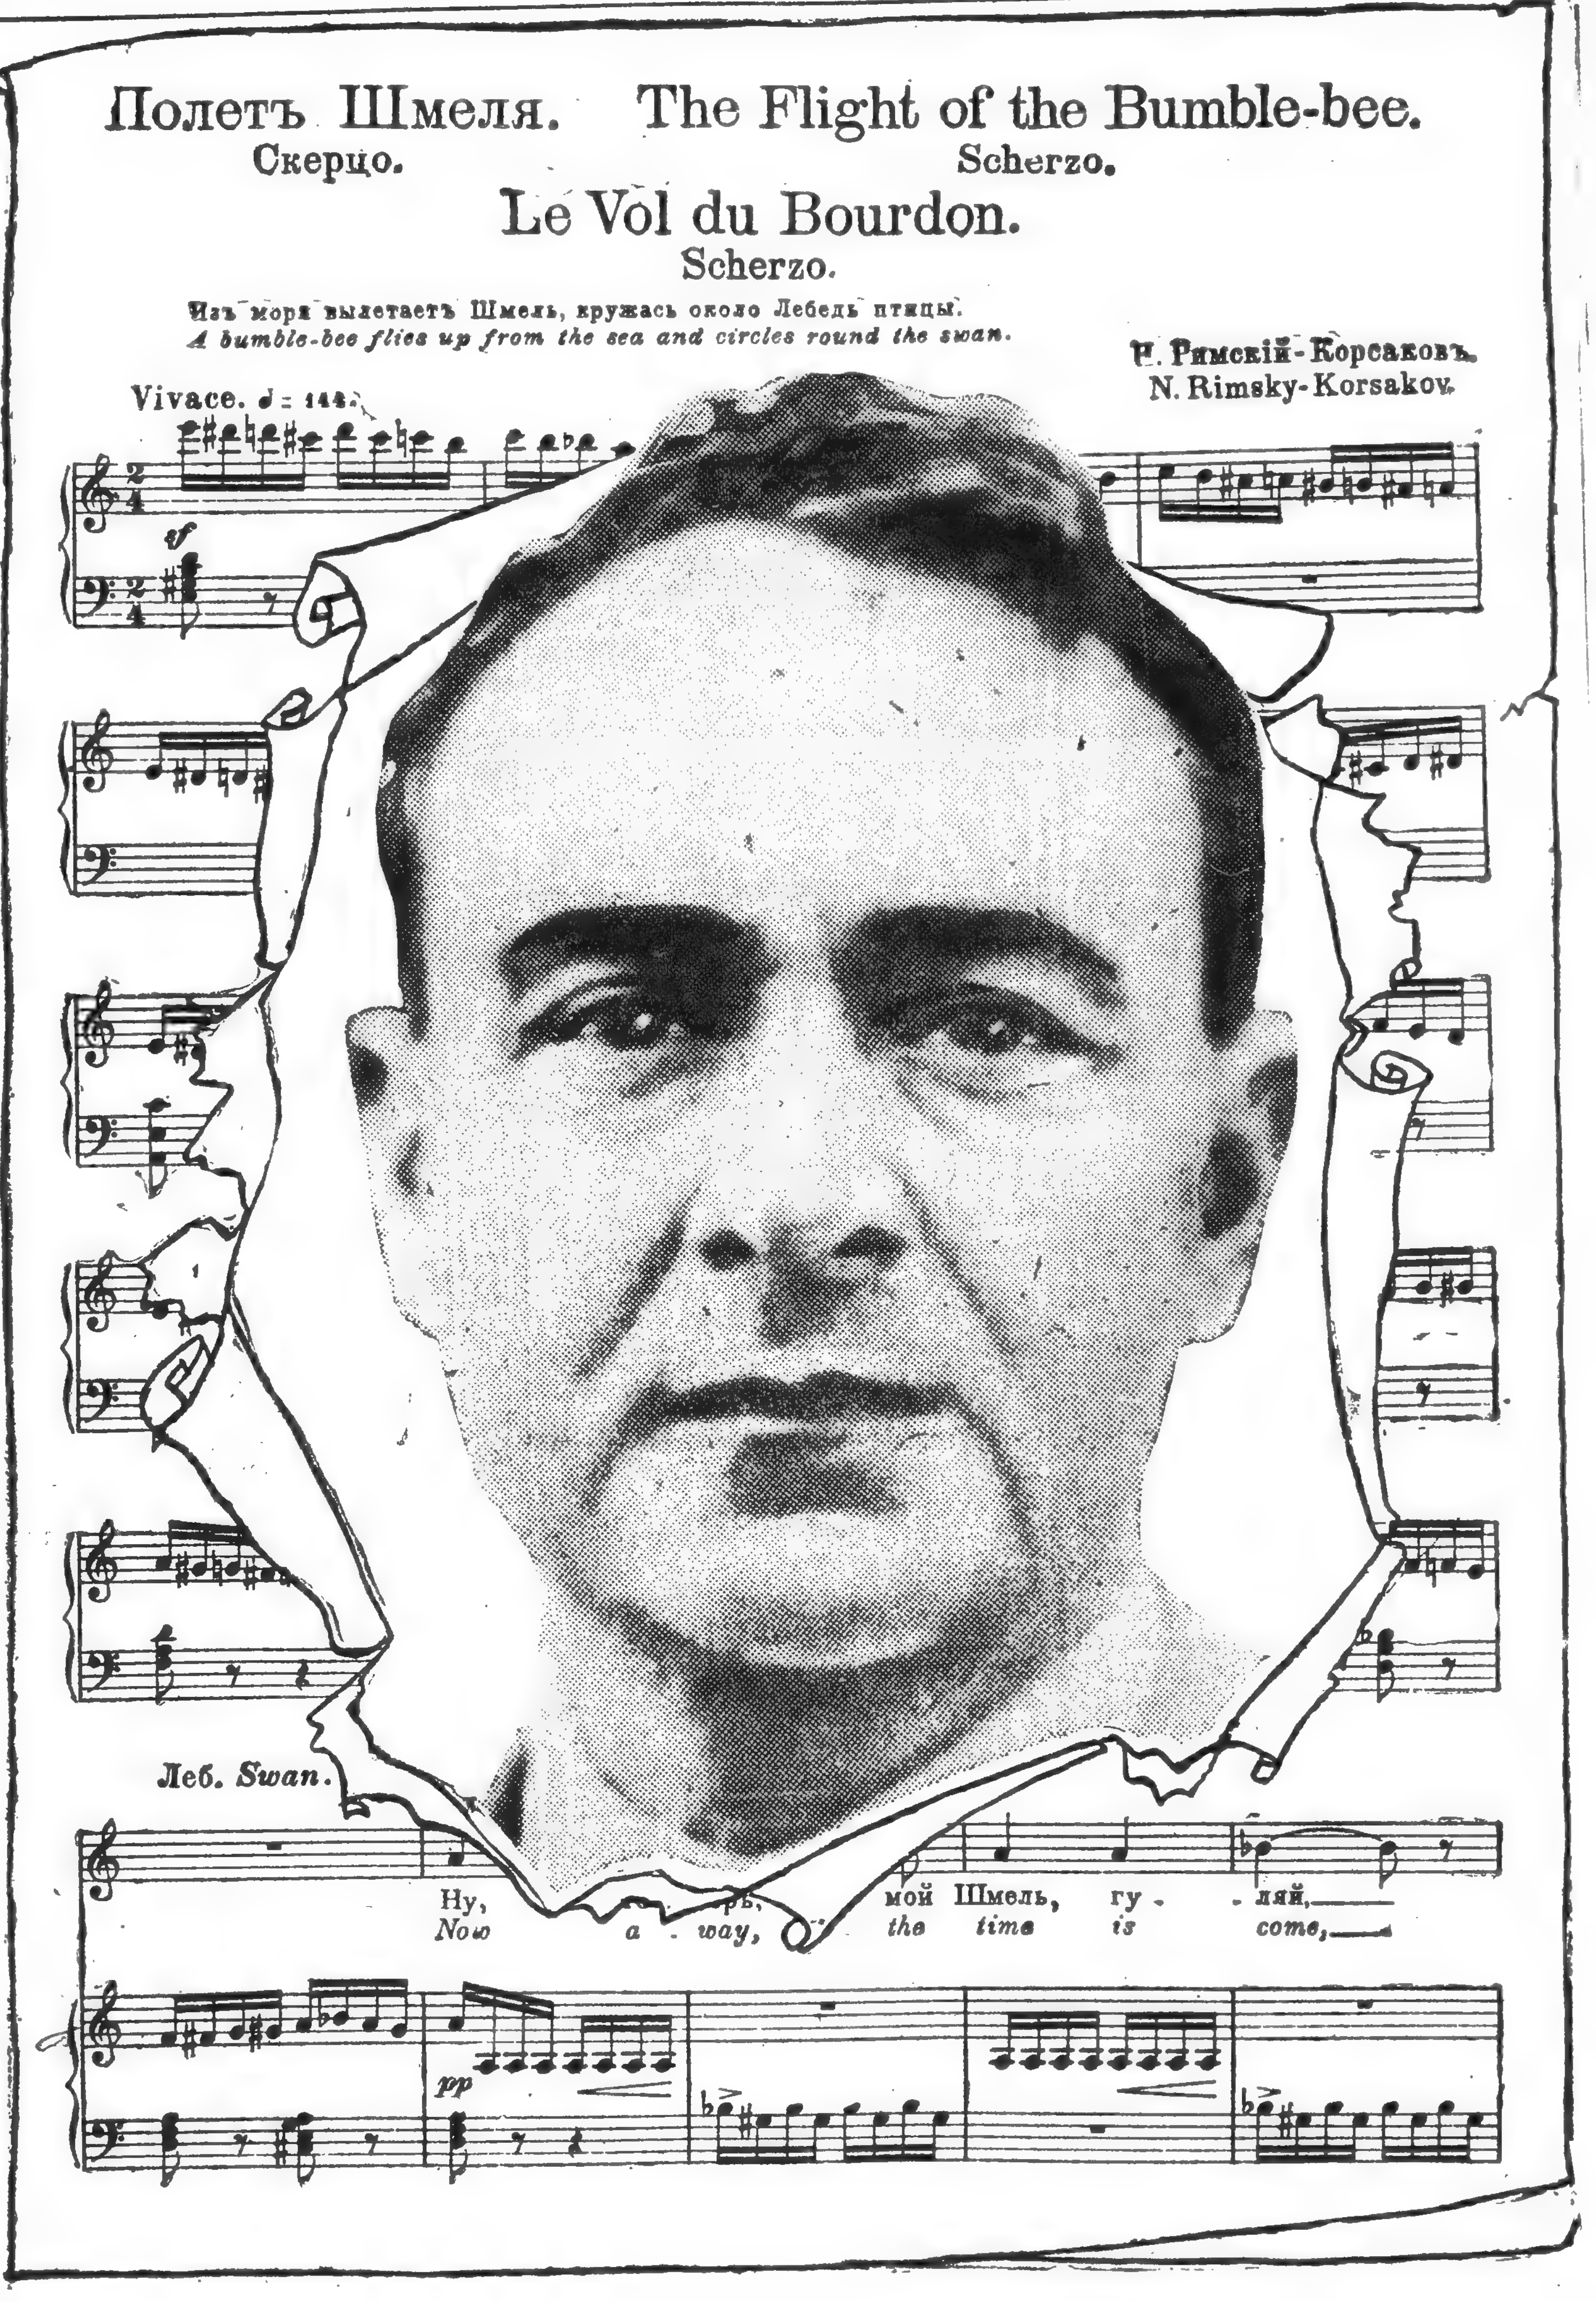
Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to the "American."

Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encore." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked," but Koussevitsky, it was said, let the musi-

---

IT PUT THE BUZZ IN SYMPHONY



Полетъ Шмеля. The Flight of the Bumble-bee.
Скерцо. Scherzo.
Le Vol du Bourdon.
Scherzo.
Изъ моря вылетаетъ Шмель, кружась около Лебедь птицы.
A bumble-bee flies up from the sea and circles round the swan.
Н. Римскій-Корсаковъ.
N. Rimsky-Korsakov.
Vivace.
Леб. Swan.
Ну, мой Шмель, гу-ляй,
Now a-way, the time is come,

An encore ordered by Serge Koussevitsky (above), conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after the rendition of Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee" on November 11, is said to have caused a split between some of the players and the conductor. Twelve of the veteran members of the famous orchestra have been refused contracts for next year and will be replaced by men from Europe by Mr. Koussevitsky.

NEW YORK
TIMES

APR 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO LOSE MANY MEN

6 /

Longy, Famous Oboe Player; Schroeder, Cellist, and Lenom Among Them.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 27.—Faces familiar to concertgoers for many years at Symphony Hall will be missing next season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes its concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

APR 28 1925

Boston Symphony Musicians Ousted

Boston, April 28.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American. The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarets on the stage of symphony hall during the

---

APR 28 1925

Orchestra Head Fires Members Who Offend Him

Boston, April 28—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American.

The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connection with the symphony, will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky. The conductor, it was stated, plans to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate themselves with other musical organizations.

UPSETS FAMOUS ORCHESTRA.

Photograph by United.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian Conductor, Has Instituted Radical Changes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Weeding Out Many Veteran Players of the Great Organization. He Intends to Supplant Them with Foreign Musicians.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS TORN APART

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian Director, Dismisses Many Veterans of Notable Orchestra.

AND SEVERAL OTHERS RESIGN

(Continued From Page 1)

his great ability and his devotion to a work.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and that his word was law.

Supplanted Monteux.

Serge Koussevitsky, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in his first season with the organization. He supplanted Pierre Monteux, a Frenchman who had held the position since the memorable war season when Dr. Karl Muck, a German, was forced to resign from the conductorship because of his disinclination (alleged) to conduct the "Star Spangled Banner" before each orchestra concert. Dr. Muck was interned and later deported to Germany. Koussevitsky, acknowledged both here and abroad as a brilliant conductor, is said to be a martinet for discipline in the orchestras he has had charge of. He has sought to introduce several radical changes in the Boston Symphony, among them the edict that musicians must do their tuning up in the musicians' room before taking their places on the stage.

Serge Koussevitsky had begun to do things totally at variance with the conducting principles of his predecessors at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 104 artists discovered that he had a daring contempt for custom and tradition. In the music he put pauses where none had been written, whipped up the tempo where other conductors had played in metronomic pace, and made phrases stand out that heretofore had been but humble parts of the structure.

Wrath of Koussevitsky.

And then the wrath of Koussevitsky was displayed.

When, before the public an extremely hard-working and self-defacing conductor, he became a stern rehearsal taskmaster.

Erring musicians of the orchestra were reprimanded in pointed French or German terms for all errors.

"Discipline I must have!" he insisted.

"It was a tremendous shock to my sense of the esthetic, the greatest shock in my life, really," declared Serge Koussevitsky to The Morning Telegraph's correspondent, "when I entered Symphony Hall for my first rehearsal to find the artists smoking pipes, cigars and cigarettes.

"Real artists should consider the stage and theatre, their temples—as well visualize worshippers smoking in church as to consider great musicians puffing at pipes and cigarettes while engaged in their meeting place in contemplation and rehearsal of beauty music.

"But I must smile.

"And please let me omit discussion of the encore rendition of 'The Flight of the Bumble Bee.' I like it, the artists liked to play it and the audience wanted it repeated. Why not?

Remember 25

The Morning Telegraph

24

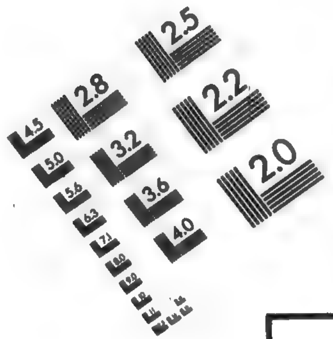
APRIL 28, 1900.

The episode of the modest-looking "Kid" McCoy knocking out a burly tough who was annoying a woman in a

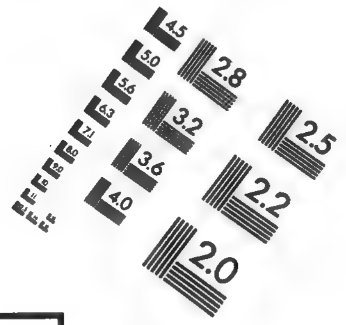
REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

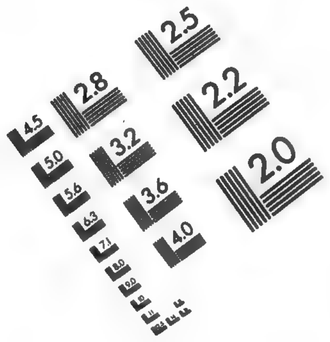
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



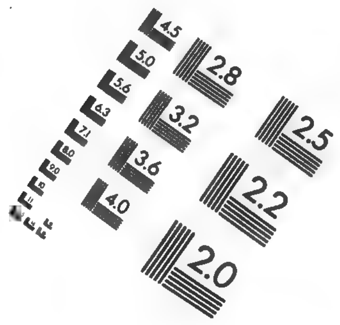
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
2.5
4.0
2.2
2.0



2.5
4.5
2.8
2.2
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

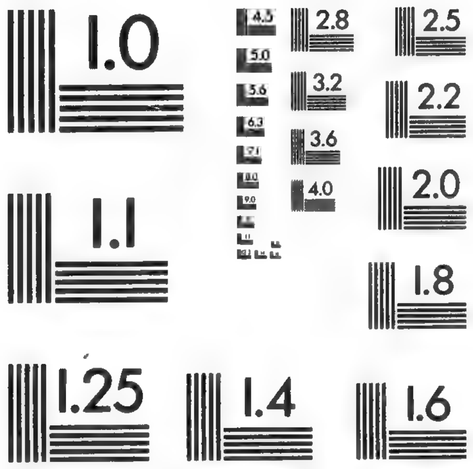


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
2.5
4.0
2.2
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

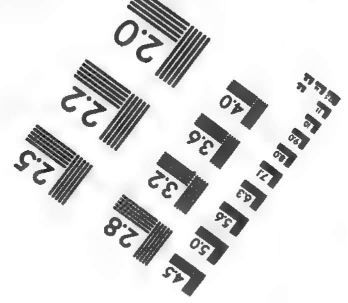
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

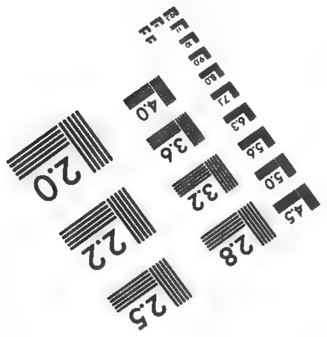
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



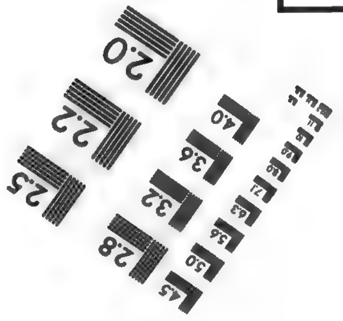
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5



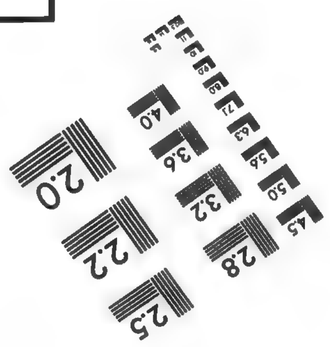
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
4.0
2.2
3.6
3.2
2.5
2.8
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Apr 28

BOSTON POST, TU

12 PLAYERS WILL LEAVE SYMPHONY

Four Resign, Eight Dropped--14 New Men to Come

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of genius and man of magnetism and uncommon personality, has indeed made the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its concerns a matter of more than usual "news interest."

And the recent decisions concerning changes in the orchestra's personnel have set many tongues a-wagging.

FOUR RESIGN, 8 DROPPED

Interviewed at Symphony Hall last evening by a representative of the Post, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said that the actual number of men who will sever their connection with the band this spring is 12. Of these, four tendered their resignations, among them Georges Longy, incomparable virtuoso of the oboe, who is retiring to his native France after more than a quarter of a century's service with the Boston Symphony.

Eight men, then, said Judge Cabot, were given notice that their contracts would not be renewed. The most of those eight players are worthy musicians, who have rendered the orchestra excellent service, but they are men past the prime of life for whom the exactions of performance under a conductor so individually-minded as is Mr. Koussevitzky might well prove disturbing.

14 New Men

For Mr. Koussevitzky is an autocrat of the baton: that fact there is no gainsaying. He knows full well the effect that he would gain, but it is frequently not the accustomed effect, nor are his means the accustomed means, and players of long habit in the traditional interpretations of one and another masterpiece find it difficult to achieve all that he asks.

So it is that the board of trustees, abiding by Mr. Koussevitzky's wishes and for the greater good of the orchestra, plan to have upon the stage of Symphony Hall when the orchestra convenes next autumn, 14 new and younger men—two new first violinists, making in all 34, instead of 32 players in that choir, and 12 others to replace those now, for one reason or another, are about to take their departure from the orchestra's ranks.

Almost Routine Changes

Great is the stir and loud the conversation anent this reordering of the personnel, yet actualy it is scarcely the "shake-up" that one and another would have you believe. With every season there are new faces; an orchestra, like all living organisms and organizations, is ever changing, never altogether still. Last season, for instance, the Philedelphia orchestra, that had already been acclaimed a well-nigh perfect instrument, had some 30 odd new players in its ranks.

Yet it is doubtful whether public interest in the fact was so great even in its home city as that now being manifested hereabouts in the affairs of the Boston Symphony. For our orchestra is a thing very close to the interests and the hearts of all Bostonians.

No Question of Discipline

It should be said, then, and it will be welcome tidings to all the orchestra's well-wishers, that Judge Cabot last evening emphatically denied that there was any "personal feeling" in the matter of either resignations or of dismissals. Nor is there any question of discipline. Considerable publicity has been given the story of Mr. Koussevitzky's reprimand of a player who smoked during rehearsal hour. That incident was never repeated, nor has it any remote connection with the present concern.

Smoking during rehearsals is generally forbidden in all major orchestras, but here in Boston there had been a certain laxness about the prohibition during the years before Mr. Koussevitzky's coming. It should scarcely be necessary to add that no show of "discipline" was needed when it was discovered how strongly Mr. Koussevitzky felt on the subject.

Matter of Encore

There is yet another story afloat which should here receive mention; to wit, that the encoring of Rimsky-Korsakov's delightful musical trifle, "The Flight of the Bumblebee," at a concert early in the season caused mutterings in the orchestra concerning Mr. Koussevitzky's departure from precedent.

From one and another musical precedent Mr. Koussevitzky has now and then departed, often to excellent effect; but in this particular instance no such distinction was his. As more than one letter to the Post and to other newspapers abundantly proved, other conductors before him had yielded to the audience's apparent desire for the repetition of a piece.

FRESH VENTURE CROWNED

The "Monday Nights" Conclude Successfully — Chaikovsky Exotic; Vivaldi Archaic—Hearers Alert and Discerning

WITH the fifth and final of the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night an experiment might be said to have come to a successful conclusion. This series of five concerts, offered it is to be presumed tentatively to sound the depth of interest on the part of the musical public of Boston and to test the reaction of a new group of hearers of symphonic music, has resulted in a new audience, called together by no call of social or family obligation, under no restraint of tradition, evoked solely by a desire to hear.

Each of the concerts has been given to a filled hall and at each the quality of the listening has been of the best. Last night not a handclap punctuated the pauses between the movements of Vivaldi's concerto and a few scattering plaudits between the second and third movements of the symphony were quickly stilled at the conductor's raised stick. As was only natural, there was a tendency to applaud at what appeared to be the end of the symphony, at the point where Chaikovsky pulls off his coat the better to get down to the business of appending a fitting close to the pile of shrieks and clamor he evolved in this fifth of his symphonies. But this mistake was quickly sensed and an apologetic shuffle promised that it would not happen again.

Doubtless the inclusion of the fifth symphony of Chaikovsky was also in the nature of an experiment. Through the Monday season the only other symphonies that had been played were the fifth and seventh of Beethoven and the G major of Haydn. For the most part, aside from the numbers elected by the soloist of the evening, Mr. Koussevitzky had set upon the programs short pieces only, steps as it were up which to lead an uncertain public, supposedly unused to the task of listening to a long work in prescribed form. If Mr. Koussevitzky was experimenting last night, he may well be satisfied with the response he received. There was eager and close attention, and no restlessness apparent even in those seats usually occupied by the elect.

Possibly the exotic tendency of the music (so Russian, you know) and the heaped-up climaxes of sound made this work ideal for such an experiment. Chaikovsky in his orchestral writing seemed a bit of an experimenter himself, though in this beyond the other symphonies of his usually performed, the fourth and the sixth, he appears to be more firmly footed—as well as heavy handed. Both Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave themselves to the pages of the score as though this sixty-fourth opus of the Russian eclectic were the greatest piece of writing of the nineteenth century. The result was a gorgeous performance and an enthusiasm which vented itself in continued and loud handclappings and even a few timid bravos from the gallery. At the fourth recall, when custom demands that the conductor invite the orchestra to rise and share in the applause, the careful commentator on the ways of an audience with his appreciation would have noted and stored up for future meditation how one after another popped up as an involuntary tribute to the performers who had given him enjoyment until most of the gathering was on its feet applauding lustily.

FRESH VENTURE CROWNED

Continued from Preceding Page

It is not on record that Vivaldi ever visited England. The concerto in D minor, however, written by the Italian fiddler and edited by the Russian pianist, is pure English and Elizabethan English at that. Of course it was not produced till long after the Elizabethan age was gone, but its broad, frank harmonies and its equally broad and frank sentimentalities are of the time when men gave honest expression to whatever feeling moved them. It is to be suspected that Mr. Siloti in editing the piece gave more prominence to the organ part than the composer had in mind. Instead of being treated merely as an accessory to the bass, as it emerged last night it had a large share in building up climaxes and augmenting the [illegible] resources of the small orchestra. Another suspicion is that the part for the oboe was a later addition, but nobody can deny that the extension of both parts helped immeasurably to make the piece worth a place on a program.

While theory runs its course, let it be remembered that after the fervors of the Italian Renaissance had waned, the craftsmen of Italy gave themselves over to producing designs borrowed from other lands from France, from Germany and from England. Need this epidemic of copying have been limited only to the handicrafts? This was the first time that any of Mr. Koussevitzky's beloved "archaic music" had appeared on one of the Monday evening programs. Still another experiment?

César Franck's Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra call for no display of virtuosity on the part of the pianist. They demand, however, a deep appreciation of the poetry the great French organist wrote into every page of every score. Romantic beauty is here, less personally perhaps than in Schumann, less majestically than in Liszt, but it is fundamental and Mieczyslaw Münz grasped this fact, contenting himself with setting forth the song of the piano part and letting his instrument become one with the band. He is an unobtrusive young man with an ingratiating touch and an ear for delicacy rather than a fist for noise. There was a crisp and brilliant accompaniment for him in the effort of the orchestra. . . . Thus is the public of the orchestra enlarged, to the benefit of the town.

C. M. S.

Fifth Symphony. The themes are well developed in the exposition, there is as a result but a short working-out section, recapitulation really recapitulates and sums up rather than fully and tiresomely restates. The vocabulary and the devices of the Stravinsky of "The Rite of Spring" abound. There are the sharp, pointed, stinging, searing dissonances; there are the insistent rhythms; there is the violent percussion; there is every known device for stimulating and over-stimulating already high strung nerves. But unlike the movements of Stravinsky, there seemed occasional moments in this movement when dissonances and rhythmic furies failed so to stimulate, when we were on the verge of dullness. Did Mr. Copland's invention (with Stravinskian language) run dry in such moments?

Unquestionably Mr. Copland has written a masterpiece of logical formal construction, of adroit juxtaposition and successive evolution of moods in this symphony. There remains the question of whether it was worth the doing in the terms and with the language that he uses. For in this he knows but one master, Stravinsky. It may be argued that originality consists not in the invention of new material, but in the new handling of old material; the classic instance of Beethoven, Liszt, Franck using the identical three-note motive without their originality being in the least questioned. "There is nothing new under the sun"; originality consists in newness of combination. True and accepted beyond peradventure of doubt. Newness of combination of old forms we have granted Mr. Copland. And still the question of originality persists. Circumstances alter cases. The kind of vocabulary Mr. Copland is using is a determining factor. It can probably be set down as a canon of the newer styles that as an idiom or vocabulary of effects increases in individuality, the number of works that can possibly be written in that idiom enormously decreases. In all probability some such principle is the foundation of Stravinsky's own incessant change of styles. Stravinsky's "renunciation" of all his works but the last one may well be taken with a grain of salt. But beneath all this there is surely the shrewd recognition of the principle that it would be unwise or even unsafe even for Stravinsky himself to at-

---

use of the "Dies Irae" not in the b form in which so many composers necessary to introduce it, the piece its tasteful orchestration is a bec last tribute to some one of the victi
the war, either as individual or as ty

Miss Nadia Boulanger is an org of distinction, and more. By all the dence of yesterday afternoon she is sician of rare attainment. It is rec ant here to speak of excellence of tec of polish of style. The organ is the est instrument in the world to play cally, just as it is one of the easie the major instruments to subject to b routine treatment. To make it as one the orchestra; to make it rise above chestra when occasion demands, wit crassly dominating everything; to kee from sounding weak and insufficient colorless in comparison with the orche these are the achievements of match musicianship. For too often is the tempt made to contrast the imitative ors of the organ with the respective

LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE

BIG SHAKEUP IN HUB ORCHESTRA

Nearly Score of Famous Symphony Musicians Are Given Notice of Dismissal

(By Universal Service)

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by the European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

One who is going, but not because of the shakeup, is Georges Longy, oboist, with the orchestra for 27 years. He has resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Twelve of the musicians were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted.

Trouble is said to have started at the second rehearsal over which the new Russian conductor presided. Smoking of pipes and cigars on the stage during "breathing spells" of that rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky.

Another rift came when, on Nov. 11, he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert. This was in response to prolonged applause for "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" from "Tsar-Sultan" by Rimsky-Korsakov. While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes, the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "no encores" rose to a storm.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and his word was law. Erring musicians were reprimanded.

Eventually a committee of the players waited upon the conductor and the trustees. The players construed his caustic comment on the abilities of certain artists as "advance notice" of dismissal.

The discussion was amicable, and it was finally agreed, that in the event of changes being made, ample notice would be given.

So, in keping with the agreement, the trustees mailed on Friday, April 17, two weeks' notices of dismissal to twelve veteran members of the orchestra.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 28 1925

12 MEN OUT OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Koussevitsky to Import Europeans for Vacancies Caused by Big Shakeup.

By Universal Service.

BOSTON, April 28.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by the uropean artists imported by Koussevitsky.

Twelve of the musicians were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted.

Trouble is said to have started at the second rehearsal, over which the new Russian conductor presided Smoking of pipes and cigars on the stage during "breathing spells" of that rehearsal brought the first ouburst of indignation from Kousseitsky

Another rit came when on November 11 e ordered the playing of an encor during a concert. This was in reponse to prolonged applause fo "The Flight of the Bumble ee" from "Tsar,Saltan" by Rimsky-Korsakov. While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "no encores" rose to a storm.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and his word was law. Erring musicians were reprimanded.

Eventually a committee of the players waited upon the conductor and the trustees. The players construed his caustic comment on the abilities of certain artists as "advanec notice" of dismissal.

The discussion was amicable, and it was finally agreed that, in the event of changes being made, ample notice would be given. So, in keeping with the agreement, the trustes mailed on Friday, April 17, two weeks' notices of dismissal to twelve veteran members of the orchestra.

Boston Herald
4-28-25

SYMPHONY MONDAY NIGHT SERIES ENDS

Brilliant Program Brilliantly Executed

The Symphony concert last night brought the Monday series to a brilliant close. It began with a Vivaldi concerto in D minor, for orchestra with organ in an edition by A. Siloti. Then Mieczyslaw Muenz played Franck's Variations for piano and orchestra. And finally came Tchaikovsky's E-minor symphony.

It was a program skilfully planned. Since Mr. Koussevitzky finds it best to place the symphony at the end, he showed consideration in making what came before it short, and by no means exacting to listen to. By way of contrast, [illegible] to the old Italian concerto with its stately strain at the start, the [illegible] lovely song of the largo movement [illegible] brilliant close, pompously [illegible] what would have answered better than the charming Variations of Cesar Franck?

The [illegible] not stand on the plane of [illegible] of the "Beatitudes" and the [illegible] the symphony. But how exquisitely the theme falls on the ear, when at last the piano intones it! It becomes presently beautiful song for the piano alone. What high spirits it suggests when the rhythm changes! And the touch of jazz toward the end! Who would have thought it of Cesar Franck? And, mind you, he hit on that skittish rhythm some 40 years ago, before it was the fashion. It has always been thrown in his face that he had his moments of commonness. A pity he did not live till today, when he could have lengthened them without blame.

Mr. Muenz played the variations with something less of brilliancy and warmth than the music could have stood, but with infinite delicacy and grace. His tone blended with that of the orchestra quite as perfectly as that of Miss Myra Hess. Higher praise there can scarcely be.

Mr. Koussevitzky, as everybody knows, does not necessarily play the same music twice alike. The Tchaikovsky symphony he did not feel so racking last night as he found it a month ago. If it lost some of its anguished appeal, it gained much in musical beauty, beauty of sound and of song. The Monday series ended indeed in a blaze of orchestral and musical glory.

This was pleasant reading in the program book: The Monday concerts will be continued another year.

R. R. G.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 28 1925

THREE NOTED PLAYERS QUIT HUB SYMPHONY

Retirement Voluntary; Judge Cabot, Trustee, Denies Story of Shakeup in Orchestra.

BOSTON, April 28—Rumors of disagreements in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of a "shakeup" insiste upon by Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, were flatly contradicted las evening by Judge Frederick Cabot, one of the trustees. These rumors, which persisted in musical circles yesterday were that 12 players had been refused new contarcts, at the behest of Koussevitsky.

The story ran that the trouble between Koussevitsky and members of the orchestra began when he forbade smoking on the stage during rest periods at rehearsals.

It was said that he flew into a rage, declaring the musicans should regard the concert hall as a shrine, and should no more think of smokin there than they would in church.

Twelve Dropped.

The rift widened, according to reports, when Mr. Koussevitzky violated all custom and ordered an encore to a number, Nov. 11, 1924. The players, it was said demanded adherence to custom. Differences arose which caused minor feuds between the conductor and some of the players, it was said.

Then, when on April 17 notices were mailed to 12 veteran members of the orchestra that their contracts would not be renewed, many persons claime to see the results of Koussevitsky' wrath. They said his opponents ha been punished.

Among those who will not be wit the orchestra in its next season are Georges Longy, one of the world most famous aboe players; Clemer Lenon, who for many years shared desk with Longy and worked with hi in his school of wood-wind music, an Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violincellis These will be replaced by new me from Europe. It is said that as far a these players are concerned, the te mination of their connection w wholly voluntary.

Judge Cabot Gives Denial.

Judge Cabot said last night that t report of a "shakeup" was "wholly invention."

"It is true," he said, "that certa members of the orchestra will not ha their contracts renewed this year, bu the condition is a normal one. Eve year about the same number of pla do not have their contracts renewed, either at their wish or because for one reason or another, they a unable to play as well as once the could.

"This year's number is no greate than the average. It is absurd to tal of friction between Mr. Koussevitsk and his players. The rumors are absolutely without foundation."

Apr 28

BOSTON POST, TU

12 PLAYERS WILL LEAVE SYMPHONY

Four Resign, Eight Dropped--14 New Men to Come

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of genius and man of magnetism and uncommon personality, has indeed made the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its concerns a matter of more than usual "news interest."

And the recent decisions concerning changes in the orchestra's personnel have set many tongues a-wagging.

FOUR RESIGN, 8 DROPPED

Interviewed at Symphony Hall last evening by a representative of the Post, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said that the actual number of men who will sever their connection with the band this spring is 12. Of these, four tendered their resignations, among them Georges Longy, incomparable virtuoso of the oboe, who is retiring to his native France after more than a quarter of a century's service with the Boston Symphony.

Eight men, then, said Judge Cabot, were given notice that their contracts would not be renewed. The most of those eight players are worthy musicians, who have rendered the orchestra excellent service, but they are men past the prime of life for whom the exactions of performance under a conductor so individually-minded as is Mr. Koussevitzky might well prove disturbing.

14 New Men

For Mr. Koussevitzky is an autocrat of the baton: that fact there is no gainsaying. He knows full well the effect that he would gain, but it is frequently not the accustomed effect, nor are his means the accustomed means, and players of long habit in the traditional interpretations of one and another masterpiece find it difficult to achieve all that he asks.

So it is that the board of trustees, abiding by Mr. Koussevitzky's wishes and for the greater good of the orchestra, plan to have upon the stage of Symphony Hall when the orchestra convenes next autumn, 14 new and younger men—two new first violinists, making in all 34, instead of 32 players in that choir, and 12 others to replace those now, for one reason or another, are about to take their departure from the orchestra's ranks.

Almost Routine Changes

Great is the stir and loud the conversation anent this reordering of the personnel, yet actualy it is scarcely the "shake-up" that one and another would have you believe. With every season there are new faces; an orchestra, like all living organisms and organizations, is ever changing, never altogether still., Last season, for instance, the Philedelphia orchestra, that had already been acclaimed a well-nigh perfect instrument, had some 30 odd new players in its ranks.

Yet it is doubtful whether public interest in the fact was so great even in its home city as that now being manifested hereabouts in the affairs of the Boston Symphony. For our orchestra is a thing very close to the interests and the hearts of all Bostonians.

No Question of Discipline

It should be said, then, and it will be welcome tidings to all the orchestra's well-wishers, that Judge Cabot last evening emphatically denied that there was any "personal feeling" in the matter of either resignations or of dismissals. Nor is there any question of discipline. Considerable publicity has been given the story of Mr. Koussevitzky's reprimand of a player who smoked during rehearsal hour. That incident was never repeated, nor has it any remote connection with the present concern.

Smoking during rehearsals is generally forbidden in all major orchestras, but here in Boston there had been a certain laxness about the prohibition during the years before Mr. Koussevitzky's coming. It should scarcely be necessary to add that no show of "discipline" was needed when it was discovered how strongly Mr. Koussevitzky felt on the subject.

Matter of Encore

There is yet another story afloat which should here receive mention; to wit, that the encoring of Rimsky-Korsakov's delightful musical trifle, "The Flight of the Bumblebee," at a concert early in the season caused mutterings in the orchestra concerning Mr. Koussevitzky's departure from precedent.

From one and another musical precedent Mr. Koussevitzky has now and then departed, often to excellent effect; but in this particular instance no such distinction was his. As more than one letter to the Post and to other newspapers abundantly proved, other conductors before him had yielded to the audience's apparent desire for the repetition of a piece.

FRESH VENTURE CROWNED

The "Monday Nights" Conclude Successfully — Chaikovsky Exotic; Vivaldi Archaic—Hearers Alert and Discerning

WITH the fifth and final of the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night an experiment might be said to have come to a successful conclusion. This series of five concerts, offered it is to be presumed tentatively to sound the depth of interest on the part of the musical public of Boston and to test the reaction of a new group of hearers of symphonic music, has resulted in a new audience, called together by no call of social or family obligation, under no restraint of tradition, evoked solely by a desire to hear.

Each of the concerts has been given to a filled hall and at each the quality of the listening has been of the best. Last night not a handclap punctuated the pauses between the movements of Vivaldi's concerto and a few scattering plaudits between the second and third movements of the symphony were quickly stilled at the conductor's raised stick. As was only natural, there was a tendency to applaud at what appeared to be the end of the symphony, at the point where Chaikovsky pulls off his coat the better to get down to the business of appending a fitting close to the pile of shrieks and clamor he evolved in this fifth of his symphonies. But this mistake was quickly sensed and an apologetic shuffle promised that it would not happen again.

Doubtless the inclusion of the fifth symphony of Chaikovsky was also in the nature of an experiment. Through the Monday season the only other symphonies that had been played were the fifth and seventh of Beethoven and the G major of Haydn. For the most part, aside from the numbers elected by the soloist of the evening, Mr. Koussevitzky had set upon the programs short pieces only, steps as it were up which to lead an uncertain public, supposedly unused to the task of listening to a long work in prescribed form. If Mr. Koussevitzky was experimenting last night, he may well be satisfied with the response he received. There was eager and close attention, and no restlessness apparent even in those seats usually occupied by the elect.

Possibly the exotic tendency of the music (so Russian, you know) and the heaped-up climaxes of sound made this work ideal for such an experiment. Chaikovsky in his orchestral writing seemed a bit of an experimenter himself, though in this beyond the other symphonies of his usually performed, the fourth and the sixth, he appears to be more firmly footed—as well as heavy handed. Both Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave themselves to the pages of the score as though this sixty-fourth opus of the Russian eclectic were the greatest piece of writing of the nineteenth century. The result was a gorgeous performance and an enthusiasm which vented itself in continued and loud handclappings and even a few timid bravos from the gallery. At the fourth recall, when custom demands that the conductor invite the orchestra to rise and share in the applause, the careful commentator on the ways of an audience with its appreciation would have noted and stored up for future meditation how one after another popped up as an involuntary tribute to the performers who had given him enjoyment until most of the gathering was on its feet applauding lustily.

FRESH VENTURE CROWNED

Continued from Preceding Page

It is not on record that Vivaldi ever visited England. The concerto in D minor, however, written by the Italian fiddler and edited by the Russian pianist, is pure English and Elizabethan English at that. Of course it was not produced till long after the Elizabethan age was gone, but its broad, frank harmonies and its equally broad and frank sentimentalities are of the time when men gave honest expression to whatever feeling moved them. It is to be suspected that Mr. Siloti in editing the piece gave more prominence to the organ part than the composer had in mind. Instead of being treated merely as an accessory to the bass, as it emerged last night it had a large share in building up climaxes and augmenting the tonal resources of the small orchestra. Another suspicion is that the part for the oboe was a later addition, but nobody can deny that the extension of both parts helped immeasurably to make the piece worth a place on a program.

While theory runs its course, let it be remembered that after the fervors of the Italian Renaissance had waned, the craftsmen of Italy gave themselves over to producing designs borrowed from other lands from France, from Germany and from England. Need this epidemic of copying have been limited only to the handicrafts? This was the first time that any of Mr. Koussevitzky's beloved "archaic music" had appeared on one of the Monday evening programs. Still another experiment?

César Franck's Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra call for no display of virtuosity on the part of the pianist. They demand, however, a deep appreciation of the poetry the great French organist wrote into every page of every score. Romantic beauty is here, less personally perhaps than in Schumann, less majestically than in Liszt, but it is fundamental and Mieczyslaw Münz grasped this fact, contenting himself with setting forth the song of the piano part and letting his instrument become one with the band. He is an unobtrusive young man with an ingratiating touch and an ear for delicacy rather than a fist for noise. There was a crisp and brilliant accompaniment for him in the effort of the orchestra. . . . Thus is the public of the orchestra enlarged, to the benefit of the town.

C. M. S.

[illegible] Apr 28

LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE

BIG SHAKEUP IN HUB ORCHESTRA

Nearly Score of Famous Symphony Musicians Are Given Notice of Dismissal

(By Universal Service)

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by the European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

One who is going, but not because of the shakeup, is Georges Longy, oboist, with the orchestra for 27 years. He has resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Twelve of the musicians were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted.

Trouble is said to have started at the second rehearsal over which the new Russian conductor presided. Smoking of pipes and cigars on the stage during "breathing spells" of that rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky.

Another rift came when, on Nov. 11, he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert. This was in response to prolonged applause for "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" from "Tsar-Sultan" by Rimsky-Korsakov. While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes, the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "no encores" rose to a storm.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and his word was law. Erring musicians were reprimanded.

Eventually a committee of the players waited upon the conductor and the trustees. The players construed his caustic comment on the abilities of certain artists as "advance notice" of dismissal.

The discussion was amicable, and it was finally agreed, that in the event of changes being made, ample notice would be given.

So, in keping with the agreement, the trustees mailed on Friday, April 17, two weeks' notices of dismissal to twelve veteran members of the orchestra.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 28 1925

12 MEN OUT OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Koussevitsky to Import Europeans for Vacancies Caused by Big Shakeup.

By Universal Service.

BOSTON, April 28.—The greatest shakeup in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, Russian condictor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by the uropean artists imported by Koussevitsky.

Twelve of the musicians were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted.

Trouble is said to have started at the second rehearsal, over which the new Russian conductor presided Smoking of pipes and cigars on the stage during "breathing spells" of that rehearsal brought the first ouburst of indignation from Kousseitsky

Another rit came when on November 11 e ordered the playing of an encor during a concert. This was in reponse to prolonged applause fo "The Flight of the Bumble Jee" from "Tsar,Saltan" by Rimsky-Korsakov. While the playing of it occupied only a few minutes the protests of some of the players over the breaking of a time-honored custom of "no encores" rose to a storm.

Koussevitsky soon made it understood he was "captain" and his word was law. Erring musicians were reprimanded.

Eventually a committee of the players waited upon the conductor and the trustees. The players construed his caustic comment on the abilities of certain artists as "advanec notice" of dismissal.

The discussion was amicable, and it was finally agreed that, in the event of changes being made, ample notice would be given. So, in keeping with the agreement, the trustes mailed on Friday, April 17, two weeks' notices of dismissal to twelve veteran members of the orchestra.

Boston Herald Apr 28

SYMPHONY MONDAY NIGHT SERIES ENDS

Brilliant Program Brilliantly Executed

The Symphony concert last night brought the Monday series to a brilliant close. It began with a Vivaldi concerto in D minor, for orchestra with organ in an edition by A. Siloti. Then Mieczyslaw Muenz played Franck's Variations for piano and orchestra. And finally came Tchaikovsky's E-minor symphony.

It was a program skilfully planned. Since Mr. Koussevitzky finds it best to place the symphony at the end, he showed consideration in making what came before it short and by no means exacting to listen to. By way of contrast, too, to the old Italian concerto with its stately stride at the start, the lovely flowing song of the largo movement, its brilliant close, pomposity itself, what could have answered better than the charming variations of Cesar Franck?

They may not stand on the plane of the best of the "Beautitudes" and the quintet, or yet the symphony. But how exquisitely the theme falls on the ear. when first the piano intones it! It becomes presently beautiful song for the piano alone. What high spirits it suggests when the rhythm changes! And the touch of jazz toward the end! Who would have thought it of Cesar Franck? And, mind you, he hit on that skittish rhythm some 40 years ago, before it was the fashion. It has always been thrown in his face that he had his moments of commonness. A pity he did not live till today, when he could have lengthened them without blame.

Mr. Muenz played the variations with something less of brilliancy and warmth than the music could have stood, but with infinite delicacy and grace. His tone blended with that of the orchestra quite as perfectly as that of Miss Myra Hess. Higher praise there can scarcely be.

Mr. Koussevitzky, as everybody knows, does not necessarily play the same music twice alike. The Tchaikovsky symphony he did not feel so racking last night as he found it a month ago. If it lost some of its anguished appeal, it gained much in musical beauty, beauty of sound and of song. The Monday series ended indeed in a blaze of orchestral and musical glory.

This was pleasant reading in the program book: The Monday concerts will be continued another year.

R. R. G.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 28 1925

THREE NOTED PLAYERS QUIT HUB SYMPHONY

Retirement Voluntary; Judge Cabot, Trustee, Denies Story of Shakeup in Orchestra.

BOSTON, April 28—Rumors of disgreements in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of a "shakeup" insiste upon by Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, were flatly contradicted las evening by Judge Frederick Cabot, one of the trustees. These rumors, which persisted in musical circles yesterday were that 12 players had been refused new contarcts, at the behest of Koussevitsky.

The story ran that the trouble between Koussevitsky and members of the orchestra began when he forbade smoking on the stage during rest periods at rehearsals.

It was said that he flew into a rage, declaring the musicans should regard the concert hall as a shrine, and should no more think of smokin there than they would in church.

Twelve Dropped.

The rift widened, according to reports, when Mr. Koussevitsky violated all custom and ordered an encore to a number, Nov. 11, 1924. The players, it was said demanded adherence to custom. Differences arose which caused minor feuds between the conductor and some of the players, it was said.

Then, when on April 17 notices wer mailed to 12 veteran members of th orchestra that their contracts would not be renewed, many persons claime to see the results of Koussevitsky wrath. They said his opponents ha been punished.

Among those who will not be wit the orchestra in its next season ar Georges Longy, one of the world most famous aboe players; Clemen Lenon, who for many years shared desk with Longy and worked with hi in his school of wood-wind music, ar Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncelli These will be replaced by new me from Europe. It is said that as far a these players are concerned, the te mination of their connection w wholly voluntary.

Judge Cabot Gives Denial.

Judge Cabot said last night that t report of a "shakeup" was "wholly a invention."

"It is true," he said, "that certa members of the orchestra will not ha their contracts renewed this year, bu the condition is a normal one. Ever year about the same number of pla ers do not have their contracts re newed, either at their wish or becaus for one reason or another, they a unable to play as well as once the could.

"This year's number is no greate than the average. It is absurd to tal of friction between Mr. Koussevitsk and his players. The rumors are abso lutely without foundation."

Fifth Symphony, [illegible] are well developed in the exposition, there is as a result but a short working-out section, recapitulation really recapitulates and sums up rather than fully and tiresomely restates. The vocabulary and the devices of the Stravinsky of "The Rite of Spring" abound. There are the sharp, pointed, stinging, searing dissonances; there are the insistent rhythms; there is the violent percussion; there is every known device for stimulating and over-stimulating already high strung nerves. But unlike the movements of Stravinsky, there seemed occasional moments in this movement when dissonances and rhythmic furies failed so to stimulate, when we were on the verge of dullness. Did Mr. Copland's invention (with Stravinskian language) run dry in such moments?

Unquestionably Mr. Copland has written a masterpiece of logical formal construction, of adroit juxtaposition and successive evolution of moods in this symphony. There remains the question of whether it was worth the doing in the terms and with the language that he uses. For in this he knows but one master, Stravinsky. It may be argued that originality consists not in the invention of new material, but in the new handling of old material; the classic instance of Beethoven, Liszt, Franck using the identical three-note motive without their originality being in the least questioned. "There is nothing new under the sun"; originality consists in newness of combination. True and accepted beyond peradventure of doubt. Newness of combination of old forms we have granted Mr. Copland. And still the question of originality persists. Circumstances alter cases. The kind of vocabulary Mr. Copland is using is a determining factor. It can probably be set down as a canon of the newer styles that as an idiom or vocabulary of effects increases in individuality, the number of works that can possibly be written in that idiom enormously decreases. In all probability some such principle is the foundation of Stravinsky's own incessant change of styles. Stravinsky's "renunciation" of all his works but the last one may well be taken with a grain of salt. But beneath all this there is surely the shrewd recognition of the principle that it would be unwise or even unsafe even for Stravinsky himself to at-use of the "Dies Irae" not in the form in which so many composers necessary to introduce it, the piece its tasteful orchestration is a bec last tribute to some one of the victi the war, either as individual or as typ

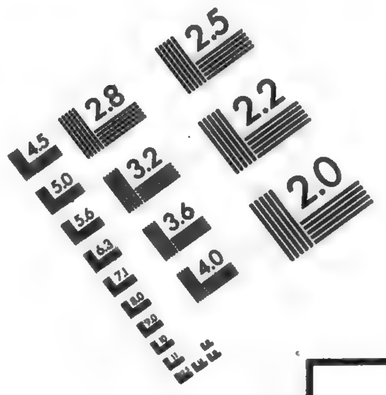
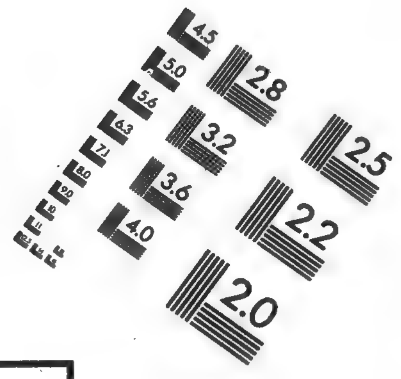
Miss Nadia Boulanger is an org of distinction, and more. By all the dence of yesterday afternoon she is sician of rare attainment. It is re ant here to speak of excellence of tec of polish of style. The organ is the est instrument in the world to play cally, just as it is one of the easie the major instruments to subject to bo routine treatment. To make it as one the orchestra; to make it rise above chestra when occasion demands, with crassly dominating everything; to kee from sounding weak and insufficient colorless in comparison with the orche these are the achievements of match musicianship. For too often is the tempt made to contrast the imitative ors of the organ with the respective

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

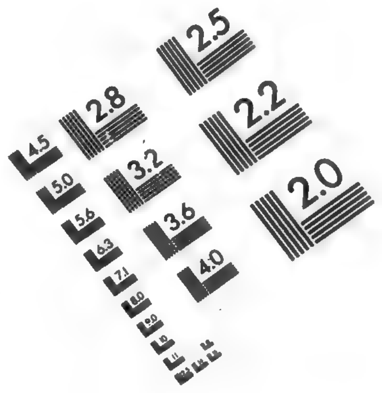
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



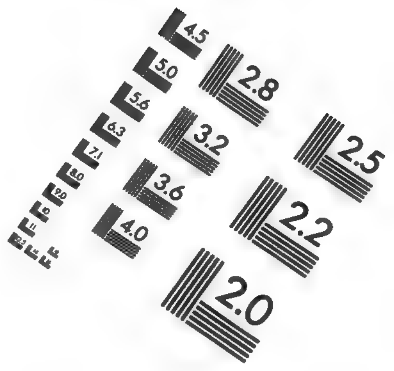
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
5.6
3.2
2.5
6.3
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0

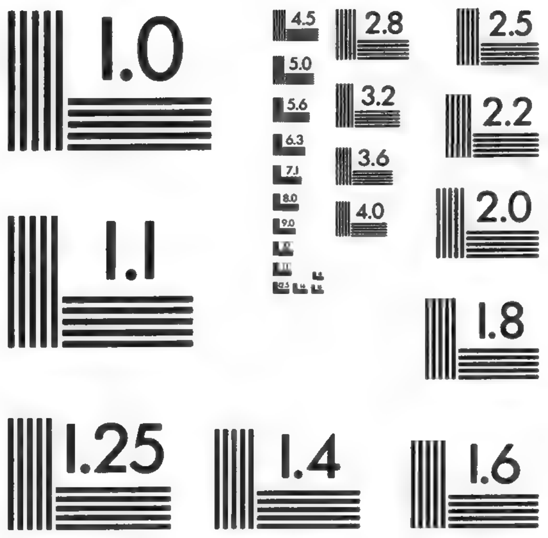


4.5
5.0
2.8
5.6
3.2
2.5
6.3
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
7.1
3.6
8.0
4.0
2.0
9.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

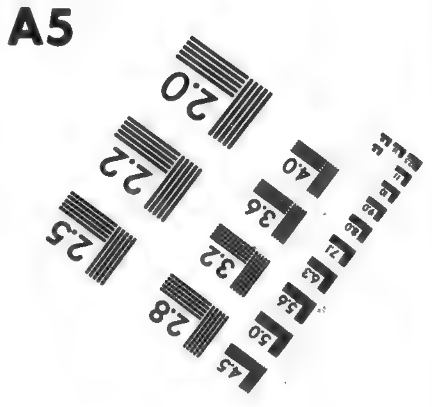
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

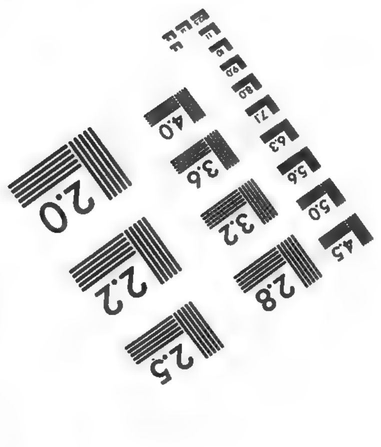
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



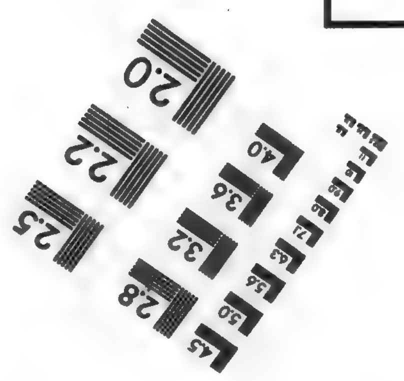
2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8



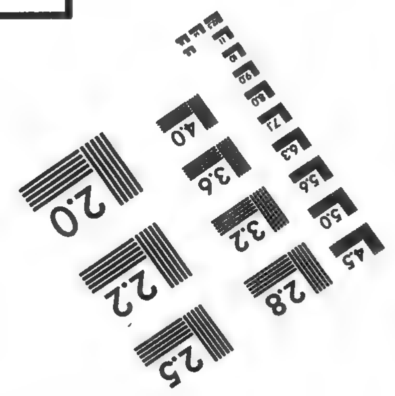
4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Post 92
April 28

SYMPHONY IN FINAL EXTRA

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The beginning of the end of the present Symphony season came last evening when Mr. Koussevitzky bade farewell, until next autumn, to the applauding subscribers to the five "extra" concerts.

For this last Monday programme, in accordance with his custom throughout the series, Mr. Koussevitzky chose orchestral numbers already played at the regular subscription concerts, leaving as the sole "novelty" the piece in which the soloist of the evening bore a part. Thus last night the programme began with Vivaldi's sturdy Concerto for organ and orchestra, in D minor, the first piece, by the way, that Mr. Koussevitzky conducted in Boston last autumn; and it ended with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, played already at a pair of subscription concerts as well as at the first Pension Fund Concert, and the vehicle for one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most impressive achievements. No other conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, it is quite safe to say, has so transfigured the composition that many are disposed to regard as Tchaikovsky's masterpiece.

The soloist on this occasion was the young Polish pianist, Mieczyslaw Munz, twice heard and favorably received here in recital. Last evening Mr. Munz appeared as pianist in Franck's Symphonic Variations, the first piece by the Belgian master to be heard here under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton. As is usual with him Mr. Koussevitzky was singularly happy in his treatment of the orchestral accompaniment. And Mr. Munz, if he shed no new light upon this music, played his portion in it with warm tone, supple rhythm and a sufficient grasp of the elusive and much-vaunted Franckian spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

APR 28 1925

Many Players Dismissed From Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, says he intends to make the organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world. The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

APR 28 1925

Many Players Dismissed From Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, says he intends to make the organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world. The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

Advertiser Apr 28

Shakeup in Symphony

Nearly a Score of Members Discharged or Resign From Orchestra; New Conductor to Bring Players From Europe

Musical Boston received a surprise yesterday in the announcement that nearly a score of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians are retiring or discharged this week in the greatest shake-up in the history of the organization.

Serge Koussevitsky, the Symphony's Russian conductor, who is backed by the trustees in the drastic changes, says:

"Discipline I must have. It was a tremendous shock to my sense of the esthetic, when I entered Symphony Hall for my first rehearsal, to find the artists smoking pipes, cigars and cigarettes.

"I intend to bring some artist here from European orchestras. The trustees will have to pay these men good salaries but they will be worth every cent paid.

"It is my ambition to make the Boston Symphony one of the three greatest orchestras in the world, ranking with the best in London and Paris."

Among those who resigned is Georges Longy, oboist, who has been with the Boston Symphony 27 years. He has retired to his old home in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

APR 28 1925

20 Musicians Gone After Shakeup in Boston Symphony

Boston, April 27.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American today. The shakeup, it was stated, was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky.

Smoking of pipes and cirgarets on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitsky through an interpreter. "I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

MUENZ SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Apr 28 Boston Globe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in the final concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony Hall last evening. The soloist was Mieczyslaw Muenz, who played the piano part of Franck's "Symphonic Variations for the Piano and Orchestra."

In this piece the piano is not given a showy part, it is merely used as a part of the orchestra. Mr Muenz did not attempt to make of this music a display piece, though he played the most difficult parts with deceptive ease. His performance was delightful and wholly in keeping with the music.

The other numbers were Vivaldi's "Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ" and Tchaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony," both of which have been played in the regular series this season.

Tchaikowsky's symphony was given the sort of reading at which Mr Koussevitzky excels. In the latter part of the fourth movement he stopped beating time for several measures, evidently to show his confidence in the orchestra. His confidence was not misplaced, as there was no flagging in the sweep of the climax.

This is the last chance that this audience will have to hear Mr Koussevitzky until next season, and he was accordingly given an ovation at the end [illegible] concert.

[illegible]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
HERALD

APR 28 1925

ART

BOSTON—Score of famous musicians leave Boston symphony orchestra due to series of misunderstandings with Conductor Serge Koussevitsky.

---

american

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY,

KOUSSEVITSKY SAYS

SPRINGFIELD MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 29 1925

THREE NOTED PLAYERS QUIT HUB SYMPHONY

Retirement Voluntary; Judge Cabot, Trustee, Denies Story of Shakeup in Orchestra.

BOSTON, April 28—Rumors of disagreements in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of a "shakeup" insisted upon by Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, were flatly contradicted last evening by Judge Frederick Cabot, one of the trustees. These rumors, which persisted in musical circles yesterday, were that 12 players had been refused new contarcts, at the behest of Koussevitsky.

The story ran that the trouble between Koussevitsky and members of the orchestra began when he forbade smoking on the stage during rest periods at rehearsals.

It was said that he flew into a rage, declaring the musicans should regard the concert hall as a shrine, and should no more think of smoking there than they would in church.

Twelve Dropped.

The rift widened, according to reports, when Mr. Koussevitsky violated all custom and ordered an encore to a number, Nov. 11, 1924. The players, it was said demanded adherence to custom. Differences arose which caused minor feuds between the conductor and some of the players, it was said.

Then, when on April 17 notices were mailed to 12 veteran members of the orchestra that their contracts would not be renewed, many persons claimed to see the results of Koussevitsky's wrath. They said his opponents had been punished.

Among those who will not be with the orchestra in its next season are: Georges Longy, one of the world's most famous aboe players; Clement Lenon, who for many years shared a desk with Longy and worked with him in his school of wood-wind music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violincellist. These will be replaced by new men from Europe. It is said that as far as these players are concerned, the termination of their connection was wholly voluntary.

Judge Cabot Gives Denial.

Judge Cabot said last night that the report of a "shakeup" was "wholly an invention."

"It is true," he said, "that certain members of the orchestra will not have their contracts renewed this year, but the condition is a normal one. Every year about the same number of players do not have their contracts renewed, either at their wish or because for one reason or another, they are unable to play as well as once they could.

"This year's number is no greater than the average. It is absurd to talk of friction between Mr. Koussevitsky and his players. The rumors are absolutely without foundation."

NEW YORK
TIMES

APR 29 1925

DENIES MUSICAL 'SHAKE-UP.'

No Trouble in Boston Symphony Orchestra, Says a Trustee.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 28.—Judge Frederick Cabot, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly denied today the rumors in musical circles that new contracts had been refused to twelve of the artists as a result of a demand for a "shake-up" by the conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

"Some players will not be with the orchestra another season, but this is a normal situation and occurs annually," said Judge Cabot. "Rumors of trouble are utterly without foundation."

Among those who are leaving are George S. Longi, famed oboe player, who announced some time ago his intention to return to France; Clement Lenom, who has worked with Longi in his wood-wind music school, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncellist, all of whom will be replaced by men from Europe. Each has said his retirement is wholly voluntary.

CINCINNATI
OHIO
STAR

APR 29 1925

MANY CHANGES IN THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Players in the Ranks for Next Season.

By JAMES M. ALLISON

NEW YORK, April 28.—Faces familiar to concert-goers for many years at Symphony hall, in Boston, will be missing next season when the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky. Georges Longy, one of the world's most famous oboe players; Clement Lenom, who shared the desk with Longy and worked with him in his school of woodwind music, and Alwyn Schroeder, veteran violoncellist, will be replaced by new men from Europe.

Eight or ten other men, undoubtedly will sever their connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. Nearly all are veteran players.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky will carry to London and Paris this and that piece by Ameri-

Continued on the Following Page

CONCERT CHRONICLE

Trans, Apr. 29

Continued from Preceding Page

can composers for performance next month at his concerts. One is Mr. Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend," heard a few weeks ago in Symphony Hall. Another is Mr. Deems Taylor's orchestral suite "Through The Looking Glass," music suggested by Lewis Carroll's fantasias and once played here under Mr. Monteux. Since the conductor, like many another admires the music, he might advisedly repeat it in Boston next year.

Evidently Prokoviev's new Concerto for Violin is destined to a round of symphony concerts in the United States next year. Already Mr. Damrosch is announcing it for his orchestra in New York, with Mr. Kochanski to play the solo-part.

CLEVELAND,
OHIO
NEWS

APR 30 1925

48 Europeans Join Boston Orchestra

Russian Director Replaces 'Strikers' in Move to Regain Bay State City's Lost Music Rank.

By Archie Bell.

THERE was a time when the Boston Symphony orchestra was considered certainly the best in America—and perhaps the best in the world.

Then it deteriorated. Many things happened that permitted it to fall back in the list. But the spirit was right with the Boston audience. It wanted an orchestra and it wanted the orchestra to rank second to none.

Last autumn, the managers brought over Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who had been creating a stir in Europe. He seems to have accomplished much with the band as he found it, but now comes the almost cyclonic announcement that forty-eight of the players have severed their connection with the Boston orchestra. Their places will be taken by Europeans. This big upheaval, it is said, will put Boston in its place as one of the three notable orchestras of the world next season.

Musicians discharged, it was said, have completed plans to affiliate with other musical organizations.

Smoking of pipes and cigarettes on the stage during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitzky. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time-honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians "balked" but Koussevitzky it was stated, left the temperamental musicians know he was "captain."

"These men have been dismissed because it is my intention to replace them with better men," said Koussevitzky through an interpreter.

"I have no personal feeling in the matter. Discipline I must have."

* * *

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

APR 30 1925

KOUSSEVITSKY CHANGES BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Universal Service Wire.

BOSTON, April 29.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians has just been accomplished.

It was engineered by Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees, on the ground that he intends to make the Boston organization one of the three greatest orchestras in the world.

The places of several veteran musicians will be filled by the European artists imported by Koussevitsky.

One who is going, but not because of the shake-up, is Georges Longy, oboist, with the orchestra for 27 years. He has resigned to retire to his old home in France.

Twelve of the musicians were given two weeks' notice on April 17, at which time the resignations of several others were accepted.

GARRICK Mat. Today 50c to $2.00

FORT DODGE
IA.
MESSENGER

APR 30 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSICIANS OUSTED

BOSTON, April 29.—The greatest shake-up in the history of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, involving the departure of nearly a score of famous musicians, has just been accomplished, according to the Boston Evening American. The shake-up, it was stated, was engineered by Sergo Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, with the support of the trustees.

Places of several veteran musicians who have severed their connections with the symphony will be filled by European artists by Koussevitsky.

Smoking of pipes and cigarets on the stage of symphony hall during the "breathing spells" of a rehearsal brought the first outburst of indignation from Koussevitsky, according to The American. Another rift came when he ordered the playing of an encore during a concert, thus breaking the time honored custom of "no encores." Some in the orchestra of 104 musicians balked.

9, 1925

MEN SLEPT ON JOB

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

APR 30 1925

To Build Up Symphony

SERGE KOUSSIVITSKY, dynamic conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, evidently intends to build up an organization that will be second to none in the country, judging from his recent activity in discharging several of the members. Several others saw the handwriting on the wall and resgined.

Ever since the arrival of the Russian conductor there has been more or less a feeling of discontent among the musicians of the famous orchestra. Koussivitsky proved a hard taskmaster at rehearsals and constantly drove his men in order to get the best possible results. This created considerable hard feeling, as lengthy and exacting rehearsals were not to the liking of the members of the famous orchestra.

The concerts, however, showed a vast improvement as the result of the Russian's efforts. When Koussivitsky broke all traditions by repeating "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" at a Boston concert early in the season, there was more grumbling, but the conductor remained undisturbed and soon afterward he repeated the same number in Providence.

It has been well known that the Russian has been dissatisfied all season with the talent of some of the members of his organization and he recently announced that the seats of those who have left will be occupied by more talented musicians next season. One of the musicians who has resigned, though not from any wish of Koussivitsky, is Georges Longes, veteran oboe player of the orchestra, who has retired and will return to France. His absence will be greatly missed.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAY 1 1925

TO SAIL SATURDAY ON MAJESTIC

Serge Koussevitsky, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and His Wife Are Among Passengers From Boston to Cross by This Steamer

The White Star Line steamship Majestic, sailing from New York tomorrow for Southampton will cary 1100 saloon passengers, among whom will be Serge Koussevitsky, who has just closed his first season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Koussevitzky; also Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Wise, James Pierpont Wise, Dr. and Mrs. T. Morris Murray, Colonel and Mrs. Cecil Stewart and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Palais of Boston.

NEW YORK
ZITS

Y 2 1925

Koussevitzky Disciplines Boston Orchestra Members

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who took active charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, has his own opinions on the matter of the pride of the musicians of his orchestra, and this week it is announced that the whole organization will see some astounding changes take place in the personnel. Koussevitzky, unlike American conductors, insists on rigorous discipline among members of the orchestra, which it is said was disregarded.

The first instance of Koussevitzky's dissatisfaction with the players was when he put his foot down on the practice of smoking between numbers. Many musicians would take out pipes, cigars and cigarettes and smoke while resting between numbers. When he put a stop to this practice, the musicians became angry. Many of them were given two weeks' notice, and almost half the orchestra either was discharged or walked out in sympathy with those who have been given notice. It is reported that Koussevitzky, for the next season of the symphony, will import musicians from Russia to form the majority of the orchestral body.

Malden

SYMPHONY MEN FELL 'ASLEEP'

Koussevitsky Says He Was Forced to Act by Musicians' Indifference

At least ten of the older members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been dropped from that organization by the director, Serge Koussevitsky, because they are so old they "fall asleep."

The men will be replaced by artists which the director will personally select on the Continent.

With the full knowledge that he has aroused a furor by dismissing the older men, most of whom are looked upon by Boston music lovers as "old masters," the celebrated Russian leader is going ahead with his plans to sail for Europe at the end of the week to engage the new artists who will replace the men already dropped from the rolls.

"FALL ASLEEP."

Lounging in the depths of an easy chair at his home on Jamaicaway, the leader closed his eyes.

Then he aroused himself in full fire and passion.

"That," he declared dramatically, "is how they act. They fall asleep. That is what I contend with in trying to please the music lovers of Boston. When the members of an orchestra fall asleep what can the conductor do but eradicate the offenders?"

The trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, when interviewed, were inclined to treat lightly the matter of resignations from the organization, but not so the tempestuous director.

PRAISES PHILHARMONIC.

The protests of Bostonians against dropping the "old masters" from the orchestra has had no reaction on Koussevitsky. "I have had scores of letters criticising my actions," he told the Boston Evening American reporter, "but I have ignored them all. Now your cultured Boston people cheer our musical efforts, but when I fill the vacancies with European artists your Bostonians will stand on their seats to applaud.

"There is the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York," he continued, "which is the best body of musicians in America, and it is so because the members are vibrant with the spirit of youth. I desire my Boston orchestra to be the best in America, but to accomplish that object I must have youth with which to work."

TO REPLACE OLD MEN.

"I have in mind famous oboists, violinists and masters of the French horn who will be only too glad to leave Europe and join the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When the next season opens in Boston this city will have the greatest ensemble of instrumentalists that has ever played in Symphony Hall."

Indicative of his promise to replenish the aging ranks of the Hub orchestra with younger blood, Mr. Koussevitsky pointed to the several steamer trunks already packed preparatory to his voyage to the continent. He is due to sail for Europe on Saturday to be gone for the greater part of the Summer.

Of the orchestra as a whole, Mr. Koussevitsky spoke in the highest terms. He has no fault to find with their respo to his directorate; but he wedly antagonistic to

---

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 30 1925

YEAR OF REVOLUTION, YEAR OF PERSONALITY, YEAR OF LIMITATION

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS A FIRST SEASON

New, Strange Task Faced and Accomplished—The Individual Factor Always Uppermost—Its Play Upon Programs, Orchestra, Performance and Audience—Change Upon Every Side—Casting a Balance

WHEN Mr. Koussevitzky agreed to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the season now ending, he could hardly have foreseen the task awaiting him. No doubt, it was faithfully and exactly recited to him; but to enumerate concerts is one thing; while to achieve them is quite another. One hundred and more were his stint—the twenty-four pairs of subscription concerts, the five supplementary concerts, the two Pension-Fund concerts, the six young people's concerts—all in Boston; ten more in New York; shorter series or occasional descents scattered among cities of New England; a week of autumn journeying westward, half a week of winter journeying southward. True, he had but to assemble twenty-four programs from which to derive the music for nearly five times as many concerts; yet upon every concert he must lavish mind, hand and spirit, however assiduously he had studied scores or prepared rehearsals. For a few days in autumn illness disabled him; at midwinter he snatched a week of relative leisure; once or twice he resigned a minor occasion to Mr. Burgin. Otherwise he has done his job; added two concerts for Brahms's Requiem with the Harvard Glee Club; emerged from the ordeal in April quite as spiritedly as he entered upon it in October. More: he has agreed to undertake it for another year, with such lessening as a slightly diminished schedule and a possible assistant conductor may bring. Yet as he has transformed the orchestra into a personal instrument and the concerts into a personal expression, so upon his personal presence do their fortunes and their future depend.

Ordeal the task certainly proved, since it was all at odds with Mr. Koussevitzky's recent life and work in Europe. Whatever his earlier courses in Russia, from the coming to Paris until the departure for Boston, he was the itinerant conductor of occasional concerts. In the autumn and in the spring, four such concerts busied him in Paris. Twice or thrice in a season he was guest of the London Symphony Orchestra. From time to time, he briefly visited other cities of Western Europe. A Russian music-drama, like "Boris," now and then summoned him to the opera house. Long intervals, with abundant leisure for rest and study, often separated these concerts. For programs, repeated from city to city, he need array relatively few pieces; while among them he could cultivate tours de force of performance for repetition and renown wherever engagements called him. These methods are not the methods that suit sixty concerts within six or seven months in a single city before closely related publics. Necessarily Mr. Koussevitzky has cut by some and modified others; while the effect of these changing courses has been plain upon his whole conduct of the Symphony Concerts.

It has been clear, for example, that the conductor had no large repertory of classic, modern and modernist pieces at his immediate command; that he had little sense of a rounded series of programs adjusted to each other and to the whole field of music. As often as not he has been obviously choosing from numbers that he had played more or less recently in Western Europe or from a few standard items in which his whole career as conductor had practised him. Hence the curious maladjustments, the variable range, the suggestion of anxious and changeful choice, that from October through April have haunted his programs. At the beginning of the season, he cultivated Beethoven; then quite ignored him. He has abounded in Chaikovsky and Skriabin; but quite overlooked Rimsky-Korsakov. There has been room for Schubert; yet not for Schumann. Debussy, Ravel, the younger Parisians, have been plentiful; while the new Englishmen have had scant inning; the new Italians, the Czechs and the Magyars none at all. Stravinsky has had place, but only for Prokoviev has the door opened to the rising Russian generation. Wagner and Strauss have entered in; but Berlioz and Liszt have merely bowed once and departed. By chance contacts and impressions Mr. Koussevitzky has seemed to choose his American pieces, with a thought now and then for their fortune—and his fortune with them—in subsequent performance in Europe.

One by one, there has been little reason to quarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. Piece by piece, each in itself has been arranged with perception and discrimination. It has run in agreeable contrasts. It has usually escaped [illegible]n. Often it has generated excitement [illegible]e repetitions—except of Rabaud and [illegible]riabin—have not been also bores. Th[illegible]oussevitzkian specialties, the Koussevitz[illegible] curiosities, have usually justified themselves. Yet the whole series of programs, assembled and surveyed, have lacked any broad, catholic, thoroughly considered, well-rounded scheme. Once the first five concerts were passed, they have been opportunist programs made from week to week; while from beginning to end of the season, they have been the specialized choice of a conductor bent primarily upon personal expression. To it they have subordinated the cultivation of the whole art of music. It has gained only by Mr. Koussevitzky's fondness for little masterpieces of eighteenth-century music. In the past twenty years the transcendent program-maker for the Symphony Concerts was Mr. Monteux. A year ago it was possible to believe that he had set a standard. Now he seems rather to have left a memory.

For within a single season, Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought a veritable revolution at Symphony Hall—a revolution running far deeper than the dismissal of a few mediocrities, incompetents and outworn abilities, the dead wood of the band. Until he came there had been but two vivid personalities, among the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra—Nikisch in the earliest times (as they now seem) and Dr. Muck of recent memory. Eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses to the ways and works of Nikisch in Boston are relatively few nowadays; but in some measure he also was Koussevitzkian—that is to say, a personality, preponderant upon music, performance and public. Dr. Muck lacked not individuality, assertion, dominance; but he joined these traits to large-mindedness and high devotion with the art of music for its own sake. Better than any other director that the concerts have known he held the balance even between the concrete conductor and the abstract achievement. In Mr. Koussevitzky the personal element overtops any other. He plays upon his orchestra; chooses his own music; pleasures and excites his public; subdues all things to his own expression and image.

The company of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—of Monday evening as well—no longer seeks the Symphony Concerts as an institution to be fostered, a social resort to be cultivated, an occasion for the hearing of music in the satisfactions it may yield. Rather, these audiences assemble to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, to watch Mr. Koussevitzky, to talk about Mr. Koussevitzky; to receive ardent sensations from his hands in the performance of music that shall variously reveal him. Upon him principally, upon the composer incidentally (unless he happens to be a sanctified fellow-townsman) it bestows admiration. Not what the composer has done, but what the conductor may (or may not) do with him, is the interest of its ears, the question upon its lips.

Similarly with the orchestra. Until the present dismissals ruffled the surrounding air, Mr. Koussevitzky has disclosed no salient disposition to continue the work of Mr. Monteux; to regain the full prestige of the band as in Mr. Gericke's latter or Dr. Muck's earlier, day; to debate with Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphians the first place among the orchestras of America and Europe. From the outset he has seemed to regard the orchestra as his personal instrument. Did it give him back the sonorities, accents, color, motion that he asked; therewith was he content. Did it fall short of them—and his implicit will is sometimes hard to discover and follow—he was resentful, complaining, occasionally harsh and arbitrary. Yet in all these things no vision of superlative perfections, no ever-receding ideal of incomparable performance, has haunted him. The degree to which the orchestra fulfilled the prescriptions of Serge Koussevitzky has been his one and only test. Likewise with the music. It has been chosen that it might be personal expression to this same Serge Koussevitzky; while sometimes he has wrought it as such regardless of the plain purposes of the composer, the clear voice, the unmistakable will, of the imprinted pages.

Is the game worth the candle? That is to say, are the Symphony Concerts, concentrated and saturated in a single personality, subordinating all else to these powers and this temperament, more to be desired than the Symphony Concerts pursuing the arts of music for their own sake, while less individualized abilities more modestly serve them? Weekly, at Symphony Hall the answer is obvious—an overwhelming yes. The management joins in it, since the prestige of Mr. Koussevitzky fills nearly every concert-room on nearly every occasion, restoring undiminished the ancient vogue of the orchestra. His coming may have increased expenses; yet has it also enlarged returns. The audiences add their voices. For they are interested and enthralled, stirred and thrilled—week upon week, beyond all memory. In their ears sounds, upon them shine, a personalit

a
th sw the c ers spread
Plain-ward
cils.

And the fellow who tachedly a be heeded ty and pl
mon with Koussevitz
he has re
of the mu accents a of Beetho
the Sym
Chaikovs
Strauss
bussy; w newest c
Schubert
misplaye cients gospelled sentimen Slavic ex
ity. Se exciteme frenzies
The co
Mr. Kou
for mos

---

25 Boston Herald Apr 30

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The 44th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will end tomorrow night, for the customary Saturday evening concert will take place on the night before in order that Mr. Koussevitzky may leave in time to fulfil his engagements with the London Symphony orchestra. The program is made up of familiar pieces, including repetitions of compositions heard earlier in the season. There is one exception: Mr. Siloti's arrangement for strings of the Adagio in Bach's Toccata, C major, for the organ. It is thought that Bach wrote this Toccata for his trip to Cassel in 1714 to exhibit a newly restored organ; for at the concert he played a long pedal solo with such skill that the Crown Prince of Hesse, marveling, pulled off a costly ring from his finger and gave it to him. But other organ pieces by Bach have thunderous pedal solos, so the identification in this instance is not sure.

The program in full is as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, G major; Adagio, arranged by Siloti; Scriabin, "Prometheus"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Borondin, dances, with chorus from "Prince Igor."

Koussevitzky --- Concerts --- Plays and P

YEAR C TION, YF ERSONALITY, EAR OF LIMITATION

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS A FIRST SEASON

New, Strange Task Faced and Accomplished—The Individual Factor Always Uppermost—Its Play Upon Programs, Orchestra, Performance and Audience—Change Upon Every Side—Casting a Balance

WHEN Mr. Koussevitzky agreed to be the conductor of the P ston Symphony Orchestra t ugh the season now ending, he could rdly have foreseen the task awaiting him Jo doubt, it was faithfully and exactly ted to him; but to enumerate conc s is one thing; while to achieve them quite another. One hundred and mo were his stint—the twenty-four pairs subscription concerts, the five supplem ry concerts, the two Pension-Fund c ts, the six young people's concerts— Boston; ten more in New York; shor eries or occasional descents scattered am cities of New England; a week of autu journeying westward, half a week of w ter journeying southward. True, he had t to assemble twenty-four programs from which to derive the music for nearly five times as many concerts; yet upon every concert he must lavish mind, hand and spirit, however assiduously he had studied scores or prepared rehearsals. For a few days in autumn illness disabled him; at midwinter he snatched a week of relative leisure; once or twice he resigned a minor occasion to Mr. Burgin. Otherwise he has done his job; added two concerts for Brahms's Requiem with the Harvard Glee Club; emerged from the ordeal in April quite as spiritedly as he entered upon it in October. More: he has agreed to undertake it for another year, with such lessening as a slightly diminished schedule and a possible assistant conductor may bring. Yet as he has transformed the orchestra into a personal instrument and the concerts into a personal expression, so upon his personal presence do their fortunes and their future depend.

Ordeal the task certainly proved, since it was all at odds with Mr. Koussevitzky's recent life and work in Europe. Whatever his earlier courses in Russia, from the coming to Paris until the departure for Boston, he was the itinerant conductor of occasional concerts In the autumn and in the spring, four such concerts busied him in Paris. Twice or thrice in a season he was guest of the London Symphony Orchestra. From time to time, he briefly visited other cities of Western Europe. A Russian music-drama, like "Boris," now and then summoned him to the opera house. Long intervals, with abundant leisure for rest and study, often separated these concerts. For programs, repeated from city to city, he need array relatively few pieces; while among them he could cultivate tours de force of performance for repetition and renown wherever engagements called him. These methods are not the methods that suit sixty concerts within six or seven months in a single city before closely related publics. Necessarily Mr. Koussevitzky has put by some and modified others; while the effect of these changing courses has been plain upon his whole conduct of the Symphony Concerts.

It has been clear, for example, that the onductor had no large repertory of classic, nodern and modernist pieces at his imediate command; that he had little sense a rounded series of programs adjusted each other and to the whole field of usic. As often as not he has been obously choosing from numbers that he d played more or less recently in West- Europe or from a few standard items which his whole career as conductor had actised him. Hence the curious malustments, the variable range, the sugtion of anxious and changeful choice, t from October through April have nted his programs. At the beginning he season, he cultivated Beethoven; then te ignored him. He has abounded in ikovsky and Skriabin; but quite overked Rimsky-Korsakov. There has been m for Schubert; yet not for Schumann. ussy, Ravel, the younger Parisians, e been plentiful; while the new Engmen have had scant inning; the new ans, the Czechs and the Magyars none ll. Stravinsky has had place, but for Prokoviev has the door ed to the rising Russian gener-. Wagner and Strauss have en- in; but Berlioz and Liszt have merewed once and departed. By chance acts and impressions Mr. Koussevitzky s seemed to choose his American pieces, a thought now and then for their une—and his fortune with them—in equent performance in Europe.

ne by one, there has been little reason uarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. by piece, each in itself has been d with perception and discrimina- has run in agreeable contrasts. usually escaped tedium. Often it ated excitement. The repetitions pi Rabaud and Skriabin—have the The Koussevitzkian it as wel lay. It loves ntal mu useful surface M nic music is thick ago it was possible to believe that he had set a standard. Now he seems rather to have left a memory.

For within a single season, Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought a veritable revolution at Symphony Hall—a revolution running far deeper than the dismissal of a few mediocrities, incompetents and outworn abilities, the dead wood of the band. Until he came there had been but two vivid personalities, among the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra—Nikisch in the earliest times (as they now seem) and Dr. Muck of recent memory. Eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses to the ways and works of Nikisch in Boston are relatively few nowadays; but in some measure he also was Koussevitzkian—that is to say, a personality, preponderant upon music, performance and public. Dr. Muck lacked not individuality, assertion, dominance; but he joined these traits to large-mindedness and high devotion with the art of music for its own sake. Better than any other director that the concerts have known he held the balance even between the concrete conductor and the abstract achievement. In Mr. Koussevitzky the personal element overtops any other. He plays upon his orchestra; chooses his own music; pleasures and excites his public; subdues all things to his own expression and image.

The company of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—of Monday evening as well—no longer seeks the Symphony Concerts as an institution to be fostered, a social resort to be cultivated, an occasion for the hearing of music in the satisfactions it may yield. Rather, these audiences assemble to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, to watch Mr. Koussevitzky, to talk about Mr Koussevitzky; to receive ardent sensations from his hands in the performance of music that shall variously reveal him. Upon him principally, upon the composer incidentally (unless he happens to be a sanctified fellow-townsman) it bestows admiration. Not what the composer has done, but what the conductor may (or may not) do with him, is the interest of its ears, the question upon its lips.

Similarly with the orchestra. Until the present dismissals ruffled the surrounding air, Mr. Koussevitzky has disclosed no salient disposition to continue the work of Mr. Monteux; to regain the full prestige of the band as in Mr. Gericke's latter or Dr. Muck's earlier, day; to debate with Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphians the first place among the orchestras of America and Europe. From the outset he has seemed to regard the orchestra as his personal instrument. Did it give him back the sonorities, accents, color, motion that he asked; therewith was he content. Did it fall short of them—and his implicit will is sometimes hard to discover and follow—he was resentful, complaining, occasionally harsh and arbitrary. Yet in all these things no vision of superlative perfections, no ever-receding ideal of incomparable performance, has haunted him. The degree to which the orchestra fulfilled the prescriptions of Serge Koussevitzky has been his one and only test. Likewise with the music. It has been chosen that it might be personal expression to this same Serge Koussevitzky; while sometimes he has wrought it as such regardless of the plain purposes of the composer, the clear voice, the unmistakable will, of the imprinted pages.

Is the game worth the candle? That is to say, are the Symphony Concerts, concen-and in the entertainment of the public there is no higher beatitude. The journals swell the chorus. Upon typewriters reviewers spread their wings; speeding Jamaica-Plain-ward, interviewers sharpen their pencils.

Koussevitzky.

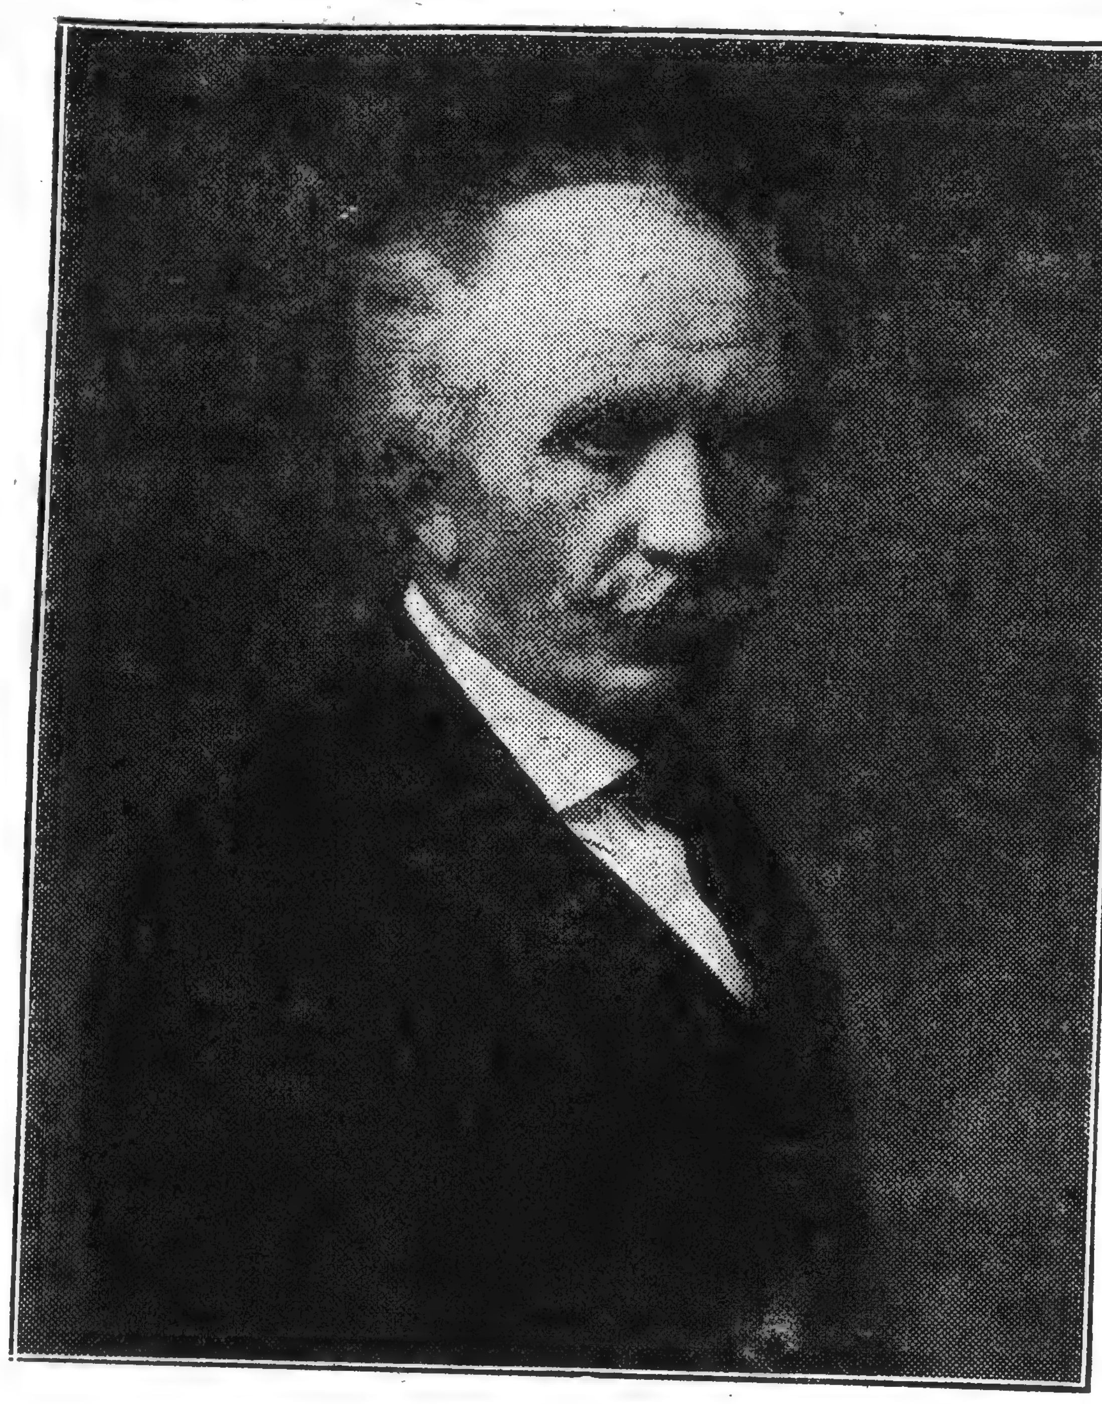
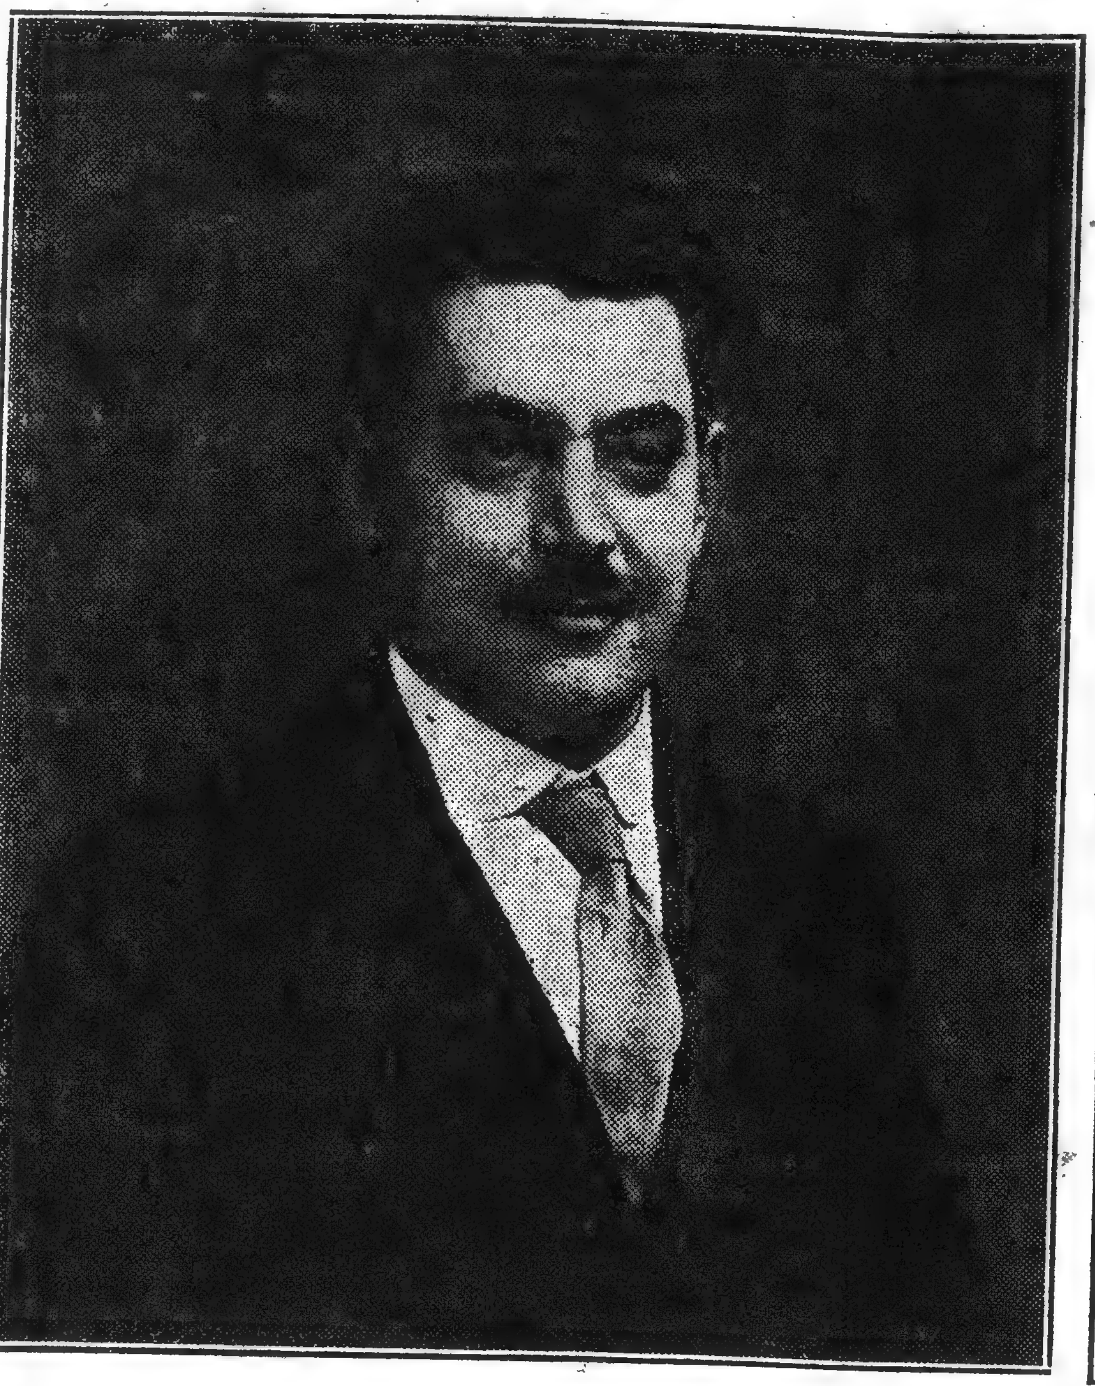
And the mere bystander, that foolish fellow who tries to see men and things detachedly and to see them whole? Is he to be heeded at all in this welter of personality and pleasure? If he is, he may summon with elation performances in which Mr. Koussevitzky has transcended praise, when he has renewed the voice and the vitality of the music in hand, adding to it his own accents and life—say with the Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms for classics; with the Symphonies and the tone-poems of Chaikovsky among fellow-Russians; with Strauss and (often) Wagner, Ravel and Debussy; with Roussel and Prokoviev of the newest comers. Yet to be recalled also are Schubert distorted; Wagner now and then misplayed; Glazunov intruded; minor ancients superfluously unearthed; Skriabin gospelled; emotion drugged into sentiment, sentiment languishing into sentimentality; Slavic excess underscoring Slavic sensibility. Sensations rather than austerities; excitements rather than devotions; fine frenzies rather than fine discriminations. The cost is counted. Yet in performance Mr. Koussevitzky still prevails. And there for most of us is the end.

H. T. P.

To Their Memory, For Their Merits



Alwin Schroeder: 'Cellist



Albert Sand: First Clarinet

C

Familiar Figures Now Retiring From the Principal "Desks" of the Symphony Or (Photographs by Horner)

Girl."

Boston Adv. May 2

Farewells at Symphony

Ovations for Conductor and Retiring Players Supplement Brilliant Performance of Unusual Numbers

Serge Koussevitzky closed his first season as Symphony conductor amid a series of ovations yesterday. The final farewell took place last night, 24 hours ahead of the regular schedule, to permit Koussevitzky to sail for Europe.

Serge Koussevitzy

There were minor ovations and parting tributes for Georges Longy, who is retiring after a long and brilliant service as first oboe player; also for A. Sand, the clarinet soloist, and Alwin Schroeder, who has been in the 'cello section off and on for many years.

Many of the veterans in the orchestra are leaving, voluntarily or otherwise, and there will be a reorganization when the conductor returns from Paris late next Summer with new players for the wood and string sections.

Scriabin's titanic "Prometheus" number, for chorus and orchestra, and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" were repeated at the farewell concerts, with the Cecilia Society and Alexander Lang Steinert assisting.

Two Bach numbers, the third Brandenburg concerto and the adagio from the C major toccata, arranged for orchestra by Alexander Siloti, lead off the program; and in between the Russian pieces came two of Debussy's impressionistic pictures, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

The performance was supremely artistic from beginning to end. The enthusiasm of the Symphony patrons was proof positive of their steadily increasing admiration for the distinguished conductor.

Europe, is wholly

Philad New

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
MAY 2 1925

Dates for Ten Concerts by Boston Symphony in N. Y.

For the 1925-'26 season, the 45th in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10 concerts have been announced for New York, in Carnegie Hall. Of this series there will be five Thursday evening programs and the balance of five on Saturday afternoons. The dates are November 26 and 28, January 7 and 9, February 4 and 6, March 11 and 13, and April 8 and 10. These will all be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

"POPS" START WITH SMART PROGRAM

Agide Jacchia

The "Pop" season at Symphony Hall starts Monday. The usual orchestra of eighty Symphony players, directed by Agide Jacchia, will present a program of light and appealing music, to the unique accompaniment of sociability and refreshments served at the tables which cover the floor.

Each night of the opening week will bring musical novelties of special and favorite numbers from the past. There may be mentioned several southern melodies to be featured on Friday night, and an operatic program paying special homage to the memory of Puccini, on Sunday, May 10.

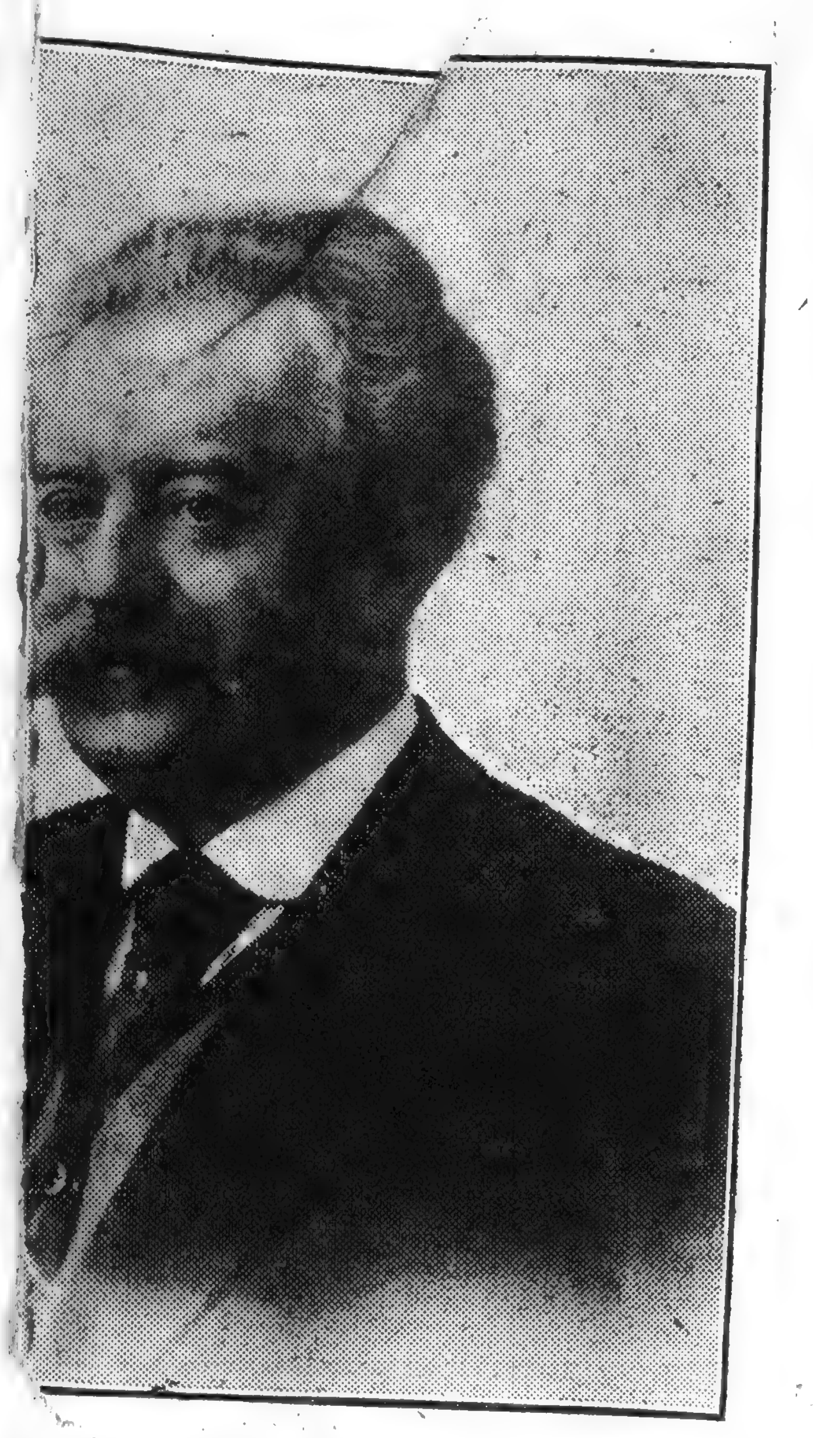
The program for the opening night follows:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota	Stoessel—Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation)	Manna-Zucca—Jacchia
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, "Solennelle 1812"	Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Valse Triste	Sibelius
French Military March	Saint-Saens

98

AMUSEMENT

layers --- Fi



Longy: First Oboe

Traveler May 2

Koussevitzky in Last Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his two last concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon and evening in Symphony hall, the regular Saturday evening concert being advanced to Friday so that the conductor might carry out his plans to sail for Europe today.

The program selected for the last two concerts was, with one exception, a repetition of compositions heard here earlier in the season, opening with Bach's Concerto in G major (third of the Brandenburg set), which was performed last January.

Bach's Adagio for string instruments arranged from the Toccata C major was performed for the first time in Boston. In its languid tempo the Adiago with its "song movement" was exquisitely brought out by the fine work of the string players.

Scriabin's symphonic poem, "Prometheus," heard here for the first time last March, with Alexander Lang Steinert assisting with the difficult piano part and the Cecilia Society as chorus, was again beautifully and emotionally performed. There was also a repetition of Debussy's two enchanting Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals, which were heard here last fall, and the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" of Borodin with the Cecilia Society again assisting with the choral work.

The audience, thoroughly delighted with the program selected for the final concerts, paid tribute to Mr. Koussevitzky, with extended applause also to Georges Longy, for many years first oboist with this orchestra and now playing his last concerts here. There was tribute, too, from his fellow players when Mr. Koussevitzky shook his hand and all rose in appreciation of his many years of faithful work with the

---

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 2 1925

SYMPHONY LEADER TO LEAVE U. S. TODAY

Serge Koussevitzky, who has just closed ~~his season as~~ director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky, will sail from New York today on the White Star line steamship Majestic for Cherbourg and Southampton. This is the first outward voyage of the liner since her reconditioning. Other passengers sailing are: Josef Hofman, concert pianist; Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Wise, James Pierpont Wise, Mr. and Mrs. T. Morris, Colonel and Mrs. Cecil Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Palais, of Boston; Dr. and Mrs. [illegible] ston, of Meriden, Conn.

Monitor. May 2

The Boston Symphony Season

By STUART MASON

THE program of the twenty-fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Bach.......Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major
Bach...Adagio from Toccata in C major, arranged by A. Siloti
Scriabin ...."Prometheus"
Debussy....Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Fêtes"
Borodin.........Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"

This program was repeated at the final concert of the season, last night. With the exception of Bach's Adagio arranged by Siloti these pieces had all been previously given this season by Mr. Koussevitzky. The Cecilia Society again assisted and Alexander Lang Stinert again played the piano part in Scriabin's "Prometheus." Siloti's arrangement of Bach's Adagio was played for the first time in Boston. It hardly calls for comment. As a composition it is surely not Bach at his best and the arrangement of it was a simple task quite within the powers of any well schooled student of music.

So too, the other items of the program call for no extensive review. Scriabin's unwieldy, pretentious Poem again unwound its almost interminable length. To many it doubtless seemed impressive because of the large array of performrs on the stage, because of the noisy climax at the end. Yet, for all, Scriabin has little to say in this Poem which seems to be of real importance. Again, as on the occasion of its previous performance, did Mr. Koussevitzky goad his forces to violent bursts of sound. The reserved Cecilia was somewhat overpowered, and so in the Dances from "Prince Igor" as well. It was all very exciting, perhaps exhilarating.

Mr. Koussevitzky's playing of Debusy's Nocturnes will possibly remain in the memory as his most effective interpretation of the season. The two Nocturnes were admirably contrasted and the "procession" in "Fêtes" was skillfully treated.

Style of Conducting

With the close of the season, it is perhaps not altogether unprofitable to record a few impressions of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting. His is a style somewhat unfamiliar to Boston audiences, at least those of the Symphony concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky seems to be a conductor primarily concerned with the externals of the art. Not that we would in any way question this conception, which is purely a matter of personal taste. But the fact remains that the principal interest of these concerts for the past season has centered about the personality of the conductor and not in the first instance about the music itself or the playing of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky delights in exuberance of gesture, in plastic poses which no doubt convey to some of his listeners many points in the interpretation of the music which would be lost to them did they depend alone on their hearing. The effect of these gestures on the orchestra is another matter. Certainly there have been moments during the season in which the players have almost surpassed themselves, but there have also been moments of uncertainty of attack, of general uneasiness. But it takes time for an orchestra to accustom itself to a new leader, particularly a leader of such radically different methods as Mr. Koussevitzky has proved to be.

Interpretations

On his arrival here, Mr. Koussevitzky found an orchestra admirably trained by his predecessor, Mr. Monteux, and with its help he has often succeeded in giving interpretations which have been more than merely effective and which have at times bordered on the eloquent. But his readings of the "classics" have been more often than not personal, for he delights to play on the orchestra as a pianist plays on his instrument. And so we have on many occasions been regaled with performances which, interesting in themselves as they may have been, partook overmuch of the conductor himself. Thus we have listened to Beethoven or Brahms or Schubert or Weber or Mozart as Mr. Koussevitzky conceived them, and not always, we fancy, as they heard themselves. But the genius of a Beethoven or a Mozart is far greater than the talent of a Koussevitzky, and the greatest interpreters succeed in effacing their own personalities so that that of the composer may stand out in all its native dignity.

In the matter of modern music, Mr. Koussevitzky has been open-minded, and on the whole successful. Not many American composers have been afforded a hearing, and some of the novelties from foreign climes have not been more worthy of attention than many a piece made nearer home. But it is an easy matter to find fault with a conductor's choice of programs and not altogether a profitable one. Mr. Koussevitzky's programs have as a whole been interesting and admirably contrasted. He has made us acquainted with much music which was novel, particularly by Russian and French composers, and he has not bored his audiences with a too great number of familiar classics.

"POPS" TO OPEN ON MONDAY EVENING

Interesting Program Arranged for Opening of Season

Monday night will bring the opening of the season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall, in which light music and music of worth but direct appeal are splendidly played by an orchestra of 80 Symphony players, to a unique accompaniment of sociability and refreshments served at the tables which cover the floor. Agide Jacchia will again preside at this, the 40th season of the famous "Pops." Each night of the opening week will bring musical novelties of special interest and favorite numbers from the past. There may be mentioned several southern melodies to be featured on Friday night and an operatic program paying special homage to the memory of Puccini on Sunday, May 10.

The program for the opening night next Monday is typical of the musical variety and interest to be found at the "Pops."

OPENING NIGHT
Monday, May 4, 1925

Introduction to Act 8, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota	Stoessel-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation)	Manna-Zucca-Jacchia
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Valse Triste	Sibelius
French Militar[illegible]	Saint-Saens

Transcript May 2

TWELVE

Pop Concer

AGAIN THE POPS

A New Series of the Familiar Concerts to Begin on Monday Under the Usual Conditions—Mr. Jacchia for Conductor and Program-Maker—Occasional Sundays

FOR a fortieth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall, to continue there on every secular evening and, on four alternate Sundays, through Saturday, July 4. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats, while tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible (except on Sundays) to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them (Sundays again excepted) unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music a bar—as bars go nowadays—stands as heretofore at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take their pleasure as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, eighty strong, will play nightly; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make diversified and interesting programs becomingly flavored with fresh numbers. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo-pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bee"—encored piece at the Symphony Concerts—and a "selection" from Giordano's opera, "Fedora." The program of Tuesday brings Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," numbers from "Rose-Marie." The audience on Wednesday will hear Debussy's amusing Suite, "Children's Corner," as scored for orchestra by the late André Caplet; Weber's Overture to "Preciosa" and the ever-applauded "España" of Chabrier. On Thursday, Respighi's Ancient Airs and Dances will be played for the first time at The Pops, along with the Fandango from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." On Friday come the Dances from "Prince Igor" and "Nutcracker," the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and sundry transcriptions by Mr. Jacchia of Southern songs. Mozart's Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," Herbert's "Irish Rhapsody," the dances from Delibes's "Sylvia," diversify the program of Saturday. On Sunday, half the chosen pieces will honor the memory of Puccini as operatic composer. Among them is the seldom-heard Intermezzo from "Suor Angelica." Tuesday is the evening of Simmons College; Wednesday, the evening of the Women's Overseas League; Thursday, the evening of the University Club. All three occasions leave ample room for the general public.

Crimson May 2

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 2 1925

SYMPHONY ENDS YEAR OF MUSIC

Parting Tribute Paid Georges Longy at Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Any who wondered, before attending the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, just how they should pay parting tribute to Georges Longy, the most distinguished individual member of the orchestra now, after 27 years of service, retiring to private life, had their problem amply and gracefully solved for them by Mr. Koussevitzky himself.

SIGNALLY HONORED

In the tumult of applause that followed the performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus" the conductor, his own acknowledgements made, moved toward Mr. Longy to shake the hand of that master among oboe players. Immediately the orchestra and the assisting chorus of the Cecilia Society arose, applauding, and in a moment the audience followed suit. The applause continued loud and long. Thus was Mr. Longy honored as within recollection no other member of our orchestra has been honored.

Yet Mr. Longy was not the only centre of interest yesterday. With the Tartar Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Mr. Koussevitzky ended his first year as conductor of the Boston Symphony in a blaze of tonal glory that was a fitting climax to an extraordinarily brilliant season, and at the end of the superb choral and orchestral performance he was four times resummoned to the stage to receive the plaudits which, with his final appearance, became cheers as well.

One New Number

Of the pieces that made this final triumphal programme only one, a noble Adagio from an Organ Toccata of Bach, arranged for string-orchestra by Siloti, had not already been heard here this season; this was altogether new to Boston. To head the list came Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, likewise for strings alone, while between "Prometheus" and Borodin's Dances were set the two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

Bach, Debussy, Scriabin and Borodin were each and all good to hear again, while in particular did "Prometheus" seem worthy of the repetition. Scriabin may be hardly the composer that certain of his disciples claim him to be. No universal genius was this hypersensitive and theosophical Russian. Indeed, he had but one thing of import to say, and he said it many times, in many ways. But finally in "Prometheus," his crowning work, he said it with an abounding eloquence.

Its Tremendous Climax

It would seem that only those anaesthetic to the appeal of the mystical in art might sit unmoved through "Prometheus," and that only the pedantically minded—those who would have all music conform to one set of canons—could seriously quarrel with Scriabin's technical means. Whatever their abstract validity, Scriabin's methods were for his own purposes ideal. And in the last analysis is that not all that matters?

Yesterday "Prometheus" was given a performance marvellously revealing of all that the composer would express. And once more the final climax was as a white and blinding light, stupendous in its sonority.

With reason, too, did Mr. Koussevitzky repeat his—and the orchestra's—superb performance of the Concerto of Bach and his imaginative reading of the Nocturnes, while again, as in its previous performance, the splendid music of Borodin carried all before it. Here the chorus sang now with a sinuous grace, now with savage exaltation, and from the orchestra came blazing colors and rhythms that snapped or strode.

So, with a repetition of this programme last evening, passed yet another symphony season, and one that will not soon be forgotten.

TH

ES GLEE
EST PRAISE

EVITZKY achievements rope.

S HIGH LEE CLUB

y by Famous uds Training

FOR JOINT AY

rained chorus ountry of the Koussevitzky, ymphony Or-the CRIMSON vith his Glee of Radcliffe, isicians have loing; he has il feeling for ir at Barceevitzky, who itania today,

ossible supe-
It is an or-ined voices,
k in the dis-
ver 40 years.
Davison, how-markable be[illegible] horus

s guest con-
nance of the perience was forget."
mpton will journey
e its annual College Glee
e University
the trip will Davison '06
ofessor Ivan for the Unietchaninov's
ughton 2G.
ed the first ir concerts
This con-o'clock on followed by 12 and 19.

[illegible] Koussevitzkian curiosities,
[illegible] ustified themselves. Yet the [illegible] of programs, assembled and [illegible] have lacked any broad, catholic,
[illegible] ghly considered, well-rounded scheme.
[illegible] the first five concerts were passed, have been opportunist programs made week to week; while from beginning d of the season, they have been the lized choice of a conductor bent priy upon personal expression. To it have subordinated the cultivation of hole art of music. It has gained only Koussevitzky's fondness for little pieces of eighteenth-century music.
past twenty years the trannt program-maker for the Sym-
Concerts was Mr. Monteux. A year

[illegible] saturated in a single personal-[illegible] bordinating all else to these powers and this temperament, more to be desired than the Symphony Concerts pursuing the arts of music for their own sake, while less individualized abilities more modestly serve them? Weekly, at Symphony Hall the answer is obvious—an overwhelming
yes. The management joins in it, since the prestige of Mr. Koussevitzky fills nearly every concert-room on nearly every occasion, restoring undiminished the ancient vogue of the orchestra. His coming may have increased expenses; yet has it also enlarged returns. The audiences add their voices. For they are interested and enthralled, stirred and thrilled—week upon week, beyond all memory. In their ears sounds, upon them shine, a personality—

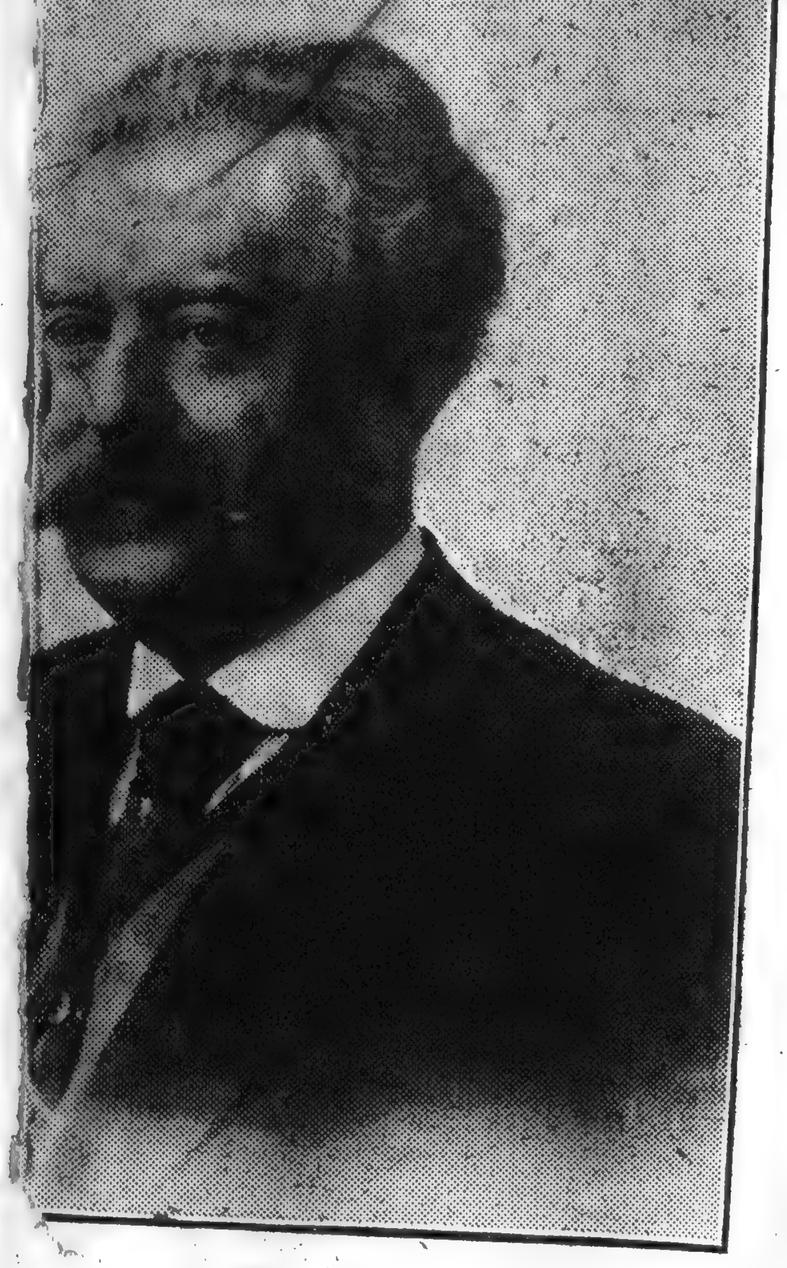
AMUSEMENT

layers --- Fi



Longy: First Oboe

Traveler
May 2

Koussevitzky in Last Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his two last concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon and evening in Symphony hall, the regular Saturday evening concert being advanced to Friday so that the conductor might carry out his plans to sail for Europe today.

The program selected for the last two concerts was, with one exception, a repetition of compositions heard here earlier in the season, opening with Bach's Concerto in G major (third of the Brandenburg set), which was performed last January.

Bach's Adagio for string instruments arranged from the Toccata C major was performed for the first time in Boston. In its languid tempo the Adiago with its "song movement" was exquisitely brought out by the fine work of the string players.

Scriabin's symphonic poem, "Prometheus," heard here for the first time last March, with Alexander Lang Steinert assisting with the difficult piano part and the Cecilia Society as chorus, was again beautifully and emotionally performed. There was also a repetition of Debussy's two enchanting Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals, which were heard here last fall, and the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" of Borodin with the Cecilia Society again assisting with the choral work.

The audience, thoroughly delighted with the program selected for the final concerts, paid tribute to Mr. Koussevitzky, with extended applause also to Georges Longy, for many years first oboist with this orchestra and now playing his last concerts here. There was tribute, too, from his fellow players when Mr. Koussevitzky shook his hand and all rose in appreciation of his many years of faithful work with the

---

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 2 1925

SYMPHONY LEADER TO LEAVE U. S. TODAY

Serge Koussevitzky, who has just closed his season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky, will sail from New York today on the White Star line steamship Majestic for Cherbourg and Southampton. This is the first outward voyage of the liner since her reconditioning. Other passengers sailing are: Josef Hofman, concert pianist; Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Wise, James Pierpont Wise, Mr. and Mrs. T. Morris, Colonel and Mrs. Cecil Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Palais, of Boston; Dr. and Mrs. [illegible]ston, of Meriden, Conn.

Monitor. May 2

The Boston Symphony Season

By STUART MASON

THE program of the twenty-fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Bach	Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major
Bach	Adagio from Toccata in C major, arranged by A. Siloti
Scriabin	"Prometheus"
Debussy	Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Fêtes"
Borodin	Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"

This program was repeated at the final concert of the season, last night. With the exception of Bach's Adagio arranged by Siloti these pieces had all been previously given this season by Mr. Koussevitzky. The Cecilia Society again assisted and Alexander Lang Stinert again played the piano part in Scriabin's "Prometheus." Siloti's arrangement of Bach's Adagio was played for the first time in Boston. It hardly calls for comment. As a composition it is surely not Bach at his best and the arrangement of it was a simple task quite within the powers of any well schooled student of music.

So too, the other items of the program call for no extensive review. Scriabin's unwieldy, pretentious Poem again unwound its almost interminable length. To many it doubtless seemed impressive because of the large array of performrs on the stage, because of the noisy climax at the end. Yet, for all, Scriabin has little to say in this Poem which seems to be of real importance. Again, as on the occasion of its previous performance, did Mr. Koussevitzky goad his forces to violent bursts of sound. The reserved Cecilia was somewhat overpowered, and so in the Dances from "Prince Igor" as well. It was all very exciting, perhaps exhilarating.

Mr. Koussevitzky's playing of Debusy's Nocturnes will possibly remain in the memory as his most effective interpretation of the season. The two Nocturnes were admirably contrasted and the "procession" in "Fêtes" was skillfully treated.

Style of Conducting

With the close of the season, it is perhaps not altogether unprofitable to record a few impressions of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting. His is a style somewhat unfamiliar to Boston audiences, at least those of the Symphony concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky seems to be a conductor primarily concerned with the externals of the art. Not that we would in any way question this conception, which is purely a matter of personal taste. But the fact remains that the principal interest of these concerts for the past season has centered about the personality of the conductor and not in the first instance about the music itself or the playing of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky delights in exuberance of gesture, in plastic poses which no doubt convey to some of his listeners many points in the interpretation of the music which would be lost to them did they depend alone on their hearing. The effect of these gestures on the orchestra is another matter. Certainly there have been moments during the season in which the players have almost surpassed themselves, but there have also been moments of uncertainty of attack, of general uneasiness. But it takes time for an orchestra to accustom itself to a new leader, particularly a leader of such radically different methods as Mr. Koussevitzky has proved to be.

Interpretations

On his arrival here, Mr. Koussevitzky found an orchestra admirably trained by his predecessor, Mr. Monteux, and with its help he has often succeeded in giving interpretations which have been more than merely effective and which have at times bordered on the eloquent. But his readings of the "classics" have been more often than not personal, for he delights to play on the orchestra as a pianist plays on his instrument. And so we have on many occasions been regaled with performances which, interesting in themselves as they may have been, partook overmuch of the conductor himself. Thus we have listened to Beethoven or Brahms or Schubert or Weber or Mozart as Mr. Koussevitzky conceived them, and not always, we fancy, as they heard themselves. But the genius of a Beethoven or a Mozart is far greater than the talent of a Koussevitzky, and the greatest interpreters succeed in effacing their own personalities so that that of the composer may stand out in all its native dignity.

In the matter of modern music, Mr. Koussevitzky has been open-minded, and on the whole successful. Not many American composers have been afforded a hearing, and some of the novelties from foreign climes have not been more worthy of attention than many a piece made nearer home. But it is an easy matter to find fault with a conductor's choice of programs and not altogether a profitable one. Mr. Koussevitzky's programs have as a whole been interesting and admirably contrasted. He has made us acquainted with much music which was novel, particularly by Russian and French composers, and he has not bored his audiences with a too great number of familiar classics.

"POPS" TO OPEN ON MONDAY EVENING

Interesting Program Arranged for Opening of Season

Monday night will bring the opening of the season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall, in which light music and music of worth but direct appeal are splendidly played by an orchestra of 80 Symphony players, to a unique accompaniment of sociability and refreshments served at the tables which cover the floor. Agide Jacchia will again preside at this, the 40th season of the famous "Pops." Each night of the opening week will bring musical novelties of special interest and favorite numbers from the past. There may be mentioned several southern melodies to be featured on Friday night and an operatic program paying special homage to the memory of Puccini on Sunday, May 10.

The program for the opening night next Monday is typical of the musical variety and interest to be found at the "Pops."

OPENING NIGHT
Monday, May 4, 1925

Introduction to Act 8, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Jota	Stoessel-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rachem (Invocation)	Manna-Zucca-Jacchia
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Valse Triste	Sibelius
French [illegible]	Saint-Saens

May 2
Transcript

TWELVE

Pop Conce

AGAIN THE POPS

A New Series of the Familiar Concerts to Begin on Monday Under the Usual Conditions—Mr. Jacchia for Conductor and Program-Maker—Occasional Sundays

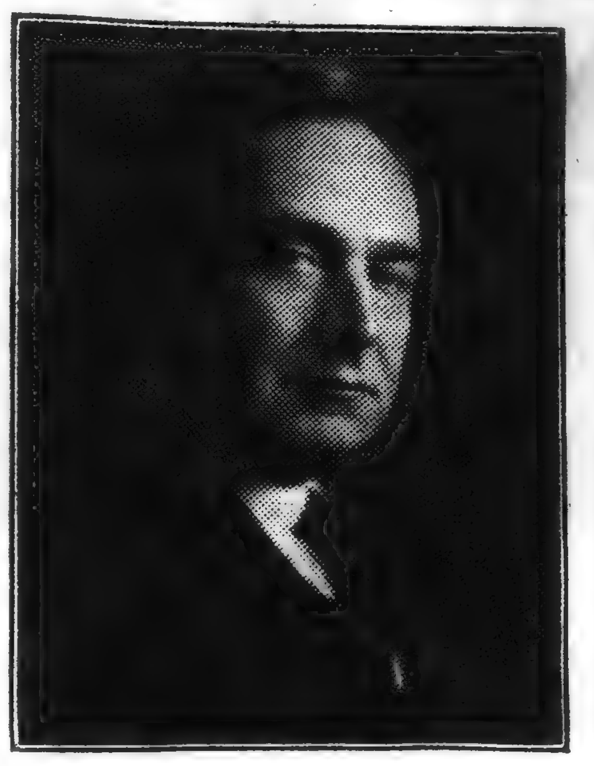
FOR a fortieth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall, to continue there on every secular evening and, on four alternate Sundays, through Saturday, July 4. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats, while tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible (except on Sundays) to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them (Sundays again excepted) unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music a bar—as bars go nowadays—stands as heretofore at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take their pleasure as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, eighty strong, will play nightly; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make diversified and interesting programs becomingly flavored with fresh numbers. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, freqeunt fantasias from familiar operas, solo-pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bee"—encored piece at the Symphony Concerts—and a "selection" from Giordano's opera, "Fedora." The program of Tuesday brings Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," numbers from "Rose-Marie." The audience on Wednesday will hear Debussy's amusing Suite, "Children's Corner," as scored for orchestra by the late André Caplet; Weber's Overture to "Preciosa" and the ever-applauded "España" of Chabrier. On Thursday, Respighi's Ancient Airs and Dances will be played for the first time at The Pops, along with the Fandango from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." On Friday come the Dances from "Prince Igor" and "Nutcracker," the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and sundry transcriptions by Mr. Jacchia of Southern songs. Mozart's Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," Herbert's "Irish Rhapsody," the dances from Delibes's "Sylvia," diversify the program of Saturday. On Sunday, half the chosen pieces will honor the memory of Puccini as operatic composer. Among them is the seldom-heard Intermezzo from "Suor Angelica." Tuesday is the evening of Simmons College; Wednesday, the evening of the Women's Overseas League; Thursday, the evening of the University Club. All three occasions leave ample room for the general public.

Crimson
May 2

TH

CONDUCTOR WHO GIVES GLEE CLUB HIS HIGHEST PRAISE



M. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Who lauds Dr. Davison's achievements just before sailing for Europe.

KOUSSEVITZKY HAS HIGH PRAISE FOR GLEE CLUB

Says It Is Surpassed Only by Famous Choir at Barcelona—Lauds Training of Dr. Davison

CLUB GOES TO SMITH FOR JOINT CONCERT TODAY

"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country of the world," declared M. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a statement to the CRIMSON yesterday. "Dr. Davison with his Glee Club and the Choral Society of Radcliffe, has done what countless musicians have only partially succeeded in doing; he has instilled into his singers real feeling for the music they work with.

"The Orfeo Catalan choir at Barcelona," continued M. Koussevitzky, who sails for Europe on the Aquitania today, "is in my belief the only possible superior to Dr. Davison's chorus. It is an organization of superbly trained voices, which has done beautiful work in the district around Barcelona for over 40 years. The effects obtained by Dr. Davison, however, are all the more remarkable because he produces them from horus of untrained voices.

"I was delighted to act as guest conductor in the recent performance of the Brahms Requiem, and the experience was a pleasure I shall not easily forget."

60 Men Go to Northampton

The University Glee Club will journey to Northampton today to give its annual joint concert with the Smith College Glee Club. The 60 members of the University organization who will make the trip will be conducted by Dr. A. T. Davison '06 and the Smith singers by Professor Ivan T. Gorohkoff. The soloist for the University Club, singing in Gretchaninov's "Credo", will be J. R. Houghton 2G. The Glee Club has announced the first of the three annual open air concerts for Tuesday evening, May 5. This concert, which will be held at 7 o'clock on the steps of Widener, will be followed by the other two concerts on May 12 and 19.

saturated in a single personal-inating all else to these powers emperament, more to be desired
Symphony Concerts pursuing the usic for their own sake, while dualized abilities more modestly n? Weekly, at Symphony Hall r is obvious—an overwhelming management joins in it, since e of Mr. Koussevitzky fills nearly ert-room on nearly every occasing undiminished the ancient he orchestra. His coming may ased expenses; yet has it also turns. The audiences add their or they are interested and en-tirred and thrilled—week upon nd all memory. In their ears on them shine, a personality—

May 2 96

Transcript

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony

END OF THE SEASON, CLAPPED CONDUCTOR, REPEATED COMPOSERS

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY TAKES ARDENT LEAVE

Plaudits for the Orchestra and Honor for the Departing Longy—Again the Ancients in Renewed Voice—For Better and for Worse Debussy, Skriabin, Borodin

RECORD precedes review with a final Symphony Concert, especially when that concert marks the end of a first season for a new conductor. Discoverable, first of all, were two wreaths, laid at the foot of Mr. Koussevitzky's little platform—his podium as the imposing German word names it. They were large, thick, green. They were tied with broad, light-yellow, silken stuff. Whence the wreaths came; what, if anything, signified the color of the ribbon, none might surely say. Beyond stretched the empty stage, crowded to the last inch with the piano, organ, celesta, glockenspiel, chairs for the full orchestra, chairs for the considerable chorus, that Skriabin's Promethean tone-poem exacts. At the outset of the concert only the string-choir filed into these seats, since the two pieces from Bach that began the program, asked no larger orchestra. Next came the conductor, received with general and hearty applause, twice or thrice renewed.

So far, there was no material departure from custom; but when the whole orchestra appeared to undertake "Prometheus," his mates turned toward Mr. Longy, the veteran oboist now retiring, and saluted him with those best of plaudits—from associates and co-workers of years' standing. The audience quickly added its own clapping; while for a minute or two the course of the concert halted. At the close of Skriabin's music, since a second or a third hearing does not enlarge or deepen appreciation, the applause was relatively faint and labored. It spread and mounted, however, when Mr. Koussevitzky called the orchestra to its feet and, leaving his place, warmly shook the hand of Mr. Longy—a compliment, or a regret, publicly bestowed for the first time, in the later annals of the orchestra, upon a departing player.

The second part of the concert brought the usual ripple of applause when the conductor returned to his stand. The recurring beauty of his version of Debussy's Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes"—renewed familiar plaudits; while the clamor of the Polovtsian Dances in Borodin's "Prince Igor" had hardly ended before the acclamations of farewell began. The choir of The Cecilia, and not few in the orchestra itself, now joined in them; many in the auditorium were standing. Before long, the conductor bade the band share these plaudits. Shaking individually the hand of the concert-master, he collectively blessed and saluted it. The audience clapped yet more loudly—and the rites of the evening ended. They were unusual in tribute to the departing Longy, the first member of the orchestra to be so singled and honored in twenty seasons. They were significant in the louder and heartier ring of the clapping whenever the full hundred of the band might share it. Conductors come; conductors go; players pass; programs change; the audience itself variously alters. Yet in permanence and in no mean glory remains the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years hence—"come autumn"—and a half century will crown it.

Warrantably, Mr. Koussevitzky began the concert with two numbers from Bach—the third Brandenburg Concerto (in G major) for strings; an arrangement by Mr. Siloti, for the like voices, of the slow movement of the Toccata in C major for Organ. Throughout the season, by frequent return to such ancient pieces, the [illegible] has done service to the art of [illegible]. It [illegible] the repertory of the useful [illegible] the general and par- [illegible] music is thickly played the ripples of the accompaniment. Sun, sea and deep-voiced wind and waters, though these poor images were probably far enough from Bach, rhapsodizing, miles inland; through a Toccata for Organ—yet surely knowing that he was doing more than the day's work. Divining, animating, goes Mr. Koussevitzky with these elder masters.

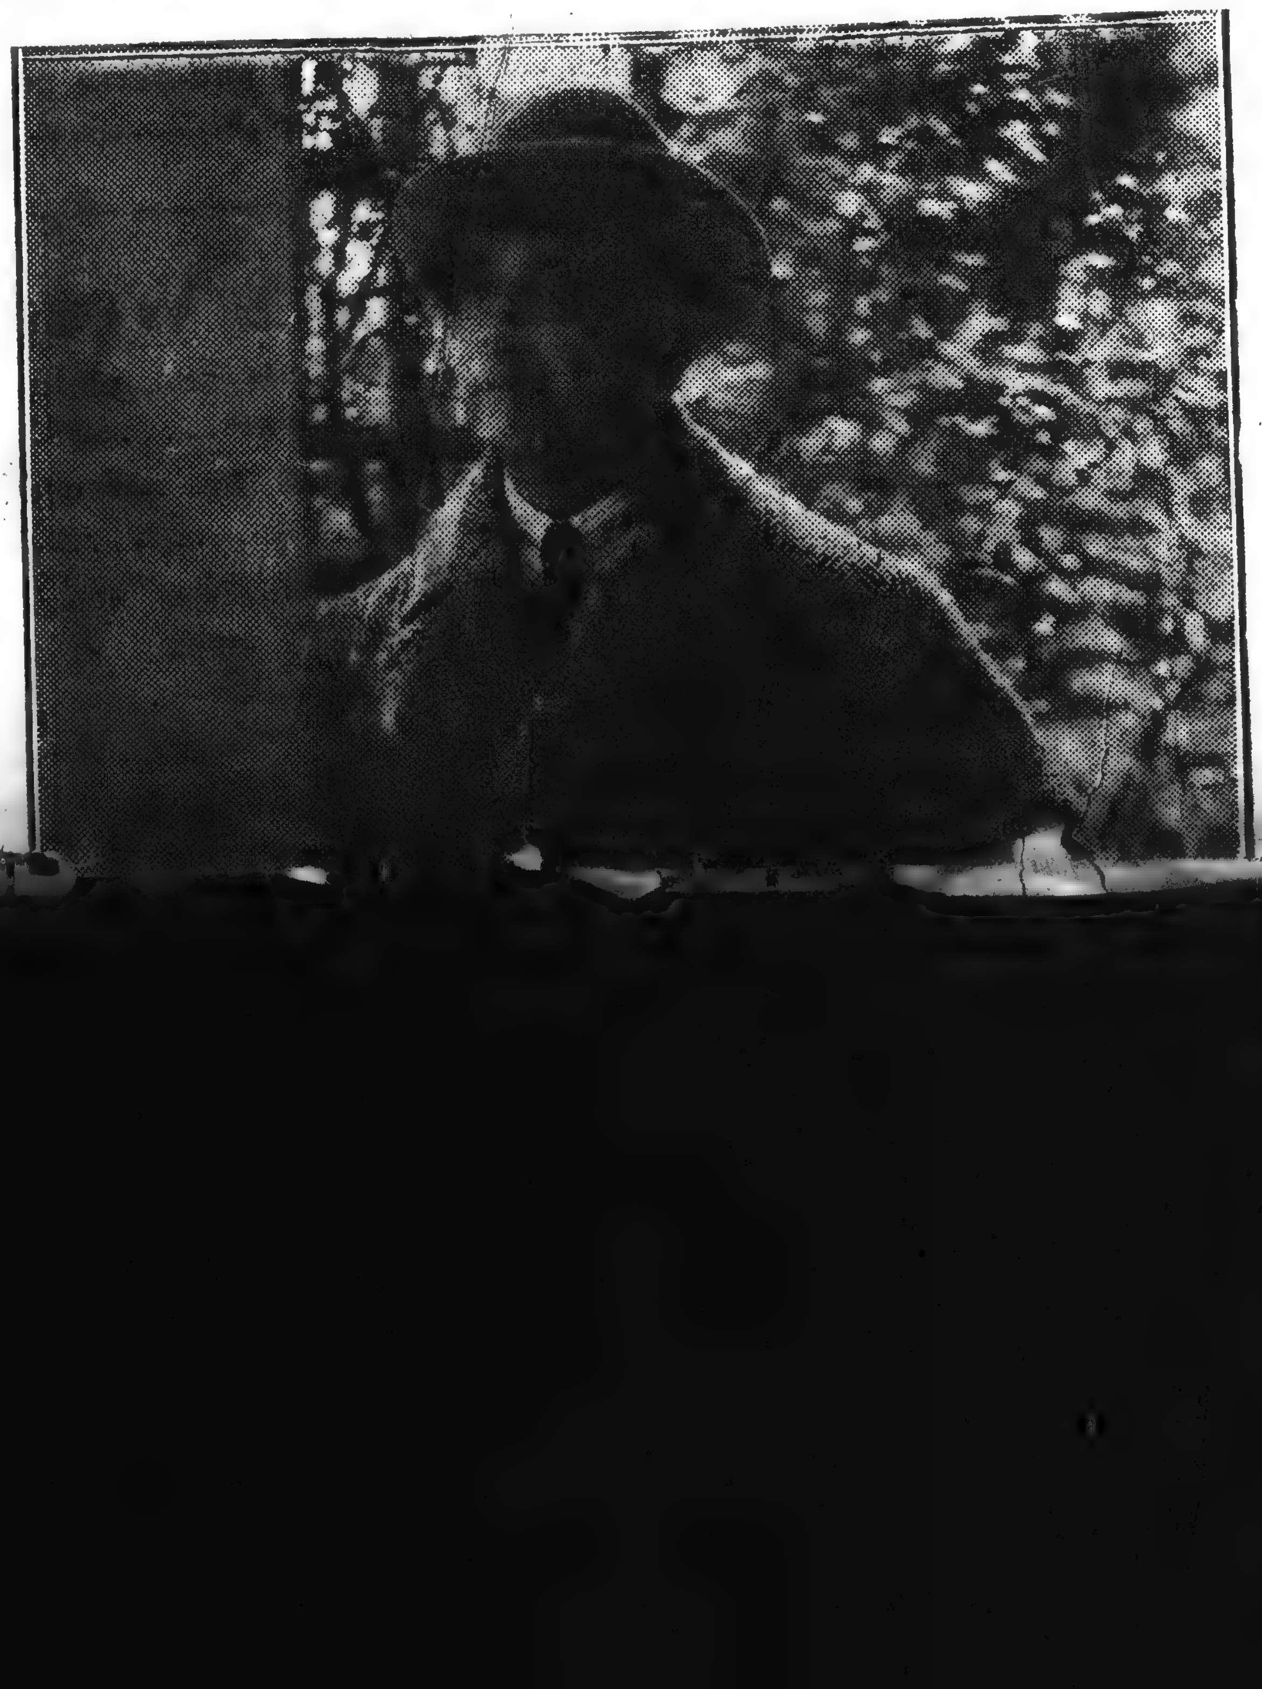
The conductor—for it was his evening rather than the evening of composers—succeeded only less well with the repeated Nocturnes. The blemish upon the performance was the over-stressing of the aerial march in "Fêtes," as it gains body, motion, intensity—an infirmity of temperament deep-seated in Mr. Koussevitzky. When he first led through "Fêtes" last November, the proportioning, rhythming, coloring of the music were beyond praise. The surface of the "festival" shimmered with luminous sound; the body pulsed with imagery and fantasy become tones. As in wraiths from vapors streaming, sounded the processional measures; twined, fused, marched, dissolved again. Prospero in "The Tempest" heard not more clearly a music of the air. Within recollection there had been no such performance of "Fêtes" and many voices proclaimed it. From city to city Mr. Koussevitzky repeated it; soon it was one of his celebrated numbers; while with each repetition came a broadening and intensifying of the aerial march until it was as over-accented and over-blown as it seemed yesterday. The Slav temperament is indeed susceptible; but it cannot deny itself it's own excesses.

Yet the version of "Clouds" ran unexaggerated and undiminished. In merits commingled none in our time at Symphony Hall may compare with it. Here is the very motion of the music—as clouds sail the sky, languid and stately both, remote, full-textured. Here, in the play of harmonies and timbres, light and shadow course them in slow change and creeping gradation. In chords, in modulations vibrate the pent melancholy of the mood. The whole impression is of a music imagined, poetized, subtilized into a haunting and indissoluble beauty, more real than a hundred daily realities. Union of conductor and composer, of precision and sensibility in the answering instrumental voices stands ideally complete. And as yet in this revelation there is neither change nor shadow of turning.

The Russian "specialties"—it is hard to forbear the term—gained not by repetition. In fact, each re-hearing of "Prometheus" strips thinner the texture of the tone-poem; lays barer the futile idiosyncrasies; dilutes even the interest of curiosity. Through two-thirds or three-quarters of the course, the vast scale of the music is vain journeying in a circle, mere beating of the air, nowhither. Through the same span, the emotional exaltation, the ecstatic aspiration, do but titillate the fleshly and the spiritual nerves—a process for which psychoanalysts might find much harsher terms. When at last, out of trumpets and trombones, the motiv of Creative Will lashes this neutonal mass, stewing and seething in neurotic excitements, it gains shape; substance, imposing march; ascends to myriad and grandiloquent climax—the rhetoric of orchestra and chorus multiplied and reverberant. Like the Pharaoh of Scripture, Mr. Koussevitzky would chastise the orchestra, the chorus, the music even, with the [illegible] pions of his projecting power. Upon Skriabin and the works of Skriabin he [illegible] himself. Yet upon "Prometheus" is impo ent; because "Prometheus" [illegible] and void.

Better twenty times the Skriab[illegible] imitates the sensuous Wagner, as [illegible] Poem of Ecstasy," than the Skria[illegible] merely gyrates and curdles in [illegible] theosophic juice. The measures [illegible] and rac[illegible] pension in the c[illegible] are worth all the smo[illegible] "Poem of Fire"—except w[illegible] theme of the Creative Will [illegible] them. To us who are not [illegible] one masterful invention of "P[illegible] end to end. Yet—these Slav[illegible] barrier separates us from Skriabin[illegible] ing him for the third time with[illegible] the listener is not passioned to [illegible] climb it. More thrilling in Wes[illegible] are the pounding rhythms, the [illegible] modulations, the darting transitions [illegible] dances from "Prince Igor"—[illegible] voiced song, the recurring sug[illegible] tribal state and spirit. The cond[illegible] orchestra, flung themselves upon [illegible] music. Manfully and woma[illegible] chorus of The Cecilia would keep [illegible] them. Our best suburbs, howeve[illegible] the fullest preparation for Tarta[illegible]



The Outlook

Tickets and Waiting Lists at the Symphony Concerts

FOR the twenty-four Friday-Afternoon Concerts, season of 1925-26, there will be no public sale of tickets. The few reserved seats not taken by re-subscription, are insufficient to fill applications on the waiting list.

For the twenty-four Saturday-Evening Concerts, season of 1925-1926, those seats which have been released are being offered to the waiting list. [From the Program-Book of Yesterday

---

Globe May 2

FINAL CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Ovation Given Longy and Koussevitzky

The final concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 44th season were given yesterday afternoon and last evening. The date, of the evening concert was shifted from Saturday to Friday by special vote of the trustees of the orchestra so that Koussevitzky can reach London in time to fulfill an engagement there as guest conductor of the London Symphony.

At the afternoon concert there was prolonged applause for Koussevitzky at the beginning and end of the program. Just before the intermission the conductor took occasion to show his esteem for Georges Longy, the veteran first oboe player, who is retiring from the orchestra, by walking over to him and shaking his hand. Orchestra and audience rose to their feet and applauded long and loudly.

Mr Longy has given the best years of his life to the orchestra, and in addition has played a notable part in the musical life of the city. This public tribute to him was wholly deserved.

No doubt many in the audience thought also of other players, as, for instance, Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist, once of the Kneisel Quartet, who is also leaving the orchestra at the end of the season, but no opportunity to pay public tribute was given.

In their cases the public is unable to judge, because it has not the facts before it. Yet one cannot but regret the departure of a number of familiar and respected players, whatever the circumstances and whose the fault.

The program carried an announcement of the 45th season, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. All seats not reengaged for Fridays have already been allotted to the waiting list, and many applications rejected. For Saturdays there is still a chance to obtain tickets by putting one's name at once on the waiting list.

Mr Koussevitzky elected to end his first season here by repeating a number of pieces which he had already given earlier in the season. Skriabin's "Prometheus" again seemed long and of very uneven quality. The opening measures and the portion from the first entrance of the chorus to the end are deeply impressive, not merely by their distinctive harmonic and orchestral color but by their musical substance. But the composer has not been able to impose his almost insanely grandiose theosophic conception upon the hearer, because his reach too far exceeds his grasp.

The performance was again sedulously eloquent. Alexander Lang Steinert was cordially applauded for playing the exacting but inconspicuous piano part.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto again received a vigorous forthright interpretation. The only new piece on the program was another number by Bach, an adagio from a toccata in C, in a rather heavy handed arrangement for orchestra by Siloti.

Again the Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals," were made to sound bigger and more dramatic than ever before. Koussevitzky is right in believing that Debussy was more than a maker of dreamy evanescent harmonies and in playing his music without overfastidious delicacy.

The "Polovtsian Dances" from Borodin's "Prince Igor," in which the chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang, had measures more grateful than those allotted them by Skriabin in "Prometheus" to sing, again greatly pleased the audience. The performance here and in New York have produced marked improvement in the work of the chorus.

So ended the first year of Koussevitzky's conductorship. The Boston Symphony has never before taken in as much money at the box office. The audiences have been greatly interested in the personality of the new conductor and, often with reason, enthusiastic about his interpretations of familiar and unfamiliar music. Mr Koussevitzky takes his own way in everything, and even those who do not always follow him willingly must concede that his way with music is at its worst interesting and at its best, magnificent. He will be welcomed next season.

EARTHQUAKE SHOCKS REPORTED FROM ADANA

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 1—Violent earthquake shocks occurred today near Adana, Turkey, according to reports received here from that vicinity.

May 2
Boston Her

PAGE TEN

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERTS GIVEN

Season Closes with Works of Bach and Debussy, Scriabin and Borodin

PIANIST AND CHORUS ASSIST ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon and evening. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, G major, for string orchestra; Bach, Adagio from the Organ Toccata, C major, arranged for string orchestra by Alexander Siloti; Scriabin, "Prometheus"; Debussy, Nocturnes (Clouds and Festivals); Borodin, dances with chorus from "Prince Igor." As earlier in the season, Alexander L. Steinert played the piano part in Scribin's tone poem; the Cecilian Society as before sang the vocal parts in the tone poem and in the Dances. Our remarks are with reference to the afternoon concent.

The pieces with the exception of Bach's Adagio had already been performed this season. As the Adagio stands as written for the organ, it has been likened by some commentators to the slow movements for violin in Bach's sonata, Mr. Siloti's transcription seemed natural, one might say inevitable. Played in Boston for the first time it was at once welcomed by the great audience, which was enthusiastic throughout the concert, from the moment that Mr. Koussevitzy came upon the platform to be greeted with hearty and unusually long-protracted applause.

Some wondered why Mr. Koussevitzky put "Prometheus" on the program, for it was performed here at the end of March. "Sir," as Dr. Johnson remarked, "you may wonder." Scriabin was an intimate friend of Mr. Koussevitzky; he was often his companion, and pianist, on his concert tours. He played the piano part when "Prometheus" was produced by Mr. Koussevitzky at Moscow in 1911. It is natural that Mr. Koussevitzky should hold the tone-poem in high regard and affection. He wishes others to be similarly disposed towards it. It is a good idea to repeat in a season an unfamiliar work of large proportions and assumed importance, even if some of us think the "importance" is to be found only in the last dozen thunderous measure; if we find that the composition as a whole is vague and too long spun out, abounding in trifling and inconsequential measures, like rickety sign posts pointing to disappointing villages, with pages that in spite of all their bombastic pretensions are uninteresting, yes, dull.

No pains were spared in the performance which was technically brilliant on the part of all concerned. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with a religious fervor. Mr. Mager, the first trumpeter, seated on high, to whom the composer assigns an extremely difficult task, was as one clad in glory. Orchestra, pianist and chorus all contributed their full share to the wished for memorial homage to the composer; but, however significant or symbolical the work itself may be to confirmed or amateur theosophists, this music of their late brother in belief is seldom beautiful, seldom noble, often vexing by its rambling desultory chatter, seldom emotional, impressive, only at the end and then by tremendous dynamic impact, a work not even conspicuous by masterly workmanship.

As we heard the beautiful and haunting music of Debussy, we thought of Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman's unfortunate comparison between the French master and Scriabin in her little but carefully written book, "The Relation of Ultramodern to Archaic Music." She even charges poor Debussy with the atrocious crime of having lived for 38 years in a "decadent" and "infidel" France. While Scriabin in the Russia that was "seeking the transcendal by means of every man who had a vision" grew into "spiritual freedom." She applauds Scriabin, who "always has wings" for not presenting in his music "the human-emotional element," and for spreading in "Prometheus" "those great wings on which he hoped to bear humanity upward and out over the borders of this fettered earth life."

If, endeavoring to accomplish this no doubt praiseworthy feat, Scriabin had only written a litle music!

The answer to Miss Heyman's ecstatic adoration of Scriabin—and her adoration is voiced in many pages—was unwittingly made by Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday: he put Debussy's "Nocturnes" after the "Prometheus." Listening to Debussy's poetic music, exquisitely performed, one forgot all about Scriabin and his high purpose and was not conscious of the fact that he had broad wings.

A brilliant performance of Borodin's ever welcome suavely sensuous and wierdly barbaric dances brought the end.

The Herald tomorrow will publish some comments on the season and on Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristics as a conductor.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

MAY 3 - 1925

* * *

More trouble in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Kussevitsky is determined to have discipline and 20 of the old members of the orchestra must seek new jobs. According to the news story he will import enough players from Europe to fill their places. Seems to me there is some sort of a law against the importation of labor; but perhaps Kussevitsky is a law unto himself, and of course there are ways and means of satisfying requirements.

J. D.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAY 3 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony leader, sailed for Europe on Saturday to fill engagements on the other side of the water. In order to accommodate him, the final pair of concerts of the season took place on the afternoon and evening of Friday last. The concert consisted chiefly of favorites of the season, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Dances, with chorus, from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 and two of Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" and, as the single new item, an Adagio from Bach's Organ Tocata in C major, in an arrangement, fo string orchestra by Alexander Silo

---

[illegible]

Novel Features to Mark Pop Concerts

NOVEL musical features will mark the opening of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. There will be an orchestra of eighty Symphony players, conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served at the tables and in the balcony cafe.

For tomorrow night's program there will be for novelties a "Jota" by Stoessel, a fantasia from Giordano's "Fedora," the Jacchia arrangement of Manna-gucca's "Rachem" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Bumble Bee" scherzo. Old favorites for this night include the "William Tell" and "1812" overtures.

On Tuesday night many from Simmons College will be present, but this and all nights are open to the public.

Sunday, May 10, will bring an operatic program, with special numbers from five of Puccini's operas as a memorial to this composer.

AGIDE JACCHIA, chosen again to lead the Pop concerts, which open tomorrow night at Symphony Hall.

STOCK COMPANY IS BRAIN

[illegible]

May 3

Maine Night at Pops

MAINE night at the Pops on Friday, May 15, is the last social event of the season for the Massachusetts Maine Daughters. Many other Maine clubs of Greater Boston and groups of students from the local colleges are participating in this festivity.

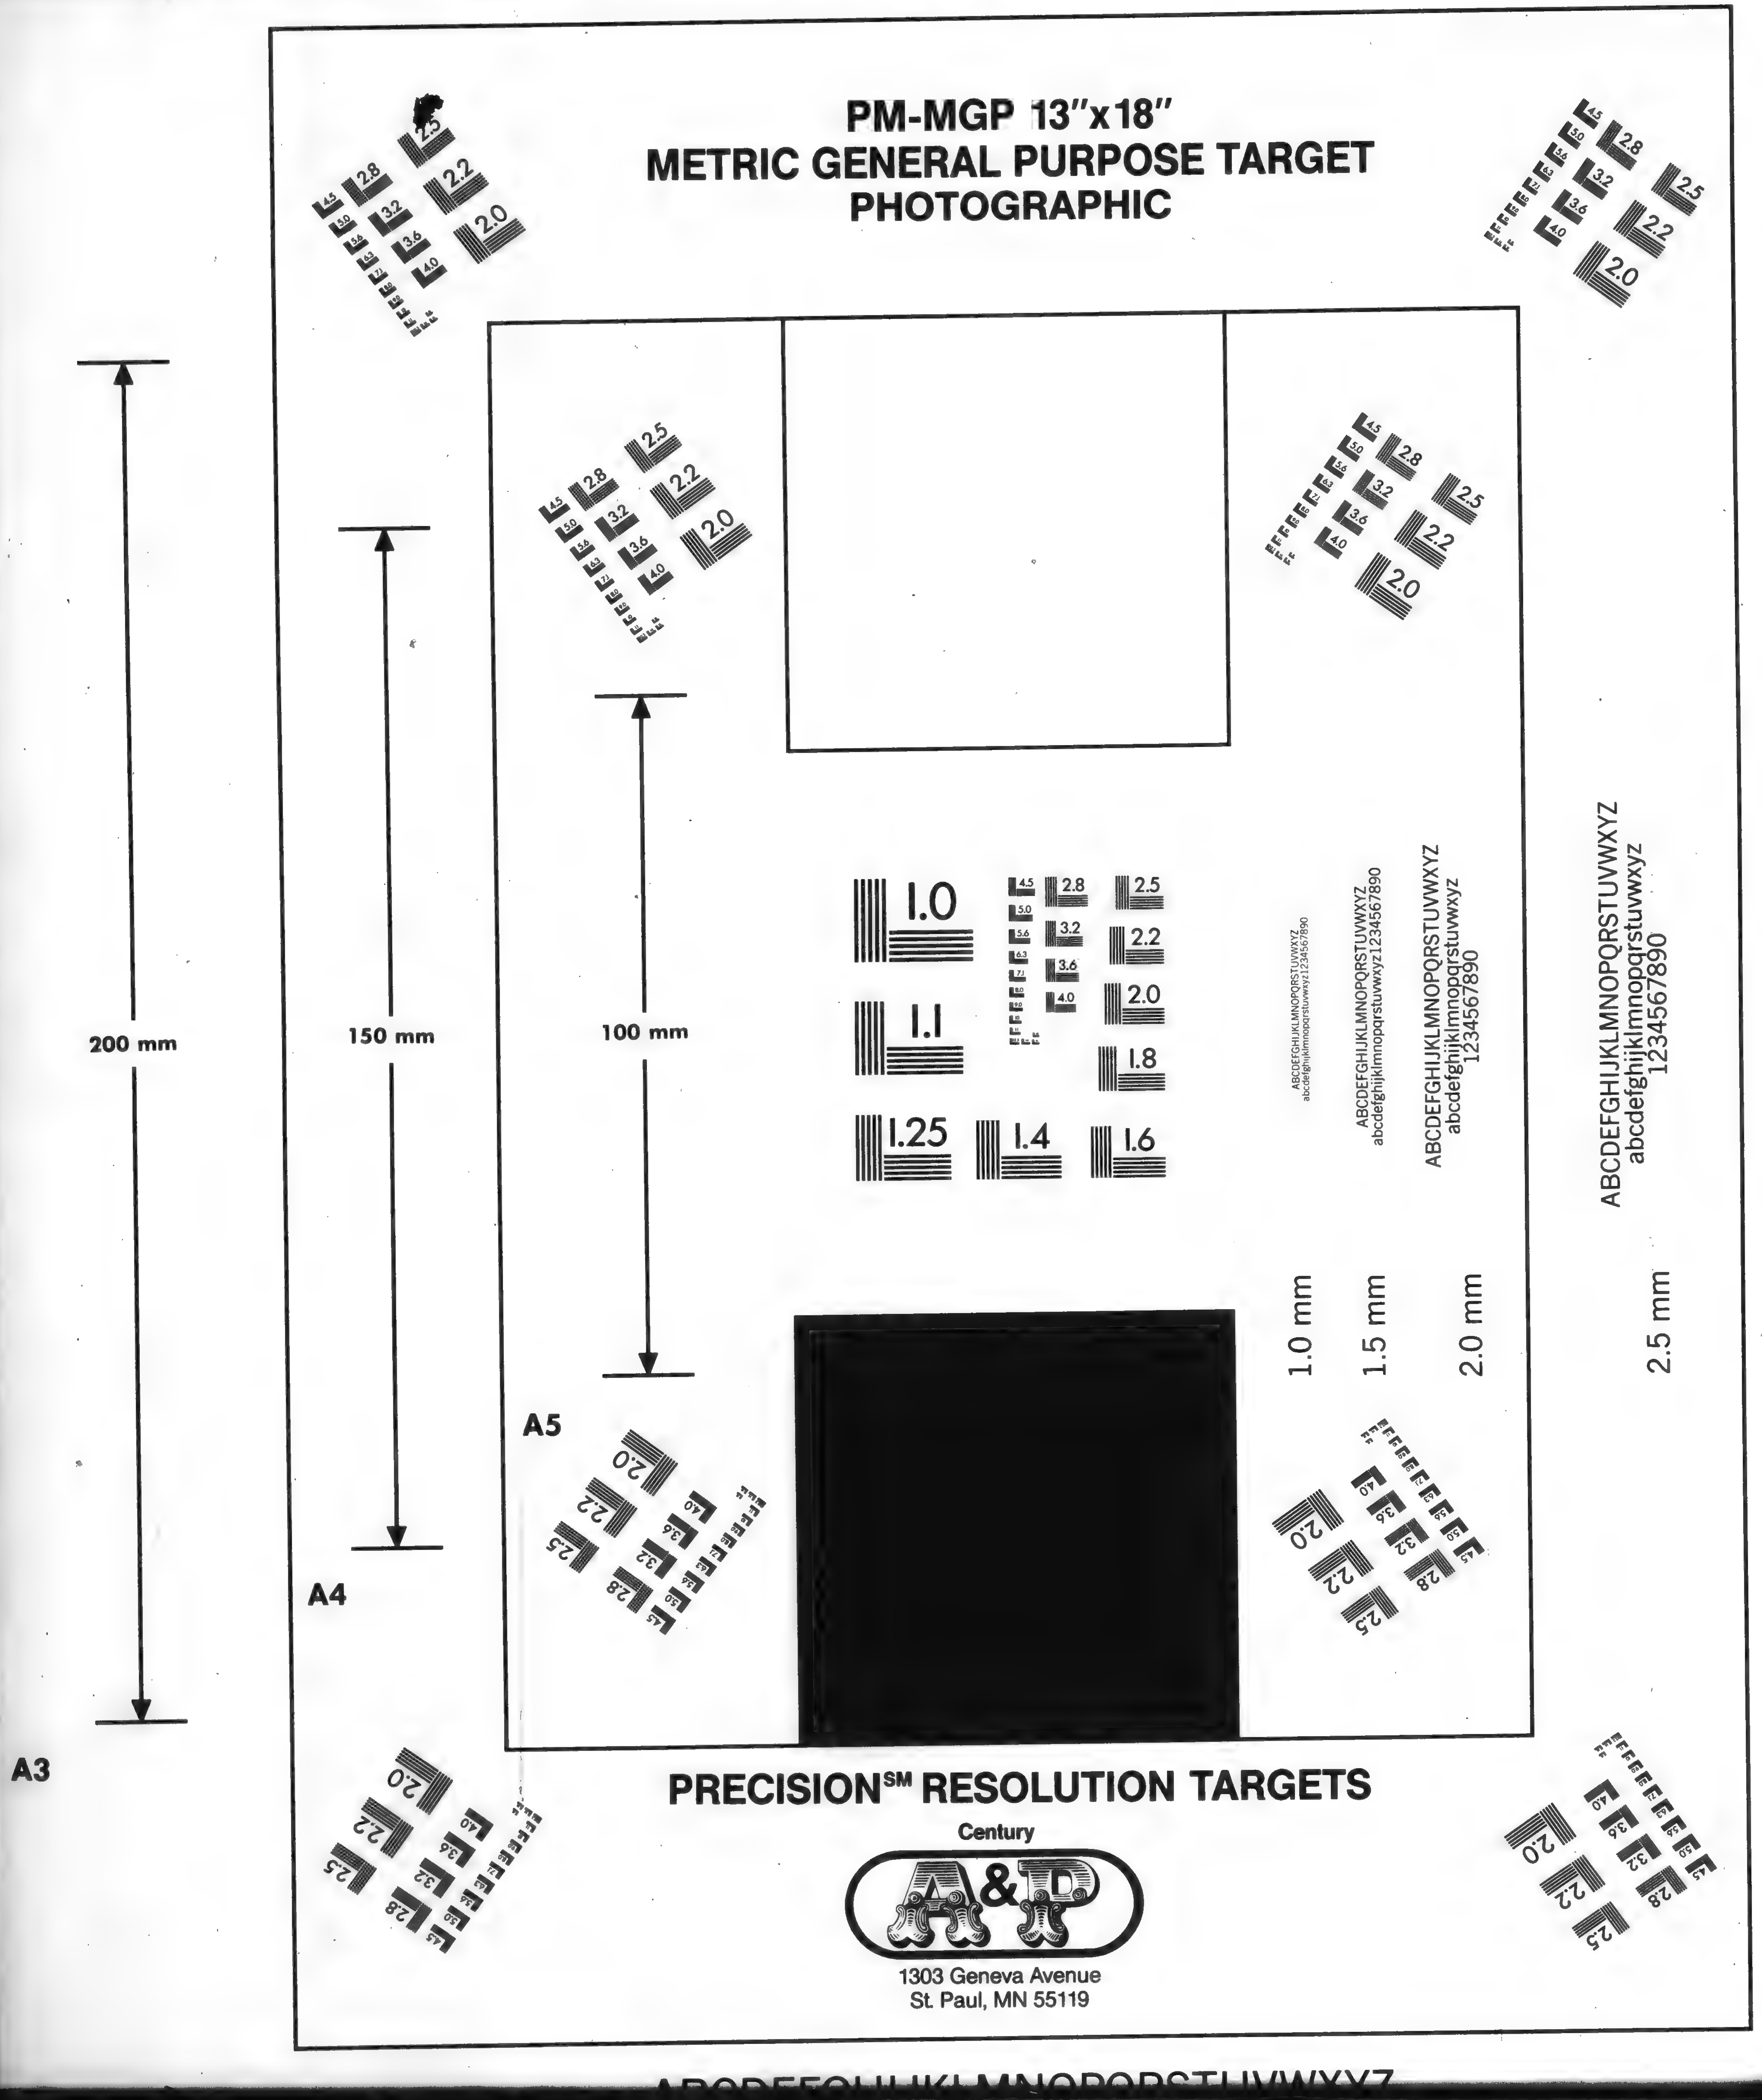
Mrs. Benjamin C. Lincoln has the affair in charge. The emblematic pine bough will be used for decoration.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

May 2 96
Transcript

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony

END OF THE SEASON, CLAPPED CONDUCTOR, REPEATED COMPOSERS

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY TAKES ARDENT LEAVE

Plaudits for the Orchestra and Honor for the Departing Longy—Again the Ancients in Renewed Voice—For Better and for Worse Debussy, Skriabin, Borodin

RECORD precedes review with a final Symphony Concert, especially when that concert marks the end of a first season for a new conductor. Discoverable, first of all, were two wreaths, laid at the foot of Mr. Koussevitzky's little platform—his podium as the imposing German word names it. They were large, thick, green. They were tied with broad, light-yellow, silken stuff. Whence the wreaths came; what, if anything, signified the color of the ribbon, none might surely say. Beyond stretched the empty stage, crowded to the last inch with the piano, organ, celesta, glockenspiel, chairs for the full orchestra, chairs for the considerable chorus, that Skriabin's Promethean tone-poem exacts. At the outset of the concert only the string-choir filed into these seats, since the two pieces from Bach that began the program, asked no larger orchestra. Next came the conductor, received with general and hearty applause, twice or thrice renewed.

So far, there was no material departure from custom; but when the whole orchestra appeared to undertake "Prometheus," his mates turned toward Mr. Longy, the veteran oboist now retiring, and saluted him with those best of plaudits—from associates and co-workers of years' standing. The audience quickly added its own clapping; while for a minute or two the course of the concert halted. At the close of Skriabin's music, since a second or a third hearing does not enlarge or deepen appreciation, the applause was relatively faint and labored. It spread and mounted, however, when Mr. Koussevitzky called the orchestra to its feet and, leaving his place, warmly shook the hand of Mr. Longy—a compliment, or a regret, publicly bestowed for the first time, in the later annals of the orchestra, upon a departing player.

The second part of the concert brought the usual ripple of applause when the conductor returned to his stand. The recurring beauty of his version of Debussy's Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes"—renewed familiar plaudits; while the clamor of the Polovtsian Dances in Borodin's "Prince Igor" had hardly ended before the acclamations of farewell began. The choir of The Cecilia, and not few in the orchestra itself, now joined in them; many in the auditorium were standing. Before long, the conductor bade the band share these plaudits. Shaking individually the hand of the concert-master, he collectively blessed and saluted it. The audience clapped yet more loudly—and the rites of the evening ended. They were unusual in tribute to the departing Longy, the first member of the orchestra to be so singled and honored in twenty seasons. They were significant in the louder and heartier ring of the clapping whenever the full hundred of the band might share it. Conductors come; conductors go; players pass; programs change; the audience itself variously alters. Yet in permanence and in no mean glory remains the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years hence—"come autumn"—and a half century will crown it.

The Outlook

Tickets and Waiting Lists at the Symphony Concerts

FOR the twenty-four Friday-Afternoon Concerts, season of 1925-26, there will be no public sale of tickets. The few reserved seats not taken by re-subscription, are insufficient to fill applications on the waiting list.

For the twenty-four Saturday-Evening Concerts, season of 1925-1926, those seats which have been released are being offered to the waiting list. [From the Program-Book of Yesterday

---

Warrantably, Mr. Koussevitzky began the concert with two numbers from Bach—the third Brandenburg Concerto (in G major) for strings; an arrangement by Mr. Siloti, for the like voices, of the slow movement of the Toccata in C major for Organ. Throughout the season, by frequent return to such ancient pieces, the [illegible]ductor has done service to the art of [illegible]. It [illegible]dened the repertory of the [illegible] useful [illegible] the general and par-[illegible] music is thickly [illegible] ticular delight. Under his predecessors, the place of the fathers in the symphonic scheme was little better than perfunctory. Once or twice in a year a Suite or a Concerto of Bach, a Concerto Grosso of Handel—and obligation toward two illustrious, perdurable masters was discharged; the pleasure that only they and their fellows may give, sufficiently distributed. Mr. Koussevitzky has wisely waived this precedent, and thereby proved a sincere and serious devotion to the art of music in what passes for its purest estate. He has ranged widely among these ancients; and seldom has the chosen piece proved uninteresting or unimpressive. Not for long has the public of the Symphony Concerts been on such familiar terms with Handel and Bach; with Carl Philip Emanuel, his son; with Vivaldi, whom they both admired; while at nearly every opportunity, it has responded warmly to these propulsive rhythms; melodies deep-hearted and outpoured; running figures; fleetness here, grace there—the whole pattern of a music interwoven and outflung, born of a formula yet ever renewed into life and beauty.

In such music both Mr. Koussevitzky and the string-choir excel. Upon the proud course and the quickening stride of the First Movement of the Brandenberg Concerto, they lavished sonorous tone, graphic accents, imperious march. The precision, the coördination, the suppleness, of the voices were both one and manifold. Ears thrilled, hearts leapt, minds stirred at the impact of the massed and blended violins. Divided, contrasted, as often in the counterpoint, they made less impression, simply because the ear found it difficult to distinguish between the parted speech of the music and the bodily proximity of the players. (There are losses as well as gains from the reseated orchestra.) From the second movement sounded the warmth, the freshness, which are antidote [illegible] formulas and rigidities, times and sea-[illegible]ns. Gracious pages glowed. Through-[illegible]t, moreover, the conductor not only kept [illegible] music in unflagging motion, but re-[illegible]wed the creative impulse, sub-conscious, [illegible] doubt, with these elder composers, but [illegible]w bearing their measures down the cen-[illegible]ies. There are perception and poise, [illegible] long view and the clear view, in Mr. [illegible]ussevitzky's sustaining of the melodic [illegible]. With veritable intuition he modu-[illegible]s it. No less vividly went the trans-[illegible] Toccata. The melody advanced and [illegible]. Around it, upon it, played the ripples of the accompaniment. Sun, sea and deep-voiced wind and waters, though these poor images were probably far enough from Bach, rhapsodizing, miles inland, through a Toccata for Organ—yet surely knowing that he was doing more than the day's work. Divining, animating, goes Mr. Koussevitzky with these elder masters.

The conductor—for it was his evening rather than the evening of composers—succeeded only less well with the repeated Nocturnes. The blemish upon the performance was the over-stressing of the aerial march in "Fêtes," as it gains body, motion, intensity—an infirmity of temperament deep-seated in Mr. Koussevitzky. When he first led through "Fêtes" last November, the proportioning, rhythming, coloring of the music were beyond praise. The surface of the "festival" shimmered with luminous sound; the body pulsed with imagery and fantasy become tones. As in wraiths from vapors streaming, sounded the processional measures; twined, fused, marched, dissolved again. Prospero in "The Tempest" heard not more clearly a music of the air. Within recollection there had been no such performance of "Fêtes" and many voices proclaimed it. From city to city Mr. Koussevitzky repeated it; soon it was one of his celebrated numbers; while with each repetition came a broadening and intensifying of the aerial march until it was as over-accented and over-blown as it seemed yesterday. The Slav temperament is indeed susceptible; but it cannot deny itself its own excesses.

Yet the version of "Clouds" ran unexaggerated and undiminished. In merits commingled none in our time at Symphony Hall may compare with it. Here is the very motion of the music—as clouds sail the sky, languid and stately both, remote, full-textured. Here, in the play of harmonies and timbres, light and shadow course them in slow change and creeping gradation. In chords, in modulations vibrate the pent melancholy of the mood. The whole impression is of a music imagined, poetized, subtilized into a haunting and indissoluble beauty, more real than a hundred daily realities. Union of conductor and composer, of precision and sensibility in the answering instrumental voices stands ideally complete. And as yet in this revelation there is neither change nor shadow of turning.

The Russian "specialties"—it is hard to forbear the term—gained not by repetition. In fact, each re-hearing of "Prometheus" strips thinner the texture of the [illegible] poem; lays barer the futile idiosyncrasi[illegible]; dilutes even the interest of curiosity. Through two-thirds or three-quarters of the [illegible]urse, the vast scale of the music is vain journey-ing in a circle, mere beating of the air, nowhither. Through the same span, the emotional exaltation, the ecstatic aspiration, do but titillate the fleshly and the spiritual nerves—a process for which psychoanalysts might find much harsher terms. When at last, out of trumpets and trombones, the motiv of Creative Will la[illegible]es this tonal mass, stewing and seething [illegible] neurotic excitements, it gains shape, substance, imposing march; ascends to myriad and grandiloquent climax—the rhetoric of orchestra and chorus multiplied and reverberant. Like the Pharaoh of Scripture, Mr. Koussevitzky would chastise the orchestra, the chorus, the music even, with [illegible] scorpions of his projecting power. Up[illegible] Skriabin and the works of Skriabin he [illegible] himself. Yet upon "Prometheus" is [illegible] impotent; because "Prometheus" [illegible] and void.

Better twenty times the Skriab[illegible] imitates the sensuous Wagner, as [illegible] Poem of Ecstasy," than the Skria[illegible] merely gyrates and curdles in [illegible] theosophic juice. The measures that bring that piercing and rac[illegible] pension in the ch[illegible] are worth all the sm[illegible] "Poem of Fire"—except v[illegible] theme of the Creative Will [illegible] them. To us who are not [illegible] one masterful invention of "P[illegible] end to end. Yet—these Slavs [illegible] barrier separates us from Skriab[illegible] ing him for the third time withi[illegible] the listener is not passioned t[illegible] climb it. More thrilling in We[illegible] are the pounding rhythms, t[illegible] modulations, the darting transit[illegible] dances from "Prince Igor"—[illegible] voiced song, the recurring su[illegible] tribal state and spirit. The con[illegible] orchestra, flung themselves upo[illegible] music. Manfully and woma[illegible] chorus of The Cecilia would kee[illegible] them. Our best suburbs, howev[illegible] the fullest preparation for Tart[illegible]

(Photograph from Schervée Studios)

Pour Prendre Conge

The Departing Conductor—La Tenue de Voyage

Globe May 2

FINAL CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Ovation Given Longy and Koussevitzky

The final concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 44th season were given yesterday afternoon and last evening. The date of the evening concert was shifted from Saturday to Friday by special vote of the trustees of the orchestra so that Koussevitzky can reach London in time to fulfill an engagement there as guest conductor of the London Symphony.

At the afternoon concert there was prolonged applause for Koussevitzky at the beginning and end of the program. Just before the intermission the conductor took occasion to show his esteem for Georges Longy, the veteran first oboe player, who is retiring from the orchestra, by walking over to him and shaking his hand. Orchestra and audience rose to their feet and applauded long and loudly.

Mr Longy has given the best years of his life to the orchestra, and in addition has played a notable part in the musical life of the city. This public tribute to him was wholly deserved.

No doubt many in the audience thought also of other players, as, for instance, Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist, once of the Kneisel Quartet, who is also leaving the orchestra at the end of the season, but no opportunity to pay public tribute was given.

In their cases the public is unable to judge, because it has not the facts before it. Yet one cannot but regret the departure of a number of familiar and respected players, whatever the circumstances and whose the fault.

The program carried an announcement of the 45th season, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. All seats not reengaged for Fridays have already been allotted to the waiting list, and many applications rejected. For Saturdays there is still a chance to obtain tickets by putting one's name at once on the waiting list.

Mr Koussevitzky elected to end his first season here by repeating a number of pieces which he had already given earlier in the season. Skriabin's "Prometheus" again seemed long and of very uneven quality. The opening measures and the portion from the first entrance of the chorus to the end are deeply impressive, not merely by their distinctive harmonic and orchestral color but by their musical substance. But the composer has not been able to impose his almost insanely grandiose theosophic conception upon the hearer, because his reach too far exceeds his grasp.

The performance was again sedulously eloquent. Alexander Lang Steinert was cordially applauded for playing the exacting but inconspicuous piano part.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto again received a vigorous forthright interpretation. The only new piece on the program was another number by Bach, an adagio from a toccata in C, in a rather heavy handed arrangement for orchestra by Siloti.

Again the Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals," were made to sound bigger and more dramatic than ever before. Koussevitzky is right in believing that Debussy was more than a maker of dreamy evanescent harmonies and in playing his music without overfastidious delicacy.

The "Polovtsian Dances" from Borodin's "Prince Igor," in which the chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang, had measures more grateful than those allotted them by Skriabin in "Prometheus" to sing, again greatly pleased the audience. The performance here and in New York have produced marked improvement in the work of the chorus.

So ended the first year of Koussevitzky's conductorship. The Boston Symphony has never before taken in as much money at the box office. The audiences have been greatly interested in the personality of the new conductor and, often with reason, enthusiastic about his interpretations of familiar and unfamiliar music. Mr Koussevitzky takes his own way in everything, and even those who do not always follow him willingly must concede that his way with music is at its worst interesting and at its best, magnificent. He will be welcomed next season.

EARTHQUAKE SHOCKS REPORTED FROM ADANA

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 1—Violent earthquake shocks occurred today near Adana, Turkey, according to reports received here from that vicinity.

May 2
Boston Her

PAGE TEN

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERTS GIVEN

Season Closes with Works of Bach and Debussy, Scriabin and Borodin

PIANIST AND CHORUS ASSIST ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon and evening. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, G major, for string orchestra; Bach, Adagio from the Organ Toccata, C major, arranged for string orchestra by Alexander Siloti; Scriabin, "Prometheus"; Debussy, Nocturnes (Clouds and Festivals); Borodin, dances with chorus from "Prince Igor." As earlier in the season, Alexander L. Steinert played the piano part in Scribin's tone poem; the Cecilian Society as before sang the vocal parts in the tone poem and in the Dances. Our remarks are with reference to the afternoon concent.

The pieces with the exception of Bach's Adagio had already been performed this season. As the Adagio stands as written for the organ, it has been likened by some commentators to the slow movements for violin in Bach's sonata. Mr. Siloti's transcription seemed natural, one might say inevitable. Played in Boston for the first time it was at once welcomed by the great audience, which was enthusiastic throughout the concert, from the moment that Mr. Koussevitzy came upon the platform to be greeted with hearty and unusually long-protracted applause.

Some wondered why Mr. Koussevitzky put "Prometheus" on the program, for it was performed here at the end of March. "Sir," as Dr. Johnson remarked, "you may wonder." Scriabin was an intimate friend of Mr. Koussevitzky; he was often his companion, and pianist, on his concert tours. He played the piano part when "Prometheus" was produced by Mr. Koussevitzky at Moscow in 1911. It is natural that Mr. Koussevitzky should hold the tone-poem in high regard and affection. He wishes others to be similarly disposed towards it. It is a good idea to repeat in a season an unfamiliar work of large proportions and assumed importance, even if some of us think the "importance" is to be found only in the last dozen thunderous measure; if we find that the composition as a whole is vague and too long spun out, abounding in trifling and inconsequential measures, like rickety sign posts pointing to disappointing villages, with pages that in spite of all their bombastic pretensions are uninteresting, yes, dull.

No pains were spared in the performance which was technically brilliant on the part of all concerned. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with a religious fervor. Mr. Mager, the first trumpeter, seated on high, to whom the composer assigns an extremely difficult task, was as one clad in glory. Orchestra, pianist and chorus all contributed their full share to the wished for memorial homage to the composer; but, however significant or symbolical the work itself may be to confirmed or amateur theosophists, this music of their late brother in belief is seldom beautiful, seldom noble, often vexing by its rambling desultory chatter, seldom emotional, impressive only at the end and then by tremendous dynamic impact, a work not even conspicuous by masterly workmanship.

As we heard the beautiful and haunting music of Debussy, we thought of Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman's unfortunate comparison between the French master and Scriabin in her little but carefully written book, "The Relation of Ultramodern to Archaic Music." She even charges poor Debussy with the atrocious crime of having lived for 38 years in a "decadent" and "infidel" France. While Scriabin in the Russia that was "seeking the transcendal by means of every man who had a vision" grew into "spiritual freedom." She applauds Scriabin, who "always has wings" for not presenting in his music "the human-emotional element," and for spreading in "Prometheus" "those great wings on which he hoped to bear humanity upward and out over the borders of this fettered earth life."

If, endeavoring to accomplish this no doubt praiseworthy feat, Scriabin had only written a little music!

The answer to Miss Heyman's ecstatic adoration of Scriabin—and her adoration is voiced in many pages—was unwittingly made by Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday: he put Debussy's "Nocturnes" after the "Prometheus." Listening to Debussy's poetic music, exquisitely performed, one forgot all about Scriabin and his high purpose and was not conscious of the fact that he had broad wings.

A brilliant performance of Borodin's ever welcome suavely sensuous and wierdly barbaric dances brought the end.

The Herald tomorrow will publish some comments on the season and on Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristics as a conductor.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

MAY 3 - 1925

* * *

More trouble in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Kussevitsky is determined to have discipline and 20 of the old members of the orchestra must seek new jobs. According to the news story he will import enough players from Europe to fill their places. Seems to me there is some sort of a law against the importation of labor; but perhaps Kussevitsky is a law unto himself, and of course there are ways and means of satisfying requirements.

J. D.

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

MAY 3 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony leader, sailed for Europe on Saturday to fill engagements on the other side of the water. In order to accommodate him, the final pair of concerts of the season took place on the afternoon and evening of Friday last. The concert consisted chiefly of favorites of the season, Scriabin's "Prometheus" and the Dances, with chorus, from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 and two of Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" and, as the single new item, an Adagio from Bach's Organ Tocata in C major, in an arrangement, fo string orchestra by Alexander Silo

---

May 3

Maine Night at Pops

MAINE night at the Pops on Friday, May 15, is the last social event of the season for the Massachusetts Maine Daughters. Many other Maine clubs of Greater Boston and groups of students from the local colleges are participating in this festivity.

Mrs. Benjamin C. Lincoln has the affair in charge. The emblematic pine bough will be used for decoration.

Novel Features to Mark Pop Concerts

NOVEL musical features will mark the opening of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. There will be an orchestra of eighty Symphony players, conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served at the tables and in the balcony cafe.

For tomorrow night's program there will be for novelties a "Jota" by Stoessel, a fantasia from Giordano's "Fedora," the Jacchia arrangement of Manna-gucca's "Rachem" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Bumble Bee" scherzo. Old favorites for this night include the "William Tell" and "1812" overtures.

On Tuesday night many from Simmons College will be present, but this and all nights are open to the public.

Sunday, May 10, will bring an operatic program, with special numbers from five of Puccini's operas as a memorial to this composer.

AGIDE JACCHIA, chosen again to lead the Pop concerts, which open tomorrow night at Symphony Hall.

STOCK COMPANY IS BRAIN

REDUCTION

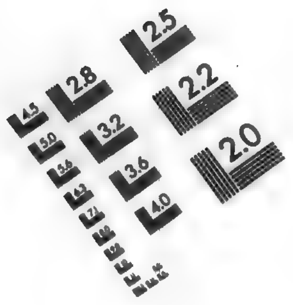
RATIO

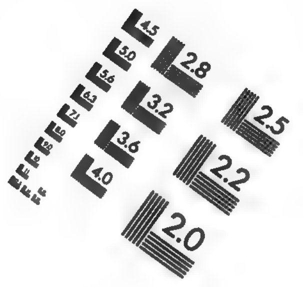
16x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

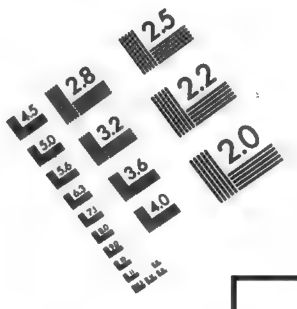
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

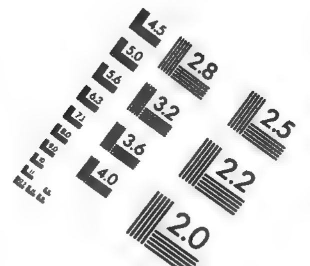
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

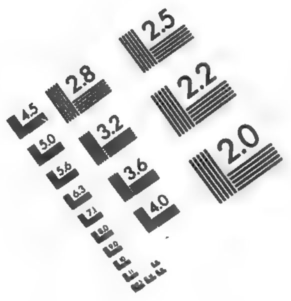


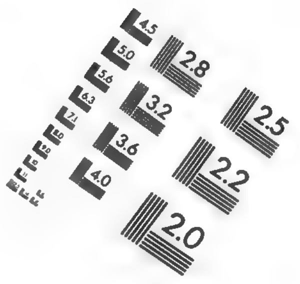


PM-MGP 13″x18″ METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET PHOTOGRAPHIC





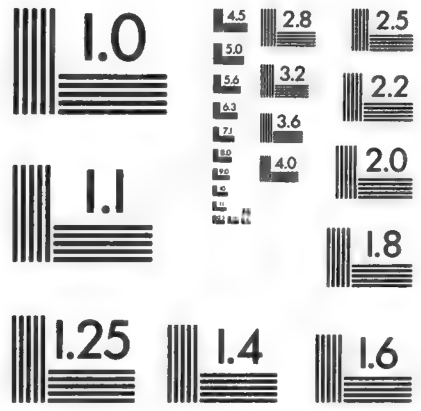




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



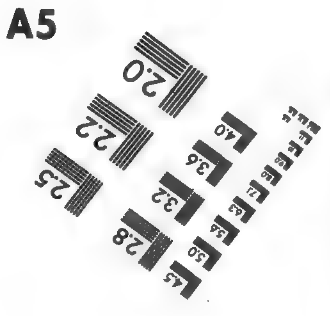
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.0 mm

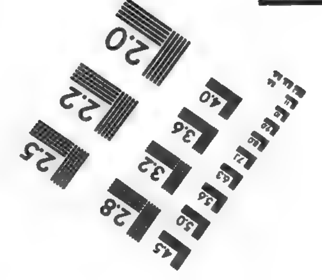
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.5 mm

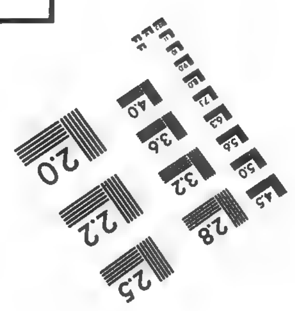
A5



A4

A3





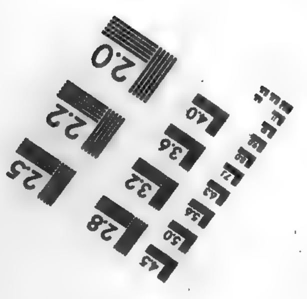
PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
3.0 mm



Herald
May 3

98

Weekly Comment

The 44th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra ended last week. Some looked forward to this season with fear and trembling, for would not Mr. Koussevitzky turn his back on the good old masters and introduce wild-eyed composers of today with breath smelling of vodka and absinthe? And it had been said of him that he was a sensational conductor, a performer on the trapeze and flying-rings of music, a conductor whose one aim was to make the smug Bostonian sit up and take notice.

Mr. Koussevitsky disappointed the surmisers and the prophets. He not only respected the ancients; he showed that he was fond of them and wished them to appear at their best. Let us call the roll of the old worthies. Emmanuel Bach and J. S. Bach. Four of Beethoven's symphonies and two of his overtures were performed. A symphony by Boccherini was played here for the first time, possibly for the first time in this country. Our old friend Johannes Brahms was represented by two symphonies and The Haydn variations, and the performances of the symphonies were among the leading features of the season. There were three of Handel's works performed. Let us go on. Corelli, 1; Liszt, 1; Mendelssohn, 1; Mozart, 3; Rigel, 1 (first time in America); Schubert, 2; Schumann, 1; Strauss, 4; Tchaikovsky, 3; Vivaldi, 1; Wagner, 9 (there were two performances of Siegfried's Funeral music); Weber, 2. We mention only instrumental works. And Gabriel Faure, 2; Glinka, 1; Berlioz, 1; d'Indy, 1; Liadov, 3; Borodin, 2; Moussorgsky, 2; Rabaud, 2; Rachmaninov, 2; Rimsky-Korsakov, 3, are names familiar to the audience.

But how about the radical wing, the extreme left? They were represented by Bliss—Bax cannot be justly described as a radical—Copland, Eichheim, de Falla, Honegger, Manuel, Prokofieff, Schmitt, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Tailleferre. Of the pieces by these composers, Copland's symphony provoked the bitterest hostility. It is a pity that it was not performed a second time, that there was not another opportunity of judging its merits and its faults. Scriabin's "Prometheus" was played twice—but Mr. Koussevitsky is devoted to the memory of his dead companion and friend and thus outvies Mrs. Micawber's devotion to her husband. Bliss's concerto was curious and made little impression. Eichheim made another trip to the Orient and heard strange and pleasing music. Manuel was welcomed, and so was Prokofieff. Stravinsky's piano concerto, the attempt to write as Bach might write today, aroused the ire of the conservatives, and many of the "more advanced" found it dull—the worst of faults. Honegger's "Pacific" is a powerful machine. Mlle. Tailleferre's concerto is amiable, unpretentious tinkling.

German-Austrian Bohemians were represented by the two Bachs, Beethoven, Brahms, Handel (really to be classed among the English), Haydn, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Smetana, Strauss, Wagner, Weber. Fifteen in all.

The French by Berlioz, Borchard (why?), Boulanger, Caplet, Debussy, Dukas, G. Faure, Honegger, d'Indy, Manuel, Rabaud, Ravel, Rigel, Roussel, Schmitt, Tailleferre; sixteen.

The Russians by Borodin, Glasounov, Glinka, Liadov, Moussorgsky, Prokofieff, Rachmaninov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, eleven.

The Italians by Boccherini, Corelli, Respighi, Vivaldi; four.

The Americans by Copland, Eichheim, Foote, Hadley, Hill, Loeffler; six.

The English by Bax, Bliss, Elgar (transcription); three.

The Spaniards by de Falla.

The number of works performed were 110. The composers whose names were on the Symphony programs for the first time were Borchard, Boulanger, Caplet, Copland, Corelli, Manuel, Rigel, Tailleferre.

The pieces by Bliss, Borchard, Eichheim (revised version of "A Chinese Legend"), Hill were played for the first time anywhere.

Works by Borchard, Caplet, Manuel, Moussorgsky (Ravel), Prokofieff, Rigel, Roussel, Stravinsky ,and possibly Boccherini, were played for the first time in America.

Besides the works thus performed 21 were heard for the first time in Boston.

There were not many soloists: A soprano, Mme. Matzenauer; two violinists, Messrs. Burgin and Spalding; one violoncellist, Mr. Bedetti (two performances); six pianists, Messrs. Borovsky (first time here), Cortot, Maier and Pattison (music for two pianos), Rachmaninov, Stravinsky (first time here), and Mlle. Boulanger, organist.

Mr. Borovsky gave a tame performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto No. 1; Mlle. Boulanger, hampered perhaps by the condition of the organ, lacked decisive rhythm. Mr. Stravinsky had the courage to play his own concerto and he played it as if he really liked it.

The season was on the whole unusually interesting and brilliant. There are orchestral performances that stand boldly out, as those of the Symphonies and the Variations by Brahms, Tchaikovsky's Fifth, the Dances (with chorus) from "Prince Igor," Debussy's "Nocturnes," Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," Honegger's "Pacific," the music by Respighi. Schumann's Concerto, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," Ravel's "The Waltz," Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite and violin concerto, Respighi's "Gregorian" concerto, the music by the two Bachs, Bax, Boccherini, de Falla, Foote, Handel, Haydn, Loeffler, Liszt, Mozart, Rabaud, Vivaldi and certain pieces by Wagner.

On the other hand, the interpretation of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, a symphony or two of Beethoven's, the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," not to mention a few other performances, excited adverse crticism and not without a show of justice.

Mr. Koussevitsky is first of all romantic and at times is inclined to fall into sentimentalism when he comes to purely lyric passages. When he does not give way to his sentimental nature he is truly and irresistibly poetic. He is mastered by moods. Yet he does not lose control of the orchestra by sudden and spontaneous changes, when he is on the platform, of previously rehearsed interpretations, for his personality is so pronounced that he masters the players as well as the audience. He can be passionate without being blatant. As a rule he prepares a climax that, when it comes, is irresistible. In wildly romantic music he is not to be excelled, yet no one treats the music of the 18th century with more loving devotion, with a finer sense of values, with a clearer appreciation of the formalism and spirit of the period. He is not too fussy about details; he is not obsequious towards the great composers.

What Anatole France said of the critic might be paraphrased wi regard to Mr. Koussevitzky: This conductor relates to his hearers th adventures of his soul in the land of music. He tells them what he hea d feels, without consideration of others, who, having heard and felt in different manner, insist that what they heard and felt should be the [illegible] He is not bound by tradition. His taste is catholic. erpretation. He is not bound by tradition. His taste is catholic. tionality of a composer is not questioned. His programs are a of this. And, praise be to Allah, he knows that music is not a fixed stablished art in form and expression; that young composers of the s cannot feel and express themselves as if they had been born in seventies and eighties, and should not if they could. He knows that beautiful in music has existed since the time when Claudio Montedi fluttered the dovecotes of the conservatives; that the beautiful and noble may with the centuries, yes, with the decades, assume new forms the expression of all sentiments and emotions.

P. H.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAY 3 1925

Symphony Shakeup.

Springfield is interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its virile leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The orchestra has been heard hereabouts under many famous leaders but it is safe to say that probably no leader has aroused more comment in the city than Mr. Koussevitzky.

It seems that there is being a general shakeup in the personnel of the orchestra in preparation for next season's work and such well-known faces as Alwin Schroeder, cellist; Albert Sand, first clarinet, and Georges Longey, first oboe will be missing.

ANNA WOLLMAN
Soprano, Who Sings in Keene, N. H., Tonight.

In other words the orchestra seems to have become a one-man proposition. We in Springfield who do not know the ins and outs of the shakeup may wonder what people in Boston think about it. Probably no one in Boston is more closely connected with affairs musical than H. T. Parker, the eminent critic of the Boston Transcript. That we, too, may understand, the following portion of an article by Mr. Parker in The Transcript of April 30 is reprinted:

For within a single season, Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought a veritable revolution at Symphony Hall—a revolution running far deeper than the dismissal of a few mediocrities, incompetents and outworn abilities, the dead wood of the band. Until he came there had been but two vivid personalities among the conductors of the symphony orchestra—Nikisch in the earliest times (as they now seem) and Dr. Muck of recent memory. Eye-witnesses and ear witnesses to the ways and works of Nikisch in Boston are relatively few nowadays; but in some measure he also was Koussevitzkian—that is to say, a personality preponderant upon music, performance and public. Dr. Muck lacked not individuality, assertion, dominance; but he joined these traits to large-mindedness and high devotion with the art of music for its own sake. Better than any other director that the concerts have known he held the balance even between the concrete conductor and the abstract achievement. In Mr. Koussevitzky the personal element overtops any other. He plays upon his orchestra; chooses his own music; pleasures and excites his public; subdues all things to his own expres on and image.

The company of Friday after and Saturday evening—of Mon evening as well—no longer seeks Symphony Concerts as an institutio to be fostered, a social resort to b cultivated, an occasion for the hearin of music in the satisfactions it ma yield. Rather, these audiences assem ble to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, to watc Mr. Koussevitzky, to talk about M Koussevitzky; to receive ardent sen tions from his hands in the perfor ance of music that shall variously re veal him. Upon him principally, up the composer incidentally (unless happens to be a sanctified fell townsman) it bestows admiration. what the composer has done, but w the conductor may (or may not) with him, is the interest of its e the question upon its lips.

Similarly with the orchestra. U the present dismissals ruffled the rounding air, Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed no salient disposition to tinue the work of Mr. Monteu regain the full prestige of the ba in Mr. Gericke's latter or Dr. M earlier day; to debate with Mr. kowski and the Philadelphian first place among the orchest America and Europe. From th set he has seemed to regard t chestra as his personal instru Did it give him back the son accents, color, motion that he therewith was he content. Did short of them—and his implicit sometimes hard to discover and follow—he was resentful, complaining, occasionally harsh and arbitrary. Yet in all these things no vision of superlative perfections, no ever-receding ideal of incomparable performance, has haunted him. The degree to which the orchestra fulfilled the prescriptions of Serge Koussevitzky has been his one and only test. Likewise with the music. It has been chosen that it might be personal expression to this same Serge Koussevitzky; while sometimes he has wrought it as such regardless of the plain purposes of the composer, the clear voice, the unmistakable will, of the imprinted pages.

Is the game worth the candle? That is to say, are the Symphony Concerts, concentrated and saturated in a single personality, subordinating all else to these powers and this temperament, more to be desired than the Symphony Concerts pursuing the arts of music for their own sake, while less individualized abilities more modestly serve them? Weekly, at Symphony Hall the answer is obvious—an overwhelming yes. The management joins in it, since the prestige of Mr. Koussevitzky fills nearly every concert-room on nearly every occasion, restoring undiminished the ancient vogue of the orchestra. His coming may have increased expenses; yet has it also enlarged returns. The audiences add their voices. For they are interested and enthralled, stirred and thrilled—week upon week, beyond all memory. In their ears sounds, upon them shines, a personality and in the entertainment of the public there is no higher beatitude. The journals swell the chorus. Upon typewriters reviewers spread their wings; speeding Jamaica Plain-ward, interviewers sharpen their pencils.

And the mere bystander, that foolish fellow who tries to see men and things detachedly and to see them whole? Is he to be heeded at all in this welter of personality and pleasure? If he is, he may summon with elation performances in which Mr. Koussevitzky has transcended praise, when he has renewed the voice and the vitality of the music in hand, adding to it his own accents and life—say with the Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms for classics; with the Symphonies and the tone-poems of Chaikovsky among fellow-Russians; with Strauss and (often) Wagner, Ravel and Debussy; with Roussel and Prokoviev of the newest comers. Yet to be recalled also are Schubert distorted; Wagner now and then misplayed; Glazunev intruded; minor ancients superfluously unearthed; Skriabin gospeled; emotion drugged into sentiment, sentiment languishing into sentimentality; Slavic excess underscoring Slavic sensibility. Sensations rather than austerities; excitements rather than devotions; fine frenzies rather than fine discriminations. The cost is counted. Yet in performance Mr. Koussevitzky still prevails. And there for most of us is the end.

H. P. T.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 3 19

Dynamic Temperament of Koussevitzky and His Complete Success

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the two Symphony Concerts of last Friday afternoon and evening the 44th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed into history. And what a season it has been!

For six years, through a period of unprecedented adversity and one also of ultimate notable accomplishment, the Boston Symphony, although led by men of sound musicianship had lacked an assertive and truly magnetic conductor. Then came Mr. Koussevitzky, possessed of the most dynamic temperament that our orchestra had known since the faroff days of Arthur Nikisch, and signs and wonders were made manifest.

By this time, of course, the tremendous popular interest in the fiery Russian and the demand for season tickets, that for once exceeded the supply, are matters widely known and taken quite for granted. For Mr. Koussevitzky is no longer a portent: he is a fact. And for another year at least—and possibly longer—he is to remain among us.

It is fitting now that a full season of Symphony concerts under his direction has come and gone, to record a general estimate of Mr. Koussevitzky both as conductor and as programme maker.

At a glance through the record in the final programme book of the season will prove, Mr. Koussevitzky, for all his vaunted partiality to modern and ultra-modern music, has by no means neglected the classics. The 23 programmes which he set (it will be recalled that one pair of concerts was led by Henry Hadley), have been judiciously representative of all periods and of nearly every "school" of music. If unusual emphasis has, naturally enough, been laid upon the music of Russia, that of France has been by means neglected; the names of Brahms, Strauss and especially Wagner have been much in evidence, as have those of the elder Teutons; contemporary England and contemporary Italy have each been represented by two pieces and contemporary Spain, through the person of Manuel deFalla, has one to her credit. Scarcely an impassioned propagandist for the American composer, Mr. Koussevitzky has yet honored the music of Arthur Foote, Edward Burlingame Hill, Henry Eichheim and Aaron Copland and of that American by adoption, Charles Martin Loeffler. Finally not a few, or the least attractive of his "novelties" have come from the lesser composers of the 18th century.

Also by now an old story are the originality and the brilliance, the far-ranging sympathies and the uncommon penetration of Mr. Koussevitzky interpretations, while equally familia to those who keep themselves poste on such matters is the opposition tha certain of these interpretations hav here and there aroused. But it is a least worthy of note that in no instance has Mr. Koussevitzky's performance per se met with unanimous condemnation at the hands of the professionally critical, whether of Boston or of New York. If Mr. A. or Mr. B. chanced to take issue with Mr. Koussevitzky's highly individualized "reading" of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, his interpretation of that long-suffering composition was, for Messrs. C. and D., a very masterpiece of recreation. So it has gone. Only the unaccountably lethargic version of the Prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and the over-emotional reading of Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" came near to being left without a single champion. Nor is either of these a piece in which any conductor's reputation could well be seriously marred or definitely made.

In his "Taking the Literary Pulse" Joseph Collins has these significant words to say concerning a conductor, not Mr. Koussevitzky, to be sure, but a leader of the same general stamp: "His merit is not that he drills his orchestra until they can render a phrase perfectly, but that when they render it he fuses himself wholly and completely with it, every fibre and every surge."

Dr. Collins' specialties are neurology and literature, yet no writer on music could have better put the case for the "individualist" conductor. Some there are, and doubtless always will be, who would have their music uncolored by the personality of a performer or a conductor—in the last analysis an unattainable ideal. For such as these a Koussevitzky, a Toscanini or a Mengelberg will scarcely fill the bill.

Such cautious souls, however, are in the minority. Most music-lovers desire evidence of impulse and imagination in the performance as well as in the creation of music. Indeed, if the total art is not to be regarded simply as a sort of sonorous mathematics, the one is as necessary as the other to the listener's full enjoyment.

If then, in the flood-tide of his transmuting eloquence Mr. Koussevitzky seems sometimes to overstress a point, such emphasis or excess may readily be forgiven him. More important is the fact that ours is the rare good fortune to have at the head of our orchestra a conductor in whose hands no piece of music could be wholly dull, a con diverse composers, from Bach and Handel to Strauss and Stravinsky.

Once more, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts have yielded both ecstacies and excitements, have summoned exaltations and evoked enthusiasms. And once more, both at home and abroad, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a name with which to conjure.

CONCERTS TODAY

This afternoon at Symphony Hall numerous choral groups, whose members are of foreign birth, will meet in an "International Singing Contest." Pieces by Mendelssohn and Arthur Foote have been selected for the actual contest, and each group will also contribute a number or two of its own.

* * * *

This evening atSymphony Hall, in the last concert of the current Steinert Series, Feodor Chaliapin, greatest of Russian singers, will be heard in numbers to be announced, according to his custom, from the stage. Also according to custom Abraham L. Sopkin, violinist, and Max Rabinovitch, pianist, will each contribute solo numbers.

5/3

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston musical season is now over, except for the Pops, for a few belated concerts and recitals, and for the events of Music Week, which begins today. Chaliapin will sing at Symphony Hall tonight, in the final concert of the Steinert Series. Since he is not to be with the Chicago Opera another season and is rumored to contemplate abandoning American touring after next year, Boston may have few su portunities to see bass

---

ING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

Y3 1925

Comment on the Past Season

The musical season now ending will be remembered as the one that brought Koussevitzky to Boston. Next Sunday in this place some remarks on the Boston Symphony season, and on Koussevitzky, will be made. Aside from the Boston Symphony there have been many enjoyable musical entertainments in the past season, and others not so enjoyable. It would relieve the jaded music reviewer's mind to compile a list of the 10 worst concerts of the year and say in lurid language just what he thought of each. But it is more politic to stick to the best and not to be too precise as to the total number of worthwhile concerts.

The Chicago Opera season here was on the whole the best this company has yet offered in Boston, both in the repertory and in the standard set and maintained by the performances. Chaliapin's other parts proved less memorable than his Bosris and his Mefistofelei in Boito's opera. Mary Garden's Melisande in Debussy's "Pelleas" and Jose Mojica's Pelleas were outstanding figures in a performance of this opera that has probably never been surpassed.

The absence of Tito Schipa left the company without a first-rank tenor here. Of those who sang in Boston Charles Marshall was the most notable tenor. Toti dal Monte's single appearance left a favorable impression. Mr Polacco and Mr Henry G. Weber as conductors were memorable figures. Mr Weber is a young American of marked promise. The "Tannhauser" performance was specially good. Joseph Schwarz proved himself a notable baritone.

The San Carlo opera also offered Boston two weeks of opera of dependa unpretentious quality, most of it from the standard Italian repertory, which was well patronized.

The Flonzaley String Quartet was obliged to cancel one of its three Boston concerts by the illness of one of the four players. The other two were as always unsurpassed among the year's concerts. Mr Pulitzer's New York String Quartet made a promising Boston debut. The Fox-Burgin-Bedetti Trio gave two successful subscription concerts. Except for private and semi-private performances, however, Bosto is still ill provided with cha music.

910

Herald
May 3

Weekly Comment

The 44th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra ended last week. Some looked forward to this season with fear and trembling, for would not Mr. Koussevitzky turn his back on the good old masters and introduce wild-eyed composers of today with breath smelling of vodka and absinthe? And it had been said of him that he was a sensational conductor, a performer on the trapeze and flying-rings of music, a conductor whose one aim was to make the smug Bostonian sit up and take notice.

Mr. Koussevitsky disappointed the surmisers and the prophets. He not only respected the ancients; he showed that he was fond of them and wished them to appear at their best. Let us call the roll of the old worthies. Emmanuel Bach and J. S. Bach. Four of Beethoven's symphonies and two of his overtures were performed. A symphony by Boccherini was played here for the first time, possibly for the first time in this country. Our old friend Johannes Brahms was represented by two symphonies and The Haydn variations, and the performances of the symphonies were among the leading features of the season. There were three of Handel's works performed. Let us go on. Corelli, 1; Liszt, 1; Mendelssohn, 1; Mozart, 3; Rigel, 1 (first time in America); Schubert, 2; Schumann, 1; Strauss, 4; Tchaikovsky, 3; Vivaldi, 1; Wagner, 9 (there were two performances of Siegfried's Funeral music); Weber, 2. We mention only instrumental works. And Gabriel Faure, 2; Glinka, 1; Berlioz, 1; d'Indy, 1; Liadov, 3; Borodin, 2; Moussorgsky, 2; Rabaud, 2; Rachmaninov, 2; Rimsky-Korsakov, 3, are names familiar to the audience.

But how about the radical wing, the extreme left? They were represented by Bliss—Bax cannot be justly described as a radical—Copland, Eichheim, de Falla, Honegger, Manuel, Prokofieff, Schmitt, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Tailleferre. Of the pieces by these composers, Copland's symphony provoked the bitterest hostility. It is a pity that it was not performed a second time, that there was not another opportunity of judging its merits and its faults. Scriabin's "Prometheus" was played twice—but Mr. Koussevitsky is devoted to the memory of his dead companion and friend and thus outvies Mrs. Micawber's devotion to her husband. Bliss's concerto was curious and made little impression. Eichheim made another trip to the Orient and heard strange and pleasing music. Manuel was welcomed, and so was Prokofieff. Stravinsky's piano concerto, the attempt to write as Bach might write today, aroused the ire of the conservatives, and many of the "more advanced" found it dull—the worst of faults. Honegger's "Pacific" is a powerful machine. Mlle. Tailleferre's concerto is amiable, unpretentious tinkling.

German-Austrian Bohemians were represented by the two Bachs, Beethoven, Brahms, Handel (really to be classed among the English), Haydn, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Smetana, Strauss, Wagner, Weber. Fifteen in all.

The French by Berlioz, Borchard (why?), Boulanger, Caplet, Debussy, Dukas, G. Faure, Honegger, d'Indy, Manuel, Rabaud, Ravel, Rigel, Roussel, Schmitt, Tailleferre; sixteen.

The Russians by Borodin, Glasounov, Glinka, Liadov, Moussorgsky, Prokofieff, Rachmaninov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, eleven.

The Italians by Boccherini, Corelli, Respighi, Vivaldi; four.

The Americans by Copland, Eichheim, Foote, Hadley, Hill, Loeffler; six.

The English by Bax, Bliss, Elgar (transcription); three.

The Spaniards by de Falla.

The number of works performed were 110. The composers whose names were on the Symphony programs for the first time were Borchard, Boulanger, Caplet, Copland, Corelli, Manuel, Rigel, Tailleferre.

The pieces by Bliss, Borchard, Eichheim (revised version of "A Chinese Legend"), Hill were played for the first time anywhere.

Works by Borchard, Caplet, Manuel, Moussorgsky (Ravel), Prokofieff, Rigel, Roussel, Stravinsky ,and possibly Boccherini, were played for the first time in America.

Besides the works thus performed 21 were heard for the first time in Boston.

There were not many soloists: A soprano, Mme. Matzenauer; two violinists, Messrs. Burgin and Spalding; one violoncellist, Mr. Bedetti (two performances); six pianists, Messrs. Borovsky (first time here), Cortot, Maier and Pattison (music for two pianos), Rachmaninov, Stravinsky (first time here), and Mlle. Boulanger, organist.

Mr. Borovsky gave a tame performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto No. 1; Mlle. Boulanger, hampered perhaps by the condition of the organ, lacked decisive rhythm. Mr. Stravinsky had the courage to play his own concerto and he played it as if he really liked it.

The season was on the whole unusually interesting and brilliant. There are orchestral performances that stand boldly out, as those of the Symphonies and the Variations by Brahms, Tchaikovsky's Fifth, the Dances (with chorus) from "Prince Igor," Debussy's "Nocturnes," Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," Honegger's "Pacific," the music by Respighi. Schumann's Concerto, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," Ravel's "The Waltz," Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite and violin concerto, Respighi's "Gregorian" concerto, the music by the two Bachs, Bax, Boccherini, de Falla, Foote, Handel, Haydn, Loeffler, Liszt, Mozart, Rabaud, Vivaldi and certain pieces by Wagner.

On the other hand, the interpretation of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, a symphony or two of Beethoven's, the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," not to mention a few other performances, excited adverse crticism and not without a show of justice.

Mr. Koussevitsky is first of all romantic and at times is inclined to fall into sentimentalism when he comes to purely lyric passages. When he does not give way to his sentimental nature he is truly and irresistibly poetic. He is mastered by moods. Yet he does not lose control of the orchestra by sudden and spontaneous changes, when he is on the platform, of previously rehearsed interpretations, for his personality is so pronounced that he masters the players as well as the audience. He can be passionate without being blatant. As a rule he prepares a climax that, when it comes, is irresistible. In wildly romantic music he is not to be excelled, yet no one treats the music of the 18th century with more loving devotion, with a finer sense of values, with a clearer appreciation of the formalism and spirit of the period. He is not too fussy about details; he is not obsequious towards the great composers.

What Anatole France said of the critic might be paraphrased wi... regard to Mr. Koussevitzky: This conductor relates to his hearers th... adventures of his soul in the land of music. He tells them what he hea... d feels, without consideration of others, who, having heard and felt in different manner, insist that what they heard and felt should be the ...erpretation. ~~He is not bound by tradition. His taste is catholic.~~ ...tionality of a composer is not questioned. His programs are a ...of this. And, praise be to Allah, he knows that music is not a fixed ...stablished art in form and expression; that young composers of the ...s cannot feel and express themselves as if they had been born in seventies and eighties, and should not if they could. He knows that beautiful in music has existed since the time when Claudio Monteverdi fluttered the dovecotes of the conservatives; that the beautiful and noble may with the centuries, yes, with the decades, assume new forms the expression of all sentiments and emotions.

P. H.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
~~EVE.~~ UNION

MAY 3 1925

Symphony Shakeup.

Springfield is interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its virile leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The orchestra has been heard hereabouts under many famous leaders but it is safe to say that probably no leader has aroused more comment in the city than Mr. Koussevitzky.

It seems that there is being a general shakeup in the personnel of the orchestra in preparation for next season's work and such well-known faces as Alwin Schroeder, cellist; Albert Sand, first clarinet, and Georges Longey, first oboe will be missing.

ANNA WOLLMAN
Soprano, Who Sings in Keene, N. H., Tonight.

In other words the orchestra seems to have become a one-man proposition. We in Springfield who do not know the ins and outs of the shakeup may wonder what people in Boston think about it. Probably no one in Boston is more closely connected with affairs musical than H. T. Parker, the eminent critic of the Boston Transcript. That we, too, may understand, the following portion of an article by Mr. Parker in The Transcript of April 30 is reprinted:

For within a single season, Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought a veritable revolution at Symphony Hall—a revolution running far deeper than the dismissal of a few mediocrities, incompetents and outworn abilities, the dead wood of the band. Until he came there had been but two vivid personalities among the conductors of the symphony orchestra—Nikisch in the earliest times (as they now seem) and Dr. Muck of recent memory. Eye-witnesses and ear witnesses to the ways and works of Nikisch in Boston are relatively few nowadays; but in some measure he also was Koussevitzkian—that is to say, a personality preponderant upon music, performance and public. Dr. Muck lacked not individuality, assertion, dominance; but he joined these traits to large-mindedness and high devotion with the art of music for its own sake. Better than any other director that the concerts have known he held the balance even between the concrete conductor and the abstract achievement. In Mr. Koussevitzky the personal element overtops any other. He plays upon his orchestra; chooses his own music; pleasures and excites his public; subdues all things to his own expression and image.

The company of Friday afterno... and Saturday evening—of Mon... evening as well—no longer seeks t... Symphony Concerts as an institutio... to be fostered, a social resort to b... cultivated, an occasion for the hearing of music in the satisfactions it may yield. Rather, these audiences assemble to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, to watch Mr. Koussevitzky, to talk about Mr. Koussevitzky; to receive ardent sensations from his hands in the performance of music that shall variously reveal him. Upon him principally, upon the composer incidentally (unless he happens to be a sanctified fellow-townsman) it bestows admiration. Not what the composer has done, but what the conductor may (or may not) do with him, is the interest of its ears, the question upon its lips.

Similarly with the orchestra. Until the present dismissals ruffled the surrounding air, Mr. Koussevitzky has disclosed no salient disposition to continue the work of Mr. Monteux; to regain the full prestige of the band as in Mr. Gericke's latter or Dr. Muck's earlier day; to debate with Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphians the first place among the orchestras of America and Europe. From the outset he has seemed to regard the orchestra as his personal instrument. Did it give him back the sonorities, accents, color, motion that he asked; therewith was he content. Did it fall short of them—and his implicit will is sometimes hard to discover and follow—he was resentful, complaining, occasionally harsh and arbitrary. Yet in all these things no vision of superlative perfections, no ever-receding ideal of incomparable performance, has haunted him. The degree to which the orchestra fulfilled the prescriptions of Serge Koussevitzky has been his one and only test. Likewise with the music. It has been chosen that it might be personal expression to this same Serge Koussevitzky; while sometimes he has wrought it as such regardless of the plain purposes of the composer, the clear voice, the unmistakable will, of the imprinted pages.

Is the game worth the candle? That is to say, are the Symphony Concerts, concentrated and saturated in a single personality, subordinating all else to these powers and this temperament, more to be desired than the Symphony Concerts pursuing the arts of music for their own sake, while less individualized abilities more modestly serve them? Weekly, at Symphony Hall the answer is obvious—an overwhelming yes. The management joins in it, since the prestige of Mr. Koussevitzky fills nearly every concert-room on nearly every occasion, restoring undiminished the ancient vogue of the orchestra. His coming may have increased expenses; yet has it also enlarged returns. The audiences add their voices. For they are interested and enthralled, stirred and thrilled—week upon week, beyond all memory. In their ears sounds, upon them shines, a personality and in the entertainment of the public there is no higher beatitude. The journals swell the chorus. Upon typewriters reviewers spread their wings; speeding Jamaica Plain-ward, interviewers sharpen thei... pencils.

And the mere bystander, that foolish fellow who tries to see men and things detachedly and to see them whole? Is he to be heeded at all in this welter of personality and pleasure? If he is, he may summon with elation performances in which Mr. Koussevitzky has transcended praise; when he has renewed the voice and the vitality of the music in hand, adding to it his own accents and life—say with the Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms for classics; with the Symphonies and the tone-poems of Chaikovsky among fellow-Russians; with Strauss and (often) Wagner, Ravel and Debussy; with Roussel and Prokoviev of the newest comers. Yet to be recalled also are Schubert distorted; Wagner now and then misplayed; Glazunov intruded; minor ancients superfluously unearthed; Skriabin gospeled; emotion drugged into sentiment, sentiment languishing into sentimentality; Slavic excess underscoring Slavic sensibility. Sensations rather than austerities; excitements rather than devotions; fine frenzies rather than fine discriminations. The cost is counted. Yet in performance Mr. Koussevitzky still prevails. And there for most of us is the end.

H. P. T.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 3 19

Dynamic Temperament of Koussevitzky and His Complete Success

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the two Symphony Concerts of last Friday afternoon and evening the 44th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed into history. And what a season it has been!

For six years, through a period of unprecedented adversity and one also of ultimate notable accomplishment, the Boston Symphony, although led by men of sound musicianship had lacked an assertive and truly magnetic conductor. Then came Mr. Koussevitzky, possessed of the most dynamic temperament that our orchestra had known since the far-off days of Arthur Nikisch, and signs and wonders were made manifest.

By this time, of course, the tremendous popular interest in the fiery Russian and the demand for season tickets, that for once exceeded the supply, are matters widely known and taken quite for granted. For Mr. Koussevitzky is no longer a portent: he is a fact. And for another year at least—and possibly longer—he is to remain among us.

It is fitting now that a full season of Symphony concerts under his direction has come and gone, to record a general estimate of Mr. Koussevitzky both as conductor and as programme maker.

At a glance through the record in the final programme book of the season will prove, Mr. Koussevitzky, for all his vaunted partiality to modern and ultra-modern music, has by no means neglected the classics. The 23 programmes which he set (it will be recalled that one pair of concerts was led by Henry Hadley), have been judiciously representative of all periods and of nearly every "school" of music. If unusual emphasis has, naturally enough, been laid upon the music of Russia, that of France has been by means neglected; the names of Brahms, Strauss and especially Wagner have been much in evidence, as have those of the elder Teutons; contemporary England and contemporary Italy have each been represented by two pieces and contemporary Spain, through the person of Manuel deFalla, has one to her credit. Scarcely an impassioned propagandist for the American composer, Mr. Koussevitzky has yet honored the music of Arthur Foote, Edward Burlingame Hill, Henry Eichheim and Aaron Copland and of that American by adoption, Charles Martin Loeffler. Finally not a few, or the least attractive of his "novelties" have come from the lesser composers of the 18th century.

Also by now an old story are the originality and the brilliance, the far-ranging sympathies and the uncommon penetration of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations, while equally familiar to those who keep themselves posted on such matters is the opposition that certain of these interpretations have here and there aroused. But it is at least worthy of note that in no instance has Mr. Koussevitzky's performance per se met with unanimous condemnation at the hands of the professionally critical, whether of Boston or of New York. If Mr. A. or Mr. B. chanced to take issue with Mr. Koussevitzky's highly individualized "reading" of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, his interpretation of that long-suffering composition was, for Messrs. C. and D., a very masterpiece of recreation. So it has gone. Only the unaccountably lethargic version of the Prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and the over-emotional reading of Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" came near to being left without a single champion. Nor is either of these a piece in which any conductor's reputation could well be seriously marred or definitely made.

In his "Taking the Literary Pulse" ...oseph Collins has these significant ...ords to say concerning a conductor. ...t Mr. Koussevitzky, to be sure, but leader of the same general stamp: ...s merit is not that he drills his or...tra until they can render a phrase ...ectly, but that when they render ... fuses himself wholly and com...y with it, every fibre and every ..."

... Collins' specialties are neurology ...erature, yet no writer on music ...ave better put the case for the ...ualist" conductor. Some there ... doubtless always will be, who ...ave their music uncolored by ...onality of a performer or a ...—in the last analysis an un... ideal. For such as these a ...sky, a Toscanini or a Men... ...ll scarcely fill the bill.

...tious souls, however, are in ...ty. Most music-lovers de...e of impulse and imagina... performance as well as in ... of music. Indeed, if the ...not to be regarded simply ...sonorous mathematics, the ...essary as the other to the ... enjoyment.

...e flood-tide of his trans...ence Mr. Koussevitzky ...es to overstress a point, ...or excess may readily ... More important is the ...s the rare good fortune ...head of our orchestra a ...whose hands no piece of ...coul. be wholly dull, a cond... ...emotion...

diverse composers, from Bach and Handel to Strauss and Stravinsky.

Once more, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts have yielded both ecstacies and excitements, have summoned exaltations and evoked enthusiasms. And once more, both at home and abroad, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a name with which to conjure.

CONCERTS TODAY

This afternoon at Symphony Hall numerous choral groups, whose members are of foreign birth, will meet in an "International Singing Contest." Pieces by Mendelssohn and Arthur Foote have been selected for the actual contest, and each group will also contribute a number or two of its own.

* * * *

This evening at Symphony Hall, in the last concert of the current Steinert Series, Feodor Chaliapin, greatest of Russian singers, will be heard in numbers to be announced, according to his custom, from the stage. Also according to custom Abraham L. Sopkin, violinist, and Max Rabinovitch, pianist, will each contribute solo numbers.

[illegible]
3

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston musical season is now over, except for the Pops, for a few belated concerts and recitals, and for the events of Music Week, which begins today. Chaliapin will sing at Symphony Hall tonight, in the final concert of the Steinert Series. Since he is not to be with the Chicago Opera another season and is rumored to contemplate abandoning American touring after next year, Boston may have few subsequent opportunities to see and hear the greatest bass this generation has known. Charles Mackey, now head of a conservatory of music in Springfield, Mass, will give a piano recital Tuesday night in Steinert Hall. He was formerly connected with the David Mannes School in New York, and has studied in Europe.

◆◆ ◆◆

The retirement of Alwin Schroeder as violoncellist in the Boston Symphony will be regretted by the many admirers of his sound musicianship and admirable playing. His has been a notable, yet unspectacular, career as cellist with the Boston Symphony and with the Kneisel Quartet. Like the retirement of Mr Longy, whose oboe playing has so long been one of the things that maintained the best standard of these concerts, the departure of Mr Schroeder represents a serious and irreparable loss to the orchestra. It has never had a cellist who was a better player or a better musician. Not since Mr Neumann left the kettle drums has the orchestra suffered worse losses than these two.

◆◆ ◆◆

These elder players represent so many links with prewar days, when the Boston Symphony was an instrument more perfect than any existing orchestra. A public which has not forgotten the splendid past of our orchestra dislikes to see the few men who remained throughout the upheaval of the war and the strike one by one dropping out.

◆◆ ◆◆

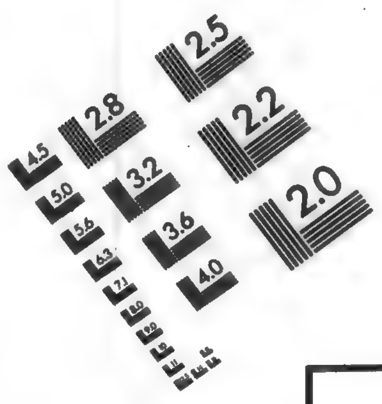
...announced that the

...ELD OVER BY PUBL...
BOZO
...ARNEY GERARD'S SENS... RE...
...LLIES OF THE D...
ELSA MAY SAM GREEN and 50 ENTE... AL...
LAUGHS THAN IN ANY BROA...
VUE AT 1/3 THE PRICE

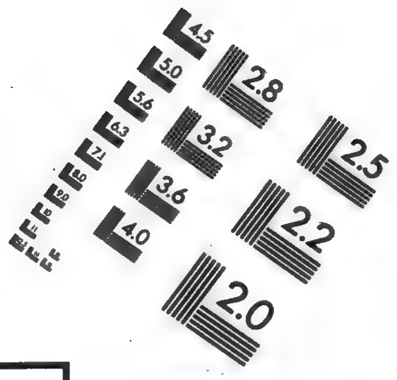
REDUCTION RATIO

12x

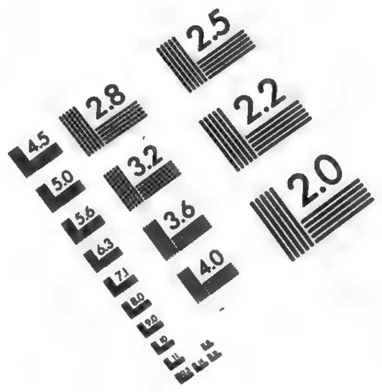
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



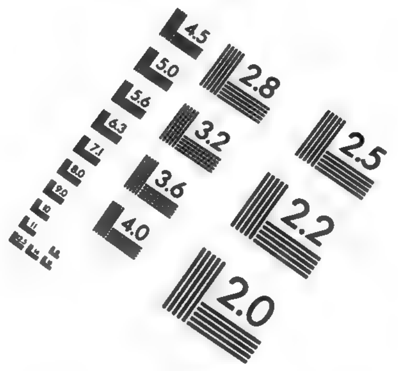
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
5.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0



4.5
2.8
5.0
2.5
3.2
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
4.5
2.2
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.0
3.6
6.3
4.0

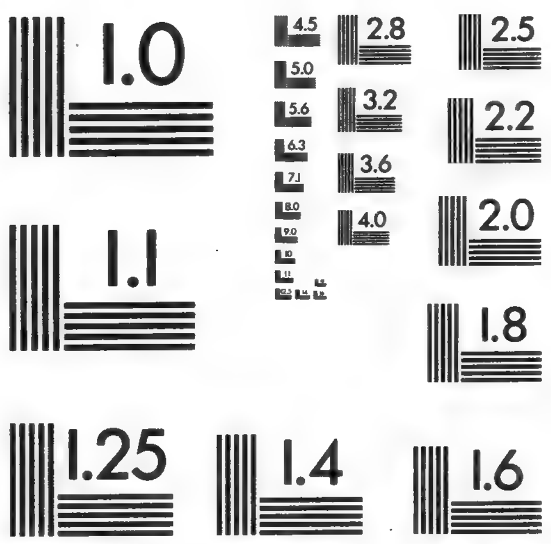


4.5
2.8
5.0
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
8.0
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

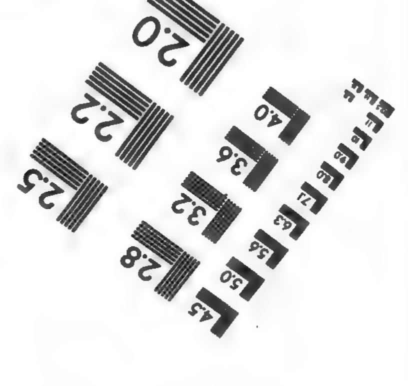
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

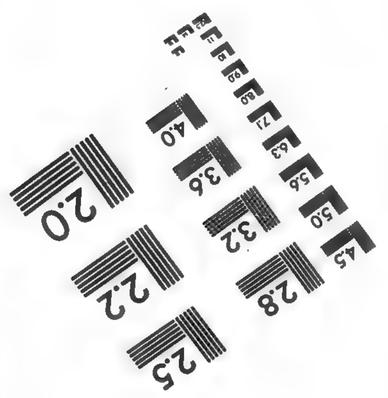
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5



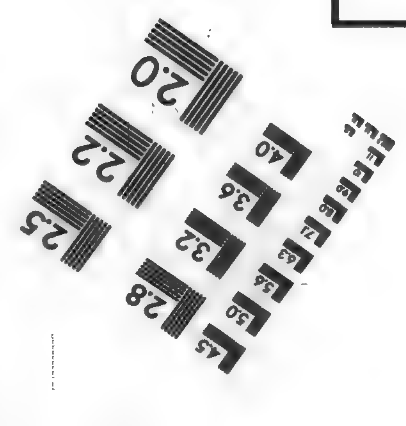
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



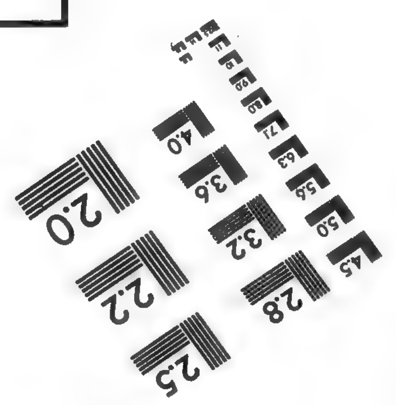
2.0
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
5.0
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
5.0
3.2
4.5
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Herald 98
May 3

'HUMAN COMEDY' IN 'POPS' AUDIENCES

You Can Ignore Music Easier Than You Can the People

By M. AGNES EDWARDS

M. AGNES EDWARDS

Not long ago we were discussing music in general and "Pops" in particular, and in view of the gusto with which we all expressed our enjoyment of these concerts one member of the group declared that we thereby convicted ourselves of a Saturday Evening Post taste in music.

Now some of us were among the "two and a half million" and some were not, and an argument ensued which bade fair to involve all of our opinions of literary and musical relativity. No conclusion was in sight, when a logical-minded person, who can follow two parallel lines of thought and finally make them converge, announced that the analogy wasn't an analogy at all. Irrespective of the merits of the magazine and irrespective of the merits of the concerts, their content is entirely different. Hence, she triumphantly pointed out, there could be no true comparison.

Well-Chosen Doses of the Classical

She went on to explain that while Mr. Jacchia gives you in small and well chosen doses music of classical rank, the Saturday Evening Post gives you a constant stream of original writing, thoroughly modern and for the most part thoroughly American. If its editors were to publish, at wisely regulated intervals, a Shakespeare number, composed perhaps of certain famous passages such as "O! that this too too solid flesh would melt," "But soft! What light through yonder window breaks?" "Friends, Romans, countrymen," with, as "encores," "Under the greenwood tree," "Where the bee sucks, there suck I," and other similar selections; if they were to follow this with a jolly hodge-podge of Boccaccio, Goethe, Sir Walter Scott, Dumas, and Lafcadio Hearn; and if yet another issue were made up of Mark Twain, Tolstoi, Ben Jonson, Marcel Proust, and perhaps a canto from the "Faerie Queene" or the Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales"—in other words, if th were to give us each week a wise a mixture of the well known and prov with the less known but no less admi able of literature, one might say th these issues were analogous to "Pops.

Furthermore, if each number cor tained at least one "encore" by th editor-in-chief himself, and if ever other one was a "special," dedicated t brokers, professors, stenographer mountaineers, or what not—all unso copies to be turned over to the publ at regular rates—and if we all read an liked these numbers—then we might sa that we had a "Pops" taste in litera ture. (Parenthetically let me say tha I don't think that is a bad idea for magazine.)

Most of us were willing to consider th argument closed after this crushin weight of evidence. The contrast wa clear, the point well taken. But as have reviewed in my mind the interes other than musical attached to "Pops" (and as a "constant attender" I assum certain rights of comment), I ha thought of a good many things which wish I had said while the discussion w going on.

The Saturday Evening Post is certainly of the people and for the people, whatever else one may say of it, and if you like your literature "exclusive" you are not apt to read this magazine. Similarly, if you happen to be one of those who love mankind but hate people, you are not likely to attend "Pops." I recently read a statement by a musical critic to the effect that the audience now goes merely to hear

BARTLETT and SON COMPANY
Eyeglasses & Spectacles
"The Shop That Is Different"
400 BOYLSTON ST. (2nd Floor)

---

son.

"Having spent my early life in Williamstown as the daughter of Henry Pettit," said Mrs. Scott, "I love nothing more than to spend all the time I can in the great outdoors. I used to fish for trout in New Ashford, but as I have grown older I have let some one else get the trout and I go after the perch and pickerel. Three or four days a week in summer I leave my home at 7 o'clock, take a trolley up to Marcel's, at Pontoosuc lake; hire a boat for $1 a day, and return when I have caught the lawful limit on pickerel and as many perch as I can carry. A majority of the men don't know anything about fishing: they don't know how to bait their hooks; they don't know what bait to use or to what depth to drop their lines; they don't know the best fishing grounds. The result is that I get a string when many others get none at all.

"I always use live bait for pickerel,"

Herald
May 3

POP CONCERTS OPEN MONDAY

Conductor Selects New and Old Compositions for Fortieth Season

Tomorrow will bring the opening night of the "Pop" concerts, in Symphony hall, now entering upon their 40th season. There will be an orchestra of 80 Symphony players conducted by Agide Jacchia, and the usual accompaniment of sociability, as refreshments are served at the tables and the balcony cafe. Every night at the "Pops" is open to the public although Simmons College will celebrate on Tuesday night, the American Women's Overseas League on Wednesday night, and the University Club on Thursday night. Friday will feature music from the South. Saturday will be called music week night, and Sunday will bring an operatic program, paying special homage to Puccini. Mr. Jacchia has new compositions as well as old ones for his programs.

The programs of the week follow:

OPENING NIGHT.
MONDAY, MAY 4.

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"...... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell".............Rossini
Jota .... Stoessel-Jacchia
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody............Liszt
Rachem (invocation) ......Manna-Zucca-Jacchia
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, Solennelle "1812"........Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen" ....Bizet
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
French military march..............Saint-Saens

TUESDAY, May 5.

March, "Cruiser Harvard,"..............Strube
Overture to "Egmont"............Beethoven
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
College songs.
Bacchanale from "Tannhaueser"........Wagner
Marche Miniature .... Tchaikovsky
Ave Maria....................Schuber-Wilhelmj
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ....Waldteufel
American Fantasy.......................Herbert

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6

Over There...............................Cohan
Overture to "Preciosa"..................Weber
March, "Sambre et Meuse".Planquette-Turlet
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony Dvorak
Suite, "Children's Corner"......Debussy-Caplet
Prelude to "Carmen"......................Bizet
Berceuse Slave.................Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana"....................Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri"
Hungarian Dance No. 1...............Brahms

THURSDAY, MAY 7

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg "Tannheuser" ....Wagner
Jubilee Overture..........................Weber
Fiantasia, "Faust"......................Gounod
Medley of College Songs
Ancient Dances (arranged by Respighi)
Fandango from the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance No. 1..................Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.............Liszt
College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters"..............Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida"..........Verdi

FRIDAY, MAY 8

Overture, "Il Guarany" ....Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"........Strauss
Carry Me Back to Old Virginie...Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo' ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.. ....Dvorak
"Old Folks at Home' ....Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".. .....Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ... .Mendelssohn
Stars and Stripes Forever........ ......Sousa

SATURDAY, MAY 9

March, "Semper Fidelis"..................Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" Cadman-Jacchia
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Simson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Three Jewish Songs..............Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words...............Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"...........Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"..................Delibes
Waltz, "Espana"..... ....Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 5................Brahms

OPERATIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 10

La Boheme, Fantasia.....................Puccini
Manon Lescaut, Intermezzo... ....Puccini
Tosca Excerpts ... ...Puccini
Suor Angelica, Interlude... ....Puccini
Madame Butterfly, Selection.............Puccini
Othello, Tempest Scene...................Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death Wagner
Carmen, Gypsy Dance......................Bizet
Haensel and Gretel, Dream Music.Humperdinck
Eugen Onegin, Waltz...............Tchaikovsky

Herald
May 4

MR. LONGY

That was a handsome tribute paid by Mr. Koussevitzy, the orchestra and the audience to Mr. Longy at the Symphony concerts last Friday. His art as first oboist of the orchestra since October, 1898, his energy as founder of the Longy Club, and as conductor of various orchestras constantly introducing unfamiliar works, richly deserved this public recognition. And last Saturday at the anniversary concert of the Longy School there was again publicly expressed appreciation of his services in the art that he adorns.

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION Herald May 3

Agide Jacchia, the Noted Conductor, Who Will Open on Monday Night the Fortieth Season of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall. This Will Be Mr. Jacchia's Ninth Season as the Most Popular of "Pops" Leaders. In the Course of the Early Summer He Will Conduct His Five Hundredth "Pops" Performance.
(Horsman)

AGIDE JACCHIA, CONDUCTOR OF THE "POP" CONCERTS, THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON TO BE GIVEN NEXT MONDAY EVENING IN SYMPHONY HALL

NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 4 1925

EXTOLS HARVARD CHORUS.

Koussevitsky Quoted as Saying I Is the Best He Ever Heard.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 3.—"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country in the world," declared Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to a Harvard Crimson reporter who talked with the orchestral leader just before he sailed for Europe.

"Dr. Davison, with his Glee Club and Choral Society of Radcliffe," he continued, "has done what countless musicians have only partially succeeded in doing; he has instilled into his singers real feeling for the music they work with.

"The Orfeo Catalan Choir at Barcelona is, in my belief, the only possible superior to Dr. Davison's chorus. It is an organization of superbly trained voices, which has done beautiful work around Barcelona for more than forty years. The effects obtained by Dr. Davison, however, are all the more remarkable because he produced them from a chorus of untrained voices."

JOURNAL

MAY 4 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISES CHORUS AT HARVARD

BOSTON, May 4.—"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country in the world," said Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to a Harvard Crimson reporter who talked with the orchestral leader just before he sailed for Europe.

Traveler
May 4

SIMMONS COLLEGE NIGHT AT POPS

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia at the "Pop" concert Symphony hall tonight at which, although open to the public, Simmons College will be particularly represented:

1—March, "Cruiser Harvard"........Strube
2—Overture to "Egmont"........Beethoven
3—Fantasia, "Aida"....................Verdi
4—College songs.
5—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"...Wagner
6—Marche Miniature...........Tchaikovsky
7—Ave Maria..............Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
8—Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody....Liszt
9—Selection, "Rose Marie"....Friml-Stothart
10—Waltz, "Tres Jolie"..........
11—American Fantasy..........

Herald—98
May 3

'HUMAN COMEDY' IN 'POPS' AUDIENCES

You Can Ignore Music Easier Than You Can the People

By M. AGNES EDWARDS

M. AGNES EDWARDS

Not long ago we were discussing music in general and "Pops" in particular, and in view of the gusto with which we all expressed our enjoyment of these concerts one member of the group declared that we thereby convicted ourselves of a Saturday Evening Post taste in music.

Now some of us were among the "two and a half million" and some were not, and an argument ensued which bade fair to involve all of our opinions of literary and musical relativity. No conclusion was in sight, when a logical-minded person, who can follow two parallel lines of thought and finally make them converge, announced that the analogy wasn't an analogy at all. Irrespective of the merits of the magazine and irrespective of the merits of the concerts, their content is entirely different. Hence, she triumphantly pointed out, there could be no true comparison.

Well-Chosen Doses of the Classical

She went on to explain that while Mr. Jacchia gives you in small and well chosen doses music of classical rank, the Saturday Evening Post gives you a constant stream of original writing, thoroughly modern and for the most part thoroughly American. If its editors were to publish, at wisely regulated intervals, a Shakespeare number, composed perhaps of certain famous passages such as "O! that this too too solid flesh would melt," "But soft: What light through yonder window breaks?" "Friends, Romans, countrymen," with, as "encores," "Under the greenwood tree," "Where the bee sucks, there suck I," and other similar selections; if they were to follow this with a jolly hodge-podge of Boccaccio, Goethe, Sir Walter Scott, Dumas, and Lafcadio Hearn; and if yet another issue were made up of Mark Twain, Tolstoi, Ben Jonson, Marcel Proust, and perhaps a canto from the "Faerie Queene" or the Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales"—in other words, if they were to give us each week a wise admixture of the well known and proven with the less known but no less admirable of literature, one might say that these issues were analogous to "Pops."

Furthermore, if each number contained at least one "encore" by the editor-in-chief himself, and if every other one was a "special," dedicated to brokers, professors, stenographers, mountaineers, or what not—all unsold copies to be turned over to the public at regular rates—and if we all read and liked these numbers—then we might say that we had a "Pops" taste in literature. (Parenthetically let me say that I don't think that is a bad idea for a magazine.)

Most of us were willing to consider the argument closed after this crushing weight of evidence. The contrast was clear, the point well taken. But as I have reviewed in my mind the interests other than musical attached to "Pops" (and as a "constant attender" I assume certain rights of comment), I have thought of a good many things which I wish I had said while the discussion was going on.

The Saturday Evening Post is certainly of the people and for the people, whatever else one may say of it, and if you like your literature "exclusive" you are not apt to read this magazine. Similarly, if you happen to be one of those who love mankind but hate people, you are not likely to attend "Pops." I recently read a statement by a musical critic to the effect that the audience now goes merely to hear the music, not to enjoy itself generally as in the good old days. I'm sure he must have been sitting in the front row, where he didn't miss even the very first note, and perhaps there every one sat silent and appreciative. But how did he avoid hearing the merry chatter and clatter which surrounds my favorite spot? There the people are certainly as much a feature of the program as the orchestra itself.

At a bona fide concert, if you do not like your neighbor you can rigidly ignore him. If a sound disturbs your enjoyment, you can frown ferociously and quellingly. And the fact that you are all in discreet parallel lines, with no disturbing element in the rows of rear elevations before you, tends to make it easy to become obliviuos to everything but the music.

But at "Pops"—how different! The chairs, all decorously facing front at 7:30, soon become a bewilderly jumble through which late comers stagger and crash. Your elbow jogs a stout lady on your right, and the gentleman behind you jiggles you with rhythmical tappings of his foot upon the rungs of your chair. The smoke from a wide and very catholic selection of cigars and cigarettes floats into and remains in your freshly shampooed hair.

The ingenue wonders why there are always some burnt-out globes in the dizzily hung clusters of lights. Someone else wonders what the orchestra tout ensemble thinks of the soloists. Your clever friend murmurs into your ear, "You have always wished you were a man and could sing bass—why don't you learn to play the bass viol?" The girl from the middle West says she shocked her family by writing that "Pops" are something like a German beer garden.

TAPS OUT WRONG RHYTHM

"Ah, the Second Hungarian Rhapsody," exults the man behind you; and he then taps it out in the wrong rhythm on your chair, while he hums the wrong tune. Fat gentlemen always sway to the ballet music from "Faust," you notice, and army officers always think a military march is played just for them. What a slapping of knees and beaming faces! Do you suppose the couple to the left are just engaged, or just about to be? Anyway, the "Barcarolle" affects them tremendously. Possibly that is one of eternal triangles over there, where two persons are holding hands behind the back of a third.

That is an amusing table up in front: one little sub-deb, a chaperone and three prep schooboys The girl flirts with them all; they eat pretzels and drink Budweiser, and the youths are smoking cigarettes with a fine indifference to the unmanliness of not inhaling.

An encore is being demanded insistently, and you realize that two numbers have been played. As a "constant attender" you have learned that while a selection may slip by occasionally alone, the public rises for its rights at least after every second one.

About this time you become aware of a monotonous mumble to your right. Some one is telling some one else (they're both feminine) all the family troubles, regardless of rhapsody, gavotte or valse. You can't turn and scowl at them, for after all this is a sort of glorified tea party, and much of a tea party consists in pouring one's woes into another's welcoming ears—if one does not pour gossip instead. Gossip, too, one must perforce absorb at "Pops."

TREMENDOUS POP

A waitress has opened a bottle of fermented grape juice and the cork made a tremendous pop. The two men in front immediately search hopefully their menu list, not noticing that the offending bottles have been returned.

Or is it a special night? You wonder if that very married-looking coouple in front are renewing in these college songs some of the thrill of Prom nights and class weeks. Some cynical creature murmurs—"Well, I must say it's worth the price of admission alone to know that that glee club would ever deign to give an encore." And you feel a little bit surprised to hear a noticeably academic audience give its most enthusiastic applause to "The Parade of the Wooden Soldiers."

No, Sir Crtic, you can ignore the music at "Pops" more easily than you can the people. Sometimes an entire number is played before you realize that you have been completely absorbed in some scene from the Comedie Humaine, that you have been staring, perhaps, with uncomfortable directness. No one is on his best musical behavior, and no one, unless it be the head waiter, is taking life seriously. And when you go home, it may be a memory of the color harmony of grape juice and red-ribboned cap, or of the preposterous hat three rows down, or of the unknown foreign language which was resounding about you, rather than an impression of the Overture to "Tannhouser" or the "Reve Angelique," which accompanies you to slumber.

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION Herald

Agide Jacchia, the Noted Conductor, Who Will Open on Monday Night the Symphony Hall. This Will Be Mr. Jacchia's Ninth Season as the Most P the Early Summer He Will Conduct His Five Hundredth "Pops" Performance.

(Horsman)

Herald
May 3

POP CONCERTS OPEN MONDAY

Conductor Selects New and Old Compositions for Fortieth Season

Tomorrow will bring the opening night of the "Pop" concerts, in Symphony hall, now entering upon their 40th season. There will be an orchestra of 80 Symphony players conducted by Agide Jacchia, and the usual accompaniment of sociability, as refreshments are served at the tables and the balcony cafe. Every night at the "Pops" is open to the public although Simmons College will celebrate on Tuesday night, the American Women's Overseas League on Wednesday night, and the University Club on Thursday night. Friday will feature music from the South. Saturday will be called music week night, and Sunday will bring an operatic program, paying special homage to Puccini. Mr. Jacchia has new compositions as well as old ones for his programs.

The programs of the week follow:

OPENING NIGHT.
MONDAY, MAY 4.

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"......Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"..............Rossini
Jota ....Stoessel-Jacchia
Twefith Hungarian Rhapsody.............Liszt
Rachem (invocation) ......Manna-Zucca-Jacchia
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, Solennelle "1812"........Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen" ....Bizet
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
French military march..............Saint-Saens

TUESDAY, May 5.

March, "Cruiser Harvard,"..............Strube
Overture to "Egmont"............Beethoven
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
College songs.
Bacchanale from "Tannhaueser"........Wagner
Marche Miniature ....Tcvhaikovsky
Ave Maria.....................Schuber-Wilhelmj
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody...........Liszt
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ....Waldteufel
American Fantasy.......................Herbert

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6

Over There.............................Cohan
Overture to "Preciosa"...................Weber
March, "Sambre et Meuse".Planquette-Turlet
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony Dvorak
Suite, "Children's Corner"......Debussy-Caplet
Prelude to "Carmen"......................Bizet
Berceuse Slave.................Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana"....................Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri"
Hungarian Dance No. 1................Brahms

THURSDAY, MAY 7

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg "Tannheuser" ....Wagner
Jubilee Overture..........................Weber
Fiantasia, "Faust"......................Gounod
Medley of College Songs
Ancient Dances (arranged by Respighi)
Fandango from the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance No. 1..................Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..............Liszt
College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters"..............Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida".........Verdi

FRIDAY, MAY 8

Overture, "Il Guarany" ....Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"........Strauss
Carry Me Back to Old Virginie...Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo' ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....................Dvorak
"Old Folks at Home' ....Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".......Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
Stars and Stripes Forever..............Sousa

SATURDAY, MAY 9

March, "Semper Fidelis"..................Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" Cadman-Jacchia
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Three Jewish Songs..............Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words...............Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".............Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"..................Delibes
Waltz, "Espana"....................Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 5................Brahms

OPERATIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 10

La Boheme, Fantasia....................Puccini
Manon Lescaut, Intermezzo..............Puccini
Tosca Excerpts ....Puccini
Suor Angelica, Interlude...............Puccini
Madame Butterfly, Selection............Puccini
Othello, Tempest Scene....................Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death Wagner
Carmen, Gypsy Dance......................Bizet
Haensel and Gretel, Drea mMusic.Humperdinck
Eugen Onegin, Waltz..............Tchaikovsky

AGIDE JACCHIA, CONDUCTOR OF THE "POP" CONCERTS, THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON TO BE GIVEN NEXT MONDAY EVENING IN SYMPHONY HALL

Herald
May 4

MR. LONGY

That was a handsome tribute paid by Mr. Koussevitzy, the orchestra and the audience to Mr. Longy at the Symphony concerts last Friday. His art as first oboist of the orchestra since October, 1898, his energy as founder of the Longy Club, and as conductor of various orchestras constantly introducing unfamiliar works, richly deserved this public recognition. And last Saturday at the anniversary concert of the Longy School there was again publicly expressed appreciation of his services in the art that he adorns.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 4 1925

EXTOLS HARVARD CHORUS.

Koussevitsky Quoted as Saying I Is the Best He Ever Heard.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 3.—"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country in the world," declared Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to a Harvard Crimson reporter who talked with the orchestral leader just before he sailed for Europe.

"Dr. Davison, with his Glee Club and Choral Society of Radcliffe," he continued, "has done what countless musicians have only partially succeeded in doing; he has instilled into his singers real feeling for the music they work with.

"The Orfeo Catalan Choir at Barcelona is, in my belief, the only possible superior to Dr. Davison's chorus. It is an organization of superbly trained voices, which has done beautiful work around Barcelona for more than forty years. The effects obtained by Dr. Davison, however, are all the more remarkable because he produced them from a chorus of untrained voices."

JOURNAL

MAY 4 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISES CHORUS AT HARVARD

BOSTON, May 4.—"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country in the world," said Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to a Harvard Crimson reporter who talked with the orchestral leader just before he sailed for Europe.

Traveler
May 4

SIMMONS COLLEGE NIGHT AT POPS

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia at the "Pop" concert Symphony hall tonight at which, although open to the public, Simmons College will be particularly represented:

1—March, "Cruiser Harvard"........Strube
2—Overture to "Egmont"........Beethoven
3—Fantasia, "Aida"......................Verdi
4—College songs
5—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"...Wagner
6—Marche Miniature............Tchaikovsky
7—Ave Maria..............Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
8—Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
9—Selection, "Rose Marie"....Friml-Stothart
10—Waltz, "Tres Jolie".......[illegible]
11—American Fantasy......[illegible]

Herald 98
May 3

'HUMAN COMEDY' IN 'POPS' AUDIENCES

You Can Ignore Music Easier Than You Can the People

By M. AGNES EDWARDS

Not long ago we were discussing music in general and "Pops" in particular, and in view of the gusto with which we all expressed our enjoyment of these concerts one member of the group declared that we thereby convicted ourselves of a Saturday Evening Post taste in music.

Now some of us were among the "two and a half million" and some were not, and an argument ensued which bade fair to involve all of our opinions of literary and musical relativity. No conclusion was in sight, when a logical-minded person, who can follow two parallel lines of thought and finally make them converge, announced that the analogy wasn't an analogy at all. Irrespective of the merits of the magazine and irrespective of the merits of the concerts, their content is entirely different. Hence, she triumphantly pointed out, there could be no true comparison.

Well-Chosen Doses of the Classical

She went on to explain that while Mr. Jacchia gives you in small and well chosen doses music of classical rank, the Saturday Evening Post gives you a constant stream of original writing, thoroughly modern and for the most part thoroughly American. If its editors were to publish, at wisely regulated intervals, a Shakespeare number, composed perhaps of certain famous passages such as "O! that this too too solid flesh would melt," "But soft! What light through yonder window breaks?" "Friends, Romans, countrymen," with, as "encores," "Under the greenwood tree," "Where the bee sucks, there suck I," and other similar selections; if they were to follow this with a jolly hodge-podge of Boccaccio, Goethe, Sir Walter Scott, Dumas, and Lafcadio Hearn; and if yet another issue were made up of Mark Twain, Tolstoi, Ben Jonson, Marcel Proust, and perhaps a canto from the "Faerie Queene" or the Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales"—in other words, if th were to give us each week a wise a mixture of the well known and prov with the less known but no less admi able of literature, one might say th these issues were analogous to "Pops

M. AGNES EDWARDS

Furthermore, if each number co tained at least one "encore" by th editor-in-chief himself, and if eve other one was a "special," dedicated t brokers, professors, stenographer mountaineers, or what not—all unso copies to be turned over to the publ at regular rates—and if we all read an liked these numbers—then we might sa that we had a "Pops" taste in litera ture. (Parenthetically let me say tha I don't think that is a bad idea for magazine.)

Most of us were willing to consider th argument closed after this crushir weight of evidence. The contrast wa clear, the point well taken. But as have reviewed in my mind the interes other than musical attached to "Pops (and as a "constant attender" I assum certain rights of comment), I ha thought of a good many things which wish I had said while the discussion wa going on.

The Saturday Evening Post is ce tainly of the people and for the people, whatever else one may say of it, and if you like your literature "exclusive" you are not apt to read this magazine. Similarly, if you happen to be one of those who love mankind but hate people, you are not likely to attend "Pops." I recently read a statement by a musical critic to the effect that the audience now goes merely to hear th

---

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION Herald May 3

Agide Jacchia, the Noted Conductor, Who Will Open on Monday Night the Fortieth Season of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall. This Will Be Mr. Jacchia's Ninth Season as the Most Popular of "Pops" Leaders. In the Course of the Early Summer He Will Conduct His Five Hundredth "Pops" Performance.

(Horsman)

POP CONCERTS OPEN MONDAY

Conductor Selects New and Old Compositions for Fortieth Season

Tomorrow will bring the opening night of the "Pop" concerts, in Symphony hall, now entering upon their 40th season. There will be an orchestra of 80 Symphony players conducted by Agide Jacchia, and the usual accompaniment of sociability, as refreshments are served at the tables and the balcony cafe. Every night at the "Pops" is open to the public although Simmons College will celebrate on Tuesday night, the American Women's Overseas League on Wednesday night, and the University Club on Thursday night. Friday will feature music from the South. Saturday will be called music week night, and Sunday will bring an operatic program, paying special homage to Puccini. Mr. Jacchia has new compositions as well as old ones for his programs.

The programs of the week follow:

OPENING NIGHT
MONDAY, MAY 4

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ... Rossini
Jota ... Stoessel-Jacchia
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Rachem (invocation) ... Manna Zucca-Jacchia
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, Solennelle "1812" ... Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen" ... Bizet
Valse Triste ... Sibelius
French military march ... Saint-Saens

TUESDAY, May 5.

March, "Cruiser Harvard," ... Strube
Overture to "Egmont" ... Beethoven
Fantasia, "Aida" ... Verdi
College songs.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ... Wagner
Marche Miniature ... Tchaikovsky
Ave Maria ... Schuber Wilhelmj
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ... Waldteufel
American Fantasy ... Herbert

WEDNESDAY MAY 6

Over There ... Cohan
Overture to "Preciosa" ... Weber
March, "Sambre et Meuse" ... Planquette-Turlet
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony ... Dvorak
Suite, "Children's Corner" ... Debussy-Caplet
Prelude to "Carmen" ... Bizet
Berceuse Slave ... Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana" ... Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri"
Hungarian Dance No. 1 ... Brahms

THURSDAY, MAY 7

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg "Tannheuser" ... Wagner
Jubilee Overture ... Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ... Gounod
Medley of College Songs
Ancient Dances (arranged by Respighi)
Fandango from the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance No. 1 ... Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters" ... Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida" ... Verdi

FRIDAY, MAY 8

Overture, "Il Guarany" ... Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ... Strauss
Carry Me Back to Old Virginie ... Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ... Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ... Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1 ... Dvorak
"Old Folks at Home" ... Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ... Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ... Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ... Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ... Mendelssohn
Stars and Stripes Forever ... Sousa

SATURDAY, MAY 9

March, "Semper Fidelis" ... Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ... Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky Blue Water" ... Cadman-Jacchia
Irish Rhapsody ... Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ... Saint-Saens
Three Jewish Songs ... Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words ... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhreuser" ... Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ... Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" ... Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 5 ... Brahms

OPERATIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 10

La Boheme, Fantasia ... Puccini
Manon Lescaut, Intermezzo ... Puccini
Tosca, Excerpts ... Puccini
Suor Angelica, Interlude ... Puccini
Madame Butterfly, Selection ... Puccini
Othello, Tempest Scene ... Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death ... Wagner
Carmen, Gypsy Dance ... Bizet
Haensel and Gretel, Dream Music ... Humperdinck
Eugen Onegin, Waltz ... Tchaikovsky

AGIDE JACCHIA, CONDUCTOR OF THE "POP" CONCERTS, THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON TO BE GIVEN NEXT MONDAY EVENING IN SYMPHONY HALL

Herald
May 4

MR. LONGY

That was a handsome tribute paid by Mr. Koussevitzy, the orchestra and the audience to Mr. Longy at the Symphony concerts last Friday. His art as first oboist of the orchestra since October, 1898, his energy as founder of the Longy Club, and as conductor of various orchestras constantly introducing unfamiliar works, richly deserved this public recognition. And last Saturday at the anniversary concert of the Longy School there was again publicly expressed appreciation of his services in the art that he adorns.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 4 1925

EXTOLS HARVARD CHORUS.

Koussevitsky Quoted as Saying I Is the Best He Ever Heard.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 3.—"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country in the world," declared Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to a Harvard Crimson reporter who talked with the orchestral leader just before he sailed for Europe.

"Dr. Davison, with his Glee Club and Choral Society of Radcliffe," he continued, "has done what countless musicians have only partially succeeded in doing; he has instilled into his singers real feeling for the music they work with.

"The Orfeo Catalan Choir at Barcelona is, in my belief, the only possible superior to Dr. Davison's chorus. It is an organization of superbly trained voices, which has done beautiful work around Barcelona for more than forty years. The effects obtained by Dr. Davison, however, are all the more remarkable because he produced them from a chorus of untrained voices."

JOURNAL

MAY 4 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISES CHORUS AT HARVARD

BOSTON, May 4.—"Harvard has the best trained chorus I have ever heard in any country in the world," said Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to a Harvard Crimson reporter who talked with the orchestral leader just before he sailed for Europe.

May 9

SIMMONS COLLEGE NIGHT AT POPS

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia at the "Pop" concert Symphony hall tonight at which, although open to the public, Simmons College will be particularly represented:

1—March, "Cruiser Harvard" ... Strube
2—Overture to "Egmont" ... Beethoven
3—Fantasia, "Aida" ... Verdi
4—College songs.
5—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ... Wagner
6—Marche Miniature ... Tchaikovsky
7—Ave Maria ... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
8—Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
9—Selection, "Rose Marie" ... Friml-Stothart
10—Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ...
11—American Fantasy ...

MISSING PAGE(S)

10

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAY6 - 1925

Incidents and Prospects

Before Mr. Koussevitzky departed for London and Paris the Harvard Crimson tempted him into talk about the Glee Club. In the course of it he said:

> Dr. Davison with his Glee Club and the Choral Society of Radcliffe has done what countless musicians have only partially succeeded in doing. He has instilled into his singers real feeling for the music they work with. The Orfeo Catalan at Barcelona is, in my belief, the only possible superior to Dr. Davison's chorus. It is an organization of superbly trained voices, which has done beautiful work around Barcelona for more than forty years. The effects obtained by Dr. Davison, however, are all the more remarkable because he produced them from a chorus of untrained voices.

Transcript May 6

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Women's Overseas League

Over There ....Cohan
Overture to "Preciosa"..........Weber
March, "Sambre and Meuse," Planquette-Turlet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony ....Dvořák
Suite, "Children's Corner," Debussy-Caplet
(Jumbo's Lullaby; Serenade for The Doll; Golliwogs' Cake-Walk)
Prelude, "Carmen" ....Bizet
Berceuse Slave ....Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "España" ....Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri" ....
Hungarian Dance, No. 1......Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Advertiser May 6

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

"Over There" .... Cohan
Overture, "Preciosa" .... Weber
March, "Sambre et Meuse" Planquette-Turlet
Largo, "New World" Symphony ....Dvorak
Suite, "Children's Corner" ..Debussy-Caplet
Prelude, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Berceuse Slave .... Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri" .... Logan
Hungarian Dance No. 1 .... Brahms

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

MAY7 1925

CURTIS DIRECTOR ARRIVES

William E. Walter Comes From Detroit to Direct Music Institute

William E. Walter, who will become executive director of the Curtis Institute of Music, arrived here today to take up his new duties, according to an announcement by Mrs. Mary Louise Curtis Bok, president of the Board of Directors.

WILLIAM E. WALTER

Mr. Walter was born in Cleveland and was graduated from the University of Michigan in 1892. After twelve years as a Cleveland newspaperman he joined the business staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, remaining there thirteen years.

During the war he served overseas with the American Expeditionary Forces and in 1920 became American secretary to Paderewski. Upon returning to America he became associate manager of the National Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestras of New York and in 1922 went to Detroit to become manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He will make his home at Greenhill Farms.

Monitor May 7

Tonight at the "Pops"

UNIVERSITY CLUB NIGHT

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" Wagner
Jubilee Overture ....Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Selection, "College Life"..Hinrichs
Ancient Dances (Arranged by Respighi)
Fandango from the "Spanish Caprice" ......Rimsky-Korsakoff
Contra Dance No. 1.....Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody Liszt
Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters"....Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida" Verdi

NEW YORK
MUSICAL COURIER
MAY 7 1925

GEORGES LONGY,

without doubt the most famous of oboe players today, who has just retired after twenty-seven years of service with the Boston Symphony, taken at the age of four. The other picture is his daughter, Renee Longy Miquelle, pianist, taken at the same age.

[illegible] May 7

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of The University Club

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Jubilee Overture ....Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Selection, "College Life"......Hinrichs
Ancient Dances ....Respighi
Fandango from "Spanish Caprice" Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance, No. 1.........Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Liszt
Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters"......Waldteufel
March from "Aida"..............Verdi

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Trans May 7

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pops" Symphony Orchestra of 80, under their leader, Agide Jacchia, will give the following program at Symphony hall tonight, the University Club being particularly represented:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser"............Wagner
Jubilee Overture..............................Weber
Fantasia, "Faust".............................Gounod
Selection, "College Life"...............Hinrichs
Ancient Dances................Arr. by Respighi
(a) Gagliarda. (c) PassoMezzo.
(b) Villanella. (e) Mascherada.
Fandango from the "Spanish Caprice"... Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance, No. 1...............Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..............Liszt
Medley of College Songs.
Waltz, "The Skaters"...............Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida"...........Verdi

Advertiser May 7

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Selection, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Jubilee Overture .... Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" .... Gounod
Selection, "College Life" .... Hinrichs
Ancient Dances .... Respighi
Fandango .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance No. 1 .... Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
Triumphal March, "Aida" .... Verdi

Post May 8

SOUTHERN MUSIC AT "POPS"

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" programme in Symphony Hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guarany"..............Gomez
Waltz, "Roses From the South"....Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy" Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"......................Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....................Dvorak
a. "Old Folks at Home"......Foster-Jacchia
b. "Dixie"...........................Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ....Tchaikovsky
a. Miniature Overture. b. Dance of the Sugar Fairy. c. Trepak.
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"...........Sousa

Transcript May 8

At the Pops Tonight

"Southern Night"

Overture, "Il Guarany"........Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South," J. Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"..........Leoni
Slavonic Dance, No. 1.........Dvořák
"Old Folks at Home"....Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
Three Dances from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" ....Chaikovsky
Scherzo from the Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"....Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Monitor May 8

Tonight at the "Pops"

SOUTHERN NIGHT

Overture, "Il Guarany"......Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy" Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.......Dvořák
"Old Folks at Home"........... Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"..... Tschaikowsky
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..Sousa

Telegram May 8

SOUTHERN MUSIC AT "POPS"

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" program in Symphony hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guaranay," Gomez; Waltz, "Roses From the South," Strauss; "Carry Me Back to Old Virginy," Bland-Jacchia; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; Fantasia, "L'Oracolo," Leoni; Slavonic Dance No. 1, Dvorak; a—"Old Folks at Home," Foster-Jacchia; b—"Dixie," Emmet; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; a—Miniature Overture; b—Dance of the Sugar Fairy; c—Trepak; Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Adver May 8

DIXIE MELODIES AT POPS

Melodies from the South will be a feature of the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Overture, "Il Guarany" .... Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy" Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" ... Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1 .... Dvorak
"Old Folks at Home" .... Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" .... Emmet
Polovtsian Dances .... Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"....Tschaikowsky
Scherzo "Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

May 9

Second Week of Pop Concerts

After six nights of record attendance the "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall will enter upon their second week tomorrow. This most popular of musical institutions combines music light and fine, superlatively performed by an orchestra of 80 Symphony players under the direction of Agide Jacchia, to the accompaniment of refreshments and sociability around the tables which cover the floor.

The program for tonight and the operatic program, which will bring the first Sunday concert tomorrow, follow:

SATURDAY

March, "Semper Fidelis,"...............Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky Blue Water" Cadman
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Three folk songs, "From Cradle to Chuppe" Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words..............Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhauser"..............Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"....................Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" ....Waldteufel
Fifth Hungarian Dance.................Brahms

SUNDAY, MAY 10

"La Boheme," Fantasia..............Puccini
"Manon Lescaut," Intermezzo...........Puccini
"Tosca," excerpts ....Puccini
"Suor Angelica," Interlude.............Puccini
"Madame Butterfly," selection..........Puccini
"Otello," Tempest Scene..................Verdi
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death ....Wagner
"Carmen," Gypsy Dance....................Blun
"Haensel and Gretel," Dream Music....... Humperdinck
"Eugen Onegin," Waltz...........Tchaikovsky

"MARY" AT SOMERVILLE

American May 8

SOUTHERN AIRS TO BE PLAYED AT POP CONCERT

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" program in Symphony Hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guarany" .... Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy," Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1 .... Dvorak
(a) "Old Folks at Home" .. Foster-Jacchia
(b) "Dixie" .... Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..Tschaikowsky
(a) Miniature Overture; (b) Dance of the Sugar Fairy; (c) Trepak.
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

Herald May 8

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" program in Symphony hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guarany"...................Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"..........Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginny"........... Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"...............................Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1......................Dvorak
(a) "Old Folks at Home"......Foster-Jacchia
(b) "Dixie"................................Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"..Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".........Tchaikovsky
(a) Miniature Overture
(b) Dance of the Sugar Fairy
(c) Trepak
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"...............Sousa

May 9

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Auspicious Beginnings in Familiar Pleasures Renewed—Novel Pieces to Be Heard Next Week—A Program for Puccini

PERPETUAL is the favor of The Pops with the public of this town. Two weeks ago they were announced for a fortieth year; last Monday they began; now they are running full tide. Spring after spring, not one auspicious circumstance abates. The orchestra, eighty strong, almost keeps the quality of the Symphony Concerts in winter; Mr. Jacchia leads it with a long-practised and still energetic hand. The programs are becomingly divided between "the imperishables" from season to season; freshening pieces lately acquired; miscellany again assorted. The incidental pleasures and refreshments—solid, liquid and to be smoked—still minister to all that would have them. Finally, a pleased audience fills the tables on the floor; occupies many a seat in the balconies; leaves no doubt of its enjoyment. Likewise, it comes again.

Through next week there is freshening matter upon nearly every program: on Monday, the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve," taken over from the Symphony Concerts, songs also by the Harvard Freshman Glee Club; on Tuesday, a repetition of the humorous and fanciful Suite from Debussy's "Children's Corner," lately added to the repertory; on Wednesday, a pot-pourri from Mr. Kern's music to Fred Stone's extravaganza, "Stepping Stones"; on Thursday, Weber's overture to his forgotten comic opera, "Abu Hassam" and a "Northern Rhapsody" by the American, Mr. Hosmer; on Friday, the little Contra Dance of Beethoven; and the songful Intermezzo from Puccini's opera, "Manon Lescaut"; on Saturday, Mendelssohn's Overture, "The Fair Melasina."

Tomorrow evening, besides, The Pops renew their alternate "Sunday Sessions" at which the listener may neither eat nor drink nor smoke in the concert-room. The law—and its functionaries—so ordain; while their subjects—management and audience—bow in submission. As last year, these Sundays bring a different and coordinated program. This time, it commemorates Puccini, dead since the last renewal of these concerts:

Fantasia from "La Boheme"—Intermezzo from "Manon Lescaut"—Excerpts from "Tosca"—Interlude from "Suor Angelica"—Selection from "Madama Butterfly" ....Puccini
Tempest Scene from "Othello"...........Verdi
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"............Bizet
Dream Music from "Hänsel and Gretel" Humperdinck Waltz from "Eugen Onégin".......Chaikovsky

10

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAY 6 1925

Incidents and Prospects

Before Mr. Koussevitzky departed for London and Paris the Harvard Crimson tempted him into talk about the Glee Club. In the course of it he said:

Dr. Davison with his Glee Club and the Choral Society of Radcliffe has done what countless musicians have only partially succeeded in doing. He has instilled into his singers real feeling for the music they work with. The Orfeo Catalan at Barcelona is, in my belief, the only possible superior to Dr. Davison's chorus. It is an organization of superbly trained voices, which has done beautiful work around Barcelona for more than forty years. The effects obtained by Dr. Davison, however, are all the more remarkable because he produced them from a chorus of untrained voices.

Transcript May 6

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Women's Overseas League

Over There ....Cohan
Overture to "Preciosa"..........Weber
March, "Sambre and Meuse," Planquette-Turlet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony ....Dvořák
Suite, "Children's Corner," Debussy-Caplet
(Jumbo's Lullaby; Serenade for The Doll; Golliwogs' Cake-Walk)
Prelude, "Carmen" ....Bizet
Berceuse Slave ....Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "España" ....Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri" ....
Hungarian Dance, No. 1......Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Advertiser May 6

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

"Over There" .... Cohan
Overture, "Preciosa" .... Weber
March, "Sambre et Meuse" Planquette-Turlet
Largo, "New World" Symphony ....Dvorak
Suite, "Children's Corner" ..Debussy-Caplet
Prelude, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Berceuse Slave .... Neruda-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Waltz, "Missouri" .... Logan
Hungarian Dance No. 1 .... Brahms

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

MAY 7 1925

CURTIS DIRECTOR ARRIVES

William E. Walter Comes From Detroit to Direct Music Institute

William E. Walter, who will become executive director of the Curtis Institute of Music, arrived here today to take up his new duties, according to an announcement by Mrs. Mary Louise Curtis Bok, president of the Board of Directors.

WILLIAM E. WALTER

Mr. Walter was born in Cleveland and was graduated from the University of Michigan in 1892. After twelve years as a Cleveland newspaperman he joined the business staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, remaining there thirteen years.

During the war he served overseas with the American Expeditionary Forces and in 1920 became American secretary to Paderewski. Upon returning to America he became associate manager of the National Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestras of New York and in 1922 went to Detroit to become manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He will make his home at Greenhill Farms.

Monitor May 7

Tonight at the "Pops"

UNIVERSITY CLUB NIGHT

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" Wagner
Jubilee Overture ....Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Selection, "College Life"..Hinrichs
Ancient Dances (Arranged by Respighi)
Fandango from the "Spanish Caprice" ......Rimsky-Korsakoff
Contra Dance No. 1.....Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody Liszt
Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters"...Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida" Verdi

NEW YORK
MUSICAL COURIER
MAY 7 1925

GEORGES LONGY,

without doubt the most famous of oboe players today, who has just retired after twenty-seven years of service with the Boston Symphony, taken at the age of four. The other picture is his daughter, Renee Longy Miquelle, pianist, taken at the same age.

Transcript May 7

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of The University Club

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Jubilee Overture ....Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Selection, "College Life"......Hinrichs
Ancient Dances ....Respighi
Fandango from "Spanish Caprice" Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance, No. 1.........Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Liszt
Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters"......Waldteufel
March from "Aida"..............Verdi

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Trav May 7

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pops" Symphony Orchestra of 80, under their leader, Agide Jacchia, will give the following program at Symphony hall tonight, the University Club being particularly represented:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser"..............Wagner
Jubilee Overture.............................Weber
Fantasia, "Faust"...........................Gounod
Selection, "College Life"..................Hinrichs
Ancient Dances...............Arr. by Respighi
(a) Gagliarda. (c) PassoMezzo.
(b) Villanella. (e) Mascherada.
Fandango from the "Spanish Caprice"... Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance, No. 1.......................Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...............Liszt
Medley of College Songs.
Waltz, "The Skaters"...................Waldteufel
Triumphal March from "Aida"............Verdi

Advertiser May 7

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Selection, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Jubilee Overture .... Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" .... Gounod
Selection, "College Life" .... Hinrichs
Ancient Dances .... Respighi
Fandango .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Contra Dance No. 1 .... Beethoven
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
Triumphal March, "Aida" .... Verdi

Post May 8

SOUTHERN MUSIC AT "POPS"

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" programme in Symphony Hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guarany"................Gomez
Waltz, "Roses From the South".....Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy" Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.......................Dvorak
a. "Old Folks at Home"......Foster-Jacchia
b. "Dixie"................................Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" .....Tchaikovsky
a. Miniature Overture. b. Dance of the Sugar Fairy. c. Trepak.
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..............Sousa

Transcript May 8

At the Pops Tonight

"Southern Night"

Overture, "Il Guarany".........Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South," J. Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"............Leoni
Slavonic Dance, No. 1.........Dvořák
"Old Folks at Home"....Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
Three Dances from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" ....Chaikovsky
Scherzo from the Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"....Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Monitor May 8

Tonight at the "Pops"

SOUTHERN NIGHT

Overture, "Il Guarany"......Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy" Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.......Dvořák
"Old Folks at Home"........... Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"..... Tschaikowsky
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..Sousa

Telegram May 8

SOUTHERN MUSIC AT "POPS"

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" program in Symphony hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guaranay," Gomez; Waltz, "Roses From the South," Strauss; "Carry Me Back to Old Virginy," Bland-Jacchia; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; Fantasia, "L'Oracolo," Leoni; Slavonic Dance No. 1, Dvorak; a—"Old Folks at Home," Foster-Jacchia; b—"Dixie," Emmet; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; a—Miniature Overture; b—Dance of the Sugar Fairy; c—Trepak; Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Adver. May 8

DIXIE MELODIES AT POPS

Melodies from the South will be a feature of the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Overture, "Il Guarany" .... Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy" Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" ... Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1 .... Dvorak
"Old Folks at Home" .... Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie" .... Emmet
Polovtsian Dances .... Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"....Tschaikowsky
Scherzo "Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

Traveler May 7

Second Week of Pop Concerts

After six nights of record attendance the "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall will enter upon their second week tomorrow. This most popular of musical institutions combines music light and fine, superlatively performed by an orchestra of 80 Symphony players under the direction of Agide Jacchia, to the accompaniment of refreshments and sociability around the tables which cover the floor.

The program for tonight and the operatic program, which will bring the first Sunday concert tomorrow, follow:

SATURDAY

March, "Semper Fidelis,"................Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky Blue Water" Cadman
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Three folk songs, "From Cradle to Chuppe" Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words..............Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhauser"................Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"....................Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" ....Waldteufel
Fifth Hungarian Dance...................Brahms

SUNDAY, MAY 10

"La Boheme," Fantasia...................Puccini
"Manon Lescaut," Intermezzo............Puccini
"Tosca," excerpts ....Puccini
"Suor Angelica," Interlude...............Puccini
"Madame Butterfly," selection...........Puccini
"Otello," Tempest Scene...................Verdi
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death ....Wagner
"Carmen," Gypsy Dance......................Blun
"Haensel and Gretel," Dream Music....... Humperdinck
"Eugen Onegin," Waltz...........Tchaikovsky

"MARY" AT SOMERVILLE

American May 8

SOUTHERN AIRS TO BE PLAYED AT POP CONCERT

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" program in Symphony Hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guarany" .... Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginy," Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1 .... Dvorak
(a) "Old Folks at Home" .. Foster-Jacchia
(b) "Dixie" .... Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..Tschaikowsky
(a) Miniature Overture; (b) Dance of the Sugar Fairy; (c) Trepak.
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

Herald May 8

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Arias from the South will be the feature of the "Pop" program in Symphony hall tonight, which follows in full:

Overture, "Il Guarany"..................Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South".........Strauss
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginny"........ Bland-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....................Dvorak
(a) "Old Folks at Home"......Foster-Jacchia
(b) "Dixie" ....Emmet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"..Borodin
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".........Tchaikovsky
(a) Miniature Overture
(b) Dance of the Sugar Fairy
(c) Trepak
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..............Sousa

May 9
Transcript

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Auspicious Beginnings in Familiar Pleasures Renewed—Novel Pieces to Be Heard Next Week—A Program for Puccini

PERPETUAL is the favor of The Pops with the public of this town. Two weeks ago they were announced for a fortieth year; last Monday they began; now they are running full tide. Spring after spring, not one auspicious circumstance abates. The orchestra, eighty strong, almost keeps the quality of the Symphony Concerts in winter; Mr. Jacchia leads it with a long-practised and still energetic hand. The programs are becomingly divided between "the imperishables" from season to season; freshening pieces lately acquired; miscellany again assorted. The incidental pleasures and refreshments—solid, liquid and to be smoked—still minister to all that would have them. Finally, a pleased audience fills the tables on the floor; occupies many a seat in the balconies; leaves no doubt of its enjoyment. Likewise, it comes again.

Through next week there is freshening matter upon nearly every program: on Monday, the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve," taken over from the Symphony Concerts, songs also by the Harvard Freshman Glee Club; on Tuesday, a repetition of the humorous and fanciful Suite from Debussy's "Children's Corner," lately added to the repertory; on Wednesday, a pot-pourri from Mr. Kern's music to Fred Stone's extravaganza, "Stepping Stones"; on Thursday, Weber's overture to his forgotten comic opera, "Abu Hassam" and a "Northern Rhapsody" by the American, Mr. Hosmer; on Friday, the little Contra Dance of Beethoven; and the songful Intermezzo from Puccini's opera, "Manon Lescaut"; on Saturday, Mendelssohn's Overture, "The Fair Melasina."

Tomorrow evening, besides, The Pops renew their alternate "Sunday Sessions" at which the listener may neither eat nor drink nor smoke in the concert-room. The law—and its functionaries—so ordain; while their subjects—management and audience—bow in submission. As last year, these Sundays bring a different and coordinated program. This time, it commemorates Puccini, dead since the last renewal of these concerts:

Fantasia from "La Boheme"—Intermezzo from "Manon Lescaut"—Excerpts from "Tosca"—Interlude from "Suor Angelica"—Selection from "Madama Butterfly" ....Puccini
Tempest Scene from "Othello"...........Verdi
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"...........Bizet
Dream Music from "Hänsel and Gretel" Humperdi Waltz from "Eugen Onégin".......Chaik

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITTLE ROCK, ARK
Arkansas Gazette
MAY 9 192

Rumors Rife Concerning Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rumors are rife concerning the many changes to be made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as many musicians who have been with the organization for several years were given notice by Koussevitzky. The noted conductor is ~~said to have~~ dispensed with the services of at least 20 veteran members of the orchestra because they rebelled at certain rulings which he demanded be followed rigidly. The musicians are said to explain their dismissal by the statement that foreign musicians are to be given their places. On the part of the trustees denial is made of any trouble and it is said the changes are no more than happen at the close of every season when it comes time to sign new contracts.

[illegible] 9

OPERATIC PROGRAM IS SCHEDULED FOR 'POPS'

After six nights of record attendance the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon their second week tomorrow. The program for tonight and the operatic program which will bring the first Sunday concert tomorrow, follow:

Tonight's program:

March, "Semper Fidelis" ....Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky Blue Water" Cadman
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah". Saint-Saens
Three Folk Songs, "From Cradle to Chuppe" Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words..........Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"..............Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" ....Waldteufel
Fifth Hungarian Dance..............Brahms

Sunday Program:

La Boheme, Fantasia......Giacomo Puccini
Manon Lescaut, Intermezzo. Giacomo Puccini
Tosca, Excerpts ....Giacomo Puccini
Suor Angelica, Interlude...Giacomo Puccini
Madame Butterfly, Selection Giacomo Puccini
Othello, Tempest Scene..............Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death Wagner
Carmen, Gypsy Dance..................Bizet
Haensel and Gretel, Dream Music Humperdinck
Eugen Onegin, Waltz..........Tchaikovsky

Monitor May 9

Tonight at the "Pops"

MUSIC WEEK NIGHT

March, "Semper Fidelis"....Sousa
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" .... Cadman
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
Three Jewish Songs. Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words..Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhäuser"..Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"......Delibes
Waltz, "España".......Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 5....Brahms

Sunday Evening

OPERATIC PROGRAM

"La Bohème" Fantasia
"Manon Lescaut," Intermezzo
"Tosca," Excerpts
"Suor Angelica," Interlude
"Madam Butterfly," Selection
} Puccini

"Otello," Tempest Scene......Verdi
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death..............Wagner
"Carmen," Gypsy Dance......Bizet
"Hansel and Gretel," Dream Music Humperdinck
"Eugen Onegin," Waltz Tchaikovsky

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
MAY 9 1925

Rumors Rife Concerning Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rumors are rife concerning the many changes to be made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as many musicians who have been with the organization for several years were given notice by Koussevitzky. The noted conductor is said to have dispensed with the services of at least 20 veteran members of the orchestra because they rebelled at certain rulings which he demanded be followed rigidly. The musicians are said to explain their dismissal by the statement that foreign musicians are to be given their places. On the part of the trustees denial is made of any trouble and it is said the changes are no more than happen at the close of every season when it comes time to sign new contracts.

Advertiser May 9

MUSIC WEEK PROGRAM AT THE POPS TONIGHT

March, "Semper Fidelis".............Sousa
Overture, "Marriage of Figaro"....Mozart
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" Cadman
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah". Saint-Saens
Three Jewish Songs ....Gideon-Jacchia
Song Without Words ....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"...............Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" ....Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance, No. 5....

---

and Harry T. Morey.

Telegram 9

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT

March, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa; Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water," Cadman (Arranged by Agide Jacchia; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Three Jewish Songs, Gideon-Jacchia; Song Without Words, Tchaikovsky; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Ballet Suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; Waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel, and Hungarian Dance No. 5, Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
MAY 10 1925

Hale Surveys Boston

PHILIP HALE in The Boston Herald gives a survey of the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new leader, Serge Koussevitzky:

"Some looked forward to this season with fear and trembling, for would not Mr. Koussevitzky turn his back on the good old masters and introduce wild-eyed composers of today with breath smelling of vodka and absinthe? And it had been said of him that he was a sensational conductor, a performer on the trapeze and flying-rings of music, a conductor whose one aim was to make the smug Bostonian sit up and take notice. Mr. Koussevitzky disappointed the surmisers and the prophets. He not only respected the ancients; he showed that he was fond of them and wished them to appear at their best. Let us call the roll of the old worthies: Emmanuel Bach and J. S. Bach. Four of Beethoven's symphonies and two of his overtures were performed. A symphony by Boccherini was played here for the first time, possibly for the first time in this country. Our old friend Johannes Brahms was represented by two symphonies and the Haydn variations, and the performances of the symphonies were among the leading features of the season. There were three of Handel's works performed. Let us go on. Corelli, 1; Liszt, 1; Mendelssohn, 1; Mozart, 3; Rigel, 1 (first time in America); Schubert, 2; Schumann, 1; Strauss, 4; Tchaikovsky, 3; Vivaldi, 1; Wagner, 9 (there were two performances of Siegfried's Funeral music); Weber, 2. We mention only instrumental works. And Gabriel Fauré, 2; Glinka, 1; Berlioz, 1; d'Indy, 1; Liadov, 3; Borodin, 2; Moussorgsky, 2; Rabaud, 2; Rachmaninoff, 2; Rimsky-Korsakoff, 3, are names familiar to the audience.

"But how about the radical wing, the extreme left? They were represented by Bliss—Bax cannot be justly described as a radical—Copland, Eichheim, de Falla, Honegger, Manuel, Prokofieff, Schmitt, Scriabine, Stravinsky, Tailleferre. Of the pieces by these composers, Copland's symphony provoked the bitterest hostility. It is a pity that it was not performed a second time, that there was not another opportunity of judging its merits and its faults. Scriabine's 'Prometheus' was played twice—but Mr. Koussevitzky is devoted to the memory of his dead companion and friend and thus outvies Mrs. Micawber's devotion to her husband. Bliss's concerto was curious and made little impression. Eichheim made another trip to the Orient and heard strange and pleasing music. Manuel was welcomed, and so was Prokofieff. Stravinsky's piano concerto, the attempt to write as Bach might write today, aroused the ire of the conservatives, and many of the 'more advanced' found it dull—the worst [illegible]. Honegger's 'Pacific' is a [illegible] machine. Mlle. Tailleferre's [illegible] is amiable, unpretentious tinkling. The number of works performed were 110. The composers whose names [illegible] on the symphony programs for the first time were Borchard, Roulanger, Caplet, Copland, Corelli, Manuel, Rigel, Tailleferre.

"The pieces by Bliss, Borchard, Eichheim (revised version of 'A Chinese Legend') and Hill were played for the first time anywhere.

"Works by Borchard, Caplet, Manuel, Moussorgsky (Ravel), Prokofieff, Rigel, Roussel, Stravinsky, and possibly Boccherini, were played for the first time in America.

"Besides the works thus [illegible] in Boston. The season was on the whole unusually interesting and brilliant.

"Mr. Koussevitzy is first of all romantic, and at times is inclined to fall into sentimentalism when he comes to purely lyric passages. When he does not give way to his sentimental nature he is truly and irresistibly poetic. He is mastered by moods. Yet he does not lose control of the orchestra by sudden and spontaneous changes, when he is on the platform, of previously rehearsed interpretations, for his personality is so pronounced that he masters the players as well as the audience. He can be passionate without being blatant. As a rule, he prepares a climax that, when it comes, is irresistible. In wildly romantic music he is not to be excelled, and no one treats the music of the eighteenth century with more loving devotion, with a finer sense of values, with a clearer appreciation of the formalism and spirit of the period. He is not too fussy about details; he is not obsequious toward the great composers.

"What Anatole France said of the critic might be paraphrased with regard to Mr. Koussevitzky: This conductor relates to his hearers the adventures of his soul in the land of music. He tells them what he hears and feels, without consideration of others, who, having heard and felt in a different manner, insist that what they heard and felt should be the only interpretation. He is not bound by tradition. His taste is catholic. The nationality of a composer is not questioned. His programs are a proof of this. And, praise be to Allah, he knows that music is not a fixed and established art in form and expression; that young composers of the 1920s cannot feel and express themselves as if they had been born in the '70s and '80s, and should not if they could. He knows that the beautiful in music has existed since the time when Claudio Monteverdi fluttered the dovecotes of the conservatives; that the beautiful and the noble may with the centuries—yes, with the decades—assume new forms in the expression of all sentiments and emotions."

Post May 10

AT THE POPS

The second week of the Pops opens with the first of the Sunday evening concerts, which last season proved altogether acceptable to a large public despite the absence of refreshments and "smokes." Tonight's programme, designed as a memorial to Puccini, will list five selections from his operas, while extracts from the operatic works of other composers will fill the remainder of the evening.

The Harvard freshmen will be in attendance Monday evening, and their Glee Club will provide a group of songs. Among the orchestral numbers will be music from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Christmas Eve," heard at the Symphony concerts during the holiday season.

Through the remainder of the week the programme will be the usual well assorted lists with a selection from "Rose Marie" for special interest on Tuesday evening, a Lohengrin fantasia and Handel's Largo on Wednesday, Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre" and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture on Thursday, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" Friday evening, and on Saturday Mendelssohn's overture "The Fair Melusine," Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" and Mr. Jacchia's orchestral arrangement of "Eili, Eili."

~~[illegible]~~

"POPS" HONOR PUCCINI TONIGHT

An operatic programme doing special homage to the memory of Puccini will be the feature of the first Sunday "Pop" concert at Symphony Hall tonight. The programme in full follows:

La Boheme, fantasia.
Manon Lescaut, intermezzo.
Tosca, excerpts.
Suor Angelica, interlude.
Madame Butterfly, selection.
GIACOMO PUCCINI
Dec. 23, 1858—Nov. 29, 1924.

Othello, tempest scene.................Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, prelude and love-death Wagner
Carmen, gypsy dance......................Bizet
Haensel and Gretel, dream music. Humperdinck
Eugen Onegin, waltz.............Tchaikovsky

Herald May 10

SECOND WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall are entering upon their second week tonight at the first Sunday night concert of the season, having traversed a record opening week. Mr. Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 symphony players will present the following programs, all of which are open to the public, although Monday is dedicated to the Harvard freshmen, Tuesday to Smith College, Thursday to Northeastern University and Friday to the Massachusetts Daughters of Maine:

OPERATIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 10

La Boheme, Fantasia; Manon Lescaut, Intermezzo, Tosca, Excerpts; Suor Angelica, Interlude; Madame Butterfly, Selection ....Puccini
Othello, Tempest Scene..............Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death ....Wagner
Carmen, Gypsy Dance...............Bizet
Haensel and Gretel, Dream Music Humperdinck
Eugen Onegin, Waltz.........Tchaikovsky

MONDAY, MAY 11

March, "Veritas" ....Densmore
Overture to "Orpheus" ....Offenbach
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ....Leoncavallo
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club (A. W. Wright, leader)
Suite from "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakov
Indian Lament (Arr. by Agide Jacchia) Dvorak-Kreisler
Introduction, Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
College Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
Pompe and Circumstance...........Elgar
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"...........Vollstedt
Selection, "College Life".........Hinrichs

TUESDAY, MAY 12

"Procession of Bacchus"..........Delibes
Overture to "Mignon"............Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"........Tchaikovsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"....Puccini
From the Suite, "The Children's Corner" Debussy-Caplet
"Deep River" ....Burleigh-Jacchia
Minuet ....Boccherini
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"....Sibelius
Selection, "Rose Marie"....Friml-Stothart
Selection of College Songs
"Oh, Fairest Alma Mater".........Sleeper

WEDNESDAY, MAY 13

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Largo (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings) ....Handel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2.........Bizet
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....Glazounov
Whispering of the Flowers..........Blon
Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
Selection, "Stepping Stones".............Kern
Waltz, "1001 Nights"...............Strauss
Sixth Hungarian Dance............Brahms

THURSDAY, MAY 14

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture to "Abu Hassan".........Weber
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
Danse Macabre ....Saint-Saens
Spanish Serenade ....Glazounov
Indian Summer, An American Idyl.....Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Northern Rhapsody ....Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" ......Waldteufel
March, "Northeastern" ....Speare

FRIDAY, MAY 15

March, "Greeting to Bangor"....R. B. Hall
Overture to "Oberon"..............Weber
Rachem (Invocation) ....Manna-Zucca
Fantasia from "Carmen" ....Bizet
Suite, "Peer Gynt"..................Grieg
Intermezzo from "Manon Lescaut" Puccini
Contra-Dance No. 1............Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries.............Wagner
Marche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
"The Lark" ....Glinka-Jacchia
Waltz, "The Sirens" ....Waldteufel

PORTIA LAW SCHOOL NIGHT
SATURDAY, MAY 16

Procession of the Sardar..Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture, "The Fair Melusine" Mendelssohn
Jota from the Suite, "Hispana" Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Fantasia, "Fedora" ....Giordano
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" Rimsky-Korsakov
Eili, Eili ....Arr. by Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi"...................Wagner
Scenes Pittoresques ....Massenet
"Love's Dream After the Ball"..Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators"........Fucik

Traveler May 11

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Harvard freshman class will be present and their glee club will sing at the "Pop" concert tonight, which, however, is open to the public. The program follows:

March, "Veritas"......................Densmore
Overture to "Orpheus"...................Offenbach
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"................Leoncavallo
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club.
Suite from "Christmas Eve"..Rimsky-Korsakov
Indian Lament.....................Dvorak-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Introduction to Act III, "Lohrengrin"..Wagner
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club.
"Pomp and Circumstance"................Elgar
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".................Vollstedt
Selection, "College Life"...............Hinrichs

~~Advertiser May 11~~

HARVARD FRESHMEN TO ATTEND POPS TONIGHT

Harvard freshmen will celebrate at tonight's Pop concert in Symphony Hall and will bring their glee club with them. The program follows:

Pomp and Circumstance.............Elgar
Overture, "Orpheus"..............Offenbach
Fantasia, "Pagliacci,"..........Leoncavallo
Songs, Harvard Freshman Glee Club.
Suite, "Christmas Eve"....Rimsky-Korsakov
Indian Lament.............Dvorak-Kreisler
Introduction, "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Songs, Harvard Freshman Glee Club.
Selection, "College Life"..........Heinrichs
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"............Vollstedt
March, "Veritas"...................Densmore
"Fair Harvard"

Transcript May 11

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard Freshmen

March, "Veritas" ....Densmore
Overture, "Orpheus" ....Offenbach
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .....Leoncavallo
College Songs
Suite from the Opera, "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakov
Indian Lament ....Kreisler-Jacchia
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" Wagner
College Songs
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"........Vollstedt
Selection, "College Life"......Hinrichs

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Assisting:
Harvard Freshman Glee Club

Monitor May 11

Tonight at the "Pops"

Harvard Freshman Night

"Pomp and Circumstance"...Elgar
Overture to "Orpheus"....Offenbach
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"...Leoncavallo
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
Suite from "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Indian Lament"...Dvořák-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Introduction Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
Selection, "College Life"...Hinrichs
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"....Vollstedt
March, "Veritas"..........Densmore
"Fair Harvard"

Traveler May 11

Opera Music at Tonight's Pop Concert

TONIGHT Agide Jacchia will conduct the first Sunday night Pop concert. The concerts opened last Monday night, with the customary eclat. The orchestra includes eighty Symphony players. Light refreshments are offered with the light music.

Tonight's program is largely operatic, with memorial selections from the Puccini operas. The bill follows:

"La Boheme," Fantasia
"Manon Lescaut," Intermezzo
"Tosca," Excerpts
"Sour Angelica," Interlude
"Madame Butterfly," Selection, Giacomo Puccini
(December 23, 1858; November 29, 1924)
"Othello," Tempest Scene .... Verdi
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death .... Wagner
"Carmen," Gypsy Danace .... Bizet
"Haensel and Gretel," Dream Music, Humperdinck
"Eugen Onegin," Waltz .. Tschaikowsky

Post May 11

Harvard '28 at "Pops"

The Harvard freshman class will be present and their Glee Club will sing at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight which, however, is open to the public. Programme follows:

March, "Veritas.. ....Densmore
Overture to "Orpheus"...........Offenbach
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"............Leoncavallo
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club.

Suite from "Christmas Eve"............ Rimsky-Korsakov
"Indian Lament" (arranged by Agide Jacchia) .... Dvorak-Kreisler
Introduction Act. III, "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club.

"Pomp and Circumstance".............Elgar
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"............Vollstedt
Selection, "College Life"............Hinrichs

Herald May 11

HARVARD '28 AT "POPS"

The Harvard freshman class will be present and their Glee Club will sing at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight, which, however, is open to the public. The program follows:

1. March, "Veritas"...................Densmore
2. Overture to "Orpheus"..........Offenbach
3. Fantasia, "Pagliacci"...........Leoncavallo
4. Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
5. Suite from "Christmas Eve"—Rimsky-Korsakov
6. Indian Lament...............Dvorak-Kreisler
   (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
7. Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
8. Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
9. "Pomp and Circumstance"............Elgar
10. Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"............Vollstedt
11. Selection, "College Life"..........Hinrichs

~~Telegram May 11~~

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT

March, "Veritas," Densmore; Overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; Fantasia, "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club; Suite from "Christmas Eve," Rimsky-Korsakov; Indian Lament, Dvorak-Kreisler (Arranged by Agide Jacchia); Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; Selection, "College Life," Hinrichs.

American May 12

POP CONCERT UNDER JACCHIA'S DIRECTION

The following program will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall, tonight, under Agide Jacchia's direction:

"Procession of Bacchus"............Delibes
Overture to "Mignon" ....Thomas
Waltz "Dornroeschen" ....Tchaikovsky
Fantasia, "Fedora" ....Giordano
Dance of the Hours...............Ponchielli
"Deep River" ....Burleigh-Jacchia
Minuet ....Boccherini
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"......Sibelius
Selection, "Rose Marie"......Friml-Stotrart
Medley of College Songs
'Oh, Fairest Alma Mater"..........Sleeper

Transcript May 12

At the Pops Tonight

Procession of Bacchus..........Delibes
Overture, "Mignon" ....Thomas
Waltz, "Dornröschen" ....Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "Fédora" ....Giordano
Dance of the Hours.........Ponchielli
Deep River ....Burleigh-Jacchia
Minuet ....Boccherini
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"...Sibelius
Selection, "Rose-Marie"..Friml-Stothart
Medley of College Songs
Oh, Fairest Alma Mater........Sleeper

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Adv. May 12

SMITH COLLEGE WILL CELEBRATE AT POPS

Smith College graduates have bought a large number of seats for tonight's Pop Concert at Symphony Hall. The program follows:

"Procession of Bacchus"............Delibes
Overture, "Mignon"................Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".........Tchaikovsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"......Puccini
Suite, "The Children's Corner,"
Debussy-Caplet
"Deep River"..............Burleigh-Jacchia
Minuet ....Boccherini
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia" .....Sibelins
Selection, "Rose Marie"......Friml-Stothart
Medley of College Songs.
"Oh, Fairest Alma Mater"..........Sleeper

Monitor May 12

Tonight at the "Pops"

SMITH ALUMNAE NIGHT

"Procession of Bacchus"....Delibes
Overture to "Mignon"......Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" ....
Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Fedora" ......Giordano
Dance of the Hours......Ponchielli
"Deep River".....Burleigh-Jacchia
Minuet ....Boccherini
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," Sibelius
Selection, "Rose Marie".........
Friml-Stothart
Medley of College Songs
"Oh, Fairest Alma Mater...Sleeper

Herald May 12

TONIGHT AT "THE POPS"

The following program will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

"Procession of Bacchus"..........Delibes
Overture to "Mignon"............Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .....Tchaikovsky
Fantasia, "Fedora"..............Giordano
Dance of the Hours............Ponchielli
'Deep River"...........Burleigh-Jacchia
Minuet ....Boccherini
Symphonic poem, "Finlandia".....Sibelius
Selection, "Rose Marie"....Friml-Stothart
Medley of College Songs
Oh, Fairest Alma Mater"........Sleeper

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT

"Procession of Bacchus," Delibes; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; waltz, "Dornroeschen," Tchaikovsky; Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; From the suite, "The Children's Corner," Debussy-Caplet; "Deep River," Burleigh-Jacchia; Minuet, Boccherini; Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," Sibelius; Selection, "Rose Marie," Friml-Stothart; Medley of College Songs, "Oh, Fairest Alma Mater," Sleeper.

Telegram May 12

American May 13

JACCHIA ARRANGES 'POPS' FOR TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will present the following concert at the "Pops" in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"
Gounod
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ....Suppe
Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) ....Handel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2..........Bizet
a. Pastorale. b. Minuet. c. Farandole.
Spanish Donce, "Panaderos" ....Glazounov
Whispering of the Flowers...........Blon
Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
Selection, "Stepping Stones" ....Kern
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ....Strauss
Sixth Hungarian Dance ....Brahms

Telegram May 13

"POP" CONCERT TONIGHT

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; Overture, "Light Calvary," Suppe; Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Handel; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2, Bizet (a. Pastorale. b. Minuet, c. Farandole); Spanish Dance, "Panaderos," Glazounov; Whispering of the Flowers, Blon; Egyptian Ballet, Luigini; Selection "Stepping Stones," Kern; Waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

Traveler May 13

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia will present the following concert at the "Pops" in Symphony hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"
Gounod
Overture, "Light Cavalry".........Suppe
Largo (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings) ....Handel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2........Bizet
a. Pastorale
b. Minuet
c. Farandole
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....Glazounov
Whispering of the Flowers.........Blon
Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
Selection, "Stepping Stones".......Kern
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ....Strauss
Sixth Hungarian Dance..........Brahms

Monitor May 13

Tonight at the "Pops"

Cortège from "The Queen of Sheba" ....Gounod
Overture, "Light Cavalry"...Suppé
Largo ....Handel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" No. 2...Bizet
(a) Pastorale (b) Minuet
(c) Farandole
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....
Glazounoff
"Whispering of the Flowers"..Blon
Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
Selection, "Stepping Stones"..Kern
Waltz, "1001 Nights".......Strauss
Sixth Hungarian Dance....Brahms

Transcript May 13

At the Pops Tonight

Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" ....Gounod
Overture, "Light Cavalry".......Suppe
Largo ....Handel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Pastorale, Minuet and Farandole from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlésienne" ....Bizet
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"..Glazunov
Whispering of the Flowers........Blon
Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
Selection, "Stepping Stones"......Kern
Waltz, "1001 Nights".......J. Strauss
Sixth Hungarian Dance.........Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Herald May 13

TONIGHT AT "THE POPS"

Agide Jacchia will present the following concert at the "Pops" in Symphony hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"
Gounod
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Largo (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings) ....Handel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2..........Bizet
a. Pastorale
b. Minuet
c. Farandole
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....Glazounov
Whispering of the Flowers..........Blon
Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
Selection, "Stepping Stones".........Kern
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ....Strauss
Sixth Hungarian Dance..........Brahms

Transcript May 14

Incidents and Prospects

By leave of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has accepted an invitation to conduct at a concert of the League of Composers in New York in the course of next November. Then and there he will lead a chamber orchestra from his own forces through pieces to be played for the first time hereabouts.

To London and to Paris for concerts already begun or soon to be set afoot, Mr. Koussevitzky has carried three pieces by American composers—Mr. Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, heard in Boston last February; Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend," likewise from the current repertory of the Symphony Concerts; Mr. Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," first played in Boston under Mr. Monteux. The conductor's Bostonian public would gladly hear it

---

Transcript May 14

At the Pops Tonigh

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture, "Abu Hassan".........Weber
Prelude ....Rakhmaninov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"............Verdi
Danse Macabre ....Saint-Saëns
Spanish Serenade ....Glazunov
Indian Summer ....Herbert
Overture, "1812" ....Chaikovsky
Northern Rhapsody ....Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
March, "Northeastern" ....Speare

Conductor: A. Jacchia

NEW YORK
POST

MAY 14 1925

Heger, Antonio

Koussevitzky and American Music

Serge Koussevitzky brought to a close his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 1, sailed for Europe the next day and on May 11 began his series with the London Symphony Orchestra as guest conductor. May 22 he will begin his annual series of Koussevitzky concerts in Paris. He will return to this country in September to begin rehearsals for next season with the Boston Orchestra, opening October 9. In Paris the conductor will introduce the music of three young American composers: Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony.

In reviewing the season Philip Hale, in the Boston Herald, remarked that, whereas some had been led by report to expect from Koussevitzky sensationalism and overemphasis upon the moderns, he had proved to have a special flair for the "ancients" and a special way with the "romantics." "He can be passionate without being blatant. As a rule, he prepares a climax that, when it comes, is irresistible. In wildly romantic music he is not to be excelled, yet no one treats the music of the eighteenth century with more loving devotion, with a finer sense of values, with a clearer appreciation of the formalism and spirit of the period." Mr. Hale lists the composers represented by nations as follows: German-Austrian-Bohemians by the two Bachs, Beethoven, Brahms, Handel (really to be classed among the English), Haydn, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Smetana, Strauss, Wagner and Weber—fifteen in all.

The French by Berlioz, Borchard, Boulanger, Caplet, Debussy, Dukas, G. Fauré, Honegger, d'Indy, Manuel, Rabaud, Ravel, Rigel, Roussel, Schmitt and Tailleferre—sixteen.

The Russians by Borodin, Glazounov, Glinka, Liadov, Moussorgsky, Prokofieff, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky—eleven.

The Italians by Boccherini, Corelli, Respighi and Vivaldi—four.

The Americans by Copland, Eichheim, Foote, Hadley, Hill and Loeffler—six.

The English by Bax, Bliss, Elgar (transcription)—three.

The Spaniards by De Falla.

Notable choral performances included Brahms' "German Requiem," Scriabin's "Prometheus" and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor."

Traveler May 14

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight will be dedicated to Northeastern University, but will be in every sense a public occasion. The program follows:

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Abu Hassan"......Weber
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"..............Verdi
Danse Macabre..............Saint-Saens
Spanish Serenade.............Glazounov
Indian Summer, an American Idyl
Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Northern Rhapsody ....Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".......Waldteufel
March, "Northeastern"............Speare

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH

MAY 14 1925

Serge Koussevitzky has had his contract as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra extended to May, 1926. It is reported that a third year may be added to his tenure if he so desires.

---

entrance

Herald May 14

TONIGHT AT "THE POPS"

The "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight will be dedicated to Northeastern University, but will be in every sense a public occasion. The program follows:

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Abu Hassan"......Weber
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"..............Verdi
Danse Macabre..............Saint-Saens
Spanish Serenade.............Glazounov
Indian Summer, an American Idyl
Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Northern Rhapsody ....Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".......Waldteufel
March, "Northeastern"............Speare

Monitor May 14

Tonight at the "Pops"

NORTHEASTERN UNIVERSITY NIGHT

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ....Meyerbeer
Overture to "Abu Hassan"..Weber
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
"Danse Macabre" ......Saint-Saëns
Spanish Serenade ....Glazounoff
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl ....Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....
Tschaikowsky
Northern Rhapsody ....Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" ....
Waldteufel
March, "Northeastern" .....Speare

Advertiser May 14

NORTHEASTERN TO ATTEND POP CONCERT

Northeastern University students will occupy a large section of seats at tonight's Pop Concert in Symphony Hall, but the public will also be admitted. The program follows:

Coronation March, "The Prophet"..Meyerbeer
Overture, "Abu Hassan" ....Weber
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Danse Macabre .... Saint-Saens
Spanish Serenade .... Glazounov
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Overture, "1812" ....Tchaikovsky
Northern Rhapsody .... Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
March, "Northeastern" .... Speare

American May 14

"POPS" CONCERT IS FOR NORTHEASTERN

The "Pops" concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be dedicated to Northeastern University. The program.

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Abu Hassan" ....Weber
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
Danse Macabre ....Saint-Saens
Spanish Serenade ....Glazounov
Indian Summer, An American Idyl
Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tchaikovsky
Northern Rhapsody..................Hosmer
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"........Waldeeufel
March, "Northeastern"..............Speare

WHEELING
W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER

MA 5 1925

PRESENTS OUR MUSIC ABROAD

KOUSSEVITZKY, BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER, TAKES AMERICAN SCORES TO PARIS.

WILL PRESENT PROGRAMS OF MODERN MUSIC ABROAD—RETURNS IN SEPTEMBER.

Music lovers will be interested in the fact that Koussevitzky, the bass viol virtuoso and leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra the past year, is introducing some of our American music to Paris and London.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores of young American composers to introduce abroad. They are: Deems Taylors' suite—"Through The Looking Glass"; Henry Eichheim's, "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris program will consist entirely of modern music.

The Europeans have paid little attention thus far to our music here. They feel that we are too commercialized, too imbued with the hustle and rush of our lives to have time to create anything much worth while.

Advertiser May 16

MAINE DAUGHTERS AT POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At tonight's Pop Concert at Symphony Hall the Massachusetts Daughters of Maine will be strongly represented. The program follows:

March, "Greeting to Bangor" ....R. B. H
Overture, "Oberon" .... Web
Fachem .... Manna-Zuc
Fantasia, "Carmen" .... Biz
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grie
Intermezzo, "Manon Lescaut" .....Puccin
Contra-Dance No. 1 .... Beethove
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagne
Morche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
"The Lark" .... Glinka-Jacchia
Waltz, "The Sirens" ....Walteufel

Monitor May 15

Tonight at the "Pops"

MAINE NIGHT

March, "Greeting to Bangor,"
R. B. Hall
Overture to "Oberon".......Weber
Rachem (Invocation)..Manna-Zucca
(Orchestrated by A. Jacchia)
Fantasia from "Carmen".....Bizet
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood
(b) In the King's Grotto
Intermezzo from "Manon Lescaut" ....Puccini
Contra-Dance No. 1.....Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries......Wagner
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
"The Lark" ....Glinka-Jacchia
Waltz, "The Sirens"....Waldteufel

---

serious.

Herald May 16

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

Tonight's "Pop" concert in Symphony hall will be open to the public, although a large number of the Massachusetts Daughters of Maine will be present. The program follows:

March, "Greeting to Bangor"......R. B. Hall
Overture to "Oberon"....................Weber
Rachem (Invocation)...............Manna-Zucca
(Orchestrated by A. Jacchia)
Fantasia from "Carmen"....................Bizet
Suite, "Peer Gynt"........................Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) In the Troll King's Grotto.
Intermezzo from "Manon Lescaut".....Puccini
Contra-Dance No. 1..................Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries...................Wagner
Marche Slave....................Tchaikovsky
"The Lark"......................Glinka-Jacchia
Waltz, "The Sirens"...............Waldteufel

At the Pops Tonigh

"Maine Night"

March, "Greeting to Bangor".....Hall
Overture, "Oberon" ....Weber
Rachem ....Manna-Zucca-Jacchia
Fantasia from "Carmen"..........Bizet
Morning Mood and The Troll-King's Grotto from the Incidental Music to "Peer Gynt" ....Grieg Intermezzo from "Manon Lescaut".
Puccini
Contra-Dance, No. 1 ....Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyrs..............Wagner
Slavic March ....Chaikovsky
The Lark ....Glinka-Jacchia
Waltz, "The Sirens"........Waldteufel

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

Transcript May 1

104

~~TELEGRAM~~ May 16

"POPS TONIGHT"

1—"Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov; 2—Overture, "The Fair Melusine," Mendelssohn; 3—Jota from the Suite, "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; 4—Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; 5—Fantasia, "Fedora," Giordano; 6, Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov! 7—"Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia, solotrumpet—Georges Mager; 8—Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; 9—Scenes Pittoresques, Massenet: (a) "Air de Ballet," (b) "Angelus," (c) "Fete Boheme"; 10—"Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; 11, "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

~~TRAVELER~~ MAY 16

THIRD WEEK OF "POPS"

The "Pop" concerts at Symphony hall will enter their third week next Monday. This institution is having one of its most flourishing seasons and affirming for the 40th time its felicitous blend of appealing music finely performed and the sociability and refreshments which abound at the tables covering the floor of Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will present novelties and old favorites on each program of the week. Wednesday will bring an all-Russian program, Thursday a representation of three colleges, Amherst, Williams, Wesleyan, and Sunday, May 24, the second Sunday concert of the season with a symphonic program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Eve. Public Ledger

MAY 16 1925

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

THE relation of the soloist to the great symphony orchestras has materially changed during the last ten years or so. As a matter of fact this change began a much longer time ago than this, but it has become more accentuated since the World War, which, I believe, had a good deal to do with it.

When the great orchestras of the United States first came into being, it was taken as an axiom by the managements, that audiences of any size could not be attracted to the concerts to hear an entire program of orchestral music and that, perforce, a great soloist was required to insure an attendance of reasonable dimensions. This was the hey-day of the soloist, but be it said to their credit that there was, at that time, no attempt to "boost" the price of performance to an excessive figure. This came later and it still remains with us. Herein the war played an important part.

Those who remember the early years of the Philadelphia Orchestra will also remember that there were few concerts in those days without a soloist. Thus, in the season of 1906-07, to take one at random, there were twenty soloists in twenty pairs of concerts and this was by no means an exceptional season in the matter of soloists. In those days the soloist was considered a necessity to the success of the orchestra.

THIS situation was by no means peculiar to Philadelphia. It existed in every city in the country which maintained a permanent symphony orchestra—then not more than three or four. The Boston Symphony seemed to consider it important to bring a distinguished soloist on every visit to Philadelphia, as did the New York Philharmonic, which then had a series here and every other big orchestra. The same policy existed for these orchestras at home.

If I remember correctly, it was with considerable trepidation that the Philadelphia Orchestra first decided to go through a season with five pairs of purely orchestral concerts. There was some "kicking" of course; what musical innovation was eved made without some recalcitrants rising up to declare a policy entirely wrong? But it proved successful and this course was materially aided by the policy of the soloists themselves in demanding an undue share of the receipts of the house for playing.

Of course, the fundamental reason behind the success of this change was that the audiences had become initiated into the beauties of orchestral music and had begun to appreciate the gigantic musical thoughts which the masters of the symphonic composition have expressed in the orchestral idiom. As this change continued in the minds of the audience and as appreciation of orchestral music grew in popularity the soloist, no matter how great, was no longer needed to fill the house.

HAD any one said fifteen years ago that the Philadelphia Orchestra would go through the season of 1924-25 without a single vocal soloist, he would have been deemed a fit subject for an insanity commission. But this is just what occurred this season, and what is even more significant, no one appeared to notice the fact. This simply goes to show the constantly diminishing power of the soloist as a symphony concert attraction, or rather necessity.

The Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the first to introduce a large proportion of purely orchestral concerts each season, but the others have followed this example. During the season just closed the Boston Orchestra had eleven soloists in twenty-four pairs of concerts and the Chicago Orchestra had sixteen in twenty-eight pairs. But the orchestras which have a lesser number of concerts still hold to the soloist idea. Thus, Cincinnati, with fourteen pairs, had soloists at ten of them, Cleveland had thirteen soloists in eighteen pairs and Detroit had fourteen soloists in sixteen pairs.

This general situation, as shown especially in Philadelphia and Boston, represents a healthful condition for the orchestras. When they are able to fill the houses with purely orchestral programs, there need be little fear for the future of the organizations. And the beauty of this condition is that orchestral music, next to chamber music, grows in popular appreciation year by year among those who really follow and accept its message.

AT THE same time, there is a distinct place for the soloist in orchestral concerts. First, some of the greatest of the world's musical thoughts have been expressed in the concerto form, and, second, many of the concertos exhibit the capabilities (and it must also be said, at times, the limitations) of the great solo instruments in a manner which is impossible in any other form.

Take, for example, such works as the Beethoven and Brahms concertos for violin and the Schumann concerto for piano in the first classification. There are few greater works in existence from the standpoint of musical thought than these three, and while they are perhaps the greatest, still they do not by any means stand alone in this respect. As owing the capabilities of an instrument take the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the most violinistic of them all, r the principal virtuoso concertos, uch as the F-sharp minor of Ernst, he Paganini or the Joachim Hungarian oncerto for the violin and the two Liszt concertos for the piano.

These are all works well worth hearing every year—provided the caliber of the soloist matches that of the composition, which, in late years, has not always been the case in Philadelphia. The violinists capable of really interpreting the Brahms and the Beethoven concertos can be counted on the fingers of one hand with a digit or two left over, and, despite the number of pianists on the concert stage, the same thing might almost be said of the Schumann.

THE attitude of the soloists themselves has had an important bearing upon this lessened demand for their services with the great orchestras. The price of orchestral soloists like everything else went up enormously some years ago and among the greatest ones it has never come down. It is only about two years ago that Dr. Walter Damrosch told me that he was no longer able, because of financial reasons, to engage one of the very greatest of them all and the other orchestras have had the same experience. For some years, as far as I know, this wonderful artist has not played with any of the great orchestras.

The viewpoint of any extremely successful soloist is that he cannot afford to play for less than the prohibitive fee which he demands. To fill a concert engagement with an orchestra requires three days of time, one for rehearsal and two for the concerts. In the same space he can play three recital engagements and make considerably more out of them than he can possibly get from an orchestra, because he can fill the house in every city where he plays. And the great artist to whom I refer is not alone in this enviable position. There are others, although not a great many.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

~~TRANSCRIPT~~ MAY 16

Progress of The Pops — Mr. Jacchia Freshens Programs — A "Symphony Night"—Belated Recitals

A WEEK from tomorrow evening, on Sunday, May 24, there will be an interesting experiment at the Pops—a concert of symphonic music, almost any item of which might stand on Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. True, no symphony will be played from beginning to end, but fragments of three have place—the Andante in Beethoven's Fifth; the Minuet from Haydn's in D major of the London series; the second movement of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"; while next of kin is the Finale from Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Add to these numbers Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride"; Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody"; Respighi's arrangement of three old Italian dances—and a truly symphonic program emerges. If the public responds to it, especially on a spring Sunday, The Pops will indeed be doing a new office.

Throughout next week, moreover, Mr. Jacchia is freshening his programs. On Monday appears Casella's resplendent arrangement for orchestra of Balakirev's "Islamey"; Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," the closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde." On Tuesday Goldmark's Overture, "Sakountala," and the March Movement from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will return. A Russian program will fill Wednesday evening with the prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantchina"; a fragment of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird"; the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Russlan and Ludmilla"; a suite from Glazunov's ballet, "Raymonda"—all relatively novel pieces. On Thursday—"Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan night"—there is room for three dances from Massenet's opera, "The Cid," and the Finale of Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. The program of Friday will run familiar course, save for Sibelius's little tone-poem of spring-melancholy; while on Saturday stands the usual assemblage of "taking" numbers.

~~TRAVELER~~ MAY 16

o Play American Music in Paris

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphpony orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

Koussetvitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony, also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the 10th anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open the next Boston Symphony orchestra season in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

TONIGHT'S "POPS"

The "Pops" program at Symphony Hall tonight will be as follows:

Procession of the Sardar....Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture, "The Fair Melusine"..Mendelssohn
Jota from the Suite, "Hispana,"
Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszzt
Fantasia, "Fedora"................Giordano
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee,"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager
Overture to "Rienza"..............Wagner
Scenes Pittoresques..............Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Angelus. c. Fete Boheme.
"Love's Dream After the Ball"....Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators".......Fucik

AMERICAN May 16

NEW YORK

TELEGRAM

MAY 16 1925

League of Composers Plans Largely.

Announcing for next season three concerts of "modern chamber orchestra music," the League of Composers is preparing a program of a scope unprecendented in all its useful career. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first concert; Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, the second; the conductor for the third has not yet been selected.

The Koussevitzky concert will take place in November. The Boston leader will direct an ensemble of picked men from his orchestra in a program of first performances of new work by Europeans and Americans. The occasion will provide Mr. Koussevitzky his first appearance here not in the regular course of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Mengelberg concert occuring late in December, will feature a marionette opera, "El Retablo de Maese Pedro," by Manuel de Falla. This recent work of the Spanish composer, whose early opera "La Vida Breve" is on the Metropolitan schedule for next season, will be presented "with full puppet regalia, with marionettes of two sizes, and marionette staging, the singers taking their place in the orchestra."

For the instrumental part Mr. Mengelberg will have at his disposal a group of players from the Philharmonic and Mme. Wanda Landowska, the noted harpsichordist. Needless to point out, this performance will be an American "premiere." The little work was given first in Seville and shortly afterward in Paris at the house of the Princesse Edmond de Polignac, to whom the score is dedicated. The subject is taken from "Don Quixote."

The third program of "chamber orchestral music," which is now being worked out, is to be given in February. The League will begin its season in October with a "recital of new chamber music," whose plans are shortly to be made public. Four issues of the League's magazine, "Modern Music," are promised for October, December, February and April.

PITTS SANBORN.

NEWARK

NEW JERSEY

EVENING NEWS

MAY 16 1925

* * *

General Musical Notes.

Serge Koussevitzky, having closed his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has gone to Europe, where he will spend the summer. Last Monday he began a series of concerts in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Next Thursday he resumes his concerts in Paris, where he became so popular during the last few summers that the manner in which he was acclaimed there was largely responsible for his engagement by the management of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to Parisians three scores by young American composers. They are Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eicheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony. He will return to Boston early in September to resume his duties there.

Under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course in Montclair Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra appeared in the mountain town last September prior to opening their series of concerts in New York. The ability shown by him in directing the performances stamped him as one of the great conductors of today. His work during the season in Boston and New York strengthened the impression then formed.

THE POPS TONIGHT.

The following program will be heard at the Pops tonight in Symphony Hall:

Procession of the Sardar ... Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture, "The Fair Melusine"..Mendelssohn
Jota from "Hispana" ..... Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia "Fedora" .... Giordano
Scherzo, "Bumble Bee"..Rimsky-Korsakov
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Ja$cchia
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager
Overture, "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Scenes Pittoresques .... Massenet
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ...Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators" ...... Fucik

ADVERTISER May 16

MONITOR MAY 16

Tonight at the "Pops"

"Procession of the Sardar".....
Ippo'itoff-Ivanoff
Overture, "The Fair Melusine,"
Mendelssohn
Jota from the Suite "Hispaña,"
Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
Fantasia, "Fedora" ......Giordano
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Eili, Eili"....Arranged by Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi"......Wagner
"Scènes Pittoresques" ....Massenet
(a) Air de Ballet (b) Angelus
(c) Fête Bohème
"Love's Dream After the Ball,"
Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators"..Fucik

NEW YORK

POST

16 1925

New Chamber Music by Composers' League

Koussevitzky and Mengelberg Among Next Season's Conductors

THREE CONCERTS of modern chamber orchestral music will be given next season by the League of Composers. The first is to be conducted by Serge oussevitsky, the second by Willem Menelberg, with Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists. There will e in addition one recital of new chamber usic and four issues of the league's gazine, which will be known in future Modern Music.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who appears by perssion of the officers and trustees of the oston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct program of first performances of works Europeans and Americans. This will his first appearance here that is not nected with a performance of the Bos organization. The concert will take e in November. The ensemble will con of picked men from the Boston Symny Orchestra.

e concert under Mr. Mengelberg's dion will feature 'El Retablo," Manuel alla's marionette opera. Mr. Mengel appearing by permission of the Board irectors of the Philharmonic Society, ead a group of players from the orra of that organization. Mme. Lanka will play the harpsichord for this which will be given its American ere. This miniature opera, dealing an episode in the life of Don Quixote, een made famous in Europe through tage performances given by the es de Polignac, to whom it is dediand by subsequent concert hearings. be presented by the League with ppet regalia with marionettes of es and marionette staging, the aking their place with the orches concert will be heard late in er.

third program of chamber or[illegible]esic, details of which are now [illegible]ng will be given in February. The [illegible] its season in October it, [illegible] music, the plans [illegible] useful [illegible] music [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

JOURNAL

16 1925

PUPPET OPERA TO BE GIVEN PREMIERE

Composers' League to Produce de Falla's "El Retablo"—Other Notes on Music.

The League of Composers, one of the two g[illegible]ups devoted to the performance [illegible]ntemporary music, makes a nu[illegible] of interesting announcemen[illegible] its next season. One of th[illegible]f of these is the promised p[illegible]d[illegible]ction of the best known Spaniard of the day, Manuel de Falla's marionette opera, "El Retablo." It deals with an episode from "Don Quixote," the unfailing source of so much Spanish art.

It has been done in Europe with successful effect, but has not yet been heard here. The League will present it with the full marionette staging and with the small orchestra it calls for, under the direction of Willem Mengelberg, conductor of the Philharmonic. Wanda Landowska [illegible]ill play the important harpsi[illegible] part. The perform[illegible] an[illegible]ed for next December [illegible] two concerts planned by [illegible] will be given in Oct[illegible] February. The first wil[illegible] by Serge Koussevit[illegible] or of the Boston Symphon[illegible]estra, and ~~will con~~sist of n[illegible]usic for chamber orchestra—picked men from the Boston band. Plans for the third programme have not yet been completed.

The League's publication, The League of Composers' Review, will henceforth [illegible] known as Modern Music, and w[illegible]e issued bi-monthly during the co[illegible] music season.

104

TELEGRAM MAY 16

"POPS TONIGHT"

1—"Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov; 2—Overture, "The Fair Melusine," Mendelssohn; 3—Jota from the Suite, "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; 4—Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; 5—Fantasia, "Fedora," Giordano; 6, Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov! 7—"Elli, Elli," arranged by Jacchia, solotrumpet—Georges Mager; 8—Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; 9—Scenes Pittoresques, Massenet: (a) "Air de Ballet," (b) "Angelus," (c) "Fete Boheme"; 10—"Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; 11, "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

~~TRAVELER~~ MAY 16

THIRD WEEK OF "POPS"

The "Pop" concerts at Symphony hall will enter their third week next Monday. This institution is having one of its most flourishing seasons and affirming for the 40th time its felicitous blend of appealing music finely performed and the sociability and refreshments which abound at the tables covering the floor of Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will present novelties and old favorites on each program of the week. Wednesday will bring an all-Russian program, Thursday a representation of three colleges, Amherst, Williams, Wesleyan, and Sunday, May 24, the second Sunday concert of the season with a symphonic program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

MAY 16 1925

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

THE relation of the soloist to the great symphony orchestras has materially changed during the last ten years or so. As a matter of fact this change began a much longer time ago than this, but it has become more accentuated since the World War, which, I believe, had a good deal to do with it.

When the great orchestras of the United States first came into being, it was taken as an axiom by the managements, that audiences of any size could not be attracted to the concerts to hear an entire program of orchestral music and that, perforce, a great soloist was required to insure an attendance of reasonable dimensions. This was the hey-day of the soloist, but be it said to their credit that there was, at that time, no attempt to "boost" the price of performance to an excessive figure. This came later and it still remains with us. Herein the war played an important part.

Those who remember the early years of the Philadelphia Orchestra will also remember that there were few concerts in those days without a soloist. Thus, in the season of 1906-07, to take one at random, there were twenty soloists in twenty pairs of concerts and this was by no means an exceptional season in the matter of soloists. In those days the soloist was considered a necessity to the success of the orchestra.

THIS situation was by no means peculiar to Philadelphia. It existed in every city in the country which maintained a permanent symphony orchestra—then not more than three or four. The Boston Symphony seemed to consider it important to bring a distinguished soloist on every visit to Philadelphia, as did the New York Philharmonic, which then had a series here and every other big orchestra. The same policy existed for these orchestras at home.

If I remember correctly, it was with considerable trepidation that the Philadelphia Orchestra first decided to go through a season with five pairs of purely orchestral concerts. There was some "kicking" of course; what musical innovation was eved made without some recalcitrants rising up to declare a policy entirely wrong? But it proved successful and this course was materially aided by the policy of the soloists themselves in demanding an undue share of the receipts of the house for playing.

Of course, the fundamental reason behind the success of this change was that the audiences had become initiated into the beauties of orchestral music and had begun to appreciate the gigantic musical thoughts which the masters of the symphonic composition have expressed in the orchestral idiom. As this change continued in the minds of the audience and as appreciation of orchestral music grew in popularity the soloist, no matter how great, was no longer needed to fill the house.

HAD any one said fifteen years ago that the Philadelphia Orchestra would go through the season of 1924-25 without a single vocal soloist, he would have been deemed a fit subject for an insanity commission. But this is just what occurred this season, and what is even more significant, no one appeared to notice the fact. This simply goes to show the constantly diminishing power of the soloist as a symphony concert attraction, or rather necessity.

The Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the first to introduce a large proportion of purely orchestral concerts each season, but the others have followed this example. During the season just closed the Boston Orchestra had eleven soloists in twenty-four pairs of concerts and the Chicago Orchestra had sixteen in twenty-eight pairs. But the orchestras which have a lesser number of concerts still hold to the soloist idea. Thus, Cincinnati, with fourteen pairs, had soloists at ten of them, Cleveland had thirteen soloists in eighteen pairs and Detroit had fourteen soloists in sixteen pairs.

This general situation, as shown especially in Philadelphia and Boston, represents a healthful condition for the orchestras. When they are able to fill the houses with purely orchestral programs, there need be little fear for the future of the organizations. And the beauty of this condition is that orchestral music, next to chamber music, grows in popular appreciation year by year among those who really follow and accept its message.

AT THE same time, there is a distinct place for the soloist in orchestral concerts. First, some of the greatest of the world's musical thoughts have been expressed in the concerto form, and, second, many of the concertos exhibit the capabilities (and it must also be said, at times, the limitations) of the great solo instruments in a manner which is impossible in any other form.

Take, for example, such works as the Beethoven and Brahms concertos for violin and the Schumann concerto for piano in the first classification. There are few greater works in existence from the standpoint of musical thought than these three, and while they are perhaps the greatest, still they do not by any means stand alone in this respect. As owing the capabilities of an instrument take the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the most violinistic of them all, r the principal virtuoso concertos, uch as the F-sharp minor of Ernst, he Paganini or the Joachim Hungarian oncerto for the violin and the two Liszt concertos for the piano.

These are all works well worth hearing every year—provided the caliber of the soloist matches that of the composition, which, in late years, has not always been the case in Philadelphia. The violinists capable of really interpreting the Brahms and the Beethoven concertos can be counted on the fingers of one hand with a digit or two left over, and, despite the number of pianists on the concert stage, the same thing might almost be said of the Schumann.

THE attitude of the soloists themselves has had an important bearing upon this lessened demand for their services with the great orchestras. The price of orchestral soloists like everything else went up enormously some years ago and among the greatest ones it has never come down. It is only about two years ago that Dr. Walter Damrosch told me that he was no longer able, because of financial reasons, to engage one of the very greatest of them all and the other orchestras have had the same experience. For some years, as far as I know, this wonderful artist has not played with any of the great orchestras.

The viewpoint of any extremely successful soloist is that he cannot afford to play for less than the prohibitive fee which he demands. To fill a concert engagement with an orchestra requires three days of time, one for rehearsal and two for the concerts. In the same space he can play three recital engagements and make considerably more out of them than he can possibly get from an orchestra, because he can fill the house in every city where he plays. And the great artist to whom I refer is not alone in this enviable position. There are others, although not a great many

---

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

~~TRANSCRIPT~~ MAY 16

Progress of The Pops — Mr. Jacchia Freshens Programs — A "Symphony Night"—Belated Recitals

A WEEK from tomorrow evening, on Sunday, May 24, there will be an interesting experiment at the Pops—a concert of symphonic music, almost any item of which might stand on Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. True, no symphony will be played from beginning to end, but fragments of three have place—the Andante in Beethoven's Fifth; the Minuet from Haydn's in D major of the London series; the second movement of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"; while next of kin is the Finale from Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Add to these numbers Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride"; Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody"; Respighi's arrangement of three old Italian dances—and a truly symphonic program emerges. If the public responds to it, especially on a spring Sunday, The Pops will indeed be doing a new office.

Throughout next week, moreover, Mr. Jacchia is freshening his programs. On Monday appears Casella's resplendent arrangement for orchestra of Balakirev's "Islamey"; Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," the closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde." On Tuesday Goldmark's Overture, "Sakountala," and the March Movement from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will return. A Russian program will fill Wednesday evening with the prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantchina"; a fragment of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird"; the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Russlan and Ludmilla"; a suite from Glazunov's ballet, "Raymonda"—all relatively novel pieces. On Thursday—"Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan night"—there is room for three dances from Massenet's opera, "The Cid," and the Finale of Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. The program of Friday will run familiar course, save for Sibelius's little tone-poem of spring-melancholy; while on Saturday stands the usual assemblage of "taking" numbers.

~~TRAVELER~~ MAY 16

o Play American Music in Paris

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphpony orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

Koussetvitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony. Koussevitsky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony, also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the 10th anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open the next Boston Symphony orchestra season in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

TONIGHT'S "POPS"

The "Pops" program at Symphony Hall tonight will be as follows:

Procession of the Sardar....Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture, "The Fair Melusine"..Mendelssohn
Jota from the Suite, "Hispana,"
Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody............Liszzt
Fantasia, "Fedora"..................Giordano
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee,"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager
Overture to "Rienza"...............Wagner
Scenes Pittoresques.... ....Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Angelus. c. Fete Boheme.
"Love's Dream After the Ball"....Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators"........Fucik

AMERICAN MAY 16

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

MAY 16 1925

League of Composers Plans Largely.

Announcing for next season three concerts of "modern chamber orchestra music," the League of Composers is preparing a program of a scope unprecendented in all its useful career. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first concert; Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, the second; the conductor for the third has not yet been selected.

The Koussevitzky concert will take place in November. The Boston leader will direct an ensemble of picked men from his orchestra in a program of first performances of new work by Europeans and Americans. The occasion will provide Mr. Koussevitzky his first appearance here not in the regular course of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Mengelberg concert occuring late in December, will feature a marionette opera, "El Retablo de Maese Pedro," by Manuel de Falla. This recent work of the Spanish composer, whose early opera "La Vida Breve" is on the Metropolitan schedule for next season, will be presented "with full puppet regalia, with marionettes of two sizes, and marionette staging, the singers taking their place in the orchestra."

For the instrumental part Mr. Mengelberg will have at his disposal a group of players from the Philharmonic and Mme. Wanda Landowska, the noted harpsichordist. Needless to point out, this performance will be an American "premiere." The little work was given first in Seville and shortly afterward in Paris at the house of the Princesse Edmond de Polignac, to whom the score is dedicated. The subject is taken from "Don Quixote."

The third program of "chamber orchestral music," which is now being worked out, is to be given in February. The League will begin its season in October with a "recital of new chamber music," whose plans are shortly to be made public. Four issues of the League's magazine, "Modern Music," are promised for October, December, February and April.

PITTS SANBORN.

THE POPS TONIGHT.

The following program will be heard at the Pops tonight in Symphony Hall:

Procession of the Sardar ... Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture, "The Fair Melusine"..Mendelssohn
Jota from "Hispana" ..... Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia "Fedora" .... Giordano
Scherzo, "Bumble Bee"..Rimsky-Korsakov
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Ja$cchia
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager
Overture, "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Scenes Pittoresques .... Massenet
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ...Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators" ...... Fucik

ADVERTISER May 16

NEWARK
NEW JERSEY
EVENING NEWS
MAY 16 1925

General Musical Notes.

Serge Koussevitzky, having closed his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has gone to Europe, where he will spend the summer. Last Monday he began a series of concerts in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Next Thursday he resumes his concerts in Paris, where he became so popular during the last few summers that the manner in which he was acclaimed there was largely responsible for his engagement by the management of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to Parisians three scores by young American composers. They are Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eicheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony. He will return to Boston early in September to resume his duties there.

Under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course in Montclair Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra appeared in the mountain town last September prior to opening their series of concerts in New York. The ability shown by him in directing the performances stamped him as one of the great conductors of today. His work during the season in Boston and New York strengthened the impression then formed.

NEW YORK
POST

16 1925

New Chamber Music by Composers' League

Koussevitsky and Mengelberg Among Next Season's Conductors

THREE CONCERTS of modern chamber orchestral music will be given next season by the League of Composers. The first is to be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the second by Willem Men- elberg, with Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists. There will e in addition one recital of new chamber isic and four issues of the league's gazine, which will be known in future Modern Music.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who appears by per- ission of the officers and trustees of the oston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct program of first performances of works y Europeans and Americans. This will e his first appearance here that is not nnected with a performance of the Bos- on organization. The concert will take ace in November. The ensemble will con- st of picked men from the Boston Sym- ony Orchestra.

The concert under Mr. Mengelberg's di- ction will feature 'El Retablo," Manuel Falla's marionette opera. Mr. Mengel- g, appearing by permission of the Board Directors of the Philharmonic Society, ll lead a group of players from the or- estra of that organization. Mme. Lan- wska will play the harpsichord for this rk, which will be given its American miere. This miniature opera, dealing an episode in the life of Don Quixote, been made famous in Europe through stage performances given by the ess de Polignac, to whom it is dedi- l, and by subsequent concert hearings. ll be presented by the League with uppet regalia with marionettes of sizes and marionette staging, the s taking their place with the orches- he concert will be heard late in ber.

third program of chamber orches- sic, details of which are now being will be given in February. The en its season in October [illegible] chamber music, the plans play. [illegible] that [illegible] nced shortly. [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
16 1925

PUPPET OPERA TO BE GIVEN PREMIERE

Composers' League to Produce de Falla's "El Retablo"—Other Notes on Music.

The League of Composers, one of the two groups devoted to the performance [illegible] ntemporary music, makes a n[illegible] of interesting announcement[illegible] its next season. One of th[illegible] of these is the promised production of the best known Spaniard of the day, Manuel de Falla's marionette opera, "El Retablo." It deals with an episode from "Don Quixote," the unfailing source of so much Spanish art.

It has been done in Europe with successful effect, but has not yet been heard here. The League will present it with the full marionette staging and with the small orchestra it calls for, under the direction of Willem Mengelberg, conductor of the Philharmonic. Wanda Landowska [illegible] ill play the important harpsi[illegible] part. The perform[illegible] an[illegible] ned for next December [illegible] two concerts planned by [illegible] will be given in Oct[illegible] February. The first wil[illegible] by Serge Koussevit[illegible] or of the Boston Symphon[illegible] hestra, and ~~will con-~~ sist of n[illegible] usic for chamber orchestra—picked men from the Boston band. Plans for the third programme have not yet been completed.

The League's publication, The League of Composers' Review, will henceforth [illegible] known as Modern Music, and w[illegible] e issued bi-monthly during the co[illegible] music season.

MONITOR MAY 16

Tonight at the "Pops"

"Procession of the Sardar".....
Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture, "The Fair Melusine,"
Mendelssohn
Jota from the Suite "Hispaña,"
Stoessel-Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
Fantasia, "Fedora" ......Giordano
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Elli, Elli"....Arranged by Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi".......Wagner
"Scènes Pittoresques" ....Massenet
(a) Air de Ballet (b) Angelus
(c) Fête Bohème
"Love's Dream After the Ball,"
Czibulka
"Entrance of the Gladiators"..Fucik

CINCINATI,
OHI
INQUIER
MAY 17 1925

An Honest Opinion

Ernest Newman Discusses Mahler's Sojourn in America and the Opinions That the Great Director Formed During the Time That He Served With the Philharmonic Orchestra and Metropolitan Forces in New York—Clear Idea of the Foreigner's Reactions Expressed in Letters Recently Published.

By Ernest Newman.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE ENQUIRER.

New York, May 13.—Americans are mistrustful, and rightly so, of the European artist who goes to America with the sole intention of making the maximum of money in the minimum of time and with the minimum of effort, and, having done so, and enjoyed the generous hospitality and the amenities of American life, returns to Europe and then, from a safe distance, bites the hand that feeds him. Like all other hosts, Americans like to know what their departed guests really think of them in their heart of hearts. Perhaps the quickest way of finding that out is to get hold of the guest's letters that were written during his American sojourn and with no idea that they would ever be published. In these, at any rate, the real man speaks and the real truth may be found. Mahler's letters have recently been published by the Paul Zsolnay Verlag, and from these the American musical public will be able to discover what the great conductor thought of it. The American letters occupy only the last hundred pages or so of a large volume, but they are important. In all his correspondence Mahler strikes one as being a truthful and honorable man; and not the slightest suspicion of flattery of America attaches to these letters.

In February, 1908, he writes to Mengelberg, telling him that an invitation will probably reach him (Mengelberg) to succeed Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Boston position," he says, "is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician cannot obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you cannot have any idea of this. Here in New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority. * * * It would be fine for me to know that you were near me. I shall probably spend the coming years also in America. I am quite ravished with the country, even though one's artistic satisfaction with the Metropolitan is only a very moderate quantity."

He gratefully acknowledges the support that is given him in New York, but feels that the results are not quite what he could have attained in Vienna with the same means. In February, 1908, he tells Paul Hammerschlag of a performance of "Don Giovanni" in which the singing was "almost unsurpassable" (Bonci and Mme. Sembrich were in the cast); yet, he says, "I longed for my Vienna production, that, I think, would have pleased Mozart better also. Were I young," he continues, "and had the energy that I squandered for ten years in Vienna, perhaps we could bring about here a situation that hovered before us as an ideal in Vienna—the elimination of every commercial motive, so fair are the conditioning factors here, and so limitless the means available. You have no doubt already heard that the stockholders offered me complete power of direction, and that I resolutely declined it. My views upon the nature of the whole institution are unchanged. Five years ago I should not have been able to resist such an enticement. The climate here, the people and the vast scale of everything please me immensely."

We learn, with a little astonishment, that his heart was in the concert room rather than the opera house. Too long a sojourn in the latter, he tells one correspondent, had been bad for him as a symphonic orchestrator; he often found, when rehearsing his own works, that he had unconsciously employed the scale of timbres of the theater, which are not those of the concert room. It was apparently early in 1908 that the incident occurred of which his widow speaks with a kind of awe in her preface: "He had experiences [in America] that must sound paradoxical to Europeans. Two ladies who had been present at a performance of 'Fidelio' under him decided on their way home that Mr. Mahler ought to have an orchestra of his own, and in 24 hours he had it." This was in 1908, apparently.

He was not altogether happy at this time, not because of America, but because, as some deeply interesting letters to Bruno Walter show, certain spiritual changes were going on in him common to most thoughtful artists as they near their fifties. His chief desire was to devote himself to composition; his health was not good, but work had become so much of a habit with him that only in exhausting work could he find any satisfaction. He feels that he is growing into a different man, "like Faust in the last scene." The outer world is becoming less and less real to him; his mind is taking a more and more metaphysical and mystical turn, and in music, even when he is conducting it, he finds the answer to his questions about the earth riddle.

He feels himself, spiritually, a beginner in a new world. A man in this condition is not likely to find anything in the external world to satisfy him, and so we are not surprised to hear him say: "My orchestra here (i e., his concert orchestra) is the genuine American orchestra, talentless and phlegmatic. * * * To have to start again at the beginning as conductor is very unpleasant for me. My only pleasure is the rehearsal of a work that I have not yet quite under my hands. Music making is still great fun to me. If I only had rather better musicians!"

He has his difficulties with the American immigration laws. He wants a certain orchestral player from Germany, but as the latter will be turned back if he comes with a contract in his pocket, he is to come to New York and live quietly for six months without breathing a hint of the engagement that is to be tacitly understood to be in the offing. "The public here," he says, "is very agreeable, and relatively much more decent than in Vienna. It listens attentively and is well disposed. The critics are just what they are everywhere. I read none of them, but have what they say reported to me. I recommend this procedure to you (i. e., Bruno Walter); these things sound less aggressive in this form."

In January, 1908, there was some question of his old friend, Alfred Roller, coming over from Vienna to take charge of certain departments at the Metropolitan. Mahler gives him a detailed account of the state of affairs there. The institution is in a bad way in consequence of long-continued incapacity of many of the people in authority. "The public and all the elements with which the artist is connected—not excluding the directors themselves (mostly multimillionaires)—are indeed spoiled (verboten) and mislead, but, in contrast to our people in Viennna * * * not blase, hungry for novelty, and in the highest degree anxious to learn." Conried had become "impossible." Mahler had been asked to take his place, but had refused. "The governors have the idea of making the present manager of the Scala the manager of the Metropolitan, and, for the Italian opera, to invite the very famous conductor Toscanini and to give the German operas to me." He has assured the authorities that before everything else the stage needs a new master, and that he knows only one man (Roller) "who, artistically as well as personally, can drag the cart out of the mire;" but for that he must have complete authority on the stage.

"Personally, I can tell you that here you will find the richest material and the noblest company—without intrigue, without bureaucratic nonsense; in a word, the finest circle of activity I could wish for you." * * * "The people here are tremendously vigorous; the rawness and the lack of training are only infantile troubles. The meanness and the mendacity are found only among our own dear countrymen who have settled here. The dollar does not govern here; it is easily learned. Only one thing is respected here—the power to will and to do. * * * Everything is big and sound, but spoiled by the immigrant pack."

One more extract must suffice. "We (i. e., he and his wife) have both had great pleasure in this country; the vigor, soundnes and straightness of everything are very attractive to us." We can understand "vigor, soundness and straightness" appealing to Mahler. They are the qualities that emerge from all his correspondence.

NEW YORK
TLEGRAPH
MAY 17 1925

Composers' League Arranges for Three Concerts Next Season

For the season of 1925-26 the League of Composers announces the most ambitious program of activities undertaken since its organization two years ago. There will be three concerts of modern chamber orchestral music. The first is to be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the second by Willem Mengelberg with Mme. Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists.

There will be in addition one recital of new chamber music, and four issues of the League's magazine, which will be known in future as Modern Music.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who appears by permission of the officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program of first performances of works by Europeans and Americans. This will be his first appearance here that is not connected with a performance of the Boston organization. The concert will take place in November. The ensemble will consist of picked men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert under Mr. Mengelberg's direction, will feature "El Retablo," Manuel de Falla's marionette opera. Mr. Mengelberg appearing by permission of the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society, will lead a group of players from the orchestra of that organization. Mme. Landowska will play the harpsichord for this work, which will be given its American premiere.

DETROIT, MICH.
~~TIMES~~
MAY 17 1925

Ernest Newman's Weekly Letter

Mahler's Letters Reveal Love For This Country

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

AMERICANS are mistrustful, and rightly so, of the European artist who goes to America with the sole intention of making the maximum of money in the minimum of time and with the minimum of effort, and, having done so, and enjoyed the generous hospitality and the amenities of American life, returns to Europe and then, from a safe distance, bites the hand that fed him. Like all other hosts, Americans like to know what their departed guests really think of them in their heart of hearts. Perhaps the quickest way of finding that out is to get hold of the guest's letters that were written during his American sojourn and with no idea that they would ever be published. In these, at any rate, the real man speaks and the real truth may be found. Mahler's letters have recently been published by the Paul Zsolnay Verlag, and from these the American musical public will be able to discover what the great conductor thought of it. The American letters occupy only the last hundred pages or so of a large volume, but they are important. In all his correspondence Mahler strikes one as being a truthful and honorable man; and not the slightest suspicion of flattery of America attaches to these letters.

* * *

In February, 1908, he writes to Mengelberg, telling him that an invitation will probably reach him (Mengelberg) to succeed Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Boston position," he says, "is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician can not obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you can not have any idea of this. Here in New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority. . . . It would be fine for me to know that you were near me. I shall probably spend the coming years also in America. I am quite ravished with the country, even though one's artistic satisfaction with the Metropolitan is only a very moderate quantity."

He gratefully acknowledges the support that is given him in New York, but feels that the results are not quite what he could have attained in Vienna with the same means. In February, 1908, he tells Paul Hammerschlag of a performance of "Don Giovanni" in which the singing was "almost unsurpassable" (Bonci and Mme. Sembrich were in the cast); yet, he says, "I longed for my Vienna production, that, I think, would have pleased Mozart better also. Were I young," he continues, "and had I the energy that I squandered for 10 years in Vienna, perhaps we could bring about here a situation that hovered before us as an ideal in Vienna—the elimination of every commercial motive, so fair are the conditioning factors here, and so limitless the [illegible] available. You have no doubt [illegible] heard that the stockholders offered me complete power of [illegible], and that I resolutely declined it. My views upon the nature of the whole institution are unchanged. Five years ago I should not have been able to resist such an enticement. The climate here, the people, and the vast scale of everything please me immensely."

* * *

He was not altogether happy at this time, not because of America, but because, as some deeply interesting letters to Bruno Walter show, certain spiritual changes were going on in him common to most thoughtful artists as they near their fifties. His chief desire was to devote himself to composit[illegible] his health was not good, but [illegible] had become so much of a habit that only in exhausting [illegible] he find any satisfaction [illegible] that he is growing into [illegible] man, "like Faust in the [illegible] The outer world is be[illegible] and less real to him; [illegible] taking a more and mor[illegible]sical turn, and in music, even when he is conducting it, he finds the answer to his questions about the earth riddle.

* * *

He feels himself, spiritually, a beginner in a new world. A man in this condition is not likely to find anything in the external world to satisfy him, and so we are not surprised to hear him say, "My orchestra here (i. e., his concert orchestra) is the genuine American orchestra, talentless and phlegmatic. . . . To have to start again at the beginning as conductor is very unpleasant for me. My only pleasure is the rehearsal of a work that I have not yet quite under my hands. Music-making is still great fun to me. If I only had rather better musicians."

He has his difficulties with the American immigration laws. He wants a certain orchestral player from Germany, but as the latter will be turned back if he comes with a contract in his pocket, he is to come to New York and live quietly for six months without breathing a hint of the engagement that is to be tacitly understood to be in the offing. "The public here," he says, "is very agreeable, and relatively much more decent than in Vienna. It listens attentively and is well disposed. The critics are just what they are everywhere. I read none of them, but have what they say reported to me. I recommend this procedure to you (i. e., Bruno Walter); these things sound less aggressive in this form."

* * *

In January, 1908, there was some question of his old friend Alfred Roller coming over from Vienna to take charge of certain departments at the Metropolitan. Mahler gives him a detailed account of the state of affairs there. The institution is in a bad way in consequence of the long-continued incapacity of many of the people in authority. "The public and all the elements with which the artist is connected—not excluding the directors themselves (mostly multimillionaires)—are indeed spoiled (verdorben) and misled, but, in contrast to our people in Vienna . . . not blase, hungry for novelty, and in the highest degree anxious to learn." Conried had become "impossible." Mahler had been asked to take his place, but had refused. "The governors have the idea of making the present manager of the Scala the manager of the Metropolitan, and, for the Italian opera, to invite the very famous conductor Toscanini, and to give the German operas to me." He has assured the authorities that before everything else the stage needs a new master, and that he knows only one man (Roller) "who, artistically as well as personally, can drag the cart out of the mire;" but for that he must have complete authority on the stage.

"Personally I can tell you that here you will find the richest material and the noblest company—without intrigue, without bureaucratic nonsense; in a word, the finest circle of activity I could wish for you." . . . "The people here are tremendously vigorous; the rawness and the lack of training are only infantile troubles. The meanness and the mendacity are found only among our own dear countrymen who have settled here. The dollar does not govern here; it is easily learned. Only one thing is respected here—the power to will and to do. . . . Everything is big and sound, but spoiled by the immigrant pack."

May 17 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the persisting Pops and a scattering of minor concerts the musical season of 1924-1925 is over and done with; and the time is now ripe to give it a retrospective and appraising glance.

So far as Boston is concerned the dominating figure of this year of music was Serge Koussevitzky, and the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his direction overtopped in interest all else, even the brilliant fortnight of the Chicago Civic Opera Company. But since the Symphony Concerts have already been summarized in these columns, we must now turn our attention to the recitalists, the chamber music organizations, the visiting opera companies and the singing societies.

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
MAY 17 1925

Serge Koussevitzky has taken three American orchestral scores for performance in his Paris series, which begins next Friday—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony.

By nationalities, the composers represented in Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston season stand: German, Austrian and Bohemian,15; French, 16; Russian, 11; Italian, 4; American, 6; English, 3; Spanish, 1. The Americans were Aaron Copland, Henry Eichheim, Arthur Foote, Henry Hadley, Edward B. Hill and Charles M. Loeffler.

GLOBE MAY 17

Music Notes and Comment

The Pop Concerts continue this week their successful course. Wednesday a Russian program will include an early and not overstartling specimen of Stravinsky, the berceuse from his "Firebird." Thursday is announced as Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan night. Seats are on sale to the general public for this and all other nights, however. Next Sunday evening the fortnightly Sunday Pops Concert offers an interesting symphonic program of which every number might and has figured on programs of the Boston Symphony concerts. Some day Mr Jacchia will attempt a whole symphony of the very popular order, Tchaikovsky's Fifth, Beethoven's Fifth, Schubert's "Unfinished," Dvorak's "New World," but up to the present he has not ventured beyond isolated movements from these and other popular symphonies.

CINCINATI, OHI
INQUIER
MAY 17 1925

An Honest Opinion

Ernest Newman Discusses Mahler's Sojourn in America and the Opinions That the Great Director Formed During the Time That He Served With the Philharmonic Orchestra and Metropolitan Forces in New York—Clear Idea of the Foreigner's Reactions Expressed in Letters Recently Published.

By Ernest Newman.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE ENQUIRER

New York, May 13.—Americans are mistrustful, and rightly so, of the European artist who goes to America with the sole intention of making the maximum of money in the minimum of time and with the minimum of effort, and, having done so, and enjoyed the generous hospitality and the amenities of American life, returns to Europe and then, from a safe distance, bites the hand that feeds him. Like all other hosts, Americans like to know what their departed guests really think of them in their heart of hearts. Perhaps the quickest way of finding that out is to get hold of the guest's letters that were written during his American sojourn and with no idea that they would ever be published. In these, at any rate, the real man speaks and the real truth may be found. Mahler's letters have recently been published by the Paul Zsolnay Verlag, and from these the American musical public will be able to discover what the great conductor thought of it. The American letters occupy only the last hundred pages or so of a large volume, but they are important. In all his correspondence Mahler strikes one as being a truthful and honorable man; and not the slightest suspicion of flattery of America attaches to these letters.

In February, 1908, he writes to Mengelberg, telling him that an invitation will probably reach him (Mengelberg) to succeed Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Boston position," he says, "is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician cannot obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you cannot have any idea of this. Here in New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority. * * * * It would be fine for me to know that you were near me. I shall probably spend the coming years also in America. I am quite ravished with the country, even though one's artistic satisfaction with the Metropolitan is only a very moderate quantity."

He gratefully acknowledges the support that is given him in New York, but feels that the results are not quite what he could have attained in Vienna with the same means. In February, 1908, he tells Paul Hammerschlag of a performance of "Don Giovanni" in which the singing was "almost unsurpassable" (Bonci and Mme. Sembrich were in the cast); yet, he says, "I longed for my Vienna production, that, I think, would have pleased Mozart better also. Were I young," he continues, "and had the energy that I squandered for ten years in Vienna, perhaps we could bring about here a situation that hovered before us as an ideal in Vienna—the elimination of every commercial motive, so fair are the conditioning factors here, and so limitless the means available. You have no doubt already heard that the stockholders offered me complete power of direction, and that I resolutely declined it. My views upon the nature of the whole institution are unchanged. Five years ago I should not have been able to resist such an enticement. The climate here, the people and the vast scale of everything please me immensely."

We learn, with a little astonishment, that his heart was in the concert room rather than the opera house. Too long a sojourn in the latter, he tells one correspondent, had been bad for him as a symphonic orchestrator; he often found, when rehearsing his own works, that he had unconsciously employed the scale of timbres of the theater, which are not those of the concert room. It was apparently early in 1908 that the incident occurred of which his widow speaks with a kind of awe in her preface: "He had experiences [in America] that must sound paradoxical to Europeans. Two ladies who had been present at a performance of 'Fidelio' under him decided on their way home that Mr. Mahler ought to have an orchestra of his own, and in 24 hours he had it." This was in 1908, apparently.

He was not altogether happy at this time, not because of America, but because, as some deeply interesting letters to Bruno Walter show, certain spiritual changes were going on in him common to most thoughtful artists as they near their fifties. His chief desire was to devote himself to composition; his health was not good, but work had become so much of a habit with him that only in exhausting work could he find any satisfaction. He feels that he is growing into a different man, "like Faust in the last scene." The outer world is becoming less and less real to him; his mind is taking a more and more metaphysical and mystical turn, and in music, even when he is conducting it, he finds the answer to his questions about the earth riddle.

He feels himself, spiritually, a beginner in a new world. A man in this condition is not likely to find anything in the external world to satisfy him, and so we are not surprised to hear him say: "My orchestra here (i. e., his concert orchestra) is the genuine American orchestra, talentless and phlegmatic. * * * To have to start again at the beginning as conductor is very unpleasant for me. My only pleasure is the rehearsal of a work that I have not yet quite under my hands. Music making is still great fun to me. If I only had rather better musicians!"

He has his difficulties with the American immigration laws. He wants a certain orchestral player from Germany, but as the latter will be turned back if he comes with a contract in his pocket, he is to come to New York and live quietly for six months without breathing a hint of the engagement that is to be tacitly understood to be in the offing. "The public here," he says, "is very agreeable, and relatively much more decent than in Vienna. It listens attentively and is well disposed. The critics are just what they are everywhere. I read none of them, but have what they say reported to me. I recommend this procedure to you (i. e., Bruno Walter); these things sound less aggressive in this form."

In January, 1908, there was some question of his old friend, Alfred Roller, coming over from Vienna to take charge of certain departments at the Metropolitan. Mahler gives him a detailed account of the state of affairs there. The institution is in a bad way in consequence of long-continued incapacity of many of the people in authority. "The public and all the elements with which the artist is connected—not excluding the directors themselves (mostly multimillionaires)—are indeed spoiled (verboten) and mislead, but, in contrast to our people in Viennna * * * not blase, hungry for novelty, and in the highest degree anxious to learn." Conried had become "impossible." Mahler had been asked to take his place, but had refused. "The governors have the idea of making the present manager of the Scala the manager of the Metropolitan, and, for the Italian opera, to invite the very famous conductor Toscanini and to give the German operas to me." He has assured the authorities that before everything else the stage needs a new master, and that he knows only one man (Roller) "who, artistically as well as personally, can drag the cart out of the mire;" but for that he must have complete authority on the stage.

"Personally, I can tell you that here you will find the richest material and the noblest company—without intrigue, without bureaucratic nonsense; in a word, the finest circle of activity I could wish for you." * * * "The people here are tremendously vigorous; the rawness and the lack of training are only infantile troubles. The meanness and the mendacity are found only among our own dear countrymen who have settled here. The dollar does not govern here; it is easily learned. Only one thing is respected here—the power to will and to do. * * * Everything is big and sound, but spoiled by the immigrant pack."

One more extract must suffice. "We (i. e., he and his wife) have both had great pleasure in this country; the vigor, soundnes and straightness of everything are very attractive to us." We can understand "vigor, soundness and straightness" appealing to Mahler. They are the qualities that emerge from all his correspondence.

NEW YORK
TLEGRAPH
MAY 17 1925

Composers' League Arranges for Three Concerts Next Season

For the season of 1925-26 the League of Composers announces the most ambitious program of activities undertaken since its organization two years ago. There will be three concerts of modern chamber orchestral music. The first is to be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the second by Willem Mengelberg with Mme. Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists.

There will be in addition one recital of new chamber music, and four issues of the League's magazine, which will be known in future as Modern Music.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who appears by permission of the officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program of first performances of works by Europeans and Americans. This will be his first appearance here that is not connected with a performance of the Boston organization. The concert will take place in November. The ensemble will consist of picked men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert under Mr. Mengelberg's direction, will feature "El Retablo," Manuel de Falla's marionette opera. Mr. Mengelberg appearing by permission of the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society, will lead a group of players from the orchestra of that organization. Mme. Landowska will play the harpsichord for this work, which will be given its American premiere.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
MAY 17 19

Ernest Newman's Weekly Letter

Mahler's Letters Reveal Love For This Country

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

AMERICANS are mistrustful, and rightly so, of the European artist who goes to America with the sole intention of making the maximum of money in the minimum of time and with the minimum of effort, and, having done so, and enjoyed the generous hospitality and the amenities of American life, returns to Europe and then, from a safe distance, bites the hand that fed him. Like all other hosts, Americans like to know what their departed guests really think of them in their heart of hearts. Perhaps the quickest way of finding that out is to get hold of the guest's letters that were written during his American sojourn and with no idea that they would ever be published. In these, at any rate, the real man speaks and the real truth may be found. Mahler's letters have recently been published by the Paul Zsolnay Verlag, and from these the American musical public will be able to discover what the great conductor thought of it. The American letters occupy only the last hundred pages or so of a large volume, but they are important. In all his correspondence Mahler strikes one as being a truthful and honorable man; and not the slightest suspicion of flattery of America attaches to these letters.

* * *

In February, 1908, he writes to Mengelberg, telling him that an invitation will probably reach him (Mengelberg) to succeed Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Boston position," he says, "is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician can not obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you can not have any idea of this. Here in New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority. . . . It would be fine for me to know that you were near me. I shall probably spend the coming years also in America. I am quite ravished with the country, even though one's artistic satisfaction with the Metropolitan is only a very moderate quantity."

He gratefully acknowledges the support that is given him in New York, but feels that the results are not quite what he could have attained in Vienna with the same means. In February, 1908, he tells Paul Hammerschlag of a performance of "Don Giovanni" in which the singing was "almost unsurpassable" (Bonci and Mme. Sembrich were in the cast); yet, he says, "I longed for my Vienna production, that, I think, would have pleased Mozart better also. Were I young," he continues, "and had I the energy that I squandered for 10 years in Vienna, perhaps we could bring about here a situation that hovered before us as an ideal i[illegible] Vienna—th[illegible] limination of every commercia[illegible]ive, so fair are the conditioni[illegible]actors here, and so limitless the [illegible]s available. You have no doubt [illegible]ady heard that the stockhold[illegible]ffered me complete power of [illegible]tion, and that I resolutely decl[illegible]ed it. My views upon the nature of the whole institution are unchanged. Five years ago I should not have been able to resist such an enticement. The climate here, the people, and the vast scale of everything plea[illegible] me immensely."

* * *

He was not altogether happy at this time, not because of America, but because, as some deeply interesting letters to Bruno Walter show, certain spiritual changes were going on in him common to most thoughtful artists as they near their fifties. His chief desire was to devote himself to compositi[illegible] his health was not good, but [illegible] become so much of a habit [illegible] that only in exhausting [illegible] he find any satisfaction [illegible] that he is growing into [illegible] man, "like Faust in the [illegible] The outer world is be[illegible] and less real to him; [illegible] taking a more and mor sical turn, and in music, even when he is conducting it, he finds the answer to his questions about the earth riddle.

* * *

He feels himself, spiritually, a beginner in a new world. A man in this condition is not likely to find anything in the external world to satisfy him, and so we are not surprised to hear him say, "My orchestra here (i. e., his concert orchestra) is the genuine American orchestra, talentless and phlegmatic. . . . To have to start again at the beginning as conductor is very unpleasant for me. My only pleasure is the rehearsal of a work that I have not yet quite under my hands. Music-making is still great fun to me. If I only had rather better musicians."

He has his difficulties with the American immigration laws. He wants a certain orchestral player from Germany, but as the latter will be turned back if he comes with a contract in his pocket, he is to come to New York and live quietly for six months without breathing a hint of the engagement that is to be tacitly understood to be in the offing. "The public here," he says, "is very agreeable, and relatively much more decent than in Vienna. It listens attentively and is well disposed. The critics are just what they are everywhere. I read none of them, but have what they say reported to me. I recommend this procedure to you (i. e., Bruno Walter); these things sound less aggressive in this form."

* * *

In January, 1908, there was some question of his old friend Alfred Roller coming over from Vienna to take charge of certain departments at the Metropolitan. Mahler gives him a detailed account of the state of affairs there. The institution is in a bad way in consequence of the long-continued incapacity of many of the people in authority. "The public and all the elements with which the artist is connected—not excluding the directors themselves (mostly multimillionaires)—are indeed spoiled (verdorben) and misled, but, in contrast to our people in Vienna . . . not blase, hungry for novelty, and in the highest degree anxious to learn." Conried had become "impossible." Mahler had been asked to take his place, but had refused. "The governors have the idea of making the present manager of the Scala the manager of the Metropolitan, and, for the Italian opera, to invite the very famous conductor Toscanini, and to give the German operas to me." He has assured the authorities that before everything else the stage needs a new master, and that he knows only one man (Roller) "who, artistically as well as personally, can drag the cart out of the mire;" but for that he must have complete authority on the stage.

"Personally I can tell you that here you will find the richest material and the noblest company—without intrigue, without bureaucratic nonsense; in a word, the finest circle of activity I could wish for you." . . . "The people here are tremendously vigorous; the rawness and the lack of training are only infantile troubles. The meanness and the mendacity are found only among our own dear countrymen who have settled here. The dollar does not govern here; it is easily learned. Only one thing is respected here—the power to will and to do. . . . Everything is big and sound, but spoiled by the immigrant pack."

May 17 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the persisting Pops and a scattering of minor concerts the musical season of 1924-1925 is over and done with; and the time is now ripe to give it a retrospective and appraising glance.

So far as Boston is concerned the dominating figure of this year of music was Serge Koussevitzky, and the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his direction overtopped in interest all else, even the brilliant fortnight of the Chicago Civic Opera Company. But since the Symphony Concerts have already been summarized in these columns, we must now turn our attention to the recitalists, the chamber music organizations, the visiting opera companies and the singing societies.

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
MAY 17 1925

Serge Koussevitzky has taken three American orchestral scores for performance in his Paris series, which begins next Friday—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's Symphony.

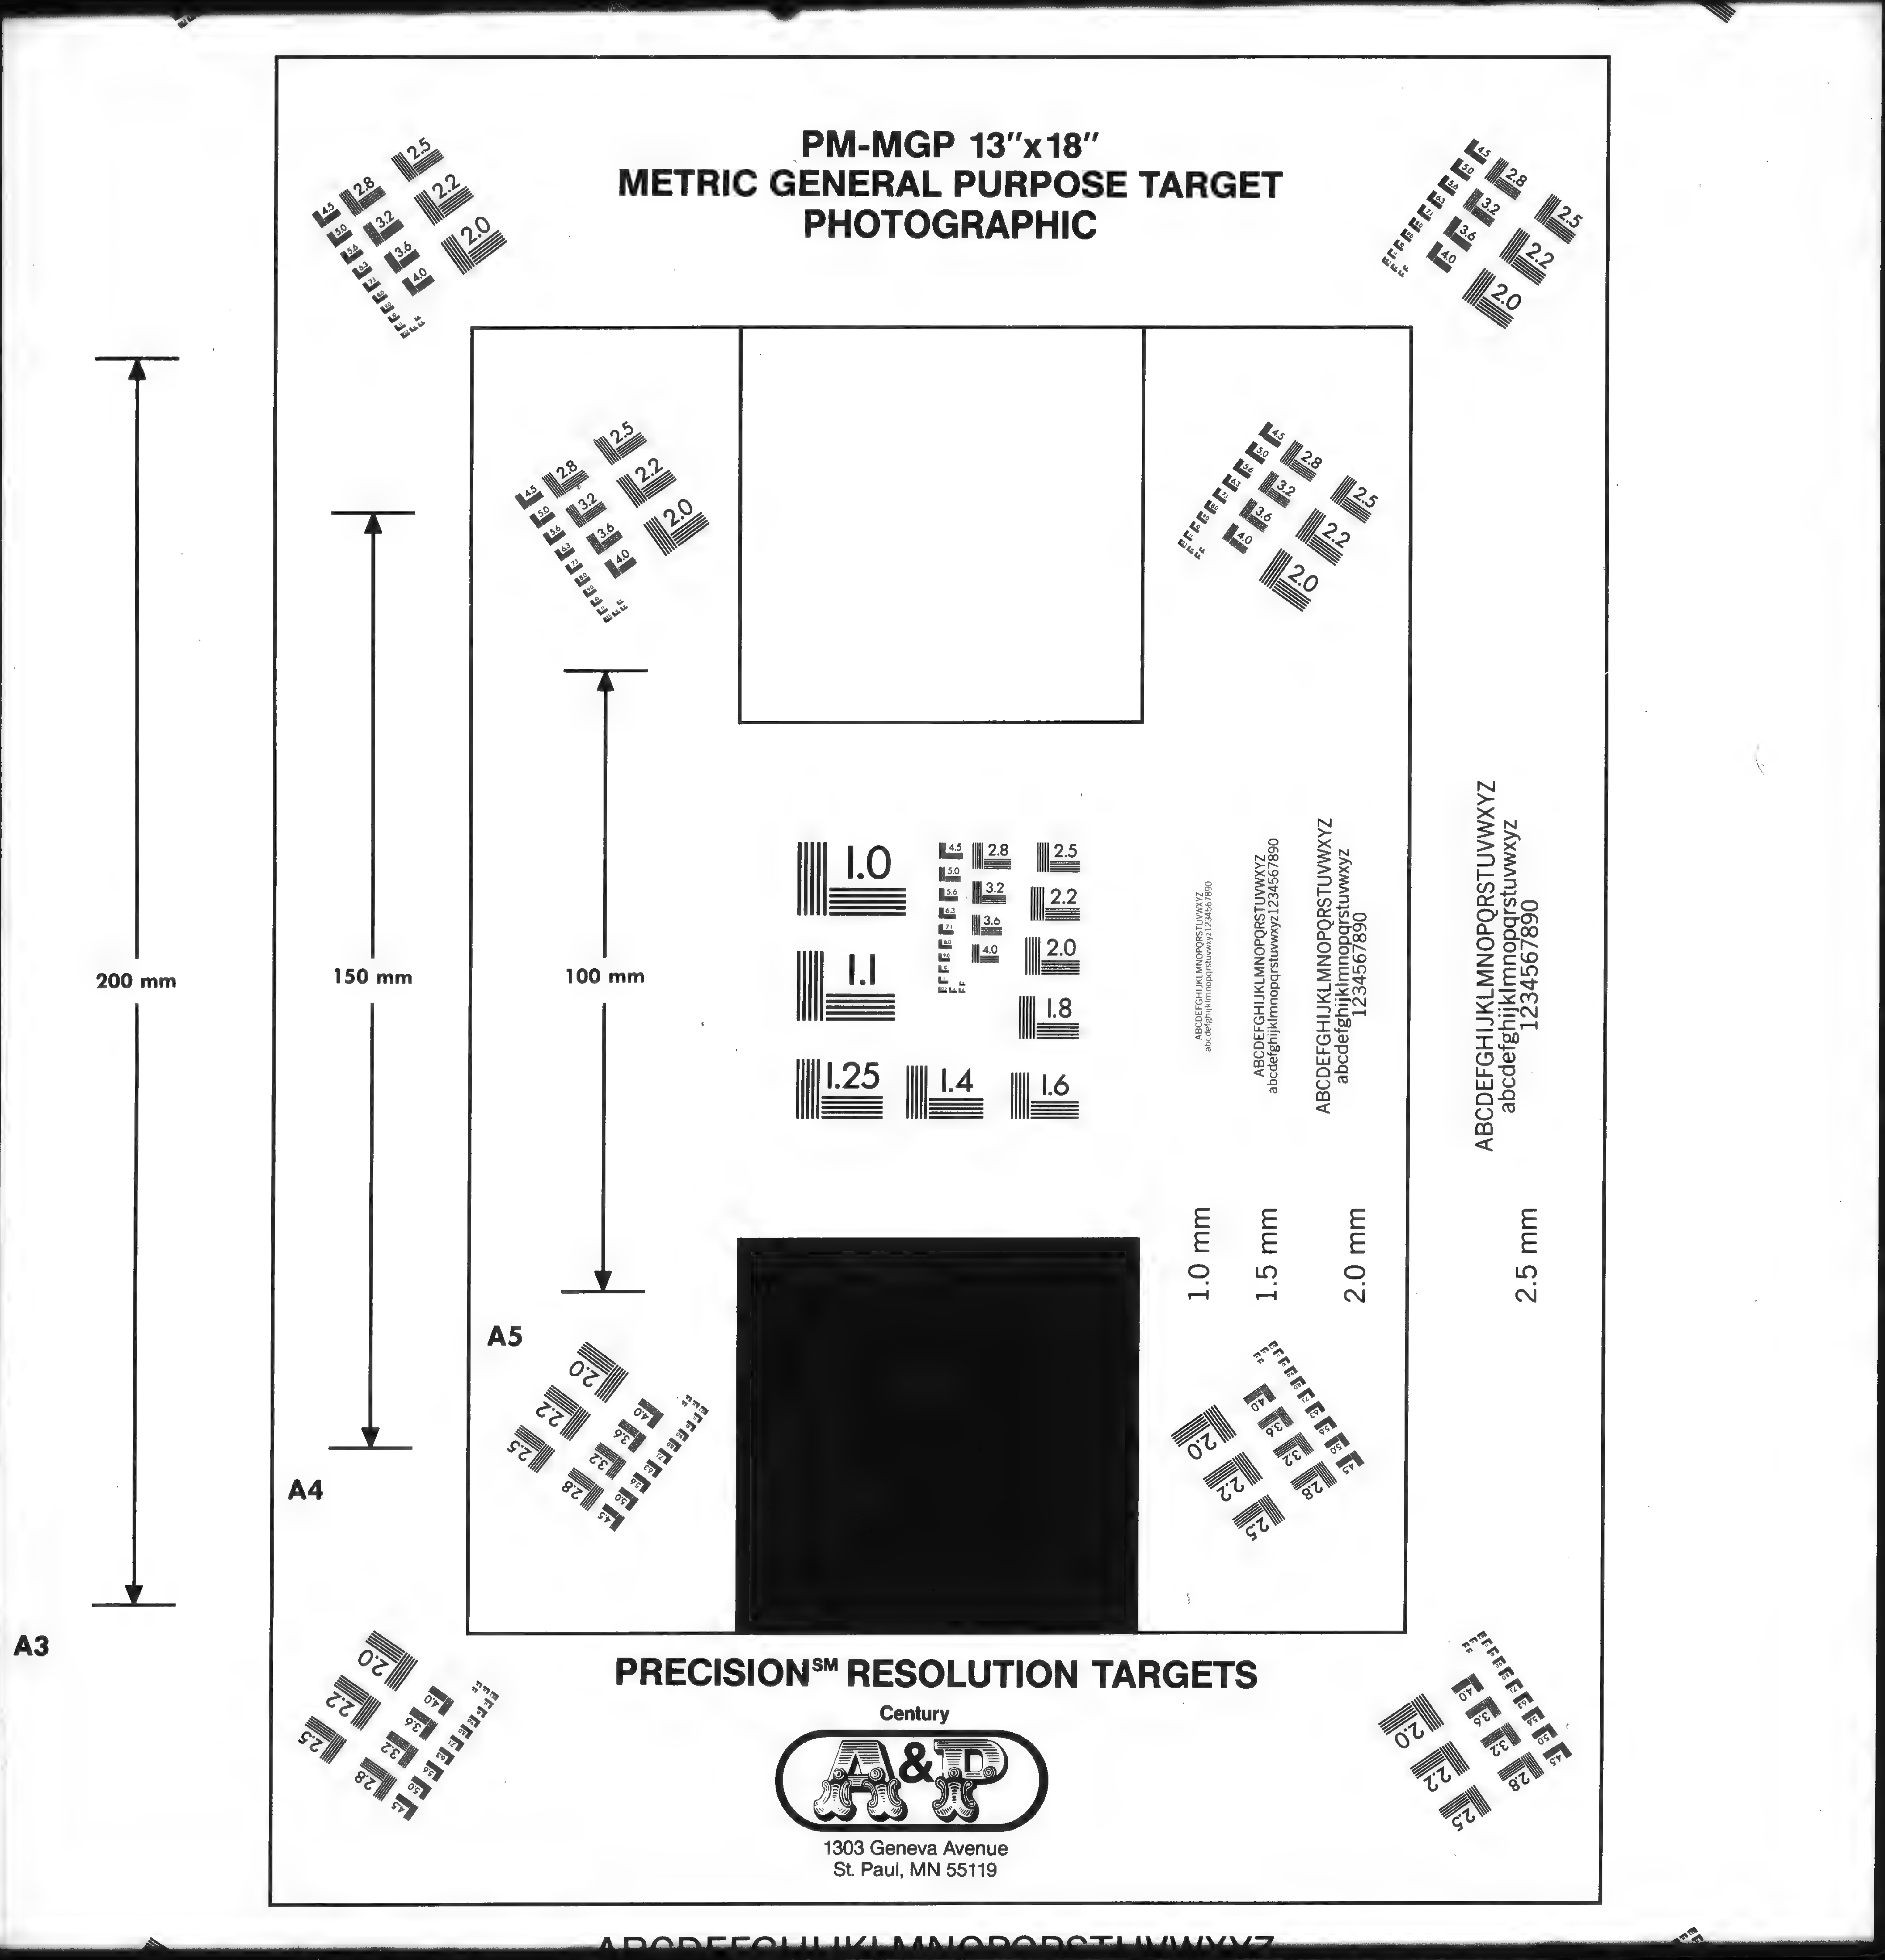
By nationalities, the composers represented in Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston season stand: German, Austria and Bohemian,15; French, 16; Russian, 11; Italian, 4; American, 6; English, 3; Spanish, 1. The Americans were Aaron Copland, Henry Eichheim, Arthur Foote, Henry Hadley, Edward B. Hill and Charles M. Loeffler.

GLOBE MAY 17

Music Notes and Comment

The Pop Concerts continue this week their successful course. Wednesday a Russian program will include an early and not overstartling specimen of Stravinsky, the berceuse from his "Firebird." Thursday is announced as Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan night. Seats are on sale to the general public for this and all other nights, however. Next Sunday evening the fortnightly Sunday Pops Concert offers an interesting symphonic program of which every number might and has figured on programs of the Boston Symphony concerts. Some day Mr Jacchia will attempt a whole symphony of the very popular order, Tchaikovsky's Fifth, Beethoven's Fifth, Schubert's "Unfinished," Dvorak's "New World," but up to the present he has not ventured beyond isolated movements from these and other popular symphonies.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x



PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
5.0
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

MAY 17 1925

Some Conductors of the Season in Retrospect

II.—Koussevitzky

By Lawrence Gilman

BOCCACCIO observed of Dante that "always he found room among his virtues for lechery." Matthew Arnold, regarding Boccaccio's phrase as unduly high-spirited, modified the vivacity but preserved at least the spare ribs of the thought when he said of Dante that "his conduct was exceedingly irregular." Reflecting upon Mr. Koussevitzky's achievements as a conductor during his first season in America, these comments upon the habits of Dante have drifted into our mind. No one can listen to Mr. Koussevitzky direct even a single concert without being made aware that he possesses extraordinary virtues as a musician and conductor, but that among those virtues he finds room for irregularities of the most disconcerting sort.

Now we should like to be able to feel about Mr. Koussevitzky's deflections as Wagner felt about the errors of Socrates and Plato, both of whom, he remarked, were artists of such overwhelming power that even in turning away from them we are compelled to worship them. We should like to be able to rise to the divine height of that eminent European colleague of ours who, hearing Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale, extolled it because, as he said, Mr. Koussevitzky made Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakoff. But those altitudes are not for us. We have not yet been able to persuade ourselves that the music of a creative artist of highly individual style may be improved by causing it to sound as if it had been written by some one else. We have not yet succeeded in acquiring a taste for Schubert remade in the image of Tchaikovsky, any more than we have learned to relish claret that has been pepped up by mixing it with champagne—though some speak highly of this quaint concoction.

* * *

The guest conductor, the guest critic—these are all to the good; these we welcome. But the guest composer we reject. The spectacle of Rimsky-Korsakoff guest-composing for Wagner in the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale is one which we are unable to regard with equanimity. The precedent thus established is far too dangerous. We are uncomfortably alive to the possibility of Strauss guest-composing for Debussy—of "The Afternoon of a Faun" reconceived as a fragment from "The Life of a Hero"; of Weber seen from the standpoint of the Celtic world of Arnold Bax, thus yielding a new classic to the orchestral list—the Overture to "O'Beron."

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky's traits and inclinations as a conductor bring these possibilities too close for comfort. He really does do things to the score of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale, for instance, which make that transcendently Wagnerian page sound like anything on earth but Wagner—like Rimsky-Korsakoff, if one chooses; and it is this tendency of his to pervert essential characteristics which seems to us to be Mr. Koussevitzky's most threatening quality.

Two years ago, hearing him conduct in Paris, we said in our report to this newspaper that Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to lack a finely discriminating sense of style. It seemed to us then that he was indifferent to the qualities that make Schubert an æsthetic being distinct from Tchaikovsky, or Mozart or Mendelssohn or Ravel. We suspected that he was insufficiently sensitive to the enormity of making Beethoven sound like Borodin, or Weber like Ethelbert Nevin. And this appeared to us to be a grievous thing, for we believe that there is no betrayal less forgivable in an interpretative artist than this treachery to the essential spirit of a creator.

* * *

We can bear with an infinitude of toleration—indeed, with endless interest—the spectacle of an interpreter extending the significance and the expressiveness of a composer on the plane of that composer's own implicit characteristics.

There is no such thing as the correct interpretation of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—there are hundreds, each as "correct" (though the word has unbearable connotations) as the others. But these various and conflicting interpretations are right and acceptable to musicians of sensibility only when they are the result of a sympathetic perception which has seen to the heart of the quality which makes Schubert himself—unique and untransferable. A hundred conductors of intuition and imagination may look at Schubert from a hundred different points of view, and recreate him according to a hundred different temperaments and experiences; and if each conductor has been looking steadily at Schubert and really seeing into his heart and brain, from whatever angle, each will tell us something of Schubert, and each will tell us something different and new.

* * *

But it is possible to look at Schubert without really seeing him as he is. You may be strabismic, or your glasses may not suit you, so that the image which is conveyed to your brain may bear only a distorted resemblance to the actual Schubert known to those hundred colleagues of yours who have seen him with unimpaired though differing eyes.

* * *

We fancy that it is something of this sort that happens to Mr. Koussevitzky when he envisages certain music-makers who for one reason or another elude his apprehension. He seems to lack that grasp of essential characteristics which enables a conductor to persuade us of his right to take what liberties he will with a composer's music. Other leaders have flouted convention and pirouetted down the primrose path of musical license with far more abandon than Mr. Koussevitzky ever dared, and have escaped rebuke. But Mr. Koussevitzky is not among the fortunate class of those who Get Away With It. You disallow certain things in his Schubert, his Brahms, his Wagner, not because they are untraditional, irrubrical, and highly personal to Mr. Koussevitzky, but because they are neglectful of those basic characteristics which differentiate one composer from another; because they betray an insensibility to the qualities which make Schubert, for example, everlastingly though variously himself, and not Tchaikovsky or Debussy; because they oppress you with a conviction that Mr. Koussevitzky is unaware of the infamy of making Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakoff.

* * *

But what of Mr. Koussevitzky's virtues, those "extraordinary virtues" to which we referred at the start? First among them is that power of transmutation about which we wrote last Sunday in our preface to this discussion of conductors—that ability to transfigure the most unpromising material: to extract from the paltry, the jejune and the dull an unsuspected beauty, an incredible significance. Mr. Koussevitzky has this rare and wonderful power. He can take a lifeless and banal thing like the Eighth Symphony of Glazounoff and fill it so full of his own electrifying intensity, lend it so much of his own ardor, his own force, that poor Glazounoff becomes irradiated with a splendor that turns his rags to cloth-of-gold and fills his eyes with images of beauty and of wonder that he himself has never seen.

This is what it means for a conductor to be able, as we were saying a week ago, to give wings to sloths, to quicken mummies, and lift the leaden feet of the condemned. Mr. Koussevitzky can work such miracles of enlivenment. We have heard him confer upon dull and trivial and withered music a mood or an emotion or a loveliness altogether unsuspected and surprising. We have heard him do this with faded music of the past, with music of yesterday and of to-day; and so we know that this inestimable gift is his.

* * *

Another of Mr. Koussevitzky's salient virtues is his genius for heightening and enriching not moribund and indigent music, but music that is alive and significant. We shall not soon forget what he made of "Till Eulenspiegel" last winter in New York; of Steinberg's arrangement of the beautiful concerto grosso of C. P. E. Bach; we still remember with uncommon vividness the performances which we heard him give in Paris of Stravinsky's "Rossignol," of Honegger's "Chant de Joie," of Bax's "Garden of Fand," of Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" (with which, for some reason or other, he was far less happy in New York), of the B minor Suite of Bach, with the unapproachable Landowska at the harpsichord.

* * *

There is much else that one might say of Mr. Koussevitzky—of his virtues and of what seem to be his defects. But it would be witless and unjust to attempt to sum him up at this stage of the game. Happily, he will be with us again next season, and there will be abundant opportunity to study him anew—to revise, perhaps, one's present impressions, perhaps to make confession of error or to avow a change of mind.

But at least one can say with positiveness of Mr. Koussevitzky that he is no dealer in clichés, no booster for the rubber stamp, no dispenser of interpretative platitudes. He thinks his own thoughts, goes his own way, dreams his own dreams. Conventions do not impress him, traditions are things to be suspected, tested and retested, perhaps discarded. He is often wrong, and, as it seems to us, perverse; he is often illuminatingly and superbly right. But almost always he is challenging and provocative and alive.

* * *

We shall continue this discussion of conductors next Sunday.

Passing in Review

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

MAY 17 1925

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
~~EVE.~~ UNION

MAY 17 1925

Koussevitzky Ends Season.

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copland's Symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the 10th anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open the next Boston Symphony Orchestra season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

This orchestra's 44th season, now ended, has proved in every way remarkable. Koussevitzky, as a new figure upon our concert platforms, has attracted the attention of the Nation, and won the admiration of each city where he has appeared at the head of the famous orchestra.

Such has been the demand for the Boston Symphony concerts, that seats for the three series in Boston and the double series in New York have been unobtainable to any except the subscribers who hold them.

ISABEL STEELE
Pianist Who Will Be Heard Thursday Evening.

Boston, New York, those cities of the near West and South which this orchestra has visited, have with one voice praised the Russian conductor as an artist, as a leader, and as a personality in music. Those few who have on occasion disagreed with his interpretation of a certain piece, have always acceded a marvelously fine performance.

In New York perhaps no conductor in years (and the world's best have passed through the metropolis) has been received with such unqualified praise.

In reviewing the season, Philip Hale in the Boston Herald (May 3) remarked that whereas some had been led by report to expect from Koussevitzky sensationalism and over-emphasis upon the moderns, he had proved to have a special flair for the "ancients," and a special way with the "romantics." "He can be passionate without being blatant. As a rule he prepares a climax that, when it comes, is irresistible. In wildly romantic music he is not to be excelled, yet no one treats the music of the 18th century with more loving devotion, with a finer sense of values, with a clearer appreciation of the formalism and spirit of the period."

Mr. Hale lists the composers represented by nations as follows:

German-Austrian Bohemians were represented by the two Bachs, Beethoven, Brahms, Handel (really to be classed among the English), Haydn, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Smetana, Strauss, Wagner, Weber. Fifteen in all.

The French by Berlioz, Borchard, Boulanger, Caplet, Debussy, Dukas, G. Faure, Honegger, d'Indy, Manuel, Rabaud, Ravel, Rigel, Roussel, Schmitt, Tailleferre; 16.

The Russians by Borodin, Glazounov, Glinka, Liadov, Moussorgsky, Prokofieff, Rachmaninov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky; 11.

The Italians by Boccherini, Cerelli, Respighi, Vivaldi; four.

The Americans by Copland, Eichheim, Foote, Hadley, Hill, Loeffler; six.

The English by Bax, Bliss, Elgar (transcription); three.

The Spaniards by de Falla.

Notable choral performances included Brahms' "German Requiem," Scriabin's "Prometheus," Borodin's Dances from "Prince Igor."

GLOBE MAY 17

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL. Pop Concerts, orchestra of 80, Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15. Monday, May 18. Hungarian March, Berlioz; "Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; "Liebesfreud," Kreisler; "Camellia Gavotte," Jacchia; Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey," Belakirev-Casella; Suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni: "Coronation March," Svendsen.

Tuesday, May 19. Prelude, "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Mascagni; "Finlandia," Sibelius; "The Music Box," Liadov; "Aragonaise," from "Le Cid," Massenet; Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony, Tchaikovsky; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Valse, "Espana," Waldteufel; "Charge of the Hussars," Spindler.

Wednesday, May 20, Russian Program—March, "Souvoroff," Arensky; prelude to "Khovantchina," Musorgsky; "Melody in F," Rubinstein; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin; suite, "Raymonda," Glazounov; berceuse from "The Fire Bird," Stravinsky; fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; "Vocalise," Rachmaninov; polonaise, Liadov.

Thursday, May 21, Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan Night——Overture to "Raymond," Thomas; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; suite from "Le Cid," Massenet; "Procession to the Cathedral," "Lohengrin," Wagner; finale, Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "Polonaise," Chopin; "Salut d'Amour," Elgar; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz.

Friday, May 22, Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; irientale, Cul-Jacchia; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; Afro-American Folk Songs, arranged by Jacchia; harp solo, "In the Canoe," Holy; "La Tristesse du Printemps," Sibelius; fantasia, "Iris," Mascagni; selection, "Rose Marie," Friml-Stothart; waltz, "Myosotis," Waldteufel; Third Slavonic Dance, Dvorak.

Saturday, May 23—Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Suite, Rameau-Mottl; Dubinushka, arranged by Jacchia; Chinese Dance, Crist; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; Hindu Song, Rimsky-Korsakoff; Military March, Schubert-Jacchia.

Sunday, May 24, Symphonic Program; Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Symphony No 5 in C minor Second Movement (Andante con moto), Beethoven; Varsang (Spring Sadness), Sibelius; Symphony No 2 in D major (London)—Menuetto (Allegro), Haydn; "Rumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, Respighi; Symphony No 6 in B flat "Pathetic" Second Movement: Allegro con grazia, Tchaikovsky; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Finale of Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Overture to "The Sold Bride," Smetana.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAY 17 19

There will be no public sale of seats for either the Boston or New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Renewals of subscriptions and a waiting list so large that it will exhaust all available seats are responsible for this.

Serge Koussevitzky, who brought to an end his first season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 1, sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabine program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

108

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

MAY 17 1925

Some Conductors of the Season in Retrospect

II.—Koussevitzky

By Lawrence Gilman

BOCCACCIO observed of Dante that "always he found room among his virtues for lechery." Matthew Arnold, regarding Boccaccio's phrase as unduly high-spirited, modified the vivacity but preserved at least the spare ribs of the thought when he said of Dante that "his conduct was exceedingly irregular." Reflecting upon Mr. Koussevitzky's achievements as a conductor during his first season in America, these comments upon the habits of Dante have drifted into our mind. No one can listen to Mr. Koussevitzky direct even a single concert without being made aware that he possesses extraordinary virtues as a musician and conductor, but that among those virtues he finds room for irregularities of the most disconcerting sort.

Now we should like to be able to feel about Mr. Koussevitzky's deflections as Wagner felt about the errors of Socrates and Plato, both of whom, he remarked, were artists of such overwhelming power that even in turning away from them we are compelled to worship them. We should like to be able to rise to the divine height of that eminent European colleague of ours who, hearing Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale, extolled it because, as he said, Mr. Koussevitzky made Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakoff. But those altitudes are not for us. We have not yet been able to persuade ourselves that the music of a creative artist of highly individual style may be improved by causing it to sound as if it had been written by some one else. We have not yet succeeded in acquiring a taste for Schubert remade in the image of Tchaikovsky, any more than we have learned to relish claret that has been pepped up by mixing it with champagne—though some speak highly of this quaint concoction.

* * *

The guest conductor, the guest critic—these are all to the good; these we welcome. But the guest composer we reject. The spectacle of Rimsky-Korsakoff guest-composing for Wagner in the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale is one which we are unable to regard with equanimity. The precedent thus established is far too dangerous. We are uncomfortably alive to the possibility of Strauss guest-composing for Debussy—of "The Afternoon of a Faun" reconceived as a fragment from "The Life of a Hero"; of Weber seen from the standpoint of the Celtic world of Arnold Bax, thus yielding a new classic to the orchestral list—the Overture to "O'Beron."

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky's traits and inclinations as a conductor bring these possibilities too close for comfort. He really does do things to the score of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale, for instance, which make that transcendently Wagnerian page sound like anything on earth but Wagner—like Rimsky-Korsakoff, if one chooses; and it is this tendency of his to pervert essential characteristics which seems to us to be Mr. Koussevitzky's most threatening quality.

Two years ago, hearing him conduct in Paris, we said in our report to this newspaper that Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to lack a finely discriminating sense of style. It seemed to us then that he was indifferent to the qualities that make Schubert an æsthetic being distinct from Tchaikovsky, or Mozart or Mendelssohn or Ravel. We suspected that he was insufficiently sensitive to the enormity of making Beethoven sound like Borodin, or Weber like Ethelbert Nevin. And this appeared to us to be a grievous thing, for we believe that there is no betrayal less forgivable in an interpretative artist than this treachery to the essential spirit of a creator.

* * *

We can bear with an infinitude of toleration—indeed, with endless interest—the spectacle of an interpreter extending the significance and the expressiveness of a composer on the plane of that composer's own implicit characteristics.

There is no such thing as the correct interpretation of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—there are hundreds, each as "correct" (though the word has unbearable connotations) as the others. But these various and conflicting interpretations are right and acceptable to musicians of sensibility only when they are the result of a sympathetic perception which has seen to the heart of the quality which makes Schubert himself—unique and untransferable. A hundred conductors of intuition and imagination may look at Schubert from a hundred different points of view, and recreate him according to a hundred different temperaments and experiences; and if each conductor has been looking steadily at Schubert and really seeing into his heart and brain, from whatever angle, each will tell us something of Schubert, and each will tell us something different and new.

* * *

But it is possible to look at Schubert without really seeing him as he is. You may be strabismic, or your glasses may not suit you, so that the image which is conveyed to your brain may bear only a distorted resemblance to the actual Schubert known to those hundred colleagues of yours who have seen him with unimpaired though differing eyes.

* * *

We fancy that it is something of this sort that happens to Mr. Koussevitzky when he envisages certain music-makers who for one reason or another elude his apprehension. He seems to lack that grasp of essential characteristics which enables a conductor to persuade us of his right to take what liberties he will with a composer's music. Other leaders have flouted convention and pirouetted down the primrose path of musical license with far more abandon than Mr. Koussevitzky ever dared, and have escaped rebuke. But Mr. Koussevitzky is not among the fortunate class of those who Get Away With It. You disallow certain things in his Schubert, his Brahms, his Wagner, not because they are untraditional, irrubrical, and highly personal to Mr. Koussevitzky, but because they are neglectful of those basic characteristics which differentiate one composer from another; because they betray an insensibility to the qualities which make Schubert, for example, everlastingly though variously himself, and not Tchaikovsky or Debussy; because they oppress you with a conviction that Mr. Koussevitzky is unaware of the infamy of making Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakoff.

* * *

But what of Mr. Koussevitzky's virtues, those "extraordinary virtues" to which we referred at the start? First among them is that power of transmutation about which we wrote last Sunday in our preface to this discussion of conductors—that ability to transfigure the most unpromising material: to extract from the paltry, the jejune and the dull an unsuspected beauty, an incredible significance. Mr. Koussevitzky has this rare and wonderful power. He can take a lifeless and banal thing like the Eighth Symphony of Glazounoff and fill it so full of his own electrifying intensity, lend it so much of his own ardor, his own force, that poor Glazounoff becomes irradiated with a splendor that turns his rags to cloth-of-gold and fills his eyes with images of beauty and of wonder that he himself has never seen.

This is what it means for a conductor to be able, as we were saying a week ago, to give wings to sloths, to quicken mummies, and lift the leaden feet of the condemned. Mr. Koussevitzky can work such miracles of enlivenment. We have heard him confer upon dull and trivial and withered music a mood or an emotion or a loveliness altogether unsuspected and surprising. We have heard him do this with faded music of the past, with music of yesterday and of to-day; and so we know that this inestimable gift is his.

* * *

Another of Mr. Koussevitzky's salient virtues is his genius for heightening and enriching not moribund and indigent music, but music that is alive and significant. We shall not soon forget what he made of "Till Eulenspiegel" last winter in New York; of Steinberg's arrangement of the beautiful concerto grosso of C. P. E. Bach; we still remember with uncommon vividness the performances which we heard him give in Paris of Stravinsky's "Rossignol," of Honegger's "Chant de Joie," of Bax's "Garden of Fand," of Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" (with which, for some reason or other, he was far less happy in New York), of the B minor Suite of Bach, with the unapproachable Landowska at the harpsichord.

* * *

There is much else that one might say of Mr. Koussevitzky—of his virtues and of what seem to be his defects. But it would be witless and unjust to attempt to sum him up at this stage of the game. Happily, he will be with us again next season, and there will be abundant opportunity to study him anew—to revise, perhaps, one's present impressions, perhaps to make confession of error or to avow a change of mind.

But at least one can say with positiveness of Mr. Koussevitzky that he is no dealer in clichés, no booster for the rubber stamp, no dispenser of interpretative platitudes. He thinks his own thoughts, goes his own way, dreams his own dreams. Conventions do not impress him, traditions are things to be suspected, tested and retested, perhaps discarded. He is often wrong, and, as it seems to us, perverse; he is often illuminatingly and superbly right. But almost always he is challenging and provocative and alive.

* * *

We shall continue this discussion of conductors next Sunday.

Passing in Review

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

MAY 17 1925

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
~~EVE.~~ UNION

MAY 17 1925

Koussevitzky Ends Season.

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copland's Symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the 10th anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open the next Boston Symphony Orchestra season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

This orchestra's 44th season, now ended, has proved in every way remarkable. Koussevitzky, as a new figure upon our concert platforms, has attracted the attention of the Nation, and won the admiration of each city where he has appeared at the head of the famous orchestra.

Such has been the demand for the Boston Symphony concerts, that seats for the three series in Boston and the double series in New York have been unobtainable to any except the subscribers who hold them.

ISABEL STEELE
Pianist Who Will Be Heard Thursday Evening.

Boston, New York, those cities of the near West and South which this orchestra has visited, have with one voice praised the Russian conductor as an artist, as a leader, and as a personality in music. Those few who have on occasion disagreed with his interpretation of a certain piece, have always acceded a marvelously fine performance.

In New York perhaps no conductor in years (and the world's best have passed through the metropolis) has been received with such unqualified praise.

In reviewing the season, Philip Hale of the Boston Herald (May 3) remarked that whereas some had been led by report to expect from Koussevitzky sensationalism and over-emphasis upon the moderns, he had proved to have a special flair for the "ancients," and a special way with the "romantics." "He can be passionate without being blatant. As a rule he prepares a climax that, when it comes, is irresistible. In wildly romantic music he is not to be excelled, yet no one treats the music of the 18th century with more loving devotion, with a finer sense of values, with a clearer appreciation of the formalism and spirit of the period."

Mr. Hale lists the composers represented by nations as follows:

German-Austrian Bohemians were represented by the two Bachs, Beethoven, Brahms, Handel (really to be classed among the English), Haydn, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Smetana, Strauss, Wagner, Weber. Fifteen in all.

The French by Berlioz, Borchard, Boulanger, Caplet, Debussy, Dukas, G. Faure, Honegger, d'Indy, Manuel, Rabaud, Ravel, Rigel, Roussel, Schmitt, Tailleferre; 16.

The Russians by Borodin, Glazounov, Glinka, Liadov, Moussorgsky, Prokofieff, Rachmaninov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky; 11.

The Italians by Boccherini, Cerelli, Respighi, Vivaldi; four.

The Americans by Copland, Eichheim, Foote, Hadley, Hill, Loeffler; six.

The English by Bax, Bliss, Elgar (transcription); three.

The Spaniards by de Falla.

Notable choral performances included Brahms' "German Requiem," Scriabin's "Prometheus," Borodin's Dances from "Prince Igor."

GLOBE MAY 17

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL. Pop Concerts, orchestra of 80, Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15. Monday, May 18. Hungarian March, Berlioz; "Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; "Liebesfreud," Kreisler; "Camellia Gavotte," Jacchia; Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey," Belakirev-Casella; Suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; "Coronation March," Svendsen.

Tuesday, May 19. Prelude, "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Mascagni; "Finlandia," Sibelius; "The Music Box," Liadov; "Aragonaise," from "Le Cid," Massenet; Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony, Tchaikovsky; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Valse, "Espana," Waldteufel; "Charge of the Hussars," Spindler.

Wednesday, May 20, Russian Program—March, "Souvoroff," Arensky; prelude to "Khovantchina," Musorgsky; "Melody in F," Rubinstein; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin; suite, "Raymonda," Glazounov; berceuse from "The Fire Bird," Stravinsky; fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; "Vocalise," Rachmaninov; polonaise, Liadov.

Thursday, May 21, Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan Night—Overture to "Raymond," Thomas; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; suite from "Le Cid," Massenet; "Procession to the Cathedral," "Lohengrin," Wagner; finale, Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "Polonaise," Chopin; "Salut d'Amour," Elgar; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz.

Friday, May 22, Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Irientale, Cui-Jacchia; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; Afro-American Folk Songs, arranged by Jacchia; harp solo, "In the Canoe," Holy; "La Tristesse du Printemps," Sibelius; fantasia, "Iris," Mascagni; selection, "Rose Marie," Friml-Stothart; waltz, "Myosotis," Waldteufel; Third Slavonic Dance, Dvorak.

Saturday, May 23—Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Suite, Rameau-Mottl; Dubinushka, arranged by Jacchia; Chinese Dance, Crist; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; Hindu Song, Rimsky-Korsakoff; Military March, Schubert-Jacchia.

Sunday, May 24, Symphonic Program; Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Symphony No 5 in C minor Second Movement (Andante con moto), Beethoven; Varsang (Spring Sadness), Sibelius; Symphony No 2 in D major (London)—Menuetto (Allegro), Haydn; "Rumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, Respighi; Symphony No 6 in B flat "Pathetic" Second Movement: Allegro con grazia, Tchaikovsky; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Finale of Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Overture to "The Sold Bride," Smetana.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAY 17 [illegible]

There will be no public sale of seats for either the Boston or New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Renewals of subscriptions and a waiting list so large that it will exhaust all available seats are responsible for this.

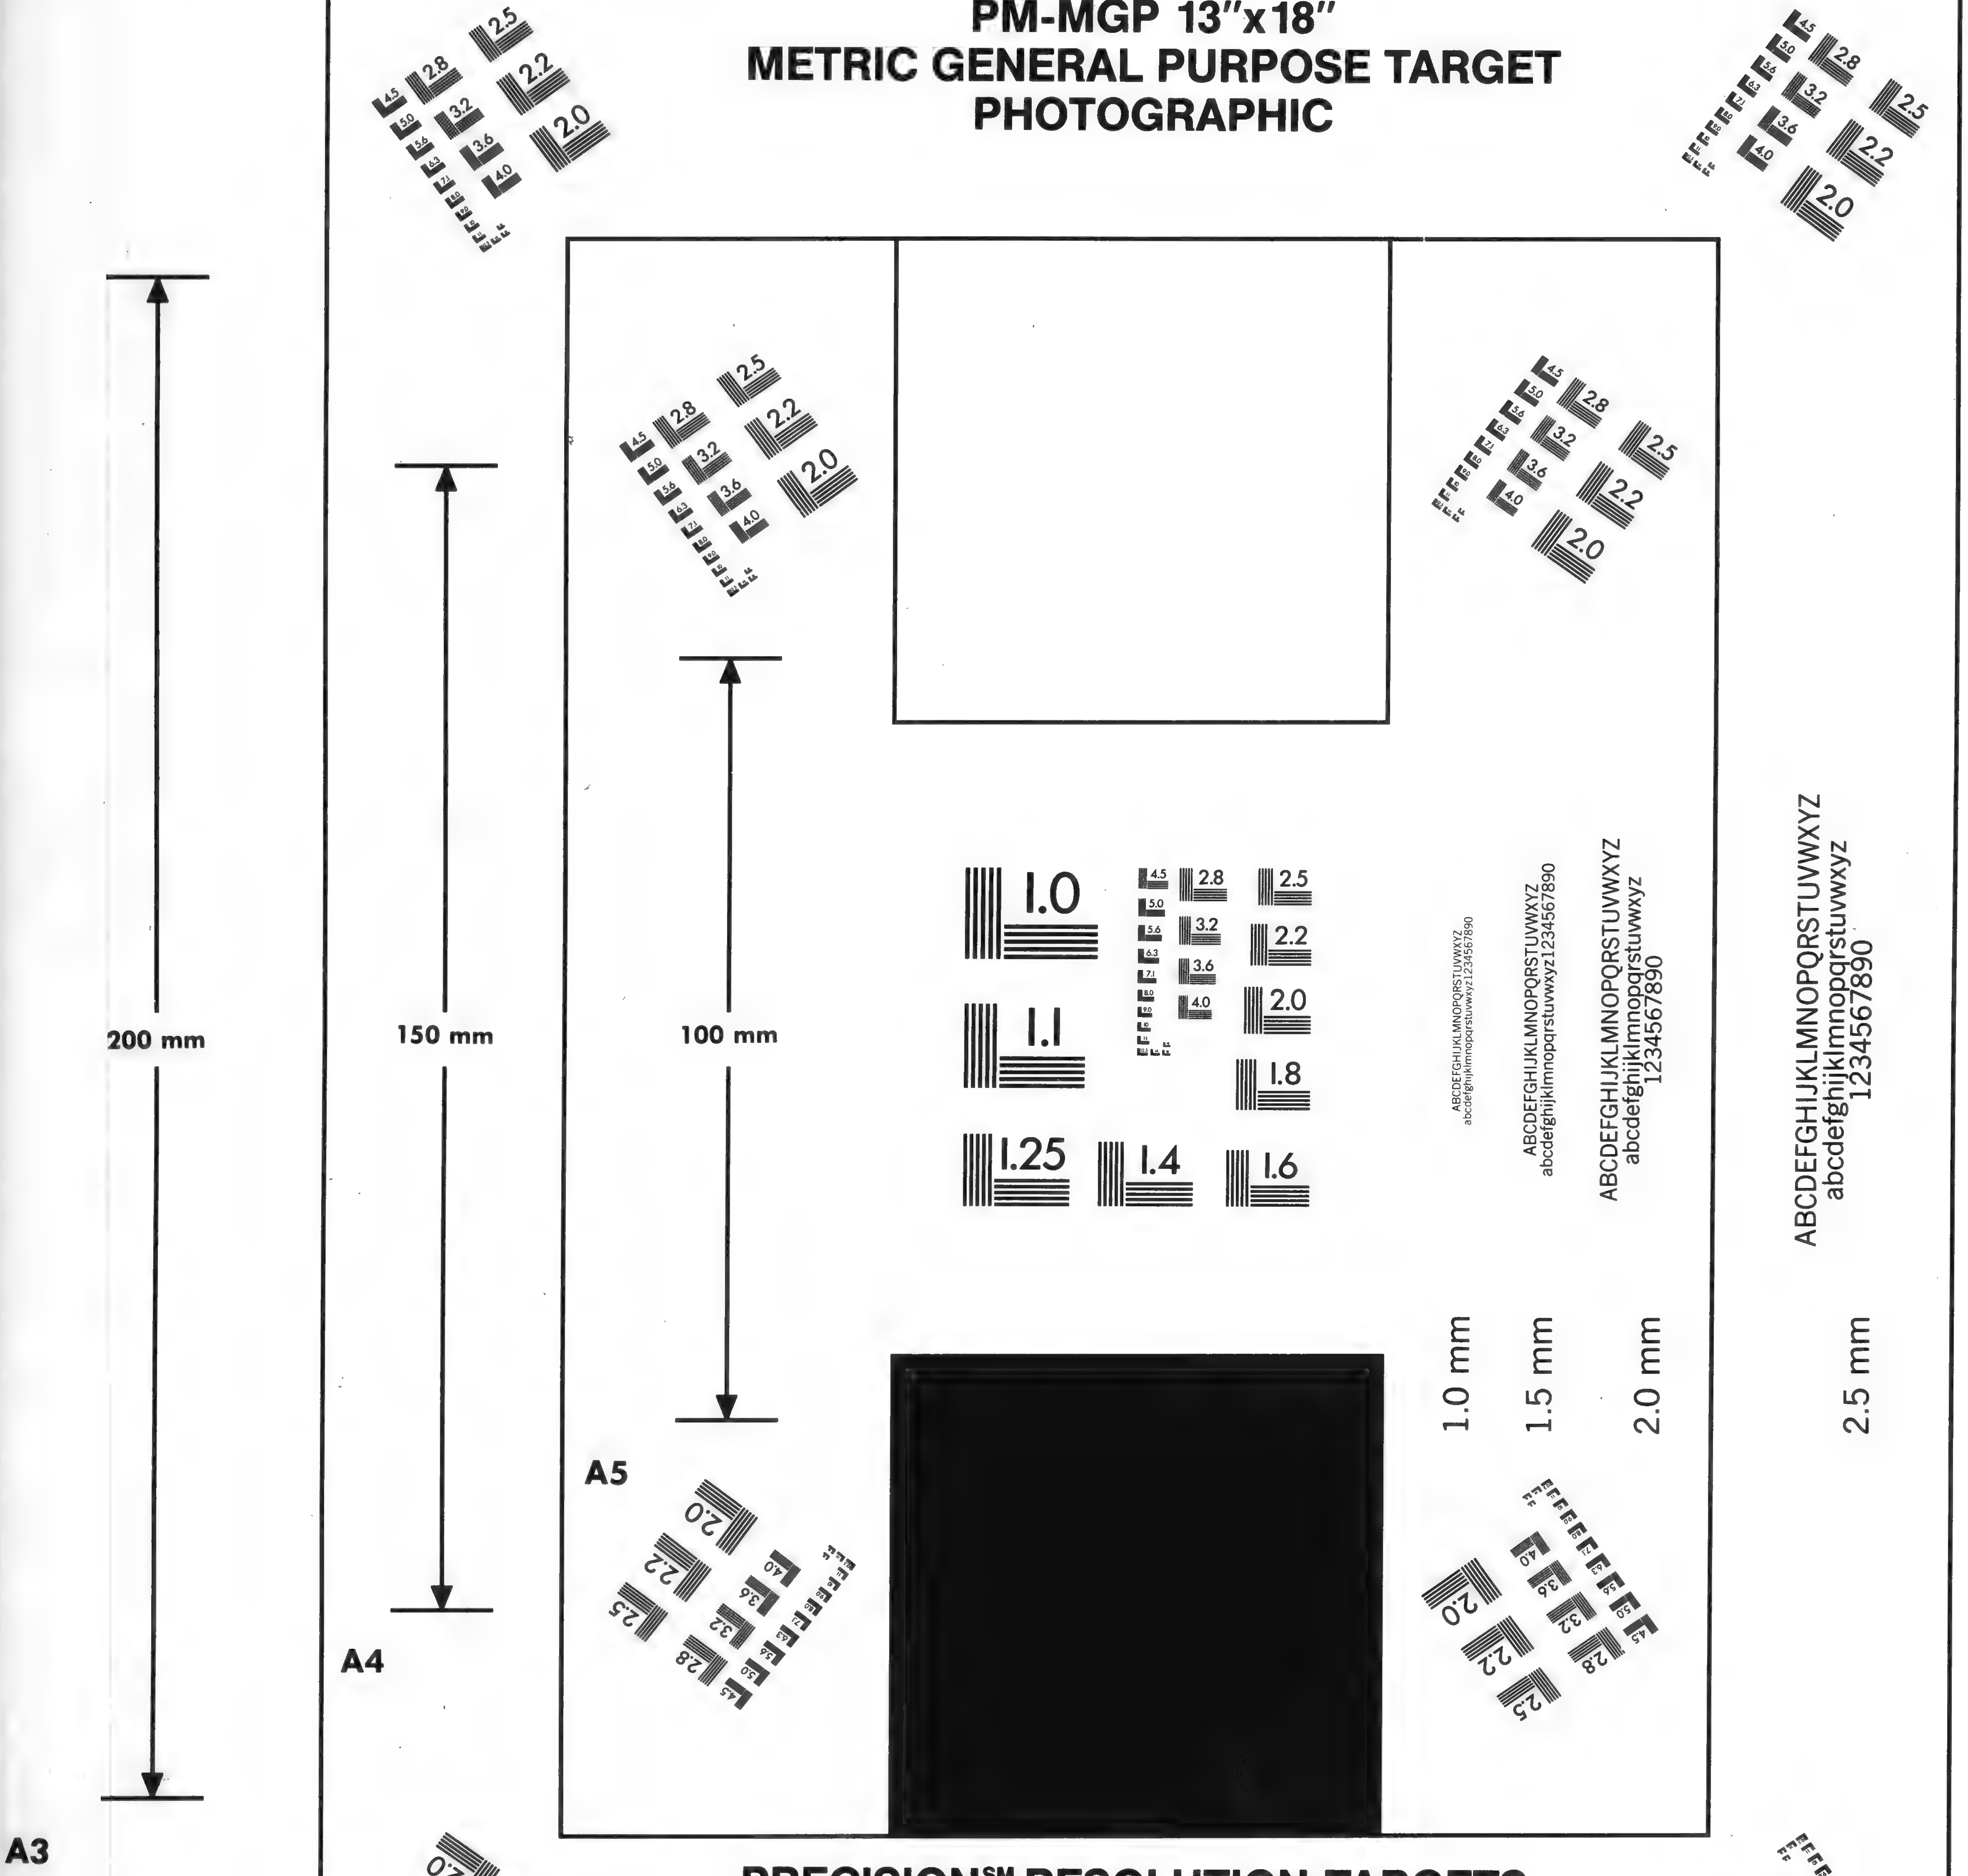
Serge Koussevitzky, who brought to an end his first season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 1, sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabine program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

MAY 17 1925

OPERAS, CONCERTS, RECITALS WILL CROWD LOCAL CALENDAR

Orchestral Program Enlarged—Several Operatic Engagements—Two Score or More Concerts and Numerous Recitals are Booked.

By Burt McMurtrie.

SHOULD there be any doubt as to musical growth in Pittsburgh and there are always some who decry the artistic tastes of the Steel City, a glance at the partially completed 1925-26 music calendar will dispel all such wonderings. With this season not yet ended, though the time of year is unusually late, plans have been made for the next year that eclipse all bookings of former years.

From the look of things as outlined for next season, Pittsburgh is going to be sort of continuous "music week" for several months, with a concert, recital, operatic or choral booking just about certain for at least four nights out of every seven. The present season however has not held the worth as far as artists are concerned that next year promises. Scarcely a musician of any great import but who will be heard some time or other during the year.

The increased programs of the orchestral association are a big item. Seven night and six matinee concerts will be played in Syria mosque, opening Nov. 6-7 with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This conductor made his American debut this season, one of his first concerts outside of Boston being in Pittsburgh last fall. Next Friday he opens in Paris his annual event, the "Concerts Koussevitsky," following which he goes to London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

It is notable to observe that Koussevitzky has taken with him to Europe, three scores by young American composers, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheims "A Chinese Legend," and [illegible]n Copelands Symphony.

PORTLAND, ME.
~~ADVERTISER~~

MAY 17 1925

On Friday, May 1, Serge Koussevitzky brought to an end his first season in America, and the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the conductor. On the following day he sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which begin May 22, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, Through the Looking Glass, Henry Eicheim's A Chinese Legend, and Aaron Copland's Symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabin program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open the next Boston Symphony Orchestra season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 9.

The forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now ended, has proved in every way remarkable. Koussevitzky, as a new figure upon our concert platforms, has attracted the attention of the nation, and won the admiration of each city where he has appeared at the head of the famous orchestra.

Such has been the demand for the Boston Symphony concerts, that seats for the three series in Boston and the double series in New York have been unobtainable to any except the subscribers who hold them.

Boston, New York, those cities of the near West and South which this orchestra has visited, have with one voice praised the Russian conductor as an artist, as a leader, and as a personality in music. Those few who have on occasion disagreed with his interpretation of a certain piece, have always acceded a marvelously fine performance.

In New York perhaps no conductor in years (and the world's best have passed through the metropolis) has been received with such unqualified praise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

MAY 17 1925

Ernest Newman

Describes Director Mahler's Letters About America and His Admiration for the Country and People

By ERNEST NEWMAN

AMERICANS are mistrustful, and rightly so, of the European artist who goes to America with the sole intention of making the maximum of money in the minimum of time and with the minimum of effort, and, having done so, and enjoyed the generous hospitality and the amenities of American life, returns to Europe and then, from a safe distance, bites the hand that fed him.

Like all other hosts, Americans like to know what their departed guests really think of them in their heart of hearts. Perhaps the quickest way of finding that out is to get hold of the guest's letters that were written during his American sojourn and with no idea that they would ever be published. In these, at any rate, the real man speaks and the real truth may be found.

Mahler's letters have recently been published by the Paul Szolnay Verlag, and from these the American musical public will be able to discover what the great conductor thought of it. The American letters occupy only the last hundred pages or so of a large volume, but they are important. In all his correspondence Mahler strikes one as being a truthful and honorable man; and not the slightest suspicion of flattery of America attaches to these letters.

In February, 1908, he writes to Mengelberg, telling him that an invitation will probably reach him (Mengelberg) to succeed Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Boston position," he says, "is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician cannot obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you cannot have any idea of this.

"Here in New York the theatre is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority. * * * It would be fine for me to know that you were near me. I shall probably spend the coming years also in America. I am quite ravished with the country, even though one's artistic satisfaction with the Metropolitan is only a very moderate quantity."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribun

MAY 17 1925

League of Composers Has Ambitious Program

Koussevitzky and Mengelberg to Conduct; Review's Name To Be "Modern Music"

With three concerts of modern musi for chamber orchestra, the first to b conducted by Serge Koussevitzky an the second by Willem Mengelberg, wit Wanda Landowska and others as solo ists, the League of Composers an nounces its most ambitious progra so far for its third season, 1925-'2 There will also be one recital of ne chamber music, and four issues of th league's magazine, which is to b known as "Modern Music."

Mr. Koussevitzky, making his firs appearance here by permission of off cers and trustees of the Boston Sym phony, outside of that orchestra's co certs, will conduct a program of Ame ican and European works heard fo the first time here. The orchestra fo this November concert will consist o picked Boston Symphony players.

The concert under Mr. Mengelberg who will appear by permission of th board of directors of the Philharmoni Society, with a group of Philharmoni players, will feature Manuel de Falla marionette opera, "El Retablo," in it American premiere. Wanda Londowska will play the harpsichord. Th League will present the work, whic deals with an episode in the tale o Don Quixote, with marionettes of tw sizes and marionette staging, the sing ers being placed with the orchestr The third orchestral progra mwill b given in February.

The league will open its season i October with a recital of chambe music. "Modern Music," continuing and expanding the critical enterprise undertaken with "The League of Composers' Review," will be issued in October, December, February and April. It will be available to the general public as well as to league members.

FORWARD MAY 17

סימפאָני האָלל, באָסטאָן

נעקסטען מיטוואָך אבענד, דעם 20טען מאַי

אין די „פאָפּס“

SYMPHONY HALL POPS

Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players Agide Jacchia, Conductor

א דורכאויס

רוסישע

פראָגראם

אן אָרקעסטער פון 80 סימפאָני שפּיעלער.

אַגידאַ דזשאַקיאַ,

קאָנדאָקטאָר.

א פּאָפּולערע פּראָגראם — רעפרעשמענטס, רויכערן.

טייבעל סיטס 1$. באלקאָני: 1$, 75ס., 50ס. אדמישאָן 25ס. (קיין טעקס).

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAY 17 1925

Mengelberg, Koussevitzky and Lan League of Composers

For the season of 1925-6 the League of Composers announces the most ambitious program of activities undertaken since its organization two years ago. There will be three concerts of modern chamber orchestral music. The first is to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, the second by Willem Mengelberg, with Mme. Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists. There will be in addition one recital of new chamber music and four issues of the league's magazine, which will be known in future as "Modern Music."

Mr. Koussevitzky, who appears by permission of the officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program of first performances of works by Europeans and Americans. The concert will take place in November. The ensemble will consist of picked men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert, under Mr. Mengelberg's direction, will feature "El Retablo," Manuel de Falla's marionette opera. Mr. Mengelberg, appearing by permission of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society, will lead a group of players from the orchestra of that organization. Mme. Landowska will play the harpsichord for this work, which will be given its American premiere. This miniature opera, dealing with an episode in the life of Don Quixote, has been made famous in Europe through the stage performances given by the Princess de Polignac, to whom it is dedicated, and by subsequent concert hearings. The concert will be heard late in December.

The third program of chamber orchestral music, whose details are now being perfected, will be given in February. The league will open its season in October with a recital of chamber music, the plans for which will soon be announced.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

MAY 17 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, whose conducting of the Boston Symphony orchestra fascinated Albanians at the concert last winter at the Capitol theatre, has closed his first season with the orchestra, and has sailed for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, starting next Friday, and, on June 11 to inaugurate his series in London as guest conductor of the London symphony orchestra.

Koussevitzky is taking three scores of young American composers with him to introduce to Paris: Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copland's symphony. He will return to America in September to open the next Boston Symphony orchestra season in Symphony hall, Boston, October 9.

"POPS" BEGIN THIRD WEEK

Herald May 17

The third week of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony hall will be characterized by the following programs to be presented by Mr. Jacchia and the "Pops" Symphony orchestra of 80 Symphony players. Of these Wednesday will bring a Russian program; Thursday a triple representation of Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan Colleges, and Sunday, May 24, a symphonic program.

MONDAY, MAY 18

Hungarian March..........Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"..........Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"..........Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"
Wagner
Liebesfreud..........Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte..........Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey"..Balakirev-Casellt
Suite "Nutcracker"..........Tchaikovsky
a Miniature Overture
b Dance of the Sugar Fairy
c Trepak
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Coronation March..........Svendsen

TUESDAY, MAY 19

Prelude to "Carmen"..........Bizet
Overture to "Sakuntala"..........Goldmark
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"..........Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Boston City Club Glee Club
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem..........Sibelius
The Musix Box..........Liadov
Aragonaise from "Le Cid"..........Massenet
Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony..........Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Valse, "Espana"..........Waldteufel
Charge of the Hussars..........Spindler

RUSSIAN PROGRAM
WEDNESDAY, May 20

March, "Souvoroff"..........Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..........Moussorgsky
Melody in F..........Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"..Borodia
Suite, "Raymonda"..........Glazounov
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird"..........Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spapnish Themes"..........Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave..........Tchaikovsky
"Vocalise"..........Rachmaninov
Polonaise..........Liadov

THURSDAY, MAY 21

Overture to "Raymond"..........Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"..........Puccini
College songs
Suite from "The Cid"..........Massenet
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin."
Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony..........Tchaikovsky
College songs
Polonaise..........Chopin
Salut d'Amour..........Elgar
Invitation to the Dance..........Weber-Berlioz

FRIDAY, May 22

Triumphal March from "Aida"..........Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Orientale..........Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs......Arr. by Jacchia
(a) You May Busy Me in de Eas'. (b) Muslen Baujo. (c) Nobody Knows de Trubble I've Seen.
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"..........Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps..........Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"..........Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"..........Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"..........Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance..........Dvorak

SATURDAY, MAY 23

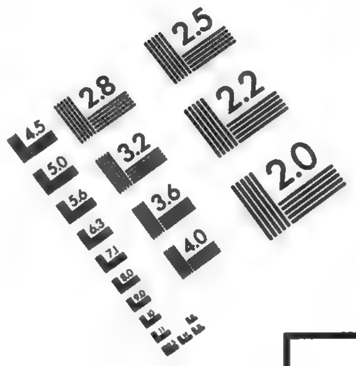
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea"..Suppe
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Strauss
Ave Maria..........Bach-Gounod
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Suite..........Rameau-Mottl
Dubinushka..........Arr. by Jacchia
Chinese Dance..........Gerst
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagner
Fantasia "Il Trovatore"..........Verdi
Hindu Song..........Rimsky-Korsakov
Military March..........Schubert-Jacchia

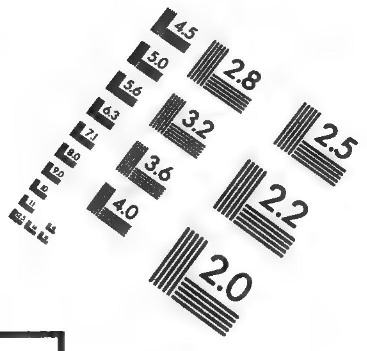
SYMPHONIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 24

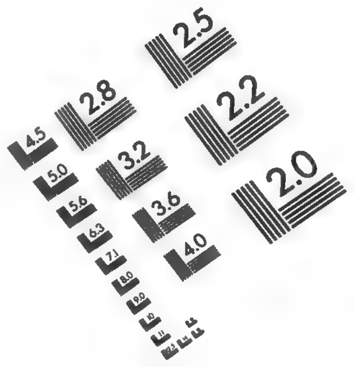
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"......Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor (Second Movement (Andante con moto)..........Beethoven
Varsang (Spring Sadness)..........Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major (London)—
Menuetto (Allegro)..........Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody..........Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute..Respighi
(a) Gagliarda. (b) Villanella. (c) Passo Mezzo e Mascherada.
Symphony No. 6 in B flat "Pathetic"
Second Movement: Allegro con grazia
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagne
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"
Rimsky-Korsako
Overture to "The Sold Bride"..........Smetan

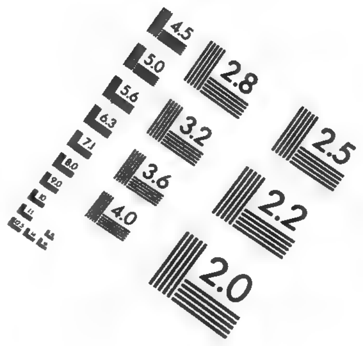
REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





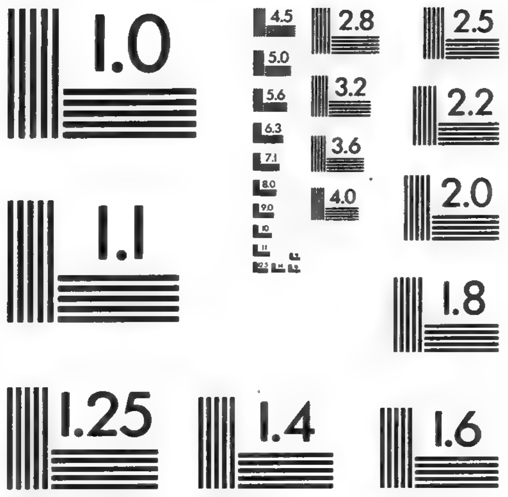




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

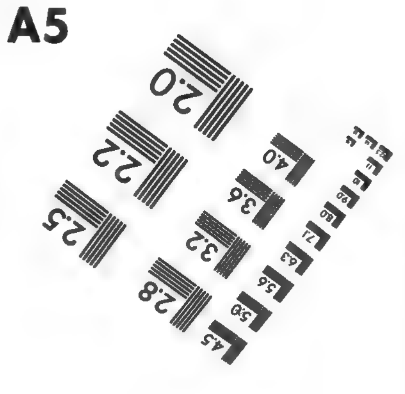
1.0 mm

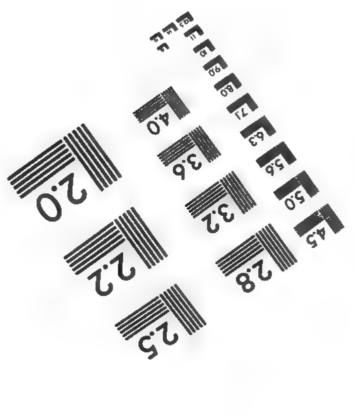
1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

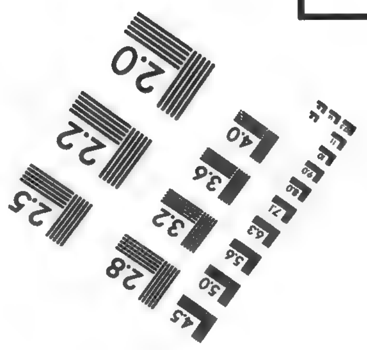
A5

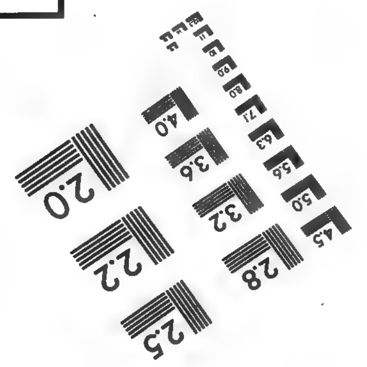




A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

108

Post May 17

The Pops

Surveying the prospective programmes for the third week of this the fortieth season of Pop Concerts, one is struck with the seriousness which these concerts, once frivolous occasions, are slowly and surely assuming. Berlioz, Beethoven, Wagner, Balakirev, Tchaikovsky are among the composers represented on Monday evening's programme, while lighter fare is offered by Mr. Jacchia's Gavotte "Camellia," Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" and the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Tuesday's concert brings the Sakunala Overture of Goldmark, Sibelius' "Finlandia" and the third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, while the Glee Club of the Boston City Club contributes part of the programme.

An all Russian programme will be given Wednesday evening, representing the Muscovite composers from Glikka and Rubinstein to Stravinsky and Rachmaninoff. Three of "The Five" are here: Mussorgsky, with the Prelud to "Khovantchina"; Borodin, with th "Prince Igor" Dances, and Rimsky-Korsakov, with the Fandango from th "Spanish Caprice." A brilliant evening is assured.

On Thursday comes Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan night, and college son deck the programme. Mr. Jacchia ar his orchestra will be heard, amo other numbers, in the Finale fro Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony and in Elgar's "Salut d'Amour," popular at the Pops in years gone by

Friday evening those who like mu frankly gay and unpretending m hear a selection from "Rose Mari Likewise on this programme are M Jacchia's arrangements of three Af American folk songs, and the Overt to "Rienzi." Alfred Holy, first harp of the Symphony Orchestra, will heard in a harp solo of his own co posing, by title, "In the Canoe."

The programme of Saturday, a v varied list, offers Strauss' walt "Wine, Women and Song," the "Dan of the Hours," from "La Gioconda and a "Chinese Dance" by the form Bostonian, Bainbridge Crist, now r siding in Europe.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 18

At the Pops Tonight

Hungarian March ....Berlioz
Overture, "Egmont" ....Beethoven
Waltz, "Blue Danube"......J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Liebesfreud ....Kreisler
Camellia-Gavotte ....Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey" Balakirev-Casella
Three Numbers from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" ....Chaikovsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Coronation March ....Svendsen

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANSCRIPT MAY 18

KOUSSEVITZKY ANEW: THE PERVERSE SIDES, THE POWER TO EXALT

THE CONDUCTOR AS HEARD BY A NOTED REVIEWER

Mr. Gilman in Survey of His Merits and Shortcomings—The Tendency to Distort with Examples from Schubert and Wagner—The Ability to Transfigure Variously Exemplified—Above All, Vitality

BEGINNING a series of articles about eminent conductors in the concert-halls of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, Mr. Lawrence Gilman of the New York Herald-Tribune yesterday discussed Mr. Koussevitzky, saying: "No one can listen to Mr. Koussevitzky direct even a single concert without being made aware that he possesses extraordinary virtues as a musician and conductor, but that among those virtues he finds room for irregularities of the most disconcerting sort. Now we should like to be able to feel about Mr. Koussevitzky's deflections as Wagner felt about the errors of Socrates and Plato, both of whom, he remarked, were artists, of such overwhelming power that, even in turning away from them, men are compelled to worship them. We should like to be able to rise to the divine height of that eminent European colleague of ours who, hearing Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the Bacchanale in "Tannhäuser" extolled it because, as he said, Mr. Koussevitzky made Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakov. But those altitudes are not for us. We have not yet been able to persuade ourselves that the music of a creative artist of highly individual style may be improved by causing it to sound as if it had been written by someone else. We have not yet succeeded in acquiring a taste for Schubert remade in the image of Chaikovsky, any more than we have learned to relish claret that has been peppered up by mixing it with champagne—though some speak highly of this quaint concoction.

"The guest-conductor, the guest-critic—these are all to the good; these we welcome. But the guest-composer we reject. The spectacle of Rimsky-Korsakov guest-composing for Wagner in the Bacchanale is one which we are unable to regard with equanimity. The precedent thus established is far too dangerous. We are uncomfortably alive to the possibility of Strau guest-composing for Debussy—of 'The Afternoon of a Faun' re-conceived as a fragment from 'The Life of a Hero'; of Weber een from the standpoint of the Celtic world of Arnold Bax, thus yielding a new classic to the orchestral list—the Overture o 'O'Beron.'

"Mr. Koussevitzky's traits and inclinaions as a conductor bring these possibiliies too close for comfort. He really does o things to the score of the Bacchanale, r instance, which make that transcendntly Wagnerian page sound like anything earth but Wagner—like Rimsky-Korsaov, if one chooses; and it is this tenency of his to pervert essential characteristics which seems to us to be Mr. Koussevitzky's most threatening quality. Two years ago, hearing him conduct in Paris, re said that Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to ack a finely discriminating sense of style. : seemed to us then that he was indifferent o the qualities that make Schubert an esthetic being distinct from Cha kov y, or Mozart or Mendelssohn, or Ravel. W sus-ected that he was insufficiently sensitive the enormity of making Beethoven sound ke Borodin, or Weber like Ethelbert evin. And this appeared to us a grievous ing; for we believe that there is no beayal less forgivable in an interpretative tist than this treachery to the essential irit of a creator. We can bear with an finitude of toleration—indeed with endss interest—the spectacle of an interprer extending the significance and the expressiveness of a composer on the plane of at composer's own implicit characteristics.

"There is no such thing as the correct interpretation of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony—there are hundreds, each as 'correct' (though the word has unbearable connotations) as the others. But these various and conflicting interpretations are right and acceptable to musicians of sensibility only when they are the result of a sympathetic perception which has seen to the heart of the quality which makes Schubert himself—unique and untransferable. A hundred conductors of intuition and imagination may look at Schubert from hundred different points of view, and recreate him according to a hundred different temperaments and experiences; and if each conductor has been looking steadily at Schubert and really seeing into his heart nd brain from whatver angle, each will ll us something of Schubert, and each ill tell us something different and new.

"But it is possible to look at Schubert ithout really seeing him as he is. You ay be strabismic, of your glasses may not it you, so that the image which is conveyed to your brain may bear only a distorted resemblance to the actual Schubert known to those hundred colleagues of yours who have seen him with unimpaired though differing eyes. We fancy that it is something of this sort that happens to Mr. Koussevitzky when he envisages certain music-makers who for one reason or another elude his apprehension. He seems to lack that grasp of essential characteristics which enables a conductor to persuade us of his right to take what liberties he will with a composer's music. Other leaders have flouted convention and pirouetted down the primrose path of musical license with far more abandon than Mr. Koussevitzky ever dared, and have escaped rebuke. But Mr. Koussevitzky is not among the fortunate class of those who Get Away With It. You disallow certain things in his Schubert, his Brahms, his Wagner, not because they are untraditional, irrubrical, and highly personal to Mr. Koussevitzky, but because they are neglectful of those basic characteristics which differentiate one composer from another; because they betray an insensibility to the qualities which make Schubert, for example, everlastingly though variously himself, and not Chaikovsky or Debussy; because they oppress you with a conviction that Mr. Koussevitzky is unaware of the infamy of making Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakov.

"But what of Mr. Koussevitzky's virtues, those 'extraordinary virtues' to which we referred at the start? First among them is that power of transmutation—that ability to transfigure the most unpromising material; to extract from the paltry, the jejune and the dull an unsuspected beauty, an incredible significance. Mr. Koussevitzky has this rare and wonderful power. He can take a lifeless and banal thing like the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov and fill it so full of his own electrifying intensity; lend it so much of his own ardor, his own force, that poor Glazunov becomes irradiated with a splendor that turns his rags to cloth-of-gold and fills his eyes with images of beauty and of wonder that he himself has never seen. This is what it means for a conductor to be able to give wings to sloths, to quicken mummies, and lift the leaden feet of the condemned. Mr. Koussevitzky can work such miracles of enlivenment. We have heard him confer upon dull and trivial and withered musi virtues is his genius for heightening and enriching not moribund and indigent music, but music that is alive and significant. We shall not soon forget what he made of 'Till Eulenspiegel' last winter in New York; of Steinberg's arrangement of the beautiful [illegible] o Grosso of Emanuel Bach [illegible] member with uncommon vivi [illegible] ormances which we heard [illegible] is of Stravinsky's 'Nightin- [illegible] Honegger's 'Chant de Joie,' of Bax's 'Garden of Fand,' of Prokoviev's 'Scythian Suite' (with which, for some reason or other, he was far less happy in New York), of the Suite in B minor of Bach, with Landowska at the harpsichord.

"There is much else that one might say of Mr. Koussevitzky—of his virtues and of what seem to be his defects. But it would be witless and unjust to attempt to sum him up at this stage of the game. Happily, he will be with us again next season, and there will be abundant opportunity to study him anew—to revise, perhaps, one's present impressions, perhaps to make confession of error or to avow a change of mind. But at least one can say with positiveness of Mr. Koussevitzky, that he is no dealer in clichés, no booster for the rubber stamp, no dispenser of interpretative platitudes. He thinks his own thoughts, goes his own way, dreams his own dreams. Conventions do not impress him; traditions are things to be suspected, tested and retested, perhaps discarded. He is often wrong, and, as it seems to us, perverse; he is often illuminatingly and superbly right. But almost always he is challenging and provocative and alive."

HERALD MAY 20

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

A Russian program, one of the most popular of the season, will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff" ....Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..Moussorgsky
Melody in F....................Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda" ....Glazounov
Entrance of Raymonda—Prelude and "La Romanesca"—Fantasic Waltz—Dance of the Arab Boys—Entrance of the Saracens.
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird"...... Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla".. Glinka
"Vocalise" ....Rachmaninov
Polonaise ....Liadov

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Percy N. Scholes, reviewing a concert of the London Symphony Orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as one who "habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship." It may be recalled that Mr. Koussevitzky said that no orchestra in the world played music by Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky as well as the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newman recently declared that there was no first class orchestra in London. Mr. Scholes said of the L. S. O.: "The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but works it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. I have spoken of Koussevitzky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river."

—•—

For his second concert in Paris, (May 30), Mr. Koussevitzky announced Denis Taylor's Suite "Through the Looking Glass." The other pieces were Bach-Steinberg, Concerto in D major for orchestra; Dukas, "The Peri;" Ravel, "The Waltz," and Miss Tailleperre's concerto played by her.

—•—

Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Furtwaengler or Mr. Mengelberg, viewing Mont Blanc for the first time, would exclaim that it was a sublime and unsurpassed example of the Creator's handiwork. Mr. Bodanzky would say that it was a pretty high hill. Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Furtwaengler and Mr. Mengelberg, in their conducting of Wagner, for example, err on the side of rhetoric and excessive emphasis. Their Wagner is generally too slow, too sentimental, too fussy, too loud or too soft. Mr. Bodanzky, on the other hand, though he is far more at home in this music than any of these particular colleagues of his, and has a truer instinct for its essential style, is inclined to scamp his Wagner. Too often he underplays it—perhaps for fear of sentimentalizing it.—Lawrence Gilman.

Advertiser May 19

Russian Music at Pop Concerts Wednesday

TOMORROW night will open the third week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Light music, played by an orchestra of eighty Symphony men and directed by Agide Jacchia, and light refreshments are offered. There will be a Russian program Wednesday night. Amherst and Williams men will attend the Thursday night concert. A symphonic program has been arranged for next Sunday's concert. The program for tomorow night follows:

Hungarian March ....Berlioz
Overture, "Egmont"..........Beethoven
Waltz, "Blue Danube"...........Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"..Wagner
Liebesfreud ....Kreisler
Camellio Gavotte ....Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islaamey" Balakirev-Caselia
Suite, "Nutcracker" ....Tchaikovsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticano" Mascagni
Coronation March ....Svendsen

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

MAY 17 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PRESENTS AMERICANS' SCORES IN EUROPE

Compositions by Deems Taylor, Henry Eichheim and Aaron Copeland on Programs.

BOSTON, May 16.—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is presenting n London and Paris three scores by young American composers. They are Deems Taylor's suite, "Through a Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and a symphony by Aaron Copland.

On May 11, the director began a series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, presenting Beethoven's Fifth, Seventh and Ninth symphonies as well as modern scores. His annual series of concerts Koussevitzky, in Paris, opening next Friday, will consist entirely of modern music. In London he led a Scriabin program, in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

HERALD MAY 18

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following numbers will be played at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of the Boston Conservatory of Music will be particularly represented:

Hungarian March.........................Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"...............Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"..............................Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Liebesfreud ....Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte..............................Jacchia
Oriental fantasy, "Islamey" Balakirev-Casella
Suite, Nutcracker .... Tchaikosky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Coronation March............................Svendsen

TRANSCRIPT MAY 20

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Program

March, "Suvorov" ....Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..Musorgsky
Melody in F.................Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
Suite from "Raymonda"......Glazunov
Lullaby from "The Fire Bird" Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March ....Chaikovsky
Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla" Glinka
Vocalise ....Rakhmaninov
Polonaise ....Liadov

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

MAY 19 1925

BOSTON ACCLAIMS NEW CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's First Season With Symphony Wins Him Instant Popularity in 'Hub' and New York

The popularity of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has grown so tremendously in this his first season in America that there will be no public sale of seats for either the local or New York concerts of that once famous organization that apparently is staging a "come back."

Koussevitzky made such an impression in New York that he was acclaimed the "rival" of Stakowski, the leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Koussevitzky is now in Paris to conduct his annual series of concerts which begin May 22 and his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony.

He will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 9.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 19

"The Boston Job"

A Naive Note from Mahler to Mengelberg

THE letters of Mahler have been collected and lately published in Vienna. Among them is a note written in 1908 to Mr. Mengelberg about "the Boston job"—that is to say, the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra. Mahler was then in New York on the staff of the Metropolitan Opera House. Dr. Muck was ending his rst term as conductor at Symphony all. Rumor ran that Mr. Mengel rg would be called from Amster m to succeed him, though the hoice subsequently fell upon the ferior Mr. Fiedler. At this juncture Mahler wrote to his friend, as translated by Ernest Newman in The New York Evening Post:

> The Boston position is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician cannot obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you cannot have any idea of this. In New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority.

MONITOR MAY 20

Tonight at the "Pops"

RUSSIAN PROGRAM

March, "Souvoroff" ....Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..... Moussorgsky
Melody in F.............Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda" ....Glazounoff
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird" Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" ....Glinka
"Vocalise" ....Rachmaninoff
Polonaise ....Liadoff

AMERICAN MAY 20

RUSSIAN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN AT POP CONCERT

A Russian program, one of the most popular of the season, will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff" ....Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"....Moussorgsky
Melody F.......................Rubinstein
Polovts nces from "Prince Igor" Borodin
Suite ....Glazounov
E Roma the Ar cens. da—Prelude and "La sic Waltz—Dance of trance of the Sara-Berceuse from "Fire Bird"...Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" Glinka
"Vocalise" ....Rachmaninov
Polonaise ....Liadov

HERALD MAY 19

NIGHT AT THE "POPS"

following program will be pre at the "Pop" concert in Sym hall tonight under Agide Jac direction:

"Carmen".........................Bize
to "Sakuntala"..............Goldmar
to the Sun from "Iris"........Mascag
t—Dawn—Sunrise
n City Club Glee Club
landia, Symphonic Poem ....Sibeli
e Music Box.......................Liad
ragonaise from "Le Cid"..........Massen ird Movement from the "Pathetic" sym-phany .... Tchaikovs elude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagn
lse, "Espana" ....Waldteu
arge of the Hussars .... Spind

AMERICAN MAY 19

GLEE CLUB SINGS AT "POPS" TONIGHT

The following program will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Prelude to "Carmen"...............Biz
Overture to "Sakuntala".........Goldma
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ...Mascag
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Boston City Club Glee Club
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem........Sibeli
The Music Box ....
Aragonaise from "Le Cid"........Mas
Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony ....Tchaiko
Prelude to "Lohengrin"...........Wa
Valse, "Espana" ....Waldte
Charge of the Hussars...........Spin

ADVERTISER MAY 20

RUSSIAN MUSIC BILL AT THE POPS TONIGH

A Russian program will be pr sented at the Pop Concert in Sy phony Hall tonight. The numbe follow:

March, "Souvoroff" .... Arens
Prelude, "Khovantchina" ..... Moussorg
Melody in F .... Rubenste
Polovtsian Dances .... Boro
Suite, "Raymonda" .... Glazou
Berceuse, "The Fire Bird" ..... Stravin
Fandango .... Rimsky-Korsak
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovs
Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla"

MONITOR MAY 18

Tonight at the "Pops"

BOSTON CONSERVATORY NIGHT

Hungarian March ....Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"...Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
"Liebesfreud" ....Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte ....Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey".... Balakireff-Casella
Suite, "Nutcracker"..Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ....Mascagni
Coronation March ....Svendsen

108

Post May 17

The Pops

Surveying the prospective programmes for the third week of this the fortieth season of Pop Concerts, one is struck with the seriousness which these concerts, once frivolous occasions, are slowly and surely assuming. Berlioz, Beethoven, Wagner, Balakirev, Tchaikovsky are among the composers represented on Monday evening's programme, while lighter fare is offered by Mr. Jacchia's Gavotte "Camellia," Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" and the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Tuesday's concert brings the Sakunala Overture of Goldmark, Sibelius' "Finlandia" and the third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, while the Glee Club of the Boston City Club contributes part of the programme.

An all Russian programme will be given Wednesday evening, representing the Muscovite composers from Glikka and Rubinstein to Stravinsky and Rachmaninoff. Three of "The Five" are here: Mussorgsky, with the Prelud to "Khovantchina"; Borodin, with th "Prince Igor" Dances, and Rimsky Korsakov, with the Fandango from th "Spanish Caprice." A brilliant even ing is assured.

On Thursday comes Amherst-Wil liams-Wesleyan night, and college song deck the programme. Mr. Jacchia ar his orchestra will be heard, amo other numbers, in the Finale fro Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony and in Elgar's "Salut d'Amour," popular at the Pops in years gone by.

Friday evening those who like mu frankly gay and unpretending m hear a selection from "Rose Mari Likewise on this programme are M Jacchia's arrangements of three Af American folk songs, and the Overt to "Rienzi." Alfred Holy, first har of the Symphony Orchestra, will heard in a harp solo of his own co posing, by title, "In the Canoe."

The programme of Saturday, a v varied list, offers Strauss' waltz "Wine, Women and Song," the "Dan of the Hours," from "La Gioconda and a "Chinese Dance" by the form Bostonian, Bainbridge Crist, now siding in Europe.

Advertiser May 19

Russian Music at Pop Concerts Wednesday

TOMORROW night will op the third week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Light music, played by an orchestra of eighty Symphony men and directed by Agide Jacchia, and light refreshments are offered. There will be a Russian program Wednesday night. Amherst and Williams men will attend the Thursday night concert. A symphonic program has been arranged for next Sunday's concert. The program for tomorow night follows:

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture, "Egemont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Liebesfreud	Kreisler
Camellio Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islaamey"	Balakirev Casella
Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticano"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

MAY 17 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PRESENTS AMERICANS' SCORES IN EUROPE

Compositions by Deems Taylor, Henry Eichheim and Aaron Copeland on Programs.

BOSTON, May 16.—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is presenting in London and Paris three scores by young American composers. They are Deems Taylor's suite, "Through a Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and a symphony by Aaron Copland.

On May 11, the director began a series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, presenting Beethoven's Fifth, Seventh and Ninth symphonies as well as modern scores. His annual series of concerts Koussevitzky, in Paris, opening next Friday, will consist entirely of modern music. In London he led a Scriabin program, in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

MAY 19 192

BOSTON ACCLAIMS NEW CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's First Season With Symphony Wins Him Instant Popularity in 'Hub' and New York

The popularity of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has grown so tremendously in this his first season in America that there will be no public sale of seats for either the local or New York concerts of that once famous organization that apparently is staging a "come back."

Koussevitzky made such an impression in New York that he was acclaimed the "rival" of Stakowski, the leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Koussevitzky is now in Paris to conduct his annual series of concerts which begin May 22 and his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony.

He will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 9.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 19

"The Boston Job"

A Naive Note from Mahler to Mengelberg

THE letters of Mahler have been collected and lately published in Vienna. Among them is a note written in 1908 to Mr. Mengelberg about "the Boston job"—that is to say, the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra. Mahler was then in New York on the staff of the Metropolitan Opera House. Dr. Muck was ending his rst term as conductor at Symphony all. Rumor ran that Mr. Mengel rg would be called from Amster m to succeed him, though the hoice subsequently fell upon the ferior Mr. Fiedler. At this juncture Mahler wrote to his friend, as translated by Ernest Newman in The New York Evening Post:

> The Boston position is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician cannot obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you cannot have any idea of this. In New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority.

HERALD MAY 19

ONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

following program will be pre at the "Pop" concert in Sym hall tonight under Agide Jac direction:

o "Carmen"	Bize
to Sakuntala"	Goldmar
to the Sun from "Iris"	Mascag
t—Dawn—Sunrise
on City Club Glee Club
ndandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibeli
e Music Box	Liad
ragonaise from "Le Cid"	Massen
ird Movement from the "Pathetic" symphany	Tchaikovs
elude to "Lohengrin"	Wagr
lse, "Espana"	Waldteu
arge of the Hussars	Spind

AMERICAN MAY 19

GLEE CLUB SINGS AT "POPS" TONIGHT

The following program will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Prelude to "Carmen"	Biz
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmar
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"	Mascag
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Boston City Club Glee Club
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibeli
The Music Box
Aragonaise from "Le Cid"	Masg
Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony	Tchaiko
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wa
Valse, "Espana"	Waldte
Charge of the Hussars	Spin

TRANSCRIPT MAY 18

At the Pops Tonight

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Liebesfreud	Kreisler
Camellia-Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey"	Balakirev-Casella
Three Numbers from the Ballet, "Nutcracker"	Chaikovsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HERALD MAY 18

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following numbers will be played at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of the Boston Conservatory of Music will be particularly represented:

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Liebesfreud	Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental fantasy, "Islamey"	Balakirev-Casella
Suite. Nutcracker	Tchaikosky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

TRANSCRIPT MAY 20

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Program

March, "Suvorov"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Musorgsky
Melody in F	Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite from "Raymonda"	Glazunov
Lullaby from "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March	Chaikovsky
Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
Vocalise	Rakhmaninov
Polonaise	Liadov

Conductor: A. Jacchia

MONITOR MAY 20

Tonight at the "Pops"

RUSSIAN PROGRAM

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody in F	Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda"	Glazounoff
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave	Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Vocalise"	Rachmaninoff
Polonaise	Liadoff

AMERICAN MAY 20

RUSSIAN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN AT POP CONCERT

A Russian program, one of the most popular of the season, will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody F	Rubinstein
Polovts nces from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite [illegible]	Glazounov
E [illegible] da—Prelude and "La Roma [illegible] sic Waltz—Dance of the Ar [illegible] trance of the Saracens.
Berceuse from "[illegible] Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Vocalise"	Rachmaninov
Polonaise	Liadov

ADVERTISER MAY 20

RUSSIAN MUSIC BILL AT THE POPS TONIGH

A Russian program will be pr sented at the Pop Concert in Syn phony Hall tonight. The numbe follow:

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensl
Prelude, "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsl
Melody in F	Rubenste
Polovtsian Dances	Borod
Suite, "Raymonda"	Glazoun
Berceuse, "The Fire Bird"	Stravins
Fandango	Rimsky-Korsak
Marche Slave	Tchaikovs
Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla"

KOUSSEVITZKY ANEW: THE PERVERSE SIDES, THE POWER TO EXALT

TRANSCRIPT MAY 18

THE CONDUCTOR AS HEARD BY A NOTED REVIEWER

Mr. Gilman in Survey of His Merits and Shortcomings—The Tendency to Distort with Examples from Schubert and Wagner—The Ability to Transfigure Variously Exemplified—Above All, Vitality

BEGINNING a series of articles about eminent conductors in the concert-halls of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, Mr. Lawrence Gilman of the New York Herald-Tribune yesterday discussed Mr. Koussevitzky, saying: "No one can listen to Mr. Koussevitzky direct even a single concert without being made aware that he possesses extraordinary virtues as a musician and conductor, but that among those virtues he finds room for irregularities of the most disconcerting sort. Now we should like to be able to feel about Mr. Koussevitzky's deflections as Wagner felt about the errors of Socrates and Plato, both of whom, he remarked, were artists, of such overwhelming power that, even in turning away from them, men are compelled to worship them. We should like to be able to rise to the divine height of that eminent European colleague of ours who, hearing Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the Bacchanale in "Tannhäuser" extolled it because, as he said, Mr. Koussevitzky made Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakov. But those altitudes are not for us. We have not yet been able to persuade ourselves that the music of a creative artist of highly individual style may be improved by causing it to sound as if it had been written by someone else. We have not yet succeeded in acquiring a taste for Schubert remade in the image of Chaikovsky, any more than we have learned to relish claret that has been peppered up by mixing it with champagne—though some speak highly of this quaint concoction.

"The guest-conductor, the guest-critic—these are all to the good; these we welcome. But the guest-composer we reject. The spectacle of Rimsky-Korsakov guest-composing for Wagner in the Bacchanale is one which we are unable to regard with equanimity. The precedent thus established is far too dangerous. We are uncomfortably alive to the possibility of Strau guest-composing for Debussy—of 'The Afternoon of a Faun' re-conceived as a fragment from 'The Life of a Hero'; of Weber seen from the standpoint of the Celtic world of Arnold Bax, thus yielding a new lassic to the orchestral list—the Overture o 'O'Beron.'

"Mr. Koussevitzky's traits and inclina- ons as a conductor bring these possibili- es too close for comfort. He really does o things to the score of the Bacchanale, r instance, which make that transcend- ntly Wagnerian page sound like anything earth but Wagner—like Rimsky-Korsa- ov, if one chooses; and it is this ten- ncy of his to pervert essential character- istics which seems to us to be Mr. Kousse- itzky's most threatening quality. Two ears ago, hearing him conduct in Paris, e said that Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to ack a finely discriminating sense of style. seemed to us then that he was indifferent o the qualities that make Schubert an sthetic being distinct from Chaikovsky, or ozart or Mendelssohn, or Ravel. We sus- ected that he was insufficiently sensitive the enormity of making Beethoven sound ke Borodin, or Weber like Ethelbert evin. And this appeared to us a grievous ing; for we believe that there is no be- ayal less forgivable in an interpretative tist than this treachery to the essential irit of a creator. We can bear with an finitude of toleration—indeed with end- ss interest—the spectacle of an interpre- r extending the significance and the ex- essiveness of a composer on the plane of at composer's own implicit character- istics.

"There is no such thing as the correct interpretation of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony—there are hundreds, each as 'correct' (though the word has unbearable connotations) as the others. But these various and conflicting interpretations are right and acceptable to musicians of sensibility only when they are the result of a sympathetic perception which has seen to he heart of the quality which makes chubert himself—unique and untransferable. A hundred conductors of intuition nd imagination may look at Schubert from hundred different points of view, and reate him according to a hundred different emperaments and experiences; and if each onductor has been looking steadily at chubert and really seeing into his heart nd brain from whatver angle, each will ll us something of Schubert, and each ill tell us something different and new.

"But it is possible to look at Schubert ithout really seeing him as he is. You ay be strabismic, of your glasses may not it you, so that the image which is conveyed to your brain may bear only a distorted resemblance to the actual Schu- bert known to those hundred colleagues of yours who have seen him with unimpaired though differing eyes. We fancy that it is something of this sort that happens to Mr. Koussevitzky when he envisages certain music-makers who for one reason or another elude his apprehension. He seems to lack that grasp of essential characteristics which enables a conductor to persuade us of his right to take what liberties he will with a composer's music. Other leaders have flouted convention and pirouetted down the primrose path of musical license with far more abandon than Mr. Koussevitzky ever dared, and have escaped rebuke. But Mr. Koussevitzky is not among the fortunate class of those who Get Away With It. You disallow certain things in his Schubert, his Brahms, his Wagner, not because they are untraditional, irrubrical, and highly personal to Mr. Koussevitzky, but because they are neglectful of those basic characteristics which differentiate one composer from another; because they betray an insensibility to the qualities which make Schubert, for example, everlastingly though variously himself, and not Chaikovsky or Debussy; because they oppress you with a conviction that Mr. Koussevitzky is unaware of the infamy of making Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakov.

"But what of Mr. Koussevitzky's virtues, those 'extraordinary virtues' to which we referred at the start? First among them is that power of transmutation—that ability to transfigure the most unpromising material; to extract from the paltry, the jejune and the dull an unsuspected beauty, an incredible significance. Mr. Koussevitzky has this rare and wonderful power. He can take a lifeless and banal thing like the Eighth Symphony of Glazunov and fill it so full of his own electrifying intensity; lend it so much of his own ardor, his own force, that poor Glazunov becomes irradiated with a splendor that turns his rags to cloth-of-gold and fills his eyes with images of beauty and of wonder that he himself has never seen. This is what it means for a conductor to be able to give wings to sloths, to quicken mummies, and lift the leaden feet of the condemned. Mr. Koussevitzky can work such miracles of enlivenment. We have heard him confer upon dull and trivial and withered musi a [illegible] or an [illegible] or a loveliness altogether unsuspected and surprising. We have heard him do this with faded music of the past, with music of yesterday and of today; and so we know that this inestimable gift is his.

"Another of Mr. Koussevitzky's salient virtues is his genius for heightening and enriching not moribund and indigent music, but music that is alive and significant. We shall not soon forget what he made of 'Till Eulenspiegel' last winter in New York; of Steinberg's arrangement of the beautiful [illegible] to Grosso of Emanuel Bach [illegible] vivid [illegible] member with uncommon [illegible] rmances which we heard [illegible] is of Stravinsky's 'Nightin- [illegible] Honegger's 'Chant de Joie,' of Bax's 'Garden of Fand,' of Prokoviev's 'Scythian Suite' (with which, for some reason or other, he was far less happy in New York), of the Suite in B minor of Bach, with Landowska at the harpsichord.

"There is much else that one might say of Mr. Koussevitzky—of his virtues and of what seem to be his defects. But it would be witless and unjust to attempt to sum him up at this stage of the game. Happily, he will be with us again next season, and there will be abundant opportunity to study him anew—to revise, perhaps, one's present impressions, perhaps to make confession of error or to avow a change of mind. But at least one can say with positiveness of Mr. Koussevitzky that he is no dealer in clichés, no booster for the rubber stamp, no dispenser of interpretative platitudes. He thinks his own thoughts, goes his own way, dreams his own dreams. Conventions do not impress him; traditions are things to be suspected, tested and retested, perhaps discarded. He is often wrong, and, as it seems to us, perverse; he is often illuminatingly and superbly right. But almost always he is challenging and provocative and alive."

HERALD MAY 20

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

A Russian program, one of the most popular of the season, will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody in F	Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda"	Glazounov
Entrance of Raymonda—Prelude and "La Romanesca"—Fantasic Waltz—Dance of the Arab Boys—Entrance of the Saracens.
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Vocalise"	Rachmaninov
Polonaise	Liadov

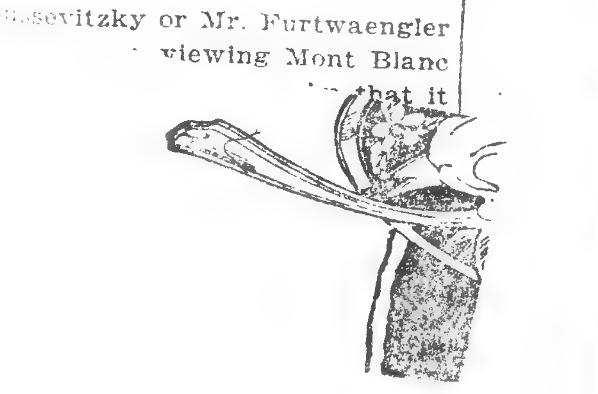
NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Percy N. Scholes, reviewing a concert of the London Symphony Orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as one who "habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship." It may be recalled that Mr. Koussevitzky said that no orchestra in the world played music by Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky as well as the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newman recently declared that there was no first class orchestra in London. Mr. Scholes said of the L. S. O.: "The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but works it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. I have spoken of Koussevitzky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river."

For his second concert in Paris, (May 30), Mr. Koussevitzky announced Denis Taylor's Suite "Through the Looking Glass." The other pieces were Bach-Steinberg, Concerto in D major for orchestra; Dukas, "The Peri;" Ravel, "The Waltz," and Miss Tailleperre's concerto played by her.

Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Furtwaengler or [illegible] viewing Mont Blanc fo [illegible] that it w o d l



MONITOR MAY 18

Tonight at the "Pops"

BOSTON CONSERVATORY NIGHT

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
"Liebesfreud"	Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey"	Balakireff-Casella
Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

108

Post May 17

The Pops

Surveying the prospective programmes for the third week of this the fortieth season of Pop Concerts, one is struck with the seriousness which these concerts, once frivolous occasions, are slowly and surely assuming. Berlioz, Beethoven, Wagner, Balakirev, Tchaikovsky are among the composers represented on Monday evening's programme, while lighter fare is offered by Mr. Jacchia's Gavotte "Camellia," Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" and the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Tuesday's concert brings the Sakunala Overture of Goldmark, Sibelius' "Finlandia" and the third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, while the Glee Club of the Boston City Club contributes part of the programme.

An all Russian programme will be given Wednesday evening, representing the Muscovite composers from Glikka and Rubinstein to Stravinsky and Rachmaninoff. Three of "The Five are here: Mussorgsky, with the Prelud to "Khovantchina"; Borodin, with th "Prince Igor" Dances, and Rimsky Korsakov, with the Fandango from th "Spanish Caprice." A brilliant evening is assured.

On Thursday comes Amherst-Williams-Wesleyan night, and college song deck the programme. Mr. Jacchia ar his orchestra will be heard, amo other numbers, in the Finale fro Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony and in Elgar's "Salut d'Amour," popular at the Pops in years gone by

Friday evening those who like mu frankly gay and unpretending m hear a selection from "Rose Mari Likewise on this programme are M Jacchia's arrangements of three Af American folk songs, and the Overt to "Rienzi." Alfred Holy, first har of the Symphony Orchestra, will heard in a harp solo of his own co posing, by title, "In the Canoe."

The programme of Saturday, a v varied list, offers Strauss' walt "Wine, Women and Song," the "Dan of the Hours," from "La Gioconda and a "Chinese Dance" by the form Bostonian, Bainbridge Crist, now r siding in Europe.

Advertiser May 19

Russian Music at Pop Concerts Wednesday

TOMORROW night will o the third week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Light music, played by an orchestra of eighty Symphony men and directed by Agide Jacchia, and light refreshments are offered. There will be a Russian program Wednesday night. Amherst and Williams men will attend the Thursday night concert. A symphonic program has been arranged for next Sunday's concert. The program for tomorow night follows:

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture, "Egemont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	Straus
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagne
Liebesfreud	Kreisle
Camellio Gavotte	Jacch
Oriental Fantasy, "Islaamey"	Balakirev-Casel
Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsk
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticano"	Mascag
Coronation March	Svend

TRANSCRIPT MAY 19

"The Boston Job"

A Naive Note from Mahler to Mengelberg

THE letters of Mahler have been collected and lately published in Vienna. Among them is a note written in 1908 to Mr. Mengelberg about "the Boston job"—that is to say, the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra. Mahler was then in New York on the staff of the Metropolitan Opera House. Dr. Muck was ending his rst term as conductor at Symphony all. Rumor ran that Mr. Mengel- rg would be called from Amster- ım to succeed him, though the hoice subsequently fell upon the ıferior Mr. Fiedler. At this juncture Mahler wrote to his friend, as translated by Ernest Newman in The New York Evening Post:

> The Boston position is the finest imaginable for a musician. It is the first and highest on the whole continent. An orchestra of the first rank. Unlimited sovereign power. A social standing such as the musician cannot obtain in Europe. A public of whose keenness to learn and whose gratitude the European can form no conception. After your New York experiences you cannot have any idea of this. In New York the theater is the central point of interest, and concerts the affair only of a small minority.

Herald May 19

ONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

following program will be pre at the "Pop" concert in Sym hall tonight under Agide Jac direction:

o "Carmen"	Bize
to "Sakuntala"	Goldmar
to the Sun from "Iris"	Mascag
t—Dawn—Sunrise
n City Club Glee Club
ıandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibeli
e Music Box	Liad
ragonaise from "Le Cid"	Massen
ird Movement from the "Pathetic" symphany	Tchaikovs
elude to "Lohengrin"	Wagr
lse, "Espana"	Waldteu
arge of the Hussars	Spind

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

MAY 17 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY PRESENTS AMERICANS' SCORES IN EUROPE

Compositions by Deems Taylor, Henry Eichheim and Aaron Copeland on Programs.

BOSTON, May 16.—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is presenting n London and Paris three scores y young American composers. They are Deems Taylor's suite, "Through a Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and a symphony by Aaron Copland.

On May 11, the director began a series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, presenting Beethoven's Fifth, Seventh and Ninth symphonies as well as modern scores. His annual series of concerts Koussevitzky, in Paris, opening next Friday, will consist entirely of modern music. In London he led a Seriabin program, in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composer's death.

HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

MAY 19 192

BOSTON ACCLAIMS NEW CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's First Season With Symphony Wins Him Instant Popularity in 'Hub' and New York

The popularity of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has grown so tremendously in this his first season in America that there will be no public sale of seats for either the local or New York concerts of that once famous organization that apparently is staging a "come back."

Koussevitzky made such an impression in New York that he was acclaimed the "rival" of Stakowski, the leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Koussevitzky is now in Paris to conduct his annual series of concerts which begin May 22 and his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony.

He will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 9.

AMER[illegible] MAY 19

GLEE CLUB SINGS AT "POPS" TONIGHT

The following program will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Prelude to "Carmen"	Biz
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmai
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"	Mascag
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Boston City Club Glee Club
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibel
The Music Box	K
Aragonaise from "Le Cid"	Masg
Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony	Tchaiko
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wa
Valse, "Espana"	Waldte
Charge of the Hussars	Spir

TRANSCRIPT MAY 18

At the Pops Tonight

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Liebesfreud	Kreisler
Camellia-Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey"	Balakirev-Casella
Three Numbers from the Ballet, "Nutcracker"	Chaikovsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HERALD MAY 18

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following numbers will be played at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of the Boston Conservatory of Music will be particularly represented:

Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Liebesfreud	Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental fantasy, "Islamey"	Balakirev-Casella
Suite, Nutcracker	Tchaikosky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

TRANSCRIPT MAY 20

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Program

March, "Suvorov"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Musorgsky
Melody in F	Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite from "Raymonda"	Glazunov
Lullaby from "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March	Chaikovsky
Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
Vocalise	Rakhmaninov
Polonaise	Liadov

Conductor: A. Jacchia

MONITOR MAY 20

Tonight at the "Pops"

RUSSIAN PROGRAM

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody in F	Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda"	Glazounoff
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave	Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Vocalise"	Rachmaninoff
Polonaise	Liadoff

AMERICAN MAY 20

RUSSIAN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN AT POP CONCERT

A Russian program, one of the most popular of the season, will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody F	Rubinstein
Polovts nces from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite	Glazounov
E Roma the Ar cens. da—Prelude and "La sic Waltz—Dance of trance of the Sara-
Berceuse from ire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Vocalise"	Rachmaninov
Polonaise	Liadov

ADVERTISER MAY 20

RUSSIAN MUSIC BILL AT THE POPS TONIGH

A Russian program will be pr sented at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude, "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody in F	Rubenstein
Polovtsian Dances	Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda"	Glazounoy
Berceuse, "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla"
"Vocalise"

KOUSSEVITZKY ANEW: THE PERVERSE SIDES, THE POWER TO EXALT

TRANSCRIPT MAY 18

THE CONDUCTOR AS HEARD BY A NOTED REVIEWER

Mr. Gilman in Survey of His Merits and Shortcomings—The Tendency to Distort with Examples from Schubert and Wagner — The Ability to Transfigure Variously Exemplified—Above All, Vitality

BEGINNING a series of articles about eminent conductors in the concert-halls of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, Mr. Lawrence Gilman of the New York Herald-Tribune yesterday discussed Mr. Koussevitzky, saying: "No one can listen to Mr. Koussevitzky direct even a single concert without being made aware that he possesses extraordinary virtues as a musician and conductor, but that among those virtues he finds room for irregularities of the most disconcerting sort. Now we should like to be able to feel about Mr. Koussevitzky's deflections as Wagner felt about the errors of Socrates and Plato, both of whom, he remarked, were artists, of such overwhelming power that, even in turning away from them, men are compelled to worship them. We should like to be able to rise to the divine height of that eminent European colleague of ours who, hearing Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the Bacchanale in "Tannhäuser" extolled it because, as he said, Mr. Koussevitzky made Wagner sound like Rimsky-Korsakov. But those altitudes are not for us. We have not yet been able to persuade ourselves that the music of a creative artist of highly individual style may be improved by causing it to sound as if it had been written by someone else. We have not yet succeeded in acquiring a taste for Schubert remade in the image of Chaikovsky, any more than we have learned to relish claret that has been peppered up by mixing it with champagne—though some speak highly of this quaint concoction.

"The guest-conductor, the guest-critic—these are all to the good; these we welcome. But the guest-composer we reject. The spectacle of Rimsky-Korsakov guest-composing for Wagner in the Bacchanale is one which we are unable to regard with equanimity. The precedent thus established is far too dangerous. We are uncomfortably alive to the possibility of Strau guest-composing for Debussy—of 'The Afternoon of a Faun' re-conceived as a fragment from 'The Life of a Hero'; of Weber seen from the standpoint of the Celtic world of Arnold Bax, thus yielding a new classic to the orchestral list—the Overture o 'O'Beron.'

"Mr. Koussevitzky's traits and inclina- ons as a conductor bring these possibili- es too close for comfort. He really does o things to the score of the Bacchanale, r instance, which make that transcend- ıtly Wagnerian page sound like anything ı earth but Wagner—like Rimsky-Korsa- ov, if one chooses; and it is this ten- ency of his to pervert essential characteristics which seems to us to be Mr. Kousse- vitzky's most threatening quality. Two ears ago, hearing him conduct in Paris, e said that Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to ack a finely discriminating sense of style. seemed to us then that he was indifferent o the qualities that make Schubert an sthetic being distinct from Chaikov v, or lozart or Mendelssohn, or Ravel. W sus- ected that he was insufficiently sensitive the enormity of making Beethoven sound ke Borodin, or Weber like Ethelbert evin. And this appeared to us a grievous ing; for we believe that there is no be- ayal less forgivable in an interpretative tist than this treachery to the essential irit of a creator. We can bear with an finitude of toleration—indeed with end- ss interest—the spectacle of an interpre- r extending the significance and the ex- essiveness of a composer on the plane of at composer's own implicit character- istics.

"There is no such thing as the correct interpretation of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony—there are hundreds, each as 'correct' (though the word has unbearable connotations) as the others. But these arious and conflicting interpretations are ight and acceptable to musicians of sensibility only when they are the result of a ympathetic perception which has seen to he heart of the quality which makes Schubert himself—unique and untransfer- ble. A hundred conductors of intuition nd imagination may look at Schubert from hundred different points of view, and re- reate him according to a hundred different emperaments and experiences; and if each onductor has been looking steadily at chubert and really seeing into his heart nd brain from whatver angle, each will ll us something of Schubert, and each ill tell us something different and new.

"But it is possible to look at Schubert ithout really seeing him as he is. You ay be strabismic, of your glasses may not it you, so that the image which is conveyed to your brain may bear only a distorted resemblance to the actual Schubert known to those hundred colleagues of ours who have seen him with unimpaired ch differing eyes. We fancy that something of this sort that happens r. Koussevitzky when he a mood or an em ion or a loveliness altogether unsuspected and surprising. We have heard him do this with faded music of the past, with music of yesterday and of today; and so we know that this inestimable gift is his.

"Another of Mr. Koussevitzky's salient virtues is his genius for heightening and enriching not moribund and indigent music, but music that is alive and significant. We shall not soon forget what he made of 'Till Eulenspiegel' last winter in New York; of Steinberg's arrangement of the beautiful o Grosso of Emanuel Bach vivi member with uncommon rmances which we heard is of Stravinsky's 'Nightin- Honegger's 'Chant de Joie,' of Bax's 'Garden of Fand,' of Prokoviev's 'Scythian Suite' (with which, for some reason or other, he was far less happy in New York), of the Suite in B minor of Bach, with Landowska at the harpsichord.

"There is much else that one might say of Mr. Koussevitzky—of his virtues and of what seem to be his defects. But it would be witless and unjust to attempt to sum him up at this stage of the game. Happily, he will be with us again next season, and there will be abundant opportunity to study him anew—to revise, perhaps, one's present impressions, perhaps to make confession of error or to avow a change of mind. But at least one can say with positiveness of Mr. Koussevitzky, that he is no dealer in clichés, no booster for the rubber stamp, no dispenser of interpretative platitudes. He thinks his own thoughts, goes his own way, dreams his own dreams. Conventions do not impress him; traditions are things to be suspected, tested and retested, perhaps discarded. He is often wrong, and, as it seems to us, perverse; he is often illuminatingly and superbly right. But almost always he is challenging and provocative and alive."

HERALD MAY

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

A Russian program, one of the most popular of the season, will be presented at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

March, "Souvoroff"	Arensky
Prelude to "Khovantchina"	Moussorgsky
Melody in F	Rubinstein
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Suite, "Raymonda"	Glazounov
Entrance of Raymonda—Prelude and "La Romanesca"—Fantasic Waltz—Dance of the Arab Boys—Entrance of the Saracens.
Berceuse from "The Fire Bird"	Stravinsky
Fandango from "Caprice on Spanish Themes"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Vocalise"	Rachmaninov
Polonaise	Liadov

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

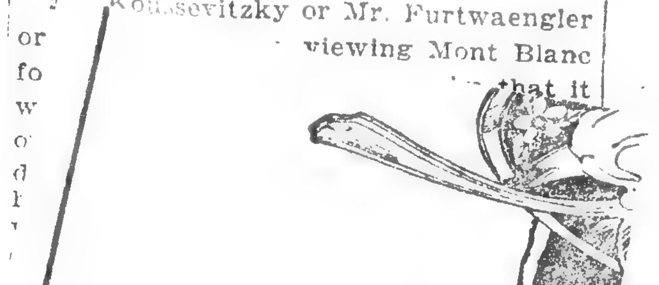
Mr. Percy N. Scholes, reviewing a concert of the London Symphony Orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as one who "habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship." It may be recalled that Mr. Koussevitzky said that no orchestra in the world played music by Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky as well as the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newman recently declared that there was no first class orchestra in London. Mr. Scholes said of the L. S. O.: "The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but works it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. I have spoken of Koussevitzky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river."

—•—

For his second concert in Paris, (May 30), Mr Koussevitzky announced Denis Taylor's Suite "Through the Looking Glass." The other pieces were Bach-Steinberg, Concerto in D major for orchestra; Dukas, "The Peri;" Ravel, "The Waltz," and Miss Tailleperre's concerto played by her.

—•—

Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Furtwaengler or viewing Mont Blanc fo that it w o d r



MONITOR MAY 18

Tonight at the "Pops"

BOSTON CONSERVATORY NIGHT

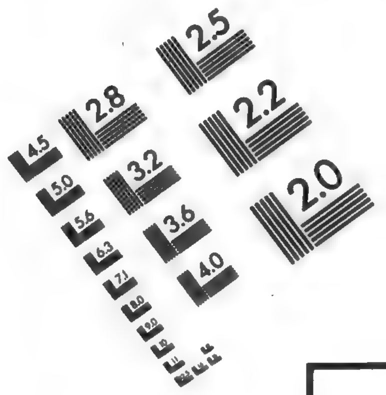
Hungarian March	Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Aïda"	Verdi
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
"Liebesfreud"	Kreisler
Camellia Gavotte	Jacchia
Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey"	Balakireff-Casella
Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Coronation March	Svendsen

REDUCTION

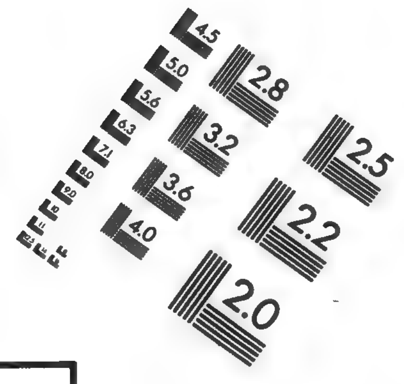
RATIO

12x

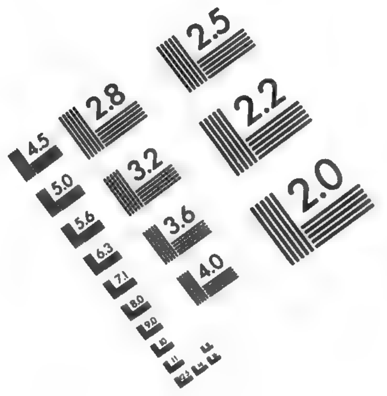
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



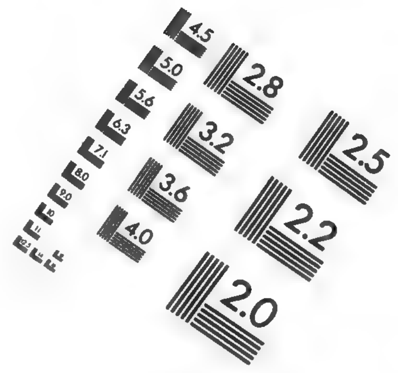
2.5
2.2
2.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0



2.5
2.2
2.0
4.5
2.8
5.0
3.2
5.6
3.6
4.0

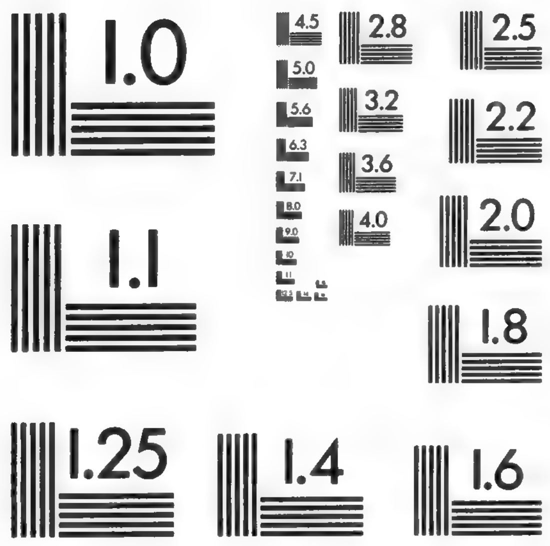


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.8
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

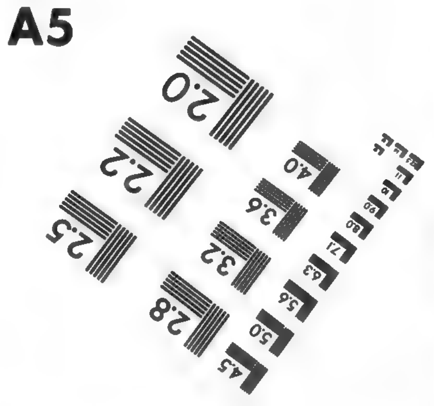
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm 1.5 mm 2.0 mm 2.5 mm

A5

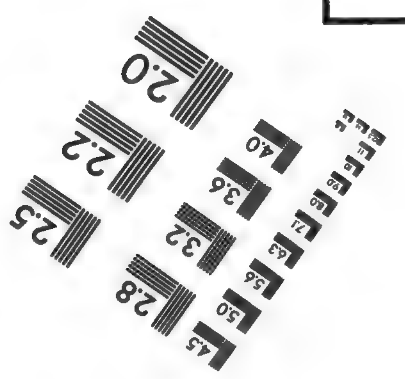


2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

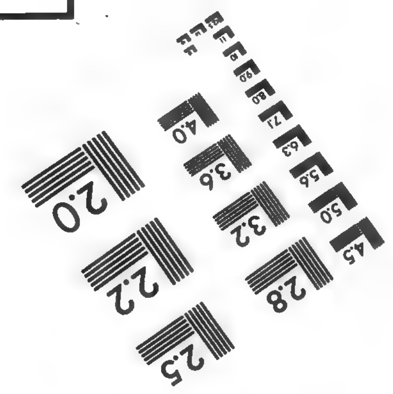
4.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.0
2.2
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



4.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.0
2.2
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

109

FIVE PAIRS OF SEATS AT 'POPS' FOR JINGLES

Five pairs of best seats for "The Pops" at Symphony Hall are offered as extra prizes for clever "last lines" submitted to Jingle No. 74 which is printed today in the Boston Evening American Limerick tournament.

These seats will be for next Monday evening, when an especially interesting program will be played including Strauss' ever-lovely "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz.

Persons familiar with "The Pops" realize what a treat is in store for the winners of these extra prizes. "The Pops" constitute one of the finest enteretainments offered to the Boston public. Nearly 100 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comprise the group of musicians that play "The Pops" programs in the inspiring temple of music at the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. The atmosphere at these concerts is of the best.

The concert program for next Monday evening which will be heard by the winners of the best "last lines" submitted to today's Jingle is as follows:

1—Hungarian March	Berlioz
2—Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
3—Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube,	Strauss
4—Fantasia: "Aida"	Verdi
5—Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde."	Wagner
6—Liebesfreud	Kreisler
7—Camellia Gavotte	Jacchia
8—Oriental Fantasy "Islamey."	Balakirev-Casella
9—Suite: "Nutcracker"	Tchaikowsky
10—Intermezzo: "Cavelleria Rusticana,"	Mascagni
11—Coronation March	Svendsen

Creating "last liness" for Boston Evening American Prize Limericks while at the movies is one of the favorite pastimes of Mrs. T. O. Bailey of Merrimacport. While watching her favorite star, a clever idea comes to Mrs. Bailey every now and then, which she forthwith places on paper. Throughout the evening she keeps pencil and paper in her lap so that no good thought will escape her.

"I have sent in 'last lines' to 61 Jingles," she wrote. "I thought each of them would be a prize winner until I saw the winning 'last line' printed in the Boston Evening American and then I knew that mine were only fit for the wastebasket."

"I have centainly tried very hard to land a prize," she continued. "These answers I made at the movies. I took a pencil and paper with me to do my jingle 'last lines' while at the show. Whether they are good or not you are going to get them, Mr. Judge. As stated in one of the recent limericks, I have 'scratched my bonehead' many times while trying to make good 'last lines' to the jingles, but when the winning 'last lines" appear in the paper I say to myself, 'Oh, you mudhead.' Jingling quickens your thought and is good schooling."

Madge McKenney of Dover street, Somerville, a beginner at "lastlining," writes: "I have composed several last lines to the Limerick, but have never sent one of them in. Several times my 'last lines' have been nearly the same as the winner, so Ithought I had better try my fortune. If I don't win anything I am going to keep on trying. I enjoy them very much."

H. Peyton Hopkins, winner of theatre tickets, sends thanks as follows:

"Many thinks for the seats at the Wilbur Theatre. I also won a dollar prize, for which I am very grateful. I will not be satisfied now until I win that first prize. As my mother recently won a first prize in a similar competition in Philadelphia, I should like to do likewise. I enjoy the rest of the Boston Evening American as much as the jingles and

---

~~TRAVELER MAY 21~~

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Songs by the Amherst Glee Club and the Glee clubs of Williams and Wesleyan will be featured at the "Pops"-concert in Symphony hall tonight.

The program follows:

Overture to "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
College Songs
Suite from "The Cid"	Massenet
(a) Castillane (b) Andalouse (c) Aragonaise.
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
College Songs
Polonaise	Chopin
Salut d'Amour	Elgar
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Berlioz

---

tors whose terms ... were reof the company during 1924 were reported at $215,501,187 and the number of stores in operation as 1256.

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

Songs by the Amherst Glee Club and the Glee Clubs of Williams and Wesleyan will be featured at the "Pop" concret in Symphony Hall tonight which is of general public interest. Programme follows:

Overture to "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
College Songs.
Suite from "The Cid"	Massenet
(a) Castillane, (b) Andalouse, (c) Aragonaise.
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
College Songs.
Polonaise	Chopin
Salut d'Amour	Elgar
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Berlioz

n).

Post 21

Trampl

...nd it the most interesting of the Boston papers."

Michael A. Ahern of Hillside street, Roxbury, another fan, writes: "I 'last lined' my way to a dollar award in your Limerick tournament. Allow me to congratulate you on your selection of first prize winners. Each one printed certainly has been worthy of that honor."

AMERICAN MAY 22

ALFRED HOLY TO PLAY HARP SOLO AT 'POP'

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Orientale	Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs...arr. by Jacchia
(a) You May Burry Me in de Eas'. (b) Musieu Banjo. (c) Nobudy Knows de Trubble I've Seen.
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"	Holy
Alfred Holy.
La Tristesse du Printemps	Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"	Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"	Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvorak

~~HERALD MAY 21~~

Mr. Koussevitzky, by permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct in New York next November, under the auspices of the League of Composers, a concert of modern orchestral works by Europeans and Americans. The players will be "picked men" from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HAD NO SMOKING AT REHEARSALS

~~Post MAY 21~~

Mr. Monteux Corrects Statement Regarding Discipline in Symphony Orchestra During His Five Years

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—It has always been a resolve of mine never to answer any newspaper articles in regard to my work, but in all fairness to myself and the Boston Symphony Orchestra I feel that I must break this resolve and answer Mr. Smith's article headed, "Twelve Players Will Leave Symphony." In that article, Mr. Smith speaks of the incident of smoking during rehearsals, and in so speaking he has written, "but here in Boston there had been a certain laxness during the years before Mr. Koussevitsky's coming." In the five years as conductor of the Boston orchestra I can say truthfully that never was it necessary for me to correct a player for breach of discipline and I am certainly sure no man in the orchestra would have thought of smoking during the rehearsal period as it was known that never would I have countenanced it, and it gave me much surprise to read of any player doing such a thing this year.

In any case I would feel it an absurd thing for publicity as my rehearsals were strictly private.

Would you kindly do me the honor of printing this as an open letter in your paper, as I wish that paragraph in Mr. Smith's article corrected absolutely.

Very sincerely,
PIERRE MONTEUX.
Concert Gelboun, Amsterdam.

~~Telegram May 22~~

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT

Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Orientale, Cui-Jacchia; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Afro-American Folk Songs, Arranged by Jacchia; Harp Solo, "In the Canoe," Holy; La Tritesse du Printemps, Sibelius; Fantasia, "Iris," Mascagni; Selection, "Rose Marie," Friml-Stothart; Waltz, "Myosotis," Waldteufel; Third Slavonic Dance, Dvorak.

ADVERTISER May 21

College Glee Clubs Sing at Pops Tonight

Songs by the Amherst, Williams and Wesleyan glee clubs will be featured at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Overture, "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
College Songs
Suite from "The Cid"	Massenet
Procession, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
College Songs
Polonaise	Chopin
Salut d'Amour	Elgar
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Berlioz

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

~~TRAVELER MAY 22~~

Agide Jacchia announces the following program for the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Orientale	Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs..arranged by Jacchia
(a) You may Bury me in de Eas'. (b) M'sieu Banjo. (c) Nobody Knows de Trubble I've Seen.
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"	Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps	Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"	Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"	Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvorak

~~ADVERTISER MAY~~ 22

At the Pops

Agide Jacchia offers the following program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Triumphal March, "Aida"	Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Orientale	Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs	Arranged by Jacchia
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"	Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps	Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"	Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"	Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvorak

TRANSCRIPT MAY 22

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Orientale	Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs
Harp Solo, "In the Canoe"	Holy
Spring Sadness	Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"	Mascagni
Selection, "Rose-Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"	Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvorák

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: A. Holy

MONITOR MAY 22

Tonight at the "Pops"

Triumphal March from "Aïda"	Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Orientale	Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs	Arranged by Jacchia
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"	Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps	Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"	Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"	Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvořák

~~HERALD MAY 22~~

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia announces the following program for the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Orientale	Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs..arranged by Jacchia
(a) You may Bury me in de Eas'. (b) M'sieu Banjo. (c) Nobody Knows de Trubble I've Seen.
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"	Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps	Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris"	Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"	Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvorak

MUSICIANS' NEWS: COMPOSERS' WAYS, CONDUCTORS' WORKS

~~TRANSCRIPT MAY 21~~

R. KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS TO LONDON

Usual Diverse Judgments—Putting travinsky in His Place—Mahler's Likg for America—Honegger as Autumn Visitor — Mrs. Coolidge's "English Singers"—Mme. Gauthier Seeks New Fortunes

MUSICALLY speaking, Mr. Koussevitzky is on his native heath again. He has conducted at orchestral concerts in London. He will soon begin a new series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. In the English city, he appeared first, on Monday, May 11, as guest-conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; while last Friday he led the Philharmonic Society through a concert to mark the tenth anniversary of the death of Skriabin. (Not "Prometheus," but the "Poem of Ecstasy" was the capital item of the program.) Reviews of the earlier occasion already come to hand; while one of them—from The Times—is unsparing. "Mr. Koussevitzky," it begins, "has returned to London after his first season in command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He took charge of the London Symphony Orchestra last evening at Queen's Hall and was greeted with enthusiasm by an audience which was large, though not what the concert-agents describe as 'capacity.' One is tempted to fall back on the concert-agent's vocabulary, because the whole of this performance was more a 'celebrity' than a symphony concert in the generally accepted sense. It seemed devised to show what the virtuoso of the baton could do. We were to be astonished by displays of daemonic frenzy followed by periods in which the conductor concentrated his whole being on one department of the orchestra, at one moment apparently urging the horns to bursting point and at another inspiring the violins to saw their strings asunder. Or. again, he would become rigid and motionless, as though, like the hero of Mr. Holst's opera, he would 'slay a foe with the glance of an eye.'

"These displays reached their climax in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, where their effect was certainly at times extraordinary. In general it was to make accents appear of enormously exaggerated importance; while the music between the accents was left to take care of itself. The characteristic rhythm of the first movement varied so much as to be sometimes unrecognizable; the scherzo was played in a helter-skelter fashion, with the instruments falling into line after each start. What was more serious than any technical defect was that the expressive side of Beethoven's music was throughout subordinated to the impressive activities of the conductor.

"Before the symphony we heard three numbers, a concerto of Vivaldi, scored by Siloti, and used chiefly to show the maximum amount of tone (not always a pure musical tone) producible on massed strings; de Falla's Ballet suite from 'Love the Sorcerer,' and Frédéric d'Erlanger's Concerto Symphonique for piano (José Iturbi) and orchestra. De Falla's music is always entertaining, but modern ballet-music in the concert room is apt to be bewildering, since without the stage it has no raison r'être; it becomes a heterogeneous collection of orchestral effects, dance rhythms, and tunes. D'Erlanger's concerto pays homage in turn to Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Chaikovsky, Verdi, Elgar, and (once more in the finale) Liszt. It contributed to the prevailing impression of this concert; too much virtuosity and too little music."

Evidently Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor breeds no less divergence of opinion in London than in Boston. In the present instance the reviewer for The Telegraph—the only other newspaper obtainable—is of quite opposite mind to his colleague rebuking virtuosity:

> On paper the balance was even between classical and modern numb[illegible] but the fine old Concerto in D mi[illegible] of Vivaldi (as scored by Siloti) [illegible] the Seventh Symphony of Beethov[illegible] more than outweighed in quality [illegible] straggling suite from de Falla's b[illegible]let, "Love the Sorcerer," and the Co[illegible]certo Symphonique for piano and [illegible]chestra by Frédéric d'Erlanger. E[illegible]phatically the classics made the co[illegible]cert, guided by the firm but flexi[illegible] right hand of the distinguished condu[illegible]tor. The rhythmic vitality of the [illegible] concerto, strengthened in the indiv[illegible]ual orchestration on the great Russ[illegible] pianist and scholar, was made ir[illegible]sistible as Koussevitzky directed [illegible] while the Symphony was Beethove[illegible] as we prefer him to be, without th[illegible] trappings of virtuosity. De Falla's ballet-music is attractive, exceedingly so in places, with brilliant coloring a[illegible] biting harmony; but as a suite it [illegible] over-long, and, away from the stage pictures, almost meaningless. It would be difficult for anyone to make the "fantastic story of two gypsy lovers and a spectre" fit this music intelligibly, should he be inclined to do so. The playing, however, was brilliant t[illegible] a degree, especialy in the departmen[illegible] of wood and brass.

TONIGHT'S "POPS"

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings); "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; suite, Rameau-Mottl ("Minuet," "Musette," "Tambourin"); "Dubinushka," arranged by Jacchia; "Chinese Dance," Crist; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; "Hindu Song," Rimsky-Korsakoff; military march, Schubert-Jacchia.

TELEGRAM MAY 23

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

~~TRANSCRIPT~~ MAY 23

An Experiment with Symphonic Musi[illegible] "Harvard Night" and The Glee Club An Italian and an American Program

WELL-DIVERSIFIED programs fi[illegible] next week at The Pops. On Sunday, in particular, comes the interesting experiment of the season—a concert of symphonic music, almost any item of which might stand on Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. True, no symphony will be played from beginning to end, but fragments of three have place—the Andante in Beethoven's Fifth; the Minuet from Haydn's in D major of the London series; the second movement of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"; while next of kin is the Finale from Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Add to these numbers Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride"; Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody"; Respighi's arrangement of three old Italian dances—and a truly symphonic program emerges. If the public responds to it, especially on a spring Sunday, The Pops will indeed be doing a new office.

For the remainder of the week, Monday brings the annual "Harvard Night," interspersed with numbers by the Glee Club as sung at its concerts last winter. This time eight are announced—among them two old English madrigals; Poulenc's "Drinking Song" (for a dry day); the Chorus of Peers from "Iolanthe," the Polish Fête from Chabrier's "Le Roi Malgré Lui." Dr. Davison will be conductor of the choir—and not for another year will he lead it in Boston. On Tuesday, Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra will play the whole of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice"—less the repetition of the first movement— music hitherto heard only in fragments at The Pops. On the program also stand two excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." In the list of pieces for Wednesday are Miss Seydel's "Indian Dirge"; three of Saint-Saëns's "Algerian Scenes"; Sinigaglia's Folk-Dances of Piedmont. For Thursday, Mr. Jacchia chooses routined and familiar course. For Friday, however, he makes an Italian program, with Respighi's Ancient Dances and Casella's "Italia" for conspicuous numbers; operatic items a-plenty; other miscellany. On the holiday evening of Saturday, American composers fill the bill—some of them with relatively novel pieces: Miss McLain's overture, "Durochka"; the Angelus from Mr. Hadley's Third Symphony; two of Mr. Skilton's Indian Dances. For American operetta Mr. Jacchia picks selections from "Robin Hood" and "Mlle. Modiste." MacDowell and Cadman have also their niches. . . . Throughout the week, except on Sunday, refreshments and tobacco as usual.

MONITOR MUSIC MAY 23

The "Pops"

Novelties continue to mark the programs of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall. The next innovation will be the "Symphonic Program" announced for tomorrow evening, consisting of excerpts from symphonies and other compositions written for the more serious sort of orchestral concert. Such a program seems particularly well suited to a "Pops" concert on Sunday evening, when refreshments are not sold, and the majority of the audience presumably attend solely to listen to the music.

Anotner new departure this season is the "Restricted Request Night" announced for Monday, June 1, in addition to the regular "request program." Finding that certain numbers recurred so frequently on request programs that any choice of a considerable minority of listeners had little chance of a hearing, Mr. Jacchia has decided to give a program from which all these prime favorites shall be barred. Hence music lovers who have been disappointed at the exclusion of their choices will have their turn. Requests should be addressed to Mr. Jacchia at Symphony Hall. Votes may be cast for any item of the "Pops" repertory except the following: The Bach-Gounod and the Schubert "Ave Maria," Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers," Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, Handel's Largo, Jacchia's "Eili, Eili," Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody, the Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann," the Dance of the Hours from "Gioconda," Rimsky-Korsakoff's Hindu Song, Rubinstein's "Rêve Angelique," Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

Monday night will be Harvard Night at the "Pops." The next novel program will be one selected from the works of Jewish composers, on a date to be announced.

A "Pops Picture Gallery" has been installed in the first balcony foyer. It includes photographs and drawings of "Pops" scenes from the Music Hall days of the 90's to the present. Boston artists represented include Dwight C. Sturges, Gluyas Williams and Franklin P. Collier. The drawings submitted by Boston art students this year in competition for the "Pops" poster also are shown.

FIVE PAIRS OF SEATS AT 'POPS' FOR JINGLES

Five pairs of best seats for "The Pops" at Symphony Hall are offered as extra prizes for clever "last lines" submitted to Jingle No. 74 which is printed today in the Boston Evening American Limerick tournament.

These seats will be for next Monday evening, when an especially interesting program will be played including Strauss' ever-lovely "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz.

Persons familiar with "The Pops" realize what a treat is in store for the winners of these extra prizes. "The Pops" constitute one of the finest enteretainments offered to the Boston public. Nearly 100 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comprise the group of musicians that play "The Pops" programs in the inspiring temple of music at the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. The atmosphere at these concerts is of the best.

The concert program for next Monday evening which will be heard by the winners of the best "last lines" submitted to today's Jingle is as follows:

1—Hungarian March.......Berlioz
2—Overture to "Egmont".......Beethoven
3—Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube, Strauss
4—Fantasia: "Aida".......Verdi
5—Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
6—Liebesfreud.......Kreisler
7—Camellia Gavotte.......Jacchia
8—Oriental Fantasy "Islamey," Balakirev-Casella
9—Suite: "Nutcracker".......Tchaikowsky
10—Intermezzo: "Cavelleria Rusticana," Mascagni
11—Coronation March.......Svendsen

Creating "last liness" for Boston Evening American Prize Limericks while at the movies is one of the favorite pastimes of Mrs. T. O. Bailey of Merrimacport. While watching her favorite star, a clever idea comes to Mrs. Bailey every now and then, which she forthwith places on paper. Throughout the evening she keeps pencil and paper in her lap so that no good thought will escape her.

"I have sent in 'last lines' to 61 Jingles," she wrote. "I thought each of them would be a prize winner until I saw the winning 'last line' printed in the Boston Evening American and then I knew that mine were only fit for the wastebasket."

"I have centainly tried very hard to land a prize," she continued. "These answers I made at the movies. I took a pencil and paper with me to do my jingle 'last lines' while at the show. Whether they are good or not you are going to get them, Mr. Judge. As stated in one of the recent limericks, I have 'scratched my bonehead' many times while trying to make good 'last lines' to the jingles, but when the winning 'last lines" appear in the paper I say to myself, 'Oh, you mudhead.' Jingling quickens your thought and is good schooling."

Madge McKenney of Dover street, Somerville, a beginner at "lastlining," writes: "I have composed several last lines to the Limerick, but have never sent one of them in. Several times my 'last lines' have been nearly the same as the winner, so Ithought I had better try my fortune. If I don't win anything I am going to keep on trying. I enjoy them very much."

H. Peyton Hopkins, winner of theatre tickets, sends thanks as follows:

"Many thinks for the seats at the Wilbur Theatre. I also won a dollar prize, for which I am very grateful. I will not be satisfied now until I win that first prize. As my mother recently won a first prize in a similar competition in Philadelphia, I should like to do likewise. I enjoy the rest of the Boston Evening American as much as the jingles and

...d it the most interesting of the Boston papers."

Michael A. Ahern of Hillside street, Roxbury, another fan, writes: "I 'last lined' my way to a dollar award in your Limerick tournament. Allow me to congratulate you on your selection of first prize winners. Each one printed certainly has been worthy of that honor."

TRAVELER MAY 21

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Songs by the Amherst Glee Club and the Glee clubs of Williams and Wesleyan will be featured at the "Pops"-concert in Symphony hall tonight.

The program follows:

Overture to "Raymond".......Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina".......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".......Puccini
College Songs
Suite from "The Cid".......Massenet
(a) Castillane
(b) Andalouse
(c) Aragonaise.
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony.......Tchaikovsky
College Songs
Polonaise.......Chopin
Salut d'Amour.......Elgar
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber-Berlioz

---

tors whose terms [illegible] of the company during 1924 were reported at $215,501,187 and the number of stores in operation as 1256.

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

Songs by the Amherst Glee Club and the Glee Clubs of Williams and Wesleyan will be featured at the "Pop" concret in Symphony Hall tonight which is of general public interest. Programme follows:

Overture to "Raymond".......Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina".......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".......Puccini
College Songs.
Suite from "The Cid".......Massenet
(a) Castillane, (b) Andalouse, (c) Aragonaise.
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony.......Tchaikovsky
College Songs.
Polonaise.......Chopin
Salut d'Amour.......Elgar
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber-Berlioz

Post 21

Trampl

AMERICAN MAY 22

ALFRED HOLY TO PLAY HARP SOLO AT 'POP'

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Triumphal March from "Aida".......Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".......Wagner
Orientale.......Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs...arr. by Jacchia
(a) You May Burry Me in de Eas'.
(b) Musieu Banjo.
(c) Nobudy Knows de Trubble I've Seen.
Harp solo, "In the Canoe".......Holy
Alfred Holy.
La Tristesse du Printemps.......Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris".......Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie".......Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis".......Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance.......Dvorak

HERALD MAY 21

Mr. Koussevitzky, by permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct in New York next November, under the auspices of the League of Composers, a concert of modern orchestral works by Europeans and Americans. The players will be "picked men" from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HAD NO SMOKING AT REHEARSALS

Post MAY 21

Mr. Monteux Corrects Statement Regarding Discipline in Symphony Orchestra During His Five Years

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—It has always been a resolve of mine never to answer any newspaper articles in regard to my work, but in all fairness to myself and the Boston Symphony Orchestra I feel that I must break this resolve and answer Mr. Smith's article headed, "Twelve Players Will Leave Symphony." In that article, Mr. Smith speaks of the incident of smoking during rehearsals, and in so speaking he has written, "but here in Boston there had been a certain laxness during the years before Mr. Koussevitsky's coming." In the five years as conductor of the Boston orchestra I can say truthfully that never was it necessary for me to correct a player for breach of discipline and I am certainly sure no man in the orchestra would have thought of smoking during the rehearsal period as it was known that never would I have countenanced it, and it gave me much surprise to read of any player doing such a thing this year.

In any case I would feel it an absurd thing for publicity as my rehearsals were strictly private.

Would you kindly do me the honor of printing this as an open letter in your paper, as I wish that paragraph in Mr. Smith's article corrected absolutely.

Very sincerely,
PIERRE MONTEUX.
Concert Gelboun, Amsterdam.

Telegram May 22

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT

Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Oriental, Cui-Jacchia; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Afro-American Folk Songs, Arranged by Jacchia; Harp Solo, "In the Canoe," Holy; La Tritesse du Printemps, Sibelius; Fantasia, "Iris," Mascagni; Selection, "Rose Marie," Friml-Stothart; Waltz, "Myosotis," Waldteufel; Third Slavonic Dance, Dvorak.

Advertiser May 21

College Glee Clubs Sing at Pops Tonight

Songs by the Amherst, Williams and Wesleyan glee clubs will be featured at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Overture, "Raymond".......Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina".......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".......Puccini
College Songs
Suite from "The Cid".......Massenet
Procession, "Lohengrin".......Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony.......Tchaikovsky
College Songs
Polonaise.......Chopin
Salut d'Amour.......Elgar
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber Berlioz

TRANSCRIPT MAY 22

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Aida".......Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi".......Wagner
Orientale.......Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs
Harp Solo, "In the Canoe".......Holy
Spring Sadness.......Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris".......Mascagni
Selection, "Rose-Marie".......Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis".......Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance.......Dvořák

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: A. Holy

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

TRAVELER MAY 22

Agide Jacchia announces the following program for the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Triumphal March from "Aida".......Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".......Wagner
Orientale.......Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs..arranged by Jacchia
(a) You may Bury me in de Eas'. (b) M'sieu Banjo. (c) Nobody Knows de Trubble I've Seen.
Harp solo, "In the Canoe".......Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps.......Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris".......Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie".......Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis".......Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance.......Dvorak

MONITOR MAY 22

Tonight at the "Pops"

Triumphal March from "Aïda" Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".......Wagner
Orientale.......Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs..... Arranged by Jacchia
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"....Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps..... Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris".......Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie"....... Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis"......Waldteufel
Third Slavonic Dance......Dvořák

ADVERTISER MAY 22

At the Pops

Agide Jacchia offers the following program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Triumphal March, "Aida".......Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi".......Wagner
Orientale.......Cui-Jacchia
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Afro-American Folk Songs Arranged by Jacchia
Harp solo, "In the Canoe".......Holy
Alfred Holy
La Tristesse du Printemps.......Sibelius
Fantasia, "Iris".......Mascagni
Selection, "Rose Marie".......Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Myosotis".......Waldtenfel
Third Slavonic Dance.......Dvorak

Herald MAY 22

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia announces the following program for the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Triumphal March from "Aida".......Verdi
.......Wagner
Overture to "Rienzi".......Cui-Jacchia
Orientale.......Liszt
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..arranged by Jacchia
Afro-American Folk Songs, (a) You may Bury me in de Eas'. (b) M'sieu Banjo. (c) Nobody Knows de Trubble I've Seen.......Holy
Harp solo, "In the Canoe"
Alfred Holy.......Sibelius
La Tristesse du Printemps.......Mascagni
Fantasia, "Iris".......Friml-Stothart
Selection, "Rose Marie".......Waldteufel
Waltz, "Myosotis".......Dvorak
Third Slavonic Dance.......

MUSICIANS' NEWS: COMPOSERS' WAYS, CONDUCTORS' WORKS

TRANSCRIPT MAY 21

R. KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS TO LONDON

Usual Diverse Judgments—Putting travinsky in His Place—Mahler's Likg for America—Honegger as Autumn Visitor — Mrs. Coolidge's "English Singers"—Mme. Gauthier Seeks New Fortunes

MUSICALLY speaking, Mr. Koussevitzky is on his native heath again. He has conducted at orchestral concerts in London. He will soon begin a new series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. In the English city, he appeared first, on Monday, May 11, as guest-conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; while last Friday he led the Philharmonic Society through a concert to mark the tenth anniversary of the death of Skriabin. (Not "Prometheus," but the "Poem of Ecstasy" was the capital item of the program.) Reviews of the earlier occasion already come to hand; while one of them—from The Times—is unsparing. "Mr. Koussevitzky," it begins, "has returned to London after his first season in command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He took charge of the London Symphony Orchestra last evening at Queen's Hall and was greeted with enthusiasm by an audience which was large, though not what the concert-agents describe as 'capacity.' One is tempted to fall back on the concert-agent's vocabulary, because the whole of this performance was more a 'celebrity' than a symphony concert in the generally accepted sense. It seemed devised to show what the virtuoso of the baton could do. We were to be astonished by displays of daemonic frenzy followed by periods in which the conductor concentrated his whole being on one department of the orchestra, at one moment apparently urging the horns to bursting point and at another inspiring the violins to saw their strings asunder. Or, again, he would become rigid and motionless, as though, like the hero of Mr. Holst's opera, he would 'slay a foe with the glance of an eye.'

"These displays reached their climax in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, where their effect was certainly at times extraordinary. In general it was to make accents appear of enormously exaggerated importance; while the music between the accents was left to take care of itself. The characteristic rhythm of the first movement varied so much as to be sometimes unrecognizable; the scherzo was played in a helter-skelter fashion, with the instruments falling into line after each start. What was more serious than any technical defect was that the expressive side of Beethoven's music was throughout subordinated to the impressive activities of the conductor.

"Before the symphony we heard three numbers, a concerto of Vivaldi, scored by Siloti, and used chiefly to show the maximum amount of tone (not always a pure musical tone) producible on massed strings; de Falla's Ballet suite from 'Love the Sorcerer,' and Frédéric d'Erlanger's Concerto Symphonique for piano (José Iturbi) and orchestra. De Falla's music is always entertaining, but modern ballet-music in the concert room is apt to be bewildering, since without the stage it has no raison r'être; it becomes a heterogeneous collection of orchestral effects, dance rhythms, and tunes. D'Erlanger's concerto pays homage in turn to Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Chaikovsky, Verdi, Elgar, and (once more in the finale) Liszt. It contributed to the prevailing impression of this concert; too much virtuosity and too little music."

Evidently Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor breeds no less divergence of opinion in London than in Boston. In the present instance the reviewer for The Telegraph—the only other newspaper obtainable—is of quite opposite mind to his colleague, rebuking virtuosity:

> On paper the balance was even between classical and modern numbers, but the fine old Concerto in D minor of Vivaldi (as scored by Siloti) [illegible] the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven more than outweighed in quality [illegible] straggling suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," and the Concerto Symphonique for piano and orchestra by Frédéric d'Erlanger. Emphatically the classics made the concert, guided by the firm but flexible right hand of the distinguished conductor. The rhythmic vitality of the [illegible] concerto, strengthened in the individual orchestration on the great Russian pianist and scholar, was made irresistible as Koussevitzky directed [illegible] while the Symphony was Beethoven as we prefer him to be, without the trappings of virtuosity. De Falla's ballet-music is attractive, exceedingly so in places, with brilliant coloring and biting harmony; but as a suite it is over-long, and, away from the stage pictures, almost meaningless. It would be difficult for anyone to make the "fantastic story of two gypsy lovers and a spectre" fit this music intelligibly, should he be inclined to do so. The playing, however, was brilliant to a degree, especialy in the department of wood and brass.

TONIGHT'S "POPS"

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings); "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; suite, Rameau-Mottl ("Minuet," "Musette," "Tambourin"); "Dubinushka," arranged by Jacchia; "Chinese Dance," Crist; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; "Hindu Song," Rimsky-Korsakoff; military march, Schubert-Jacchia.

TELEGRAM MAY 23

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

TRANSCRIPT MAY 23

An Experiment with Symphonic Musi "Harvard Night" and The Glee Club An Italian and an American Program

WELL-DIVERSIFIED programs fi next week at The Pops. On Sunday, in particular, comes the interesting experiment of the season—a concert of symphonic music, almost any item of which might stand on Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. True, no symphony will be played from beginning to end, but fragments of three have place—the Andante in Beethoven's Fifth; the Minuet from Haydn's in D major of the London series; the second movement of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"; while next of kin is the Finale from Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Add to these numbers Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride"; Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody"; Respighi's arrangement of three old Italian dances—and a truly symphonic program emerges. If the public responds to it, especially on a spring Sunday, The Pops will indeed be doing a new office.

For the remainder of the week, Monday brings the annual "Harvard Night," interspersed with numbers by the Glee Club as sung at its concerts last winter. This time eight are announced—among them two old English madrigals; Poulenc's "Drinking Song" (for a dry day); the Chorus of Peers from "Iolanthe," the Polish Fête from Chabrier's "Le Roi Malgré Lui." Dr. Davison will be conductor of the choir—and not for another year will he lead it in Boston. On Tuesday, Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra will play the whole of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice"—less the repetition of the first movement— music hitherto heard only in fragments at The Pops. On the program also stand two excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." In the list of pieces for Wednesday are Miss Seydel's "Indian Dirge"; three of Saint-Saëns's "Algerian Scenes"; Sinigaglia's Folk-Dances of Piedmont. For Thursday, Mr. Jacchia chooses routined and familiar course. For Friday, however, he makes an Italian program, with Respighi's Ancient Dances and Casella's "Italia" for conspicuous numbers; operatic items a-plenty; other miscellany. On the holiday evening of Saturday, American composers fill the bill—some of them with relatively novel pieces: Miss McLain's overture, "Durochka"; the Angelus from Mr. Hadley's Third Symphony; two of Mr. Skilton's Indian Dances. For American operetta Mr. Jacchia picks selections from "Robin Hood" and "Mlle. Modiste." MacDowell and Cadman have also their niches. . . . Throughout the week, except on Sunday, refreshments and tobacco as usual.

MONITOR MUSIC MAY 23

The "Pops"

Novelties continue to mark the programs of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall. The next innovation will be the "Symphonic Program" announced for tomorrow evening, consisting of excerpts from symphonies and other compositions written for the more serious sort of orchestral concert. Such a program seems particularly well suited to a "Pops" concert on Sunday evening, when refreshments are not sold, and the majority of the audience presumably attend solely to listen to the music.

Anotner new departure this season is the "Restricted Request Night" announced for Monday, June 1, in addition to the regular "request program." Finding that certain numbers recurred so frequently on request programs that any choice of a considerable minority of listeners had little chance of a hearing, Mr. Jacchia has decided to give a program from which all these prime favorites shall be barred. Hence music lovers who have been disappointed at the exclusion of their choices will have their turn. Requests should be addressed to Mr. Jacchia at Symphony Hall. Votes may be cast for any item of the "Pops" repertory except the following: The Bach-Gounod and the Schubert "Ave Maria," Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers," Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, Handel's Largo, Jacchia's "Eili, Eili," Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody, the Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann," the Dance of the Hours from "Gioconda," Rimsky-Korsakoff's Hindu Song, Rubinstein's "Rêve Angelique," Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

Monday night will be Harvard Night at the "Pops." The next novel program will be one selected from the works of Jewish composers, on a date to be announced.

A "Pops Picture Gallery" has been installed in the first balcony foyer. It includes photographs and drawings of "Pops" scenes from the Music Hall days of the 90's to the present. Boston artists represented include Dwight C. Sturges, Gluyas Williams and Franklin P. Collier. The drawings submitted by Boston art students this year in competition for the "Pops" poster also are shown.

NEW YORK
REVIEW
MAY 23 1925

110

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS ANNOUNCE SPLENDID PROGRAM

Koussevitzky and Mengelberg Will Each Conduct a Concert

The League of Composers announces a program for the coming season which holds unusual promise for the public interested in modern music.

Three concerts of chamber orchestral works will be presented under the direction of distinguished conductors. The first, taking place late in November, will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. He makes his initial appearance here outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by permission ~~of its board~~ of trustees, to conduct a program of new music by Americans and Europeans. He will lead an ensemble of picked men from that orchestra.

Composers turns confidently to former members and new friends with the invitation to continue the undertaking whose early success has been insured by their response and enthusiasm.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
HERALD

MAY 23 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, who brought to an end his first season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 1, sailed immediately for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which began yesterday, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky took three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The "Restricted Request Program" Departs Little from Expectation — Fresh Pieces for Next Week, "O, Katharina" Included—A "Wagner Program"

BY THE SIGNS of the "Restricted Request Program" at The Pops nex Monday evening, two pieces added t he repertory this spring, have caught th ancy of the public—the little Scherzo o "The Bumble Bee" à la Russe and the re sounding Fantasia from Giordano's opera "Fedora." The Metropolitan revived it i New York for Mme. Jeritza—and lo! Bos ton listens to it orchestrally. True, th oldest "war-horses" were banished from the program; but other steeds, decidedly mature, have been voted into places on it—say, the Overture to "William Tell," the "Slavic March," Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia." Good to hear anywhere and at any time are also Chabrier's "España" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrs." As a whole, however, the voted program is near to the expected.

Elsewhere the lists for the fifth week

TRANSCRIPT MAY 24

bring at least a wide range of pieces. On Thursday, for example Mozart's overture to his opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," has place; while on Saturday, there is room for "O, Katharina," Fall's reiterative ditty, which Baliev tried to teach, last winter, to the audiences of the Chauve-Souris. Possibly the company at The Pops can be more readily beguiled into answering chorus. Mr. Jacchia has also scored another song for orchestra—the Spanish piece, "Clavelitos," light, gay and often sung by Mme Galli-Curci at her concerts. A waltz b Lehár (on Wednesday); an Intermezz arranged for orchestra from Granados' "Goyescas" (on Thursday); Mr. Friml' "Chinese Suite" (on Tuesday) also dot th programs. With this newfound numbe Mr. Jacchia comes closer to jazz than h has ever drawn before. For the Suite wa written for Mr. Whiteman's orchestra an first played at his concert in Boston month ago. Otherwise there is nothing t report except the songs of the choir of th Square and Compass Club announced f Tuesday evening.

There will be no concert next Sunda evening, but a week later on June 7, M Jacchia and the orchestra will be heard i a "Wagner Program." The Overture t "The Flying Dutchman"; the Prelude t "Lohengrin"; the Prelude to "Die Meiste singer"; the Bacchanal from "Tann hauser"; fragments of "Rheingold," "Di Walküre," "Siegfried" and "Parsifal"—

There has been hissing in American halls. At Chicago and in Philadelphia certain ultra-modern compositions have been hissed at symphony concerts. In Boston last season there were vigorous protests against Stravinsky's piano concerto and Copland's symphony, but there was no hissing. The objectors contented themselves with perfervid talk and with letters addressed to the conductor. These letters were generally in a vein of courteous remonstrance, though there were threats of not renewing subscriptions. If these threats were carried out, the concerts would, of course, come to a premature end and Mr. Koussevitzky would be forced to leave the city.

Once we heard hissing in Symphony hall, but it was not directed against a composition, the conductor, or any soloist. The demonstration took place when a prominent member of the orchestra refused to stand up with his co-mates to acknowledge applause, refused because he had a personal but unwarranted grievance against Mr. Monteux, the most amiable and courteous of men, although in rehearsal he was an admirable disciplinarian. Many in the audience resented the member's foolish behavior and sibilantly showed it. We doubt if hissing would be of aesthetic benefit in any theatre of Boston. Our public is what is known among the Germans as a "thankful" one. The great majority, enjoying a wretched play, would resent hissing as a reflection on their own judgment and would see with pleasure the hissers ignominiously ejected. No, the spectator is expected to applaud.

Applause in our concert halls has lost all significance. The me[illegible]ocre performer and the dull composition (especially when there is a th[illegible]derous din at the end, brass instruments tooting and blaring as if the [illegible]walls were those of Jericho, organ with all the stops drawn out) are app[illegible]uded as though there were a display of genius on the platform. Would h[illegible]sing an ultra-modern composition conduce to musical righteousness? [illegible]eras that have at first been hissed, as "The Barber of Seville" and "[illegible]annhaeuser" (in Paris), are now in a state of vigorous health. Sym[illegible]onic works that at first were noisily protested are now warmly applaude[illegible]and recognized as classic. If only the hisser could see into the future! [illegible]Yet hissing and counter-applause would enliven symphonic afternoons [illegible]nd nights and possibly induce ordinarily indifferent persons to attend [illegible]n-certs if only in the hope of seeing a row.

P.

AMERICAN MAY 23

Special Nights Featured At the "Pop" Concerts

More special nights will occur in the fourth week of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall which opens tomorrow night with a Symphonic program. Monday will be Harvard Night with two groups by the Harvard Glee Club; Friday an Italian program, and Saturday a holiday program

Agide Jacchia

The Symphonic program for tomorrow night will be a repetition of an experiment made with conspicuous success last season. On this night Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" orchestra will be heard in the following numbers:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor; second movement, (Andante con moto) ....Beethoven
Varsang, (Spring Sadness) ....Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major, (London), Menuetto, (Allegro) ....Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute .Respighi
Symphony No. 6 in B flat, "Pathetic,".. Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" ...... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "The Sold Bride"

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Y 23 1925

There will be no public sale of seats for concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in either Boston or New York during the coming season, according to recent announcement. The subscription lists have reached such a large stage that there are waiting lists in both cities. Koussevitzky, who is now in Paris directing his series of "Concerts Kou~~ssevitzky~~," took with him to Europe, three scores by young American composers in order to introduce them to European audiences, the most important of which was "Through the Looking Glass," by Deems Taylor. Other works to be played are Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and the new "Symphony" by Aaron Copland. Koussevitsky will return to this country in time to start his second American season in Symphony hall Boston, on October 9.

* * *

HERALD MAY 23

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pops" Symphony orchestra, under Agide Jacchia's leadership, will be heard in the following program at Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea"....Supp
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Straus
Ave Maria ....Bach-Gouno
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchiel
Suite ....Rameau-Mot
(Minuet—Musette—Tambourin)
Dubinushka ....Arranged by Jacch
Chinese Dance ....Cri
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagn
Fantasia "Il Trovatore"....................Ver
Hindu Song ....Rimsky-Korsak
Military March ....Schubert-Jacch

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

AY 23 1925

MR. KOUSSEVITSKY, with the Boston Symphony, presented three such ~~novelties, a~~ composition entitled a "fresco," for violoncello and orchestra, by Caplet, and played by Mr. Bedetti, solo violoncellist of the Bostons; Prokofieff's concerto for violin and orchestra, played by Mr. Burgin, the concertmeister, and Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," for violin and orchestra, played by Albert Spalding

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 24 1925

Although no information is at hand regarding the subscription renewals for the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence next season, the New York Times reports subscribers and a large waiting list have exhausted all available seats for the concerts of the orchestra in New York and Boston, so there will be no public sale.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky began a series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra on May 11, and last Friday was scheduled to lead his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which he has done for several years.

In Paris he intends to introduce three works by American composers, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," which Mr. Mengelberg conducted in New York last season; Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copeland's symphony for organ and orchestra which has been heard in Boston.

* * *

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

MAY 24 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, who brought to an end his first season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra on May 1 ~~has gone~~ to Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which began May 22, and his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabine program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composeh's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony hall, Boston, on October 9.

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
MAY 24 1925

COMPOSERS PLAN THREE CONCERTS

Noted Artists Will Appear on Programs to Be Given by League Next Season

HONEGGER COMING HERE

The League of Composers has announced a program for the coming season which holds unusual promise for the public interested in modern music.

Three concerts of chamber orchestral works will be presented under the direction of distinguished conductors. The first taking place late in November, will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. He makes his initial apearance here outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by permission ~~of its board~~ of trustees, to conduct a program of new music by Americans and Europeans. He will lead an ensemble of picked men from that orchestra.

The second concert, the feature which is to be Manuel de Falla' Retablo," will be directed

---

"POPS" BEGIN FOURTH WEEK

Monday to Be Annual Night for Harvard Glee Club

HERALD MAY 24

The fourth week of the "Pops" concerts in Symphony hall, which opens tonight with a symphonic program, will also have other nights of interest. Tomorrow night will be the annual Harvard night, with songs by the Harvard Glee Club. Friday will bring an Italian program and Saturday a holiday program with American compositions.

The program of the week arranged by Mr. Jacchia for the "Pops" symphony orchestra follows:

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 24

Overture, "The Roman Carnival..Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor Second Movement ....Beethoven
Varsang (Spring Sadness)........Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major (London) —Menuetto (Allegro) ....Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute Respighi
(a)—Gagliarda. (b)—Villanella. (c)—Passo Mezzo e Mascherada.
Symphony No. 6 in B flat "Pathetic" Second Movement: Allegro con grazia.......... Tchiakovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Sold Bride....Smetana

HARVARD NIGHT
MONDAY, MAY 25

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" Litolf
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" ....Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin"....Tchaikovsky
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor
(a)—The Gypsy ....Zolotarov
(b)—Come Again, Sweet Love..Dowland
(c)—Fete Polonaise from "Le Roi Malgre Lui"............Chabrier
Alsatian Scenes ....Massenet
Sunday morning—at the Cabaret
Sunday Evening
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, Act III "The Valkyrie" ....Wagner
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
(a)—Now Is the Month of Maying Morley
(b)—Chanson a Boire ....Poulene
(Dedicated to the Harvard Glee Club)
(c)—Nocturne ....Cui
(d)—Sir Eglamore ..English Folk Song
(e)—March of the Peers from "Iolanthe" ....Sullivan
Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saens
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....Densmore

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 26

Overture to "Phedre"............Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..........Komzak
"I'm a-Wand'rin" (Old Slave Song) Gaines-Jacchia
Saxophone Solo—Mr. Laus
Excerpts from Act III, "The Mastersingers" ....Wagner
Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs
Spanish Caprice........Rimsky-Korsakov
Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—Fandango of the Asturias
Trauemerei ....Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"..Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell"..........Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse ....Hellmesberger
Triumphal March, of Sigurd Jorsalfar Grieg

WEDNESDAY, MAY 27

Overture to "Pique Dame" ....Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"..........Metra
Moment Musical ....Schubert
Algerian Scenes ....Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi ....Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais" ....Massenet
Solo Violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge ....Seydel
March, Down the Ayenue ....Perera

THURSDAY, MAY 28

Overture to "La Cazza Ladra"........Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament ....Dvorak-Kreisler
(Arranged by Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1"..........Bizet
Prelude—Minuet—Carillon
Fantasia, "Othello" ....Verdi
Elli, Elli ....Arr. by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo, "L'Aico Frits"..........Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana"..............Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon"...............Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube" Ivanovici
American Patrol ....Meacham

ITALIAN PROGRAM
FRIDAY, MAY 29

Overture to "The Barber of Seville".Rossini
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin" Drigo
Burlesca ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to th eSun, from "Iris".....Mascagni
Ancient Dances and Airs ....Respighi
Ave Maria, from "Otello"..............Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casella
Selection, "Tosca" ....Puccini
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Marcia Reale Italiana ....Gabetti

SATURDAY, May 30

Stars and Stripes Forever ....Sousa
Overture, "Durochka" ....McLain
Spanish Dance No. 1 ......Rollins-Jacchia
Selection, "Robin Hood" ....DeKoven
Woodland Sketches ....MacDowell
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water Cadman-Jacchia
Angelus, from the Third Symphony....Hadley
Two Indian Dances ....Skilton
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" ....Herbert
The Rosary ....Nevin
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager.
American Military Fantasy ......Roll

Endow the Symphony

GLOBE MAY 24

But the Boston Symphony [illegible] from hand to mouth, dependent u[illegible] a charity that may in time grow wea[illegible] of giving. Raising an endowment f[illegible]he Boston Symphony and if possibl[illegible]xtending its activities to reach a [illegible]er number of the plain people, give[illegible]ne chance for civic spirit in Boston m[illegible]al affairs.

The orchestra does of course al[illegible]dy reach those of the plain people wh[illegible]re to buy tickets for the series. [illegible]he lowest price of season tickets f[illegible]es out to something like 75 cents per [illegible]le concert, a sum the plain people [illegible]an afford to pay, a sum less tha[illegible]is charged for most recitals.

SYMPHONY HALL Pop Concerts. Orchestra of 50, Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15. Sunday, May 24—Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Symphony No. 5 in C minor second movement (andante con moto), Beethoven; Varsang (Spring Sadness), Sibelius; Symphony No. 2 in D major (London)—menuetto (allegro), Haydn; Rumanian rhapsody, Enesco; old dances and airs for the lute, Respighi; Symphony No. 6 in B flat "Pathetic" second movement: Allegro con grazia, Tchiakowsky; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; overture to "The Sold Bride," Smetana.

GLOBE MAY 24

GLOBE MAY 24

Tomorrow is Harvard Night at the Pops. Dr Davison will lead the Harvard Glee Club through two groups of numbers. Tonight a symphonic program is offered at the second of the special Sunday evening programs. Friday an Italian program and Saturday an American program are other special features.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 25

At the Pops Tonight

"Harvard Night"

Overture, "Robespierre"..........Litolf
Waltz, "Miners' Lights"..............Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin"..Chaikovsky
Numbers by Harvard Glee Club:
The Gypsy ....Zolotarov
Come Again, Sweet Love....Dowland
Fête Polonaise from "Le Roi Malgré Lui" ....Chabrier
Alsatian Scenes ....Massenet
Tarantella ....Jacchia
Magic-Fire Music from "The Valkyr." Wagner
Numbers by Harvard Glee Club:
Now Is the Month of Maying..Morley
Drinking Song ....Poulenc
Nocturne ....Cui
Sir Eglamore .....English Folk-Song
March of the Peers from "Iolanthe," Sullivan
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saëns
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....Densmore

Conductors: A. Jacchia and A. T. Davison

HERALD MAY 21

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Songs by the Amherst Glee Club and the Glee clubs of Williams and Wesleyan will be featured at the "Pops"-concert in Symphony hall tonight.

The program follows:

Overture to "Raymond"..........Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina"........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"........Puccini
College Songs
Suite from "The Cid"............Massenet
(a) Castillane
(b) Andalouse
(c) Aragonaise.
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tchaikovsky
College Songs
Polonaise ....Chopin
Salut d'Amour........................Elgar
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-

ADVERTISER MAY 24

SECOND SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will conduct the second Sunday night Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight. Tomorrow will bring the annual Harvard night. On Friday night there will be an all-Italian program. American numbers will be featured on the Memorial Day program. Tonight's offerings follow:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival"..Berlioz
Symphony No. 5, Second Movement, Beethoven
Varsang ....Sibelius
Symphony No. 2, Menuetto........Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, Respighi
Symphony No. 6, Second Movement, Tchiakovsky
Prelude, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "The Sold Bride"....Smetana

NEW YORK
REVIEW
MAY 23 1925

110

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS ANNOUNCE SPLENDID PROGRAM

Koussevitzky and Mengelberg Will Each Conduct a Concert

The League of Composers announces a program for the coming season which holds unusual promise for the public interested in modern music.

Three concerts of chamber orchestral works will be presented under the direction of distinguished conductors. The first, taking place late in November, will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. He makes his initial appearance here outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by permission ~~of its board~~ of trustees, to conduct a program of new music by Americans and Europeans. He will lead an ensemble of picked men from that orchestra.

Composers turns confidently to former members and new friends with the invitation to continue the undertaking whose early success has been insured by their response and enthusiasm.

AMERICAN MAY 23

Special Nights Featured At the "Pop" Concerts

More special nights will occur in the fourth week of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall which opens tomorrow night with a Symphonic program. Monday will be Harvard Night with two groups by the Harvard Glee Club; Friday an Italian program, and Saturday a holiday program.

Agide Jacchia

The Symphonic program for tomorrow night will be a repetition of an experiment made with conspicuous success last season. On this night Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" orchestra will be heard in the following numbers:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor; second movement, (Andante con moto) ....Beethoven
Varsang, (Spring Sadness) ....Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major, (London), Menuetto, (Allegro) ....Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute .Respighi
Symphony No. 6 in B flat, "Pathetic,".. Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" ...... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "The Sold Bride" . [illegible]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

23 1925

* * *

There will be no public sale of seats for concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in either Boston or New York during the coming season, according to recent announcement. The subscription lists have reached such a large stage that there are waiting lists in both cities. Koussevitsky, who is now in Paris directing his series of "Concerts ~~Koussevitzky~~," took with him to Europe, three scores by young American composers in order to introduce them to European audiences, the most important of which was "Through the Looking Glass," by Deems Taylor. Other works to be played are Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and the new "Symphony" by Aaron Copland. Koussevitsky will return to this country in time to start his second American season in Symphony hall Boston, on October 9.

* * *

HERALD MAY 21

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Songs by the Amherst Glee Club and the Glee clubs of Williams and Wesleyan will be featured at the "Pops"-concert in Symphony hall tonight.

The program follows:

Overture to "Raymond"..........Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina"........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"........Puccini
College Songs
Suite from "The Cid"............Massenet
  (a) Castillane
  (b) Andalouse
  (c) Aragonaise.
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tchaikovsky
College Songs
Polonaise ....Chopin
Salut d'Amour.......................Elgar
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-[illegible]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
HERALD

MAY 23 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, who brought to an end his first season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 1, sailed immediately for Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which began yesterday, and (beginning May 11) his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky took three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music.

HERALD MAY 23

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pops" Symphony orchestra, under Agide Jacchia's leadership, will be heard in the following program at Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea"....Supp
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Straus
Ave Maria ....Bach-Gouno
  (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchiel
Suite ....Rameau-Mot
  (Minuet—Musette—Tambourin)
Dubinushka ....Arranged by Jacch
Chinese Dance ....Cri
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagn
Fantasia "Il Trovatore"..................Ver
Hindu Song ....Rimsky-Korsak
Military March ....Schubert-Jacch

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Eve. Public Ledger

23 1925

MR. KOUSSEVITSKY, with the Boston Symphony, presented three such ~~novelties, a~~ composition entitled a "fresco," for violoncello and orchestra, by Caplet, and played by Mr. Bedetti, solo violoncellist of the Bostons; Prokofieff's concerto for violin and orchestra, played by Mr. Burgin, the concertmeister, and Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," for violin and orchestra, played by Albert Spalding.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 24 1925

Although no information is at hand regarding the subscription renewals for the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence next season, the New York Times reports subscribers and a large waiting list have exhausted all available seats for the concerts of the orchestra in New York and Boston, so there will be no public sale.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky began a series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra on May 11, and last Friday was scheduled to lead his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which he has done for several years.

In Paris he intends to introduce three works by American composers, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," which Mr. Mengelberg conducted in New York last season; Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," and Aaron Copeland's symphony for organ and orchestra which has been heard in Boston.

* * *

ADVERTISER MAY 24

SECOND SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will conduct the second Sunday night Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight. Tomorrow will bring the annual Harvard night. On Friday night there will be an all-Italian program. American numbers will be featured on the Memorial Day program. Tonight's offerings follow:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival"..Berlioz
Symphony No. 5, Second Movement, Beethoven
Varsang .... Sibelius
Symphony No. 2, Menuetto........Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody .... Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, Respighi
Symphony No. 6, Second Movement, Tchaikovsky
Prelude, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "The Sold Bride"....Smetana

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The "Restricted Request Program" Departs Little from Expectation — Fresh Pieces for Next Week, "O, Katharina" Included—A "Wagner Program"

BY THE SIGNS of the "Restricted Request Program" at The Pops next Monday evening, two pieces added to the repertory this spring, have caught the fancy of the public—the little Scherzo of "The Bumble Bee" à la Russe and the resounding Fantasia from Giordano's opera "Fedora." The Metropolitan revived it in New York for Mme. Jeritza—and lo! Boston listens to it orchestrally. True, the oldest "war-horses" were banished from the program; but other steeds, decidedly mature, have been voted into places on it—say, the Overture to "William Tell," the "Slavic March," Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," Good to hear anywhere and at any time are also Chabrier's "España" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrs." As a whole, however, the voted program is near to the expected.

Elsewhere the lists for the fifth week

TRANSCRIPT MAY 24

bring at least a wide range of pieces. On Thursday, for example Mozart's overture to his opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," has place; while on Saturday, there is room for "O, Katharina," Fall's reiterative ditty, which Baliev tried to teach, last winter, to the audiences of the Chauve-Souris. Possibly the company at The Pops can be more readily beguiled into answering chorus. Mr. Jacchia has also scored another song for orchestra—the Spanish piece, "Clavelitos," light, gay and often sung by Mme. Galli-Curci at her concerts. A waltz by Lehár (on Wednesday); an Intermezzo arranged for orchestra from Granados' "Goyescas" (on Thursday); Mr. Friml's "Chinese Suite" (on Tuesday) also dot the programs. With this newfound number Mr. Jacchia comes closer to jazz than he has ever drawn before. For the Suite was written for Mr. Whiteman's orchestra and first played at his concert in Boston a month ago. Otherwise there is nothing to report except the songs of the choir of the Square and Compass Club announced for Tuesday evening.

There will be no concert next Sunday evening, but a week later on June 7, Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra will be heard in a "Wagner Program." The Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Bacchanal from "Tannhauser"; fragments of "Rheingold," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried" and "Parsifal"—

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

24 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, who brought to an end his first season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra on May 1, ~~has gone~~ to Europe to conduct his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which began May 22, and his series in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitzky has taken three scores by young American composers with him to introduce to Paris—Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend" and Aaron Copland's symphony. Koussevitzky's Paris programs will consist entirely of modern music. In London, however, he will conduct classic as well as recent scores. London is to hear Beethoven's Choral symphony—also the Fifth and Seventh. There will be a Scriabine program in observance of the tenth anniversary of the Russian composeh's death.

Koussevitzky will return to America next September to open his second American season in Symphony hall, Boston, on October 9.

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
MAY 24 1925

COMPOSERS PLAN THREE CONCERTS

Noted Artists Will Appear on Programs to Be Given by League Next Season

HONEGGER COMING HERE

The League of Composers has announced a program for the coming season which holds unusual promise for the public interested in modern music.

Three concerts of chamber orchestral works will be presented under the direction of distinguished conductors. The first taking place late in November, will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. He makes his initial apearance here outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by permission ~~of its board~~ of trustees, to conduct a program of new music by Americans and Europeans. He will lead an ensemble of picked men from that orchestra.

The second concert, the feature which is to be Manuel de Falla's Retablo," will be directed b[illegible]

There has been hissing in American halls. At Chicago and in Philadelphia certain ultra-modern compositions have been hissed at symphony concerts. In Boston last season there were vigorous protests against Stravinsky's piano concerto and Copland's symphony, but there was no hissing. The objectors contented themselves with perfervid talk and with letters addressed to the conductor. These letters were generally in a vein of courteous remonstrance, though there were threats of not renewing subscriptions. If these threats were carried out, the concerts would, of course, come to a premature end and Mr. Koussevitzky would be forced to leave the city.

Once we heard hissing in Symphony hall, but it was not directed against a composition, the conductor, or any soloist. The demonstration took place when a prominent member of the orchestra refused to stand up with his co-mates to acknowledge applause, refused because he had a personal but unwarranted grievance against Mr. Monteux, the most amiable and courteous of men, although in rehearsal he was an admirable disciplinarian. Many in the audience resented the member's foolish behavior and sibilantly showed it. We doubt if hissing would be of aesthetic benefit in any theatre of Boston. Our public is what is known among the Germans as a "thankful" one. The great majority, enjoying a wretched play, would resent hissing as a reflection on their own judgment and would see with pleasure the hissers ignominiously ejected. No, the spectator is expected to applaud.

Applause in our concert halls has lost all significance. The mediocre performer and the dull composition (especially when there is a thunderous din at the end, brass instruments tooting and blaring as if the walls were those of Jericho, organ with all the stops drawn out) are applauded as though there were a display of genius on the platform. Would hissing an ultra-modern composition conduce to musical righteousness? Operas that have at first been hissed, as "The Barber of Seville" and "Tannhaeuser" (in Paris), are now in a state of vigorous health. Symphonic works that at first were noisily protested are now warmly applauded and recognized as classic. If only the hisser could see into the future! Yet hissing and counter-applause would enliven symphonic afternoons and nights and possibly induce ordinarily indifferent persons to attend concerts if only in the hope of seeing a row.

P.

Endow the Symphony

GLOBE MAY 2[illegible]

But the Boston Symphony [illegible] from hand to mouth, dependent upon a charity that may in time grow weary of giving. Raising an endowment for the Boston Symphony and if possible extending its activities to reach a larger number of the plain people, gives one chance for civic spirit in Boston musical affairs.

The orchestra does of course already reach those of the plain people who are able to buy tickets for the series. The lowest price of season tickets figures out to something like 75 cents per single concert, a sum the plain people can afford to pay, a sum less than is charged for most recitals.

"POPS" BEGIN FOURTH WEEK

Monday to Be Annual Night for Harvard Glee Club

HERALD MAY 24

The fourth week of the "Pops" concerts in Symphony hall, which opens tonight with a symphonic program, will also have other nights of interest. Tomorrow night will be the annual Harvard night, with songs by the Harvard Glee Club. Friday will bring an Italian program and Saturday a holiday program with American compositions.

The program of the week arranged by Mr. Jacchia for the "Pops" symphony orchestra follows:

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM
SUNDAY, MAY 24

Overture, "The Roman Carnival..Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor Second Movement ....Beethoven
Varsang (Spring Sadness).......Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major (London) —Menuetto (Allegro) ....Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute Respighi
  (a)—Gagliarda. (b)—Villanella. (c)—Passo Mezzo e Mascherada.
Symphony No. 6 in B flat "Pathetic" Second Movement: Allegro con grazia......... Tchiakovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin".........Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Sold Bride....Smetana

HARVARD NIGHT
MONDAY, MAY 25

Overture. "Maximilian Robespierre" Litolf
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" ....Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin"....Tchaikovsky
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
  Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor
  (a)—The Gypsy ....Zolotarov
  (b)—Come Again, Sweet Love..Dowland
  (c)—Fete Polonaise from "Le Roi Malgre Lui"............Chabrier
Alsatian Scenes ....Massenet
  Sunday morning—at the Cabaret
  Sunday Evening
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, Act III "The Valkyrie" ....Wagner
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
  (a)—Now Is the Month of Maying Morley
  (b)—Chanson a Boire ....Poulene
  (Dedicated to the Harvard Glee Club)
  (c)—Nocturne ....Cui
  (d)—Sir Eglamore ..English Folk Song
  (e)—March of the Peers from "Iolanthe" ....Sullivan
Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saens
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....Densmore

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 26

Overture to "Phedre"...........Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..........Komzak
"I'm a-Wand'rin" (Old Slave Song) Gaines-Jacchia
  Saxophone Solo—Mr. Laus
Excerpts from Act III, "The Mastersingers" ....Wagner
  Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs
Spanish Caprice........Rimsky-Korsakov
  Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—Fandango of the Asturias
Trauemerei ....Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"..Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell"..........Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse ....Hellmesberger
Triumphal March, of Sigurd Jorsalfar Grieg

WEDNESDAY, MAY 27

Overture to "Pique Dame" ....Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"........Metra
Moment Musical ....Schubert
Algerian Scenes ....Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi ....Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais" ....Massenet
  Solo Violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge ....Seydel
March, Down the Avenue ....Perera

THURSDAY, MAY 28

Overture to "La Cazza Ladra"........Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament ....Dvorak-Kreisler
  (Arranged by Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1".........Bizet
  Prelude—Minuet—Carillon
Fantasia, "Othello" ....Verdi
Eili, Eili ....Arr. by Jacchia
  Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo, "L'Aico Fritz"..........Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon"...............Thomas

Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube" Ivanovici
American Patrol ....Meacham

ITALIAN PROGRAM
FRIDAY, MAY 29

Overture to "The Barber of Seville".Rossini
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin" Drigo
Burlesca ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris"......Mascagni
Ancient Dances and Airs ....Respighi
Ave Maria, from "Otello".............Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casella
Selection, "Tosca" ....Puccini
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Marcia Reale Italiana ....Gabetti

SATURDAY, May 30

Stars and Stripes Forever ....Sousa
Overture, "Durochka" ....McLain
Spanish Dance No. 1 ......Rollins-Jacchia
Selection, "Robin Hood" ....DeKoven
Woodland Sketches ....MacDowell
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water Cadman-Jacchia
Angelus, from the Third Symphony....Hadley
Two Indian Dances ....Skilton
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" ....Herbert
The Rosary ....Nevin
  Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager.
American Military Fantasy ......Roll[illegible]

GLOBE MAY 24

SYMPHONY HALL Pop Concerts. Orchestra of 50, Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15. Sunday, May 24—Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Symphony No. 5 in C minor second movement (andante con moto), Beethoven; Varsang (Spring Sadness), Sibelius; Symphony No. 2 in D major (London)—menuetto (allegro), Haydn; Rumanian rhapsody, Enesco; old dances and airs for the lute, Respighi; Symphony No. 6 in B flat "Pathetic" second movement: Allegro con grazia, Tchiakowsky; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; overture to "The Sold Bride," Smetana.

GLOBE MAY 24

Tomorrow is Harvard Night at the Pops. Dr Davison will lead the Harvard Glee Club through two groups of numbers. Tonight a symphonic program is offered at the second of the special Sunday evening programs. Friday an Italian program and Saturday an American program are other special features.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 25

At the Pops Tonight

"Harvard Night"

Overture, "Robespierre".........Litolf
Waltz, "Miners' Lights"..........Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin"..Chaikovsky
Numbers by Harvard Glee Club:
  The Gypsy ....Zolotarov
  Come Again, Sweet Love....Dowland
  Fête Polonaise from "Le Roi Malgré Lui" ....Chabrier
Alsatian Scenes ....Massenet
Tarantella ....Jacchia
Magic-Fire Music from "The Valkyr," Wagner
Numbers by Harvard Glee Club:
  Now Is the Month of Maying..Morley
  Drinking Song ....Poulenc
  Nocturne ....Cui
  Sir Eglamore .....English Folk-Song
  March of the Peers from "Iolanthe," Sullivan
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saëns
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....Densmore

Conductors: A. Jacchia and A. T. Davison

111

Post May 25

LIKE CLASSICS AT SUNDAY POPS

Big Audience Cordial to Highest Grade Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A rainy night, a "Symphonic" programme and the "Refreshments Served" signs turned face to the wall—and yet the Pop concert of last evening attracted an audience that filled all the balconies and the most of the floor of Symphony Hall.

What further proof were needed of the growing popularity of "classical" music among us?

At the Sunday Pops smoking, as well as eating and drinking, is forbidden by public statute, so that at these biweekly occasions the tables serve no useful purpose. Add to this the fact that last night's programme, made up of fragments of symphonies and of shorter pieces from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, was too long to permit of encores, and one has a Pop Concert with most of the "pop" deleted. Yet the audience last evening was unmistakably interested, even engrossed, and cordial in its reception of the music.

To the musical purist the performance of a single movement from a symphony is little short of sacrilege. Nevertheless, the Andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony heard last evening between Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture and the Minuet from a Symphony of Haydn, seemed for that reason no less beautiful, no less impressive than in its usual surroundings.

Inaugurated last season by Mr. Jacchia, the "Symphonic Night" at the Pops gives promise of becoming an annual event and by all appearances these concerts fill a distinct need in the musical life of the city. Give the insipient music-lover symphonies in installments, and in time he may crave them in toto. And that is true education.

HARVARD NIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Tonight wil be the annual Harvard night at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall, with two groups by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor. The program follows:

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre," ..... Litolff
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" .... Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ...... Tchaikovsky
Songs by Harvard Glee Club—
  (a) The Gypsy .... Zolotarev
  (b) Come Again, Sweet Love.... Dowland
  (c) Fete Plonaise from "Le Roi Malgre Lui" .... Chabrier

Alsatian Scenes .... Massenet
Tarantelle .... Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, Act III, "The Valkyrie" .... Wagner
Songs by Harvard Glee Club—
  (a) Now is the Month of Maying,
  (b) Chanson a Boire .... Pouleno
  (c) Nocturne .... Cui
  (d) Sir Eglamore .... English Folk Song
  (e) March of the Peers from "Iolanthe," .... Sullivan

Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," .... Saint-Saens
Barcarolle .... Offenbach
March, "Veritas" .... Densmore

AMERICAN MAY 25

~~HERALD MAY 25~~

"POPS" HARVARD NIGHT

Tonight will be the annual Harvard night at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall, with two groups by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor. The program:

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre," Litolff; waltz, "Miners' Lights," Zeller; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; songs by Harvard Glee Club—"The Gypsy," Zolotarev; "Come Again, Sweet Love," Dowland; "Fete Polonaise" from "Le Roi Malgre Lui," Chabrier; Alsatian Senes, Massenet; Tcarantelle, Jacchia; Magic Fire Music, act III, "The Valkyrie," Wagner; Songs by Harvard Glee Club—"Now is the Month of Maying," Morley, "Chanson a Boire," Poulenc, Nocturne, Cui, "Sir Eglamore" English folk song, "March of the Peers," from "Iolanthe," Sullivan: Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Barcarolle, Offenbach; march, "Veritas," Densmore.

ADVERTISER MAY 25

At Pops Tonight

Overture, "Robespierre" .... Litolff
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" .... Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tchaikovsky
Songs, Harvard Glee Club:
  a, The Gypsy .... Zolotarev
  b, Come Again, Sweet Love...... Dowland
  c, Fete from "Le Roie Maigre Lui" .... Chabrier
Alsatian Scenes .... Massenet
Tarantelle .... Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, "Valkyrie" ..... Wagner
Songs, Harvard Glee Club:
  a, Now Is the Month of Maying ... Morley
  b, Chanson a Boire .... Poulenc
  c, Nocturne .... Cui
  d, Sir Eglamore ...... English Folk Song
  e, March of the Peers from "Iolanthe" .... Sullivan
[illegible] "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Barcarolle .... Offenbach
March, "Veritas"

~~MONITOR MAY 25~~

Tonight at the "Pops"

HARVARD NIGHT

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" .... Litolff
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" ...... Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
Songs by Harvard Glee Club (Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor)
"Alsatian Scenes" .... Massenet
Tarantelle .... Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, Act III, "The Valkyrie" .... Wagner
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns
Barcarolle .... Offenbach
March, "Veritas" .... Densmore

HARVARD NIGHT AT "POPS"

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre," Litolff; Waltz, "Miners' Lights," Zeller; Fantasia "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky songs by Harvard Glee club; Alsatian Scenes, Massenet; Tarantelle, Jacchia Magic Fire Music, Act III, "The Valkyrie," Wagner; songs by Harvard Glee club; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Barcarolle, Offenbach; March "Veritas," Densmore.

TELEGRAM MAY 25

TRANSCRIPT MAY 26

At the Pops Tonight

Overture, "Phèdre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
Saxophone Solo, "I'm a-Wand'rin'," .... Gaines-Jacchia
Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner
Spanish Caprice...... Rimsky-Korsakov
Traümerei .... Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci". Leoncavallo
Overture, "William Tell" ...... Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.... Liszt
Entr'Acte, Waltz........ Hellmesberger
Triumphal March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar," .... Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Abdon Laus

TRAVELER MAY 26

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his "Pops" Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall tonight.

Overture to "Phedre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
"I'm a Wandörin'" (Old Slave Song) .... Gaines-Jacchia
Saxophone solo—Mr. Laus
Excerpt from act III, "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Spanish Caprice ....
Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—Fandango of the Asturias.
Traumerei .... Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse .... Hellmesberger
Triumphal March of Sigurd Josalfar .... Grieg

MONITOR MAY 26

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "Phèdre".... Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"... Komzak
"I'm a-Wand'rin'" (Old Slave Song) .... Gaines-Jacchia
Excerpts from Act III, "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
Spanish Caprice.. Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Traümerei" .... Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell".. Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody. .... Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse .... Hellmesberger
Triumphal March of Sigurd Jorsalfar .... Grieg

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his "Pops" Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall tonight.

Overture to "Phedre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
"I'm a Wandörin'" (Old Slave Song) .... Gaines-Jacchia
Saxophone solo—Mr. Laus
Excerpt from act III, "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Spanish Caprice ....
Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—Fandango of the Asturias.
Traumerel .... Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavello
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse .... Hellmesberger
Triumphal March of Sigurd Josalfar ..... Grieg

HERALD MAY 26

Fourth Week of Pops

This is the fourth week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia and the orchestra of 80 are giving each evening programs of the sorts of music auliences like, including everything from Wagner to Nevin and Mozart to Friml.

Friday night there will be an Italian program, including many selections from favorite operas. Saturday night in honor of the holiday an all American program is to be played. Next Monday, June 1, Mr Jacchia will offer a request program.

This time, however, a list of a dozen or more perennial favorites like Tchaikovsky's "1812," and Handel's "Largo," is announced.

GLOBE MAY 26

~~ADVERTISER MAY 26~~

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be presented at tht Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture, "Phedre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
I'm a-Wand'rin'" (Old Slave Song) .... Gaines-Jacchia
Saxophone Solo—Mr. Laus.
Excerpts from Act III, "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
Spanish Caprice .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Traumerei .... Schumann
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Entr' Acte Valse .... Hellmesberger
Triumphal March, of Sigurd Jorsalfar.. Grieg

~~ADVERTISER MAY 28~~

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Overture, "La Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Intermezzo, "Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament .... Dvorak-Kreisler
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1" .... Bizet
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—George Mager
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" .... Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" .... Ivanovici
American Patrol .... Meacham

TRANSCRIPT MAY 27

At the Pops Tonight

Overture, "Queen of Spades".... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"...... Metra
Moment Musical .... Schubert
Three Algerian Scenes...... Saint-Saëns
Fantasia, "Tales of Hoffmann" .... Offenbach
Dances of Piedmont........ Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais"...... Massenet
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".. Wagner
Capriccio—Pastorale—Burlesca .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue"...... Perera

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRAVELER MAY 27

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following program as conductor of the Symphony orchestra at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "Pique Dame........ Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"........ Metra
Moment Musical .... Schubert
Algerian Scenes .... Saint-Saens
Moorish Rhapsody—Evening Revery—Military March
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" .... Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi .... Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais" .... Massenet
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue" .... Perera

MONITOR MAY 27

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "Pique Dame"... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"... Metra
"Moment Musical" ...... Schubert
"Algerian Scenes" ..... Saint-Saëns
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi .... Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thaïs".. Massenet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Capricio-Pastorale-Burlesca. .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
"Indian Dirge" .... Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue". Perera

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following program as conductor of the Symphony orchestra at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "Pique Dame .... Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" .... Metra
Moment Musical .... Schubert
Algerian Scenes .... Saint-Saen
Moorish Rhapsody—Evening Revery—Military March
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" .... Offenbac
Danze Piemontesi .... Sinigagli
Meditation from "Thais" .... Massene
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagne
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca .... Scarlatti-Jacch
Indian Dirge .... Seyd
March, "Down the Avenue" .... Peret

HERALD MAY 27

May 27 AMERICAN

"THAIS" MEDITATION FEATURE AT POPS

Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following programs at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture to "Pique Dame" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" .... Metra
Moment Musical .... Schubert
Algerian Scenes .... Saint-Saens
Fantasia "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi .... Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais" .... Massenet
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Capriccio-Pastoralle-Burlesca. Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
March, Down the Avenue .... Perere

~~ADVERTISER MAY~~ 27

Pop Program

Overture, "Pique Dame" .... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" .... Metra
Moment Musical .... Schubert
Algerian Scenes .... Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "Tales of Hoffmann".. Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi .... Sinigaglia
Meditation, "Thais" .... Massenet
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz.
Prelude, "Mastersingers of Nuremberg .... Wagn
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca .... Scarletti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue" .... Perera

TRAVELER

IURSDAY, MAY 28, 1925

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following numbers will be heard at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" .... Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament........ Dvorak-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1" .... Bizet
Prelude—Minuet—Carillon.
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz" .... Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube".. Ivanovici
American Patrol .... Meacham

LAWRENCE
MASS.

MAY 28 1925

MUSIC-LOVERS who find more enjoyment in instrumental programs that are somewhat of a popular nature than in those of the serious, academic style, are having recourse to the Pops, now holding forth nightly at Symphony hall, Boston. This is the fortieth season. The orchestra, comprising some 75 or 80 players from the Boston Symphony, is again under the able leadership of Agide Jacchia. During the regular musical season the Boston Symphony in the main confines its work to programs of a pretentious character in which the great symphonies of Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Franck, Sibelius and others are given first place. While portions of some of the most popular of the great composers' symphonies find favor with Pop audiences, there is noticed a livelior appreciation for the lighter, less abstruse numbers, particularly those in which brevity is the salient feature. Tone-poems lasting an hour or more often tax the musical patience as well as understanding of the most enthusiastic, inveterate concert-goers. On many Pop programs will be noticed such stock pieces as Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" overture; Rossini's "William Tell" overture; Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, Berlioz's Hungarian march; Sousa marches; operatic fantasies (light and grand); and orchestral arrangements of songs like the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," the Schubert "Ave Maria," the Song of the Volga Boatmen; and others that are much more of a popular character. An evening at the Pops offers an intermingling of selections calculated to please the least as wel as the most erudite of isteners.

MONITOR MAY 28

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea" .... Suppé
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .... Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Suite .... Rameau-Mottl
"Dubinushka". Arranged by Jacchia
Chinese Dance .... Crist
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"..... Verdi
Hindu Song...... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Military March.... Schubert-Jacchia

Sunday Evening

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM

Overture, "The Roman Carnival" .... Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor.. (Second Movement).... Beethoven
"Varsang" (Spring Sadness).... .... Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major... (Menuetto) .... Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ...... Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute .... Respighi
Symphony No. 6 in B flat, "Pathetic" (Second Movement)... .... Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin".... Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Schéhérazade" (Finale) ...... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "The Sold Bride".. .... Smetana

TRANSCRIPT MAY 28

At the Pops Tonight

Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".... Rossini
Intermezzo from "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament .... Dvorák-Kreisler
Prelude, Minuet, Carillon, from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Eili, Eili.
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".. Mascagni
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube". Ivanovici
American Patrol .... Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

MONITOR MAY 28

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" .... Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
"Indian Lament" .. Dvořák-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlésienne No. 1"... Bizet
Fantasia, "Otello" .... Verdi
"Eili, Eili".... Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo," "L'Amico Fritz".. .... Mascagni
Rhapsody, "España" ..... Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon"...... Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube" .... Ivanovici
"American Patrol" ...... Meacham

HERALD MAY 28

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following numbers will be heard at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"........ Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament........ Dvorak-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1" .... Bizet
Prelude—Minuet—Carillon.
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz" .... Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube".. Ivanovici
American Patrol .... Meacham

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

MAY 29 1925

League of Composers to Give Premieres of Important Works the Coming Season

THE PROGRAM for next season of the League of Composers gives promise of much interest for those who like modern music. To open its season the league will give members an opportunity to hear Arthur Honegger, the noted French composer, in a program of chamber music by himself and his compatriots. This will take place in October, shortly after his arrival in America.

Three concerts of chamber orchestral works will be presented under the direction of distinguished conductors. The first, taking place late in November, will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. He makes his initial appearance here outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by permission of its board of trustees, to conduct a program of new music by Americans and Europeans. He will lead an ensemble of picked men from that orchestra

---

MONITOR MAY 29

Tonight at the "Pops"

ITALIAN PROGRAM

Overture to "The Barber of Seville" .... Rossini
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin" .... Drigo
Burlesca .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Ancient Dances and Airs.. Respighi
Ave Maria from "Otello"..... Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Selection, "Tosca." .... Puccini
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Marcia Reale Italiana...... Gabetti

Tomorrow Evening

MEMORIAL DAY PROGRAM

"Stars and Stripes Forever".. Sousa
Overture, "Durochka" ..... McLain
Spanish Dance No. 1......... .... Rollins-Jacchia
Selection, "Robin Hood".. DeKoven
"Woodland Sketches".... MacDowell
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" .... Cadman-Jacchia
Angelus from the Third Symphony .... Hadley
Two Indian Dances........ Skilton
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".. Herbert
The Rosary .... Nevin
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager
American Military Fantasy..... .... Rollinson

AMERICAN MAY 29

ITALIAN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN AT POP CONCERT

The melodies of Italy, operatic and otherwise, will fill the "Pop" program in Symphony Hall tonight. Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, will present the following numbers:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville," .... Rossini
Serenade, "The Milions of Harlequin," .... Drigo
Burlesca .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .. Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise.
Ancient Dances and Airs .... Respighi
Ave Maria from "Otello" .... Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casello
Selection, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Marcia Reale Italiana .... Gabetti

HERALD MAY 29

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Melodies of Italy, operatic and otherwise, will constitute the Pops concert at Symphony hall tonight. Agida Jacchia, conductor, will offer the following numbers:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville".. Rossini
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin".. Drigo
Burlesca........ Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"........ Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise.
Ancient Dances and Airs........ Respighi
Ave Maria from "Otello" .... Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Selection, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Minuet .... Bolzori
Marcia Reale Italiana .... Gabetti

Post May 23

LIKE CLASSICS AT SUNDAY POPS

Big Audience Cordial to Highest Grade Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A rainy night, a "Symphonic" programme and the "Refreshments Served" signs turned face to the wall—and yet the Pop concert of last evening attracted an audience that filled all the balconies and the most of the floor of Symphony Hall.

What further proof were needed of the growing popularity of "classical" music among us?

At the Sunday Pops smoking, as well as eating and drinking, is forbidden by public statute, so that at these biweekly occasions the tables serve no useful purpose. Add to this the fact that last night's programme, made up of fragments of symphonies and of shorter pieces from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, was too long to permit of encores, and one has a Pop Concert with most of the "pop" deleted. Yet the audience last evening was unmistakably interested, even engrossed, and cordial in its reception of the music.

To the musical purist the performance of a single movement from a symphony is little short of sacrilege. Nevertheless, the Andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony heard last evening between Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture and the Minuet from a Symphony of Haydn, seemed for that reason no less beautiful, no less impressive than in its usual surroundings.

Inaugurated last season by Mr. Jacchia, the "Symphonic Night" at the Pops gives promise of becoming an annual event and by all appearances these concerts fill a distinct need in the musical life of the city. Give the insipient music-lover symphonies in installments, and in time he may crave them in toto. And that is true education.

HARVARD NIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Tonight wil be the annual Harvard night at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall, with two groups by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor. The program follows:

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre," ....Litolff
Waltz, "Miners' Lights"........Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin"......Tchaikovsky
Songs by Harvard Glee Club—
(a) The Gypsy ....Zolotarev
(b) Come Again, Sweet Love....Dowland
(c) Fete Plonaise from "Le Roi Malgre Lui" ....Chabrier

Alsatian Scenes ....Massenet
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, Act III, "The Valkyrie" ....Wagner
Songs by Harvard Glee Club—
(a) Now is the Month of Maying, ...Pouleno
(b) Chanson a Boire ....
(c) Nocturne ....Cui
(d) Sir Eglamore .... English Folk Song
(e) March of the Peers from "Iolanthe," ....Sullivan

Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," ....Saint-Saens
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....Densmore

AMERICAN MAY 25

HERALD MAY 25

"POPS" HARVARD NIGHT

Tonight will be the annual Harvard night at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall, with two groups by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor. The program:

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre," Litolff; waltz, "Miners' Lights," Zeller; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; songs by Harvard Glee Club—"The Gypsy," Zolotarev; "Come Again, Sweet Love," Dowland; "Fete Polonaise" from "Le Roi Malgre Lui," Chabrier; Alsatian Senes, Massenet; Tearantelle, Jacchia; Magic Fire Music, act III, "The Valkyrie," Wagner; Songs by Harvard Glee Club—"Now is the Month of Maying," Morley, "Chanson a Boire," Poulenc, Nocturne, Cui, "Sir Eglamore" English folk song, "March of the Peers," from "Iolanthe," Sullivan; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Barcarolle, Offenbach; march, "Veritas," Densmore.

ADVERTISER MAY 25

At Pops Tonight

Overture, "Robespierre" ....Litolff
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" ....Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ....Tchaikovsky
Songs, Harvard Glee Club:
a, The Gypsy ....Zolotarev
b, Come Again, Sweet Love......Dowland
c, Fete from "Le Roie Malgre Lui" ....Chabrier
Alsatian Scenes ....Massenet
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, "Valkyrie" .....Wagner
Songs, Harvard Glee Club:
a, Now Is the Month of Maying ...Morley
b, Chanson a Boire ....Poulenc
c, Nocturne ....Cui
d, Sir Eglamore ......English Folk Song
e, March of the Peers from "Iolanthe" ....Sullivan
[illegible] "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saens
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....

MONITOR MAY 25

Tonight at the "Pops"

HARVARD NIGHT

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" ....Litolff
Waltz, "Miners' Lights"......Zeller
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ...... Tschaikowsky
Songs by Harvard Glee Club (Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor)
"Alsatian Scenes" ....Massenet
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Magic Fire Music, Act III, "The Valkyrie" ....Wagner
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saëns
Barcarolle ....Offenbach
March, "Veritas" ....Densmore

HARVARD NIGHT AT "POPS"

Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre, Litolff; Waltz, "Miners' Lights," Zeller Fantasia "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky songs by Harvard Glee club; Alsatian Scenes, Massenet; Tarantelle, Jacchia Magic Fire Music, Act III, "The Valkyrie," Wagner; songs by Harvard Glee club; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Barcarolle, Offenbach; March, "Veritas," Densmore.

TELEGRAM MAY 25

TRANSCRIPT MAY 26

At the Pops Tonight

Overture, "Phèdre"...........Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".......Komzak
Saxophone Solo, "I'm a-Wand'rin'," Gaines-Jacchia

Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger"....Wagner
Spanish Caprice......Rimsky-Korsakov
Traümerei .... Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".Leoncavallo
Overture, "William Tell".......Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Entr'Acte, Waltz.........Hellmesberger
Triumphal March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar," Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Abdon Laus

TRAVELER MAY 26

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his "Pops" Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall tonight.

Overture to "Phedre"............Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"............Komzak
"I'm a Wandörin' " (Old Slave Song) Gaines-Jacchia

Saxophone solo—Mr. Laus
Excerpt from act III, "The Mastersingers" Wagner

Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Haus Sachs............Rimsky-Korsako
Spanish Caprice............
Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—Fandango of the Asturias.
Traumerei............Schuman
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"........Leoncavell
Overture to "William Tell"........Rossin
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody............Lisz
Entr'Acte Valse............Hellmesberge
Triumphal March of Sigurd Josalfar......Gri

MONITOR MAY 26

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "Phèdre".....Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"...Komzak
"I'm a-Wand'rin' " (Old Slave Song) ....Gaines-Jacchia
Excerpts from Act III, "The Mastersingers" ....Wagner
Spanish Caprice..Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Traümerei" ....Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"... Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.. Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse ....Hellmesberger
Triumphal March of Sigurd Jorsalfar ....Grieg

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his "Pops" Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall tonight.

Overture to "Phedre"............Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"............Komzak
"I'm a Wandörin' " (Old Slave Song) Gaines-Jacchia

Saxophone solo—Mr. Lau.
Excerpt from act III, "The Mastersingers" Wagner

Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs............Rimsky-Korsakov
Spanish Caprice............
Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—Fandango of the Asturias.
Traumerei............Schumann
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"........Leoncavello
Overture to "William Tell"........Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody............Liszt
Entr'Acte Valse............Hellmesberger
Triumphal March of Sigurd Josalfar......Grieg

HERALD MAY 26

Fourth Week of Pops

This is the fourth week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia and the orchestra of 80 are giving each evening programs of the sorts of music audiences like, including everything from Wagner to Nevin and Mozart to Friml.

Friday night there will be an Italian program, including many selections from favorite operas. Saturday night in honor of the holiday an all American program is to be played. Next Monday, June 1, Mr Jacchia will offer a request program.

This time, however, a list of a dozen or more perennial favorites like Tchaikovsky's "1812," and Handel's "Largo," is announced.

GLOBE MAY 26

ADVERTISER MAY 26

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be presented at tht Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture, "Phedre" ....Massenet
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"............Komzak
I'm a-Wand'rin' " (Old Slave Song) Gaines-Jacchia

Saxophone Solo—Mr. Laus.
Excerpts from Act III, "The Mastersingers" ....Wagner
Spanish Caprice ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Traumerei ....Schumann
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" ....Leoncavallo
Overture, "William Tell" ....Rossini
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.........Liszt
Entr' Acte Valse............Hellmesberger
Triumphal March, of Sigurd Jorsalfar..Grieg

ADVERTISER MAY 28

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Overture, "La Gazza Ladra" .... Rossini
Intermezzo, "Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament .... Dvorak-Kreisler
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1" .... Bizet
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—George Mager
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz" ....Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"...Ivanovici
American Patrol .... Meacham

TRANSCRIPT MAY 27

At the Pops Tonight

Overture, "Queen of Spades"....Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"......Metra
Moment Musical ....Schubert
Three Algerian Scenes......Saint-Saëns
Fantasia, "Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach

Dances of Piedmont........Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais"......Massenet
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"..Wagner
Capriccio—Pastorale—Burlesca Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge ....Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue"......Perera

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRAVELER MAY 27

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following program as conductor of the Symphony orchestra at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "Pique Dame........Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"........Metra
Moment Musical ....Schubert
Algerian Scenes ....Saint-Saens
Moorish Rhapsody—Evening Revery—Military March
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi ....Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thais"........Massenet
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca...Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge ....Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue"........Perera

MONITOR MAY 27

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "Pique Dame"...Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"...Metra
"Moment Musical" ....Schubert
"Algerian Scenes" .....Saint-Saëns
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffman" ....Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi ....Sinigaglia
Meditation from "Thaïs"..Massenet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Capricio-Pastorale-Burlesca.... Scarlatti-Jacchia
"Indian Dirge" ....Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue".Perera

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following program as conductor of the Symphony orchestra at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "Pique Dame........Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade"........Metra
Moment Musical ....Schubert
Algerian Scenes ....Saint-Saens
Moorish Rhapsody—Evening Revery—Military March
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbac
Danze Piemontesi ....Sinigagli
Meditation from "Thais"........Massene
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagne
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca...Scarlatti-Jacch
Indian Dirge ....Seyd
March, "Down the Avenue"........Perei

HERALD MAY 27

AMERICAN May 27

"THAIS" MEDITATION FEATURE AT POPS

Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following programs at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture to "Pique Dame" ....Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" ....Metra
Moment Musical ....Schubert
Algerian Scenes ....Saint-Saens
Fantasia "The Tales of Hoffmann"Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi ....Sinigaglis
Meditation from "Thais"........Massenet
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca.Scarlatti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge ....Seydel
March, Down the Avenue ....Perera

ADVERTISER MAY 27

Pop Program

Overture, "Pique Dame" ....Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" .... Metra
Moment Musical .... Schubert
Algerian Scenes .... Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "Tales of Hoffmann"..Offenbach
Danze Piemontesi .... Sinigaglia
Meditation, "Thais" .... Massenet
Solo violin—J. Theodorowicz.
Prelude, "Mastersingers of Nuremberg .... Wagner
Capriccio Pastorale-Burlesca .... Scarletti-Jacchia
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
March, "Down the Avenue" ....Perera

TRAVELER

IURSDAY, MAY 28, 1925

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following numbers will be heard at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"...... .Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament............Dvorak-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1" ....Bizet
Prelude—Minuet—Carillon.
Fantasia, "Othello"............Verdi
Eili, Eili ....Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz"..........Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon"............Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube"..Ivanovici
American Patrol ....Meacham

LAWRENCE
MASS.

MAY 28 1925

MUSIC-LOVERS who find more enjoyment in instrumental programs that are somewhat of a popular nature than in those of the serious, academic style, are having recourse to the Pops, now holding forth nightly at Symphony hall, Boston. This is the fortieth season. The orchestra, comprising some 75 or 80 players from the Boston Symphony, is again under the able leadership of Agide Jacchia. During the regular musical season the Boston Symphony in the main confines its work to programs of a pretentious character in which the great symphonies of Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Franck, Sibelius and others are given first place. While portions of some of the most popular of the great composers' symphonies find favor with Pop audiences, there is noticed a livelier appreciation for the lighter, less abstruse numbers, particularly those in which brevity is the salient feature. Tone-poems lasting an hour or more often tax the musical patience as well as understanding of the most enthusiastic, inveterate concert-goers. On many Pop programs will be noticed such stock pieces as Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" overture; Rossini's "William Tell" overture; Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, Berlioz's Hungarian march; Sousa marches; operatic fantasies (light and grand); and orchestral arrangements of songs like the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," the Schubert "Ave Maria," the Song of the Volga Boatmen; and others that are much more of a popular character. An evening at the Pops offers an intermingling of selections calculated to please the least as wel as the most erudite of isteners.

MONITOR MAY 28

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea" ....Suppé
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ....Strauss
Ave Maria ....Bach-Gounod
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Suite ....Rameau-Mottl
"Dubinushka".Arranged by Jacchia
Chinese Dance ....Crist
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"....Verdi
Hindu Song......Rimsky-Korsakoff
Military March....Schubert-Jacchia

Sunday Evening

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM

Overture, "The Roman Carnival" Berlioz
Symphony No. 5 in C minor.. (Second Movement)....Beethoven
"Varsang" (Spring Sadness).... Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major... (Menuetto) ....Haydn
Rumanian Rhapsody ......Enesco
Old Dances and Airs for the Lute ....Respighi
Symphony No. 6 in B flat, "Pathetic" (Second Movement)... Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Symphonic Suite, "Schéhérazade" (Finale) ......Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "The Sold Bride".. Smetana

TRANSCRIPT MAY 28

At the Pops Tonight

Overture, "La Gazza Ladra"... Rossini
Intermezzo from "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament ....Dvořák-Kreisler
Prelude, Minuet, Carillon, from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne" ....Bizet
Fantasia, "Othello" ....Verdi
Eili, Eili.
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz"..Mascagni
Rhapsody, "España" ....Chabrier
Overture, "Mignon" ....Thomas
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" .Ivanovici
American Patrol ....Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

MONITOR MAY 28

Tonight at the "Pops"

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
"Indian Lament" ..Dvořák-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlésienne No. 1"...Bizet
Fantasia, "Otello" ....Verdi
"Eili, Eili"....Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo," "L'Amico Fritz".. Mascagni
Rhapsody, "España" .....Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon"......Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube" ....Ivanovici
"American Patrol" ......Meacham

HERALD MAY 28

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The following numbers will be heard at the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".........Rossini
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Indian Lament............Dvorak-Kreisler
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1"..........Bizet
Prelude—Minuet—Carillon.
Fantasia, "Othello"............Verdi
Eili, Elli ....Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz"..........Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
Overture to "Mignon"............Thomas
Waltz, "The Waves of the Danube"..Ivanovici
American Patrol ....Meacham

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST

MAY 29 1925

League of Composers to Give Premieres of Important Works the Coming Season

THE PROGRAM for next season of the League of Composers gives promise of much interest for those who like modern music. To open its season the league will give members an opportunity to hear Arthur Honegger, the noted French composer, in a program of chamber music by himself and his compatriots. This will take place in October, shortly after his arrival in America.

Three concerts of chamber orchestral works will be presented under the direction of distinguished conductors. The first, taking place late in November, will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. He makes his initial appearance here outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by permission of its board of trustees, to conduct a program of new music by Americans and Europeans. He will lead an ensemble of picked men from that orchestra

---

MONITOR MAY 29

Tonight at the "Pops"

ITALIAN PROGRAM

Overture to "The Barber of Seville" ....Rossini
Serenade ,"The Millions of Harlequin" ....Drigo
Burlesca ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" Mascagni
Ancient Dances and Airs..Respighi
Ave Maria from "Otello".....Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casella
Selection, "Tosca." ....Puccini
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Marcia Reale Italiana......Gabetti

Tomorrow Evening

MEMORIAL DAY PROGRAM

"Stars and Stripes Forever"..Sousa
Overture, "Durochka" .....McLain
Spanish Dance No. 1.......... Rollins-Jacchia
Selection, "Robin Hood"'..DeKoven
"Woodland Sketches"....MacDowell
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" ....Cadman-Jacchia
Angelus from the Third Symphony ....Hadley
Two Indian Dances.........Skilton
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"..Herbert
The Rosary ....Nevin
Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager
American Military Fantasy..... Rollinson

AMERICAN MAY 29

ITALIAN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN AT POP CONCERT

The melodies of Italy, operatic and otherwise, will fill the "Pop" program in Symphony Hall tonight. Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, will present the following numbers:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
Serenade, "The Milions of Harlequin," Drigo
Burlesca ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ..Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise.
Ancient Dances and Airs ....Respighi
Ave Maria from "Otello" ....Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casello
Selection, "Tosca" ....Puccini
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Marcia Reale Italiana ....Gabett.

HERALD MAY 29

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Melodies of Italy, operatic and otherwise, will constitute the Pops concert at Symphony hall tonight. Agida Jacchia, conductor, will offer the following numbers:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville"..Rossini
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin"..Drigo
Burlesca............Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"........Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise.
Ancient Dances and Airs............Respighi
Ave Maria from "Otello"............Verdi
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"............Leoni
Rhapsody, "Italia"............Casella
Selection, "Tosca"............Puccini
Minuet............Bolzori
Marcia Reale Italiana............Gabetti

1170

WILL BE FIRST 'JEWISH NIGHT' AT THE POPS

28 Advertiser

"Jewish Night"—one evening at the Pops concerts in Boston's Symphony Hall devoted solely to Jewish folk music and the works of a whole galaxy of immortal Jewish composers,—takes place Tuesday, June 16th. The occasion is especially distinguished because it marks the first time in the history of Boston and the history of the Pops concerts that a "Jewish Night" was included in the season's course of programmes. This notwithstanding the fact that an extraordinarily large percentage of followers of the Pops, as well as the regular Boston Symphony orchestral performances, are members of the Jewish faith.

Announcement officially of "Jewish Night," June 16th, comes at the end of activities initiated by the Culture Club of Boston, of which Morris Katzeff, prominent Boston attorney, is president, and under whose auspices the concert is to be given. When the idea of a "Jewish Night" was suggested to Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops concerts, he entered enthusiastically into the proposal and contributed his support and advice to the final plans. Shortly, however, the aid also of Henry Gideon, director of music at Temple Israel, was enlisted in the cause and a selective and representative "Jewish Night" program decided upon.

This has been fixed definitely as follows:

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Mayerbaer; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; fantasia, "The Jewess," Halevy; chorus, "Halelujah," Lewandowsky; "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn; violin solo, Bloch; three folk songs from Cradle to Chuppe, Gideon-Jacchia; Eili, Eili, arranged by Jacchia; selection from "The Music Box," Berlin; Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach; ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein.

In addition to this orchestral program the Culture Club, with the aid of Henry Gideon, will present more intimate examples of Jewish folk music. This will be rendered under Mr. Gideon's direction by a selected choir from several Boston temples. It is in these vocal selections that the folk music of the Jewish people, folk music gathered from [illegible] Ghettos and Jewish communiti[illegible] of the world, will find place o[illegible] program. In the orchestral [illegible]tions emphasis has been giv[illegible]ially to the works of Jewis[illegible]sers, whose music, while h[illegible]t the peculiar genius and [illegible]ion of the Jew, is not an [illegible]sion of Jewish folk life. I[illegible]as this precisely, however, which Morris Katzeff and the committee with the advice of Conductor Jacchia and Mr. Gideon most sought. They wished on the program the folk music of the Jewish race. But they wished also the works of immortal Jewish composers whose heritage to all mankind bears the influence of non-Jewish surroundings.

The enthusiasm and eagerness Conductor Jacchia put into the arrangements for "Jewish Night" constituted the major reward for the work of President Katzeff and the committee in starting the movement. Conductor Jacchia, who takes no little pride in his own Jewishness, was born in Lugo, Italy, on January 5, 1875. His Orthodox Jewish mother now makes her home in Milan, Italy, and the famous conductor and composer, regards it one of the joys of his vacations in his native country to observe with his mother the ancient customs of their race. He began his musical training in the Royal Conservatory of Music, at Parma, entering the Rossini Conservatory, at Pesaro, five years later. It was here that he became a great favorite with Pietro Mascagni under whom he studied composition, the relationship of teacher and pupil developing with the years into a firm and enduring friendship. On his graduation in 1898 he was awarded the Bodoira Prize for his "Hymn to Rossini."

Soon he became known in all the principal cities of Italy as a gifted conductor of grand opera. In 1902 he visited America as assistant-conductor to his beloved teacher in the latter's Mascagni Opera Company. In 1907 through to 1909 he toured the United States and Central America with the Milano Opera Company. About this time he composed the National Hymn of Central America and dedicated it to the president of the Republic of Quatemala.

In the seasons that followed, success greeted him everywhere. First at the Academy of Music in New York and then for four years in Canada as general musical director of the Montreal Opera Company. In 1914 he became principal conductor of the Century Opera Company in New York, touring the United States the following year as conductor with the Boston National Opera Company. In 1917 he began his engagement with the Boston Symphony Pops, which he is now conducting for the ninth season. He led in the organization of the Boston Conservatory of Music of which he has been the director.

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAY 30 1925

The Telegraph's correspondent is in receipt of the following communication from Pierre Monteux, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"~~Sir—It has always~~ been a resolve of mine ~~never to~~ answer any newspaper articles in regard to my work, but in fairness to myself and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I feel that I must break this resolve and answer an article written by Mr. Smith, headed "Twelve Players Leave Symphony," in a Boston paper and widely republished. In that article Mr. Smith speaks of the incidents of smoking during rehearsals, and in so speaking he has written, 'but here in Boston there had been a certain laxness during the years before Mr. Koussevitsky's coming.'

"In the five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony I can truthfully say that never was it necessary for me to correct a player for breach of dicipline, and I am certainly sure no man in the orchestra would have thought of smoking, as it was known that I would never have countenanced it, and it gave me much surprise to read of any player doing such a thing this year. In any case, I would feel it an absurd thing for publicity. Would you kindly do me the honor of printing this as an open letter in your paper, as I wish that paragraph in Mr. Smith's article corrected absolutely.

"Very sincerely,
"Pierre Monteux.
"Concert Gelboun, Amsterdam."

Advertiser May 30

American Music on Holiday Pop Program

American music will be featured on the holiday program at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers are:

Stars and Stripes Forever	Sousa
Overture, "Durochka"	McLain
Spanish Dance	Rollins-Jacchia
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Woodland Sketches	MacDowell
"Land of the Sky-Blue Water"	Cadman-Jacchia
Angelus, Third Symphony	Hadl
Two Indian Dances	Skil
Selection, "Mlle Modiste"	Herbert
The Rosary	Nevin
Solo Srumpet—Georges Mager.
American Military Fantasy	Rollins

Request Program At Monday Pops

Advertiser May 31

At Symphony Hall tomorrow night the fifth week of the Pops will open with a novel "restricted request" program, including the triumphal march from "Aida," the "William Tell" overture, Chabrier's "Espana," the "Fedora" fantasia, Seydel's "Indian Dirge," the "Bumble Bee" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Sibelius' "Finlandia," Jacchia's arrangement of "Dubinushka," Glinka's "Lark" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

The Boston Square and Compass Club choir will take part on Tuesday night.

There will be an all-Wagner program next Sunday night.

N Y TIMES

MAY 31 1925

Koussevitzky Interviewed

In London Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was interviewed by a representative of The Evening Standard, to whom the leader confided views on American music. "I think it probable," said Mr. Koussevitsky, "that the first American musician who writes really great music will base it on jazz motifs. Furthermore, jazz has a tremendous effect on the mentality of the general public in America and it cannot fail to have its influence on American music. The difference is that in London you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect, for the day of American composers is yet to come. Perhaps it is due to the fact that America is still very young as a country. I do not know.

"In London there is a wonderful musical movement which is expressed in the superb London Symphony Orchestra. But compare the number of concerts which take place in a city like Boston with those which take place in London. In London I am conducting three concerts only and the London Symphony Orchestra is giving twelve altogether.

"In Boston alone I conducted 112. Besides that, America, and Boston in particular, opens its arms to modern musicians, which is all the more strange since London has modern composers of a high order, which America lacks.

"Comparisons I know are odious, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the largest repertoire in the world, but it is my convinced opinion that the London Symphony Orchestra plays the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky better than any orchestra in the world. They have cultivated these particular musicians to perfection. What is even more interesting, perhaps, is the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra is composed almost entirely of English musicians, whereas that of Boston contains musicians from every European country with only a sprinkling of Americans."

Singers engaged at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, this season will again be advised not to accede to the demands of the leaders of the claque. "This is good news," remarks The London Morning Post. "Healthy, genuine applause is always welcome, but it becomes irritating when recognized hands try to arouse enthusiasm from a lethargic audience. Of course, this is different in Italy, for, as Mr. Richard Northcott, the archivist of the Royal Opera, reminds one, singers still have to acknowledge the claque, and have to pay the recognized rates for judicious applause at the proper moment. 'Any artist who attempts to fight this body of blackmailers,' says Mr. Northcott, who knows the Italian opera houses, 'with octopus-like tentacles in every city in the land of song, soon realizes the hopelessness of his efforts. If he pays the price there is stimulating and even exhilarating applause at every suitable opportunity, and the average visitor would not suspect the origin of this appreciation from various parts of the auditorium. But should the singer consider the amount demanded too large and offer, say, only half, he certainly will get applause, though most likely, as happened to an English tenor in Turin, an important aria may be spoiled by a too previous Bravo! which will lead the rest of the audience to "shush" down the offender, so that amid the spontaneous disturbance the artist's efforts will be lost.'"

EAGLE

MAY 31 1925

* * *

It was recently reported that fourteen members of the Boston symphony orchestra were relieved of their musical duties because they insisted upon smoking cigarets during their frequent and lengthy rehearsals. At any rate this is one thing that New York will not be able to blame on Kansas, the state that, they claim, is bounded on the south, west and north by wheat and on the east by bunk. And they never specified how far east the bunk extended.

4

SAYS MUSIC FALLS UPON DEAF EARS

Post May 31

Public Can't Understand Much of It, Says Pops Leader

Boston Symphony concerts are played to deaf ears. So says Agide Jacchia, leader of the famous "Pops", who declares that his audiences are 100 per cent music lovers while less than one-tenth of the Symphony audiences know or care anything about the music played for them.

BLAMES THE MUSIC

And Mr. Jaccia does not blame the Symphony concerts for proving at times incomprehensible, for he admits that he cannot understand or enjoy the ultra modern music that has made its appearance on Symphony programmes since the war. This music, according to Mr. Jaccia, is not music at all and he will have none of it on the Pops programmes.

But [illegible] from the merits or demerits of the [illegible] concerts, Mr. Jaccia finds [illegible] quite unable to enjoy music [illegible] selves. There is altogether [illegible] snobbishness about their [illegible] the concerts, he says, and it [illegible] opinion that a large majority of the S[illegible]urday nighters at Symphony depen[illegible]pon newspaper criticism for the [illegible] their applause.

Prais[illegible] op[illegible] udiences

The "Pops" audiences are not present because of the dictates of fashion, declared the leader, but attend "Pops" because they really enjoy music. They are a wonderfully responsive audience on this account and despite the eating that goes on they are extremely polite, he added.

Mr. Jaccia attributes the American deafness to music to lack of musical education such as is made public in European countries. He favors having music schools side by side with the public schools and in this way developing what musical genius America must have as well as develop and appreciation for music.

Mr. Jaccia has presented his plans for national music schools to other musicians, but he finds that most of them put [illegible] private interest before the public interest and do not wish to undertake a career which would prove less profitable than private teaching which in this country has become so exorbitant, he says, as to exclude all except the well off.

'POPS' BEGIN FIFTH WEEK

HERALD MAY 31

Restricted Request Program for Monday—Annual Wagner Program

Of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony hall for the coming week, the fifth of their season, the special nights will be the restricted request program tomorrow, and the annual Wagner program next Sunday, June 7. The programs of the week prepared by Agide Jacchia for the "Pops" symphony orchestra of 80 players follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 1

RESTRICTED REQUEST PROGRAM

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Dubinushka	Arr. by Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Indian Dirge	Seydel
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
The Lark (Arr. by Jacchia)	Glinka
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

TUESDAY, JUNE 2

March, "Boston Commandery"	Carter
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"	Tchaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club choir
(a) "To the Field, to the Hunt," from "Don Munio"	Buck
(b) Song of the Pilot from "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Chinese Suite	Friml
Po-Ling and Ming Toy—A Chinese Love Song—Time o' Gloaming (Valse)—Cometh as a Bride
Volga Bargemen's Song	Arr. by Jacchia
The Dance of the Hours	Ponchielli
Boston Square and Compass Club
(a) Gypsy Love Song	Herbert
Ernest W. Johnson, Soloist
(b) Dear Old Pops
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman"	Offenbach
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artist' Life"	Strauss

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 3

Stars and Stripes Forever	Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
American Patrol	Meacham
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
American Fantasy	Herbert
Largo	Handel
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water	Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Gold and Silver"	Lehar
Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar

THURSDAY, JUNE 4

Military March (Ar. by Jacchia)	Schubert
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte"	Mozart
The Lark	Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Indian Summer, An American Idyl	Herbert
Solo English horn, Louis Speyer
Czardas (No. 1)	Michiels
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Suite, Coppelia	Delibes
Waltz of the Hours—Czardas
Intermezzo from "Goyescas"	Granados
Bacchanale from "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod

FRIDAY, JUNE 5

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
Reve Angelique	Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"	Verdi
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Violin, harp, organ and strings
Clavelitos	Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song"	Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
March, "Lorraine"	Ganne

SATURDAY, JUNE 6

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture to "L'Italiano in Algeri"	Rossini
Serenade	Toselli
Fantasia "Madam Butterfly"	Puccini
Fireworks	Stravinsky
O Katharina	Fall
Waltz No. 15	Brahms-Gericke
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello"	Verdi
Valse Triste	Sibelius
March, "El Capitan"	Sousa

WAGNER PROGRAM

SUNDAY, JUNE 7

Festival march
"The Flying Dutchman"—overture
"Lohengrin"—Prelude
"Tannhaeuser"—Bacchanale
"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg—Prelude
"Parsifal"—Entrance of the Knights into th temple of the Holy Grail
"The Rhine Gold"—Entrance of the gods int Walhalla
"Siegfried"—"Forest Murmurs"
"The Valkyrie"—The Ride of the Valkyries

ADVERTISER JUNE 1

NOVEL REQUEST BILL AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Tonight's restricted request program is a new departure at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The numbers are:

Triumphal March "Aida"	Verdi
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Dubinushka	Arranged by Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
antasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Indian Dirge	Seydel
Scherzo, "Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchiakovsky
Finlandia	Sibelius
The Lark	Klinka
The Ride of the alkyries	Wagner
Encores
Tarantelle	Jacchia
Prelude	Rachmaninov
Minuet	Boccherini
By the Waters of Minnetonka	Lieurance
March of the Toys	Herbert

MONITER JUNE 1

Tonight at the "Pops"

RESTRICTED REQUEST PROGRAM

Triumphal March from "Aïda"	Verdi
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
"Dubinushka," Arranged by Jacchia
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Indian Dirge	Seydel
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave	Tschaikowsky
"Finlandia"	Sibelius
"The Lark" (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)	Glinka
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Encores
Tarantelle	Jacchia
Prelude	Rachmaninoff
Minuet	Boccherini
By the Waters of Minnetonka	Lieurance
March of the Toys	Herbert

Post May 29

Koussevitzky Locked In

LONDON, May 28.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is conducting at London symphony, had a tragic experience the other night. With a friend, he took a stroll in Hyde Park after dinner, unaware that the public parks in London are locked up at night.

When they started for their hotel they found themselves locked in. Round and round the park they walked endeavoring to find someone to let them out and when 3 a. m. was chiming [illegible] found a gatekeeper near Albert Hall who let them out.

Advertiser May 29

ITALIAN NIGHT AT POPS

Melodies of Italy will fill the Pop Concert program at Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers:

Overture, "Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Serenade, "Millions of Harlequ	Drigo
Burlesca	Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"	Mascagni
Ancient Dances and Airs	Raspigni
Ave Marie from "Otello"	Verd
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"	Leo
Rhapsody, "Italia"	Casel
Selection, "Tosca"	Pucc
Minuet	Bol
Marcia Reale Italiana	Ga

1170

WILL BE FIRST 'JEWISH NIGHT' AT THE POPS

28 Advertiser

"Jewish Night"—one evening at the Pops concerts in Boston's Symphony Hall devoted solely to Jewish folk music and the works of a whole galaxy of immortal Jewish composers,—takes place Tuesday, June 16th. The occasion is especially distinguished because it marks the first time in the history of Boston and the history of the Pops concerts that a "Jewish Night" was included in the season's course of programmes. This notwithstanding the fact that an extraordinarily large percentage of followers of the Pops, as well as the regular Boston Symphony orchestral performances, are members of the Jewish faith.

Announcement officially of "Jewish Night," June 16th, comes at the end of activities initiated by the Culture Club of Boston, of which Morris Katzeff, prominent Boston attorney, is president, and under whose auspices the concert is to be given. When the idea of a "Jewish Night" was suggested to Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops concerts, he entered enthusiastically into the proposal and contributed his support and advice to the final plans. Shortly, however, the aid also of Henry Gideon, director of music at Temple Israel, was enlisted in the cause and a selective and representative "Jewish Night" program decided upon.

This has been fixed definitely as follows:

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Mayerbaer; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; fantasia, "The Jewess," Halevy; chorus, "Halelujah," Lewandowsky; "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn; violin solo, Bloch; three folk songs from Cradle to Chuppe, Gideon-Jacchia; Eili, Eili, arranged by Jacchia; selection from "The Music Box," Berlin; Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach; ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein.

In addition to this orchestral program the Culture Club, with the aid of Henry Gideon, will present more intimate examples of Jewish folk music. This will be rendered under Mr. Gideon's direction by a selected choir from several Boston temples. It is in these vocal selections that the folk music of the Jewish people, folk music gathered from [illegible] Ghettos and Jewish communit[illegible] of the world, will find place o[illegible] program. In the orchestral [illegible]tions emphasis has been giv[illegible]ially to the works of Jewis[illegible]sers, whose music, while h[illegible]t the peculiar genius and [illegible]ion of the Jew, is not an [illegible]sion of Jewish folk life. [illegible] was this precisely, however, wh[illegible]h Morris Katzeff and the committee with the advice of Conductor Jacchia and Mr. Gideon most sought. They wished on the program the folk music of the Jewish race. But they wished also the works of immortal Jewish composers whose heritage to all mankind bears the influence of non-Jewish surroundings.

The enthusiasm and eagerness Conductor Jacchia put into the arrangements for "Jewish Night" constituted the major reward for the work of President Katzeff and the committee in starting the movement. Conductor Jacchia, who takes no little pride in his own Jewishness, was born in Lugo, Italy, on January 5, 1875. His Orthodox Jewish mother now makes her home in Milan, Italy, and the famous conductor and composer, regards it one of the joys of his vacations in his native country to observe with his mother the ancient customs of their race. He began his musical training in the Royal Conservatory of Music, at Parma, entering the Rossini Conservatory, at Pesaro, five years later. It was here that he became a great favorite with Pietro Mascagni under whom he studied composition, the relationship of teacher and pupil developing with the years into a firm and enduring friendship. On his graduation in 1898 he was awarded the Bodoira Prize for his "Hymn to Rossini."

Soon he became known in all the principal cities of Italy as a gifted conductor of grand opera. In 1902 he visited America as assistant-conductor to his beloved teacher in the latter's Mascagni Opera Company. In 1907 through to 1909 he toured the United States and Central America with the Milano Opera Company. About this time he composed the National Hymn of Central America and dedicated it to the president of the Republic of Quatemala.

In the seasons that followed, success greeted him everywhere. First at the Academy of Music in New York and then for four years in Canada as general musical director of the Montreal Opera Company. In 1914 he became principal conductor of the Century Opera Company in New York, touring the United States the following year as conductor with the Boston National Opera Company. In 1917 he began his engagement with the Boston Symphony Pops, which he is now conducting for the ninth season. He led in the organization of the Boston Conservatory of Music of which he has been the director.

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAY 30 1925

The Telegraph's correspondent is in receipt of the following communication from Pierre Monteux, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"Sir—It has always been a resolve of mine never to answer any newspaper articles in regard to my work, but in fairness to myself and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I feel that I must break this resolve and answer an article written by Mr. Smith, headed "Twelve Players Leave Symphony," in a Boston paper and widely republished. In that article Mr. Smith speaks of the incidents of smoking during rehearsals, and in so speaking he has written, 'but here in Boston there had been a certain laxness during the years before Mr. Koussevitsky's coming.'

"In the five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony I can truthfully say that never was it necessary for me to correct a player for breach of dicipline, and I am certainly sure no man in the orchestra would have thought of smoking, as it was known that I would never have countenanced it, and it gave me much surprise to read of any player doing such a thing this year. In any case, I would feel it an absurd thing for publicity. Would you kindly do me the honor of printing this as an open letter in your paper, as I wish that paragraph in Mr. Smith's article corrected absolutely.

"Very sincerely,
"Pierre Monteux.
"Concert Gelboun, Amsterdam."

ADVERTISER MAY 31

American Music on Holiday Pop Program

American music will be featured on the holiday program at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers are:

Stars and Stripes Forever	Sousa
Overture, "Durochka"	McLain
Spanish Dance	Rollins-Jacchia
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Woodland Sketches	MacDowell
"Land of the Sky-Blue Water"	Cadman-Jacchia
Angelus, Third Symphony	Hadley
Two Indian Dances	Skilton
Selection, "Mlle Modiste"	Herbert
The Rosary	Nevin
Solo Srumpet—Georges Mager.
American Military Fantasy	Rollinson

Request Program At Monday Pops

ADVERTISER MAY 31

At Symphony Hall tomorrow night the fifth week of the Pops will open with a novel "restricted request" program, including the triumphal march from "Aida," the "William Tell" overture, Chabrier's "Espana," the "Fedora" fantasia, Seydel's "Indian Dirge," the "Bumble Bee" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Sibelius' "Finlandia," Jacchia's arrangement of "Dubinushka," Glinka's "Lark" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

The Boston Square and Compass Club choir will take part on Tuesday night.

There will be an all-Wagner program next Sunday night.

N TIMES

MAY 31 1925

Koussevitzky Interviewed

In London Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was interviewed by a representative of The Evening Standard, to whom the leader confided views on American music. "I think it probable," said Mr. Koussevitsky, "that the first American musician who writes really great music will base it on jazz motifs. Furthermore, jazz has a tremendous effect on the mentality of the general public in America and it cannot fail to have its influence on American music. The difference is that in London you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect, for the day of American composers is yet to come. Perhaps it is due to the fact that America is still very young as a country. I do not know.

"In London there is a wonderful musical movement which is expressed in the superb London Symphony Orchestra. But compare the number of concerts which take place in a city like Boston with those which take place in London. In London I am conducting three concerts only and the London Symphony Orchestra is giving twelve altogether.

"In Boston alone I conducted 112. Besides that, America, and Boston in particular, opens its arms to modern musicians, which is all the more strange since London has modern composers of a high order, which America lacks.

"Comparisons I know are odious, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the largest repertoire in the world, but it is my convinced opinion that the London Symphony Orchestra plays the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky better than any orchestra in the world. They have cultivated these particular musicians to perfection. What is even more interesting, perhaps, is the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra is composed almost entirely of English musicians, whereas that of Boston contains musicians from every European country with only a sprinkling of Americans."

Singers engaged at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, this season will again be advised not to accede to the demands of the leaders of the claque. "This is good news," remarks The London Morning Post. "Healthy, genuine applause is always welcome, but it becomes irritating when recognized hands try to arouse enthusiasm from a lethargic audience. Of course, this is different in Italy, for, as Mr. Richard Northcott, the archivist of the Royal Opera, reminds one, singers still have to acknowledge the claque, and have to pay the recognized rates for judicious applause at the proper moment. 'Any artist who attempts to fight this body of blackmailers,' says Mr. Northcott, who knows the Italian opera houses, 'with octopus-like tentacles in every city in the land of song, soon realizes the hopelessness of his efforts. If he pays the price there is stimulating and even exhilarating applause at every suitable opportunity, and the average visitor would not suspect the origin of this appreciation from various parts of the audhorium. But should the singer consider the amount demanded too large and offer, say, only half, he certainly will get applause, though most likely, as happened to an English tenor in Turin, an important aria may be spoiled by a too previous Bravo! which will lead the rest of the audience to "shush" down the offender, so that amid the spontaneous disturbance the artist's efforts will be lost.' "

EAGLE

MAY 31 1925

* * *

It was rec[illegible] reported that fourteen members of the Boston symphony orchestra were relieved of their musical duties because they insisted upon smoking cigarets during their frequent and lengthy rehearsals. At any rate this is one thing that New York will not be able to blame on Kansas, the state that, they claim, is bounded on the south, west and north by wheat and on the east by bunk. And they never specified how far east the bunk extended.

4

SAYS MUSIC FALLS UPON DEAF EARS

Post MAY 31

Public Can't Understand Much of It, Says Pops Leader

Boston Symphony concerts are played to deaf ears. So says Agide Jacchia, leader of the famous "Pops", who declares that his audiences are 100 per cent music lovers while less than one-tenth of the Symphony audiences know or care anything about the music played for them.

BLAMES THE MUSIC

And Mr. Jaccia does not blame the Symphony concerts for proving at times incomprehensible, for he admits that he cannot understand or enjoy the ultra modern music that has made its appearance on Symphony programmes since the war. This music, according to Mr. Jaccia, is not music at all and he will have none of it on the Pops programmes.

But a[illegible] from the merits or demerits of the [illegible]ny concerts, Mr. Jaccia finds [illegible] quite unable to enjoy music [illegible]selves. There is altogether [illegible]ch snobbishness about their r[illegible]se to the concerts, he says, and it [illegible]s [illegible]inion that a large majority of [illegible]e S[illegible]urday nighters at Symphony depen[illegible]pon newspaper criticism for the[illegible]ntl their applause.

Prais[illegible]op[illegible]udiences

The "Pops" audiences are not present because of the dictates of fashion, declared the leader, but attend "Pops" because they really enjoy music. They are a wonderfully responsive audience on this account and despite the eating that goes on they are extremely polite, he added.

Mr. Jaccia attributes the American deafness to music to lack of musical education such as is made public in European countries. He favors having music schools side by side with the public schools and in this way developing what musical genius America must have as well as develop and appreciation for music.

Mr. Jaccia has presented his plans for national music schools to other musicians but he finds that most of them put [illegible]r private interest before the public interest and do not wish to undertake a career which would prove less profitable than private teaching which in this country has become so [illegible]orbitant, he says, as to exclude a[illegible] except the well off.

'POPS' BEGIN FIFTH WEEK

HERALD MAY 31

Restricted Request Program for Monday—Annual Wagner Program

Of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony hall for the coming week, the fifth of their season, the special nights will be the restricted request program tomorrow, and the annual Wagner program next Sunday, June 7. The programs of the week prepared by Agide Jacchia for the "Pops" symphony orchestra of 80 players follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 1

RESTRICTED REQUEST PROGRAM

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Dubinushka	Arr. by Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Indian Dirge	Seydel
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
The Lark (Arr. by Jacchia)	Glinka
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

TUESDAY, JUNE 2

March, "Boston Commandery"	Carter
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"	Tchaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club choir
(a) "To the Field, to the Hunt," from "Don Munio"	Buck
(b) Song of the Pilot from "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Chinese Suite	Friml
Po-Ling and Ming Toy—A Chinese Love Song
[illegible]ne o' Gloaming (Valse)—Cometh as a [illegible]
Volga Bargemen's Song	Arr. by Jacchia
The Dance of the Hours	Ponchielli
Boston Square and Compass Club
(a) Gypsy Love Song	Herbert
Ernest W. Johnson, Soloist
(b) Dear Old Pops
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman"	Offenbach
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artist' Life"	Strauss

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 3

Stars and Stripes Forever	Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
American Patrol	Meacham
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
American Fantasy	Herbert
Largo	Handel
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water	Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose Marie"	Friml-Stothart
Overture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Gold and Silver"	Lehar
Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar

THURSDAY, JUNE 4

Military March (Ar. by Jacchia)	Schubert
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte"	Mozart
The Lark	Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
[illegible], "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Indian Summer, An American Idyl	Herbert
Solo English horn, Louis Speyer
Czardas (No. 1)	Michiels
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Suite, Coppelia	Delibes
Waltz of the Hours—Czardas
Intermezzo from "Goyescas"	Granados
Bacchanale from "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod

FRIDAY, JUNE 5

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
Reve Angelique	Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Fantasia "Il Trovatore"	Verdi
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Violin, harp, organ and strings
Claveltos	Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song"	Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
March, "Lorraine"	Ganne

SATURDAY, JUNE 6

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture to "L'Italiano in Algeri"	Rossini
Serenade	Toselli
Fantasia "Madam Butterfly"	Puccini
Fireworks	Stravinsky
O Katharina	Fall
Waltz No. 15	Brahms-Gericke
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello"	Verdi
Valse Triste	Sibelius
March, "El Capitan"	Sousa

WAGNER PROGRAM

SUNDAY, JUNE 7

Festival march
"The Flying Dutchman"—overture
"Lohengrin"—Prelude
"Tannhaeuser"—Bacchanale
"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg—Prelude
"Parsifal"—Entrance of the Knights into th temple of the Holy Grail
"The Rhine Gold"—Entrance of the gods int Walhalla
"Siegfried"—"Forest Murmurs"
"The Valkyrie"—The Ride of the Valkyries

ADVERTISER JUNE 1

NOVEL REQUEST BILL AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Tonight's restricted request program is a new departure at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The numbers are:

Triumphal March "Aida"	Verdi
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Dubinushka	Arranged by Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Indian Dirge	Seydel
Scherzo, "Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchiakovsky
Finlandia	Sibelius
The Lark	Klinka
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Encores
Tarantelle	Jacchia
Prelude	Rachmaninov
Minuet	Boccherini
By the Waters of Minnetonka	Lieurance
March of the Toys	Herbert

MONITER JUNE 1

Tonight at the "Pops"

RESTRICTED REQUEST PROGRAM

Triumphal March from "Aïda"	Verdi
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
"Dubinushka,"	Arranged by Jacchia
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fedora"	Giordano
Indian Dirge	Seydel
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave	Tschaikowsky
"Finlandia"	Sibelius
"The Lark" (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)	Glinka
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Encores
Tarantelle	Jacchia
Prelude	Rachmaninoff
Minuet	Boccherini
By the Waters of Minnetonka	Lieurance
March of the Toys	Herbert

Post MAY 29

Koussevitzky Locked In

LONDON, May 28.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is conducting at London symphony, had a tragic experience the other night. With a friend, he took a stroll in Hyde Park after dinner, unaware that the public parks in London are locked up at night.

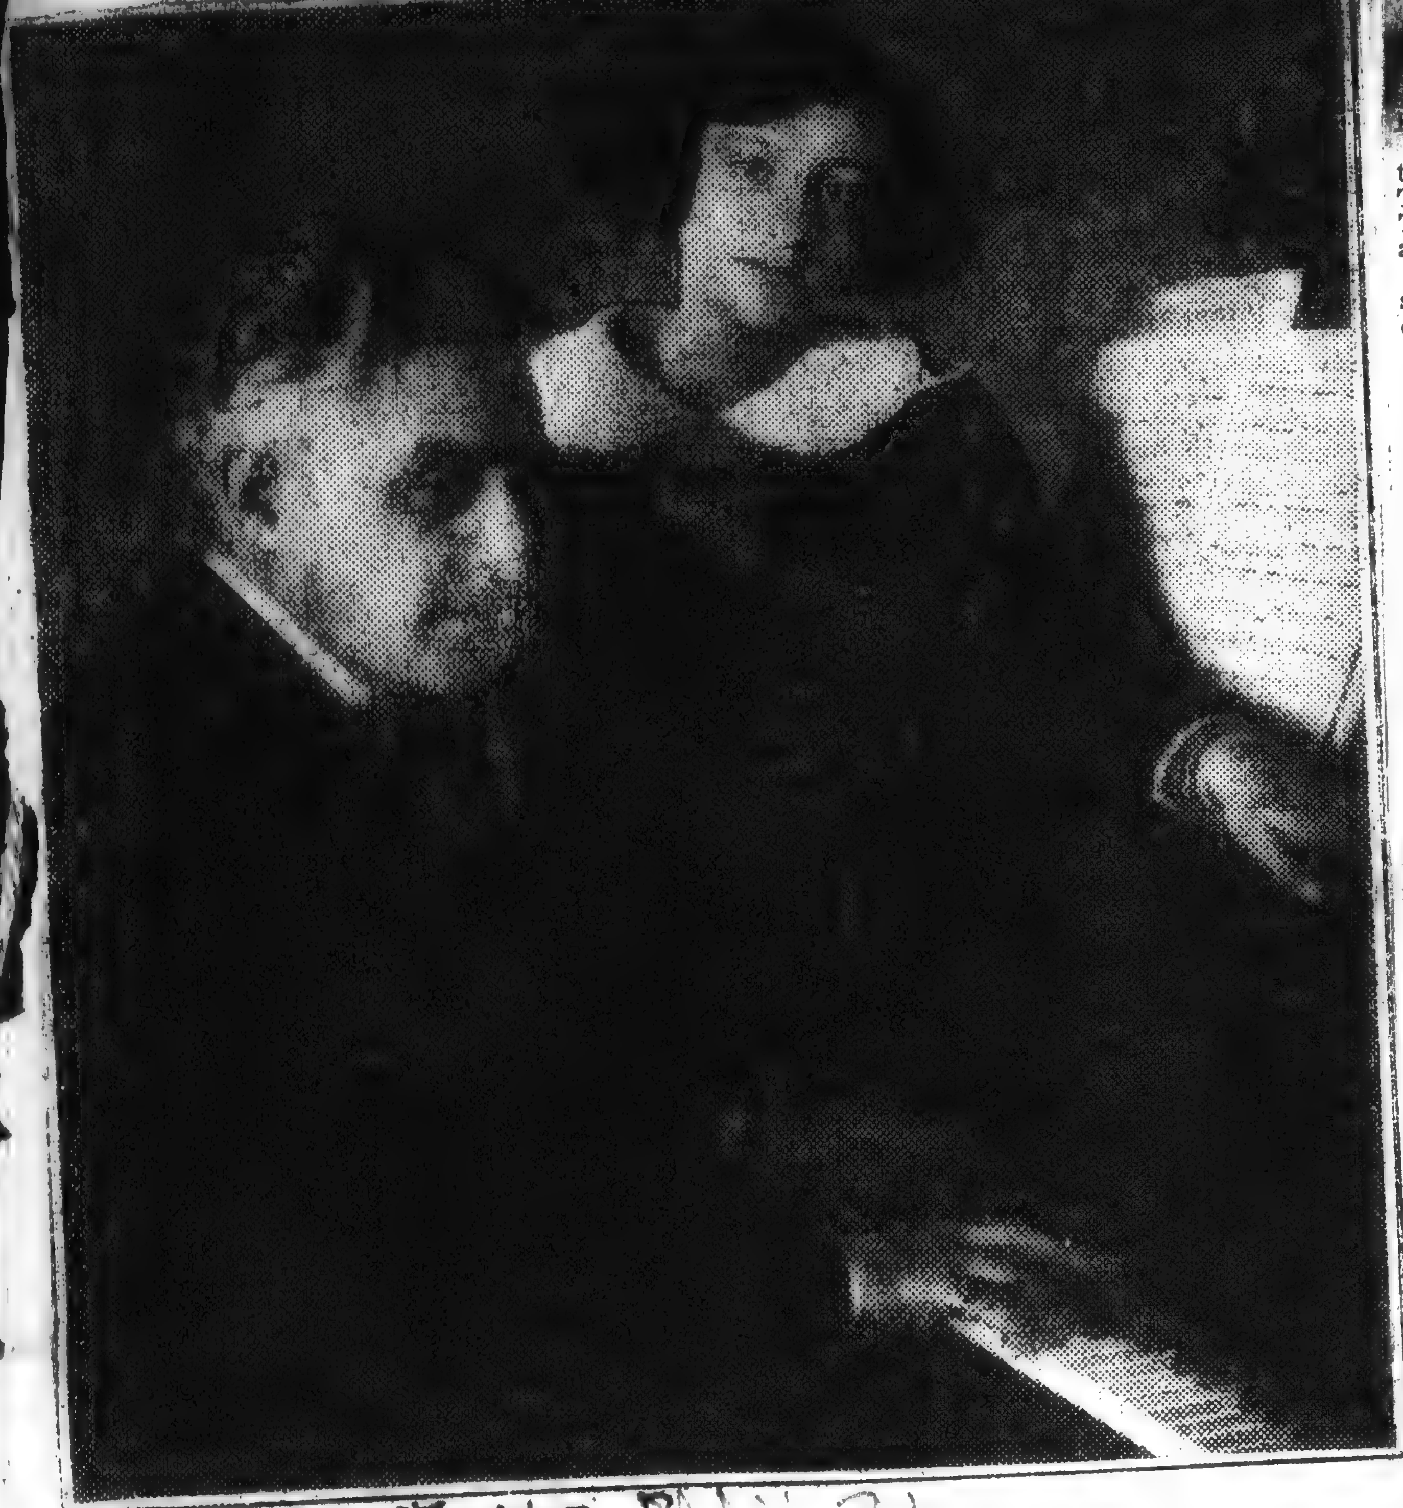
When they started for their hotel they found themselves locked in. Round and round the park they walked endeavoring to find someone to let them out and when 3 a. m. was chiming [illegible] found a gatekeeper near Albert Hall who let them out.

Advertiser May 29

ITALIAN NIGHT AT POPS

Melodies of Italy will fill the Pop Concert program at [illegible]phony Hall tonight. The numbers:

Overture, "Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Serenade, "Millions of Harlequin"	Drigo
Burlesca	Scarlatti-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"	Mascagni
Ancient Dances and Airs	Raspigni
Ave Marie from "Otello"	Verd
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"	Leon
Rhapsody, "Italia"	Casel
Selection, "Tosca"	Pucc
Minuet	Bol
Marcia Reale Italiana	Gal



POST ~~JUNE~~ MAY 31

Jacchia's Daughter Listens—Elsa Jacchia, daughter of the famous conductor of the Pops at Boston, is an ardent student of music. Here she is shown with her father studying some of the intricacies of technique. (Schervee Studio.)

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

MAY 31 1925

Musical

Vale—Being a Resume of Notes—Mayor Organizes
certs—Ethel Litchfield I cian—Harmonica Contes

By HARVEY

Hurray for the moth balls and the cedar chips, the music season is over, the singing solstice is past and some of us may now hibernate and enjoy ourselves.

It has been a hard season, a fast one and a good one. People have been most kind to this desk, sending us billets deux of appreciation, replete with blackhand suggestions. There is something marvelously prophylactic in a good blackhand note. It is something like having a first-class fight with the wife at breakfast; it clarifies the atmosphere.

The unfortunate part about this season's blackhand notes is the utter absence of profanity and billingsgate. We much prefer them rougher and more rugged. We would rather have them couched in the goose-flesh provoking, tremble-producing language of, say, a motorman addressing a casual conversation to a truck driver. There is something fine and virile in that, and something one may really remember. To have people merely disagree with you and disapprove of you is nothing. That is the price you pay in the newspaper game, and it is a worthy price. It is something we come to look for with every signed article.

Where to begin? Oh, let's start with the Boston Symphony. That brought up four deprecatory notes, one from a prominent person in the community much given to writing notes, one from a concert manager and two from people suffering from Bostonphobia. It would seem that the title, "Made in Boston," was sacrosanct, and perhaps that is why cod rhymes so easily—and so often in Back Bay—with God. Elford Langhley writes us a volume to prove that Koussevitsky is a burning torch, and that it is distinctly up to us to play the Pollyanna game and "be glad that such men as Serge Koussevitsky visited unmusical Pittsburgh."

"You Flat Head," so opens "A Well-Wisher." "If Daniel Webster invented the dictionary, I have no doubt Noah invented the ark. After read few of your alleged music

---

THE POPS

Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Dubinushka, arranged by Jacchia; Rhapsody, "Espana," Charbrier; Fantasia, "Feroda," Giordano; Indian Dirge, Seydel; Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; The Lark, (arranged by Agide Jacchia), Glinka; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner;

Encores

Tarantelle, Jacchia; Prelude, Rachmaninov; Minuet, Boccherini; By the Waters of Minnetonka, Lieurance; March of the Toys, Herbert.

TELEGRAM JUNE 1

MONITOR JUNE 1

The "Pops"

Tonight brings the first "Restricted Request Program" in the history of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall. Patrons were invited to vote for any number of the repertory except certain items that have heretofore held exclusive sway on request nights.

The result of the ballot, as shown by the program printed in another column, is interesting. For the most part, it seems to indicate that the taste of the minority differs little from that of the majority of "Pops" concertgoers. "Dubinushka," the Indian Dirge, the Marche Slave, the "Aïda" March, the "William Tell" overture and the encores indicated are of much the same type as "Eili, Eili," the Hindu Song, the "Rêve Angélique," "Pomp and Circumstance," the "1812" Overture and "Whispering of the Flowers."

"The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," of course, is new, because it has not been offered before; otherwise it probably would have been on the forbidden list. But perhaps the "Finlandia," the "Fedora" Fantasia and the "Ride of the Valkyrs" may be accepted as representing another taste. Possibly next year Mr. Jacchia may add this restricted request program to the list of barred pieces and invite another choice, with interesting results.

For the rest of the week the programs run the usual entertaining course. The annual Wagner program is set for next Sunday evening, with an unusual selection of items.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 1

At the Pops Tonight

"Request Program"

March from "Aida" .... Verdi
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Dubinushka
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fédora" .... Giordano
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
Scherzo, "The Bumble-Bee"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Slavic March .... Chaikovsky
Tone-Poem, "Finlandia" .... Sibelius
The Lark .... Glinka
Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 2

At the Pops Tonight

March, "Boston Commandery" ..... Carter
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin" ...
Chaikovsky

Choral Numbers ....
Chinese Suite .... Friml
Volga Bargemen's Song..........
Dance of the Hours......... Ponchielli
Choral Numbers ....
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann"
Offenbach
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci". Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artists' Life" .... Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Assisting: Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.

GLOBE JUNE 2

Programs for the Pops

The "Pop" concerts will begin the sixth week of their season in Symphony Hall with an all Wagner program.

The colleges to be represented during the course of the week are Tufts, Thursday; and Technology, Friday. These and all other nights, however, are open to the public.

The following program will be presented during the week by Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" orchestra:

Sunday, June 7—"Festival March," "The Flying Dutchman"—Overture; "Lohengrin," Prelude; "Tannhauser," Bacchanale; "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Prélude; "Parsifal," Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail; "The Rhine Gold," Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla; "Siegfried," "Forest Murmurs"; "The Valkyries ,all by Wagner.

Monday, June 8—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "Masaniello," Auber; Serenade, Schubert-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods," Tchaikovsky; "At the Convent," Borodin-Marr; "Children at Play," Van Westerhout-Jacchia; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Irish Rhapsody," Herbert; Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Strauss; March, "Washington Post," Sousa.

Tuesday, June 9—Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "To Perdita", Repper; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; Jota from "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Prelude Religieux," Edith Lang; "Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen.

Wednesday, June 10—March, "National Masonic Club," Harlow; Overture, "Morning, Noon, and Night in Vienna," Suppe; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia; Fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "The Music Box," Liadov; Air, "Non piu andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart (sung by Charles H. Bennett, baritone); "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; "Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook," Seigi Abe; Waltz, "Roses from the South," Strauss.

Thursday, June 11—"Rackoczy March," Berlioz; overture to "Zampa," Herold; excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers," Wagner; Tufts songs, a "Fight," E. W. Hayes, '16, b "Spell It Out," A. T. Williams, '19, c "Aren't You Glad?" E. W. Newton, '90; Largo, from the "New World Symphony," Dvorak; Spanish dance, "Panaderos," Glazounov; Furlana, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Tufts Songs, a "That Mascot," P. B. Lewis, '18, b "Brown and Blue," E. W. Newton, '90, c "Dear Alma Mater," L. R. Lewis, '87; Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs, J. W. Morton, '11; waltz, "La Barcarolle," Waldteufel; coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer.

Friday, June 12—March, "Father of Victory," Ganne; overture, "Light Cavalry," Suppe; fantasia, "Mefistofele," Boito; "Tech" songs; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; second Slavonic dance, Dvorak; finale, Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "Tech" songs; selection, "Rose Marie," Frimi-Stothart; waltz, "Dream of Love," Fahrbach; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Stein Song," Bullard.

Saturday, June 13—Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; waltz from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; suite, "Cephale et Procris," Gretry-Motti; valse, "Juanita," Hadley; "Deep River," Burleigh-Jacchia; rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; "Puck's Minuet," Howells; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanoff.

HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

JUN 2 1925

BELIEVES JAZZ WILL BE AMERICAN MUSIC MOTIF

Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has staged a wonderful "come back" under his magnetic leadership, waits till he returns to London before he confides his views on American music and musicians. Koussevitsky thinks the first American musician who writes really great music will base it on jazz motifs.

"Jazz has a tremendous effect on the mentality of the general public in America and it cannot fail to have its influence on American music," he contends. "The difference is that in London you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect, for the day of American composers is yet to come. Perhaps it is due to the fact that America is still very young as a country. I do not know.

"In London there is a wonderful musical movement which is expressed in the superb London Symphony Orchestra. But compare the number of concerts which take place in a city like Boston with those which take place in London.

"In Boston alone I conducted 112. Beside that, America, and Boston in particular, opens its arms to modern musicians, which is all the more strange since London has modern composers of a high order, which America lacks.

"Comparisons I know are odious, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the largest repertoire in the world, but it is my convinced opinion that the London Symphony Orchestra plays the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky better than any orchestra in the world. They have cultivated these particular musicians to ... What is even more interesting, perhaps, is the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra is composed almost entirely of English musicians, whereas that of Boston contains musicians from every European country with only a sprinkling of Americans."

KOUSSEVITZKY IN LONDON

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 2

Comparing Two Cities

THE INTERVIEWER overtook Mr. Koussevitzky in London, and to a reporter for The Evening Standard he spoke amusingly about Boston and the Symphony Orchestra, almost always in terms of comparison:

> In London there is a wonderful musical movement which is expressed in the superb London Symphony Orchestra. But compare the number of concerts which take place in a city like Boston with those which take place in London. In London I am conducting three concerts only and the London Symphony Orchestra is giving twelve altogether. In Boston alone I conducted 112. Besides that, America, and Boston in particular opens its arms to modern musicians, which is all the more strange since London has modern composers of a high order, which America lacks.
>
> Comparisons I know are odious, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the > largest repertory in the world; but it is my convinced opinion that the London Symphony Orchestra plays the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Chaikovsky better than any orchestra in the world. They have cultivated these particular musicians to perfection. What is even more interesting, perhaps, is the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra is composed almost entirely of English musicians; whereas that of Boston contains musicians from every European country, with only a sprinkling of Americans.

Continued on the Following Page

KOUSSEVITZKY IN LONDON

Continued from Preceding Page

Seemingly, the reporter misunderstood Mr. Koussevitzky as to the number of concerts in which he had conducted in this town. Through 112 concerts he may have led the Symphony Orchestra between October and May last; but only fifty-eight of them befell in Boston. Not yet are we capable of 112 concerts by a single orchestra in seven months. In fact, and all told, the Symphony Orchestra played but sixty-three times in Boston during the season of 1924-25. The conductor, however, was soon off on another tack. Said he:

> I think it probable that the first American musician who writes really great music will base it on jazz motifs. Furthermore, jazz has a tremendous effect on the mentality of the general public in America and it cannot fail to have its influence on American music. The difference is that in London you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect; (sic) for the day of American composers is yet to come. Perhaps it is due to the fact that America is still very young as a country. I do not know.

Again the reader mistrusts the reporter. It is hard to gather what Mr. Koussevitzky means when he says "in America there is only a vast musical intellect." For "intellect" should not the word be "appetite?"

Dissenter I.

Not all the reviewers of concerts in London share Mr. Koussevitzky's high opinion of the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newman, for example, lately returned from New York, seizes the opportunity of the conductor's concerts to write despitefully of that very band. "Koussevitzky," he remarks in The Sunday Times, "has conducted at two concerts during the week—that of the London Symphony Orchestra and the Skriabin memorial concert, with the Philharmonic Orchestra. With the former, he manifestly had the utmost difficulty in getting the players, until, at the very end of the concert, they came to the finale of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, to give him anything corresponding to his desires. The plain, sober truth is that there is not an orchestra in London at the present moment to which, without the exercise of considerable charity, even the front rank of the second-class can be conceded. The standard of playing has fallen so gradually since 1914 that people have not noticed the decline, and one becomes conscious of it only when one goes abroad. Now and then our players rise above themselves, though the conductor has to sweat blood to get them to do it; when they fail to do this, their work is of a kind that makes orchestral music a penance for the cultivated ear. On Monday the strings were, as a rule, scratchy; the wood-wind sour; the brass blatant. In America I heard Koussevitzky play the same concerto of Vivaldi for strings with the Boston Orchestra; and the difference between the two string tones was that between satin and worn cotton. . . . We finished up with one of those astoundingly vitalized Beethoven performances of Koussevitzky, that create such perterbations in some quarters. . . . At the Skriabin concert the orchestral playing in the concerto and the First Symphony was mostly so bad that it can be excused only on the supposition that the orchestra had not had enough rehearsal even to be sure of the notes and the entries. The 'Poem of Ecstasy' was more familiar to the men, and in spirit, at any rate, they rose to Koussevitzky's tremendous height in this music, though technically there were many faults."

Dissenter II.

Like-minded also is Mr. Scholes of The Observer when he writes: "Mr. Koussevitzky demanded a goose-step-like precision from his forces. The London Symphony Orchestra has throughout the present season been in a slack way. The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but pieces it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. A conductor like Koussevitzky, who habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship, can temporarily pull the orchestra back into something like its old best standard, but even he finds it an exhausting business. . . . I have spoken of Koussevitzky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river. In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony the conductor hypnotized or galvanized players and audience by his forceful insistence. There were some remarkable tempi. The visit of a virtuoso conductor is, for once in a way, very stimulating, but I should not like to sit under one (and especially under the same one) every week. Is music a tonic or a food?"

"POPS" TONIGHT

March, "Boston Commandery," Carter; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Boston Square and Compass Club Choir—(a) "To the Field, to the Hunt," from "Don Munio," Buck, (b) Song of the Pilot from "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Chinese Suite, Frimi; Volga Bargemen's Song, Arranged by Jacchia; The Dance of the Hours, Ponchielli; Boston Square and Compass Club—(a) Gypsy Love Song, Herbert, Ernest W. Johnson, soloist, (b) Dear Old Pops: Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach; Intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss.

TELEGRAM JUNE 2

113

MONITOR JUNE 2

Tonight at the "Pops"

MASONIC NIGHT

March, "Boston Commandery"..
Carter
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"
Tschaikowsky
Boston Square and Compass
Club Choir
Chinese Suite ....Friml
Volga Bargemen's Song........
Arranged by Jacchia
The Dance of the Hours..Ponchielli
Boston Square and Compass Club
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann" ....Offenbach
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"...
Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artist's Life"......Strauss

TRAVELER JUNE 2

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and the symphonic forces of the "Pops" at Symphony hall will be heard in the following program tonight:

March, "Boston Commandery" .... Carter
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club choir
(a) "To the Field, To the Hunt," from "Don Munio" .... Buck
(b) Song of the Pilot from "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner
Chinese Suite .... Friml
Volga Bargemen's Song... Arranged by Jacchia
The Dance of the Hours............ Ponchielli
Boston Square and Compass Club
Ernest W. Johnson, soloist
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman" .. Offenba
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" .... Leoncava
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .... Stra

HERALD JUNE 2

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Agide Jacchia and the symphon forces of the "Pops" at Symphony ha will be heard in the following progran tonight:

March, "Boston Commandery" .... Car
Overture to "William Tell" .... Ross
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikov
Boston Square and Compass Club choir
(a) "To the Field, To the Hunt," from "Don Munio" .... E
(b) Song of the Pilot from "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wag
Chinese Suite .... Fr
Volga Bargemen's Song... Arranged by Jacch
The Dance of the Hours............ Ponchiel
Boston Square and Compass Club
Ernest W. Johnson, soloist
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman" .. Offenba
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" .... Leoncava
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .... Stra

ADVERTISER JUNE 2

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

March, "Boston Commandery" ..... Carter
Overture, "William Tell .... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"
Tchaikovs
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
a. "To the Field, To the Hunt," from "Don Munio" ....
b. Song of the Pilot from "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wa
Chinese Suite ....
Volga Bargemen's Song
Arranged by Jacchia
Dance of the Hours .... Ponchielli
Boston Square and SCompanss Club
a. Gypsy Love Song .... Herbert
Ernest W. Johnson, Soloist
b. Dear Old Pops
Selection, "Tales of Hoffman" ..Offenbach
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" ...... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .... Strauss

AMERICAN JUNE 3

MIXED PROGRAM ARRANGED FOR POP CONCERT TONIGHT

The following program will be presented by the Symphony Orchestra at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Stars and Stripes Forever............Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"......Suppe
American Patrol ....Meacham
Suite from "Carmen".....................Bizet
(a) Aragonaise; (b) Intermezzo, Act 3
(c) Prelude to Act 1.
American Fantasy......................Herbert
Largo ....Handel
Solo—Violin, Harp, Organ and Strings.
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water
Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose Marie".....Friml-Stothart
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Gold and Silver"...............Lehar
Pomp and Circumstance.................Elgar

ADVERTISER JUNE 3

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa
Overture, 'Poet and Peasant .... Suppe
American Patrol .... Meacham
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
American Fantasy .... Herbert
Solo Violin, Harp, Organ and Strings
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water .... Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose Marie" ..... Friml-Stothart
Overture, "1812" .... Tchaik
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" ....
Pomp and Circumstance ....

113

POST JUNE [illegible]

Jacchia's Daughter Listens—Elsa Jacchia, daughter of the famous conductor of the Pops at Boston, is an ardent student of music. Here she is shown with her father studying some of the intricacies of technique. (Schervee Studio.)

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
MAY 31 1925

Musical

Vale—Being a Resume of Notes—Mayor Organizes Concerts—Ethel Litchfield [illegible] [illegible]ian Harmonica Contes[illegible]

By HARVEY

Hurray for the moth balls and the cedar chips, the music season is over, the singing solstice is past and some of us may now hibernate and enjoy ourselves.

It has been a hard season, a fast one and a good one. People have been most kind to this desk, sending us billets deux of appreciation, replete with blackhand suggestions. There is something marvelously prophylactic in a good blackhand note. It is something like having a first-class fight with the wife at breakfast; it clarifies the atmosphere.

The unfortunate part about this season's blackhand notes is the utter absence of profanity and billingsgate. We much prefer them rougher and more rugged. We would rather have them couched in the goose-flesh provoking, tremble-producing language of, say, a motorman addressing a casual conversation to a truck driver. There is something fine and virile in that, and something one may really remember. To have people merely disagree with you and disapprove of you is nothing. That is the price you pay in the newspaper game, and it is a worthy price. It is something we come to look for with every signed article.

Where to begin? Oh, let's start with the Boston Symphony. That brought up four deprecatory notes, one from a prominent person in the community much given to writing notes, one from a concert manager and two from people suffering from Bostonphobia. It would seem that the title, "Made in Boston," was sacrosanct, and perhaps that is why cod rhymes so easily and so often in Back Bay—with God. El[illegible] [illegible]ord Langhley writes us a volume to prove that Koussevitsky is a burning torch, and that it is distinctly up to us to play the Pollyanna game and "be glad that such men as Serge Koussevitsky visited unmusical Pittsburgh."

"You Flat Head," so opens "A Well Wisher." "If Daniel Webster invented the dictionary, I hav[illegible] [illegible] doubt Noah [illegible] invented the ark. After reac[illegible] [illegible] of your alleged music

THE POPS

Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Dubinushka, arranged by Jacchia; Rhapsody, "Espana," Charbrier; Fantasia, "Feroda," Giordano; Indian Dirge, Seydel; Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; The Lark, (arranged by Agide Jacchia), Glinka; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner;

Encores

Tarantelle, Jacchia; Prelude, Rachmaninov; Minuet, Boccherini; By the Waters of Minnetonka, Lieurance; March of the Toys, Herbert.

TELEGRAM [illegible] 1

[illegible] JUNE 1

The "Pops"

Tonight brings the first "Restricted Request Program" in the history of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall. Patrons were invited to vote for any number of the repertory except certain items that have heretofore held exclusive sway on request nights.

The result of the ballot, as shown by the program printed in another column, is interesting. For the most part, it seems to indicate that the taste of the minority differs little from that of the majority of "Pops" concertgoers. "Dubinushka," the Indian Dirge, the Marche Slave, the "Aïda" March, the "William Tell" overture and the encores indicated are of much the same type as "Eili, Eili," the Hindu Song, the "Rêve Angélique," "Pomp and Circumstance," the "1812" Overture and "Whispering of the Flowers."

"The Flight of the Bumble-Bee," of course, is new, because it has not been offered before; otherwise it probably would have been on the forbidden list. But perhaps the "Finlandia," the "Fedora" Fantasia and the "Ride of the Valkyrs" may be accepted as representing another taste. Possibly next year Mr. Jacchia may add this restricted request program to the list of barred pieces and invite another choice, with interesting results.

For the rest of the week the programs run the usual entertaining course. The annual Wagner program is set for next Sunday evening, with an unusual selection of items.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 1

At the Pops Tonight

"Request Program"

March from "Aïda" .... Verdi
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Dubinushka
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
Fantasia, "Fedora" .... Giordano
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
Scherzo, "The Bumble Bee" .... Rimsky Korsakov
Slavic March .... [illegible]
Tone-Poem, "Finlandia" .... Sibelius
The Lark .... Glinka
Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 2

At the Pops Tonight

March, "Boston Commandery" .... Carter
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin" .... Tchaikovsky
Choral Numbers ....
Chinese Suite .... Friml
Volga Boatmen's Song ....
Dance of the Hours .... Ponchielli
Choral Numbers ....
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann" .... Offenbach
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artists' Life" .... Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Assisting: Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.

GLOBE JUNE 2

Programs for the Pops

The "Pop" concerts will begin the sixth week of their season in Symphony Hall with an all Wagner program.

The colleges to be represented during the course of the week are Tufts, Thursday; and Technology, Friday. These and all other nights, however, are open to the public.

The following program will be presented during the week by Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" orchestra:

Sunday, June 7—"Festival March," "The Flying Dutchman"—Overture; "Lohengrin," Prelude; "Tannhauser," Bacchanale; "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Prelude; "Parsifal," Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail; "The Rhine Gold," Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla; "Siegfried," "Forest Murmurs"; "The Valkyries ,all by Wagner.

Monday, June 8—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "Masaniello," Auber; Serenade, Schubert-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods," Tchaikovsky; "At the Convent," Borodin-Marr; "Children at Play," Van Westerhout-Jacchia; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Irish Rhapsody," Herbert; Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Strauss; March, "Washington Post," Sousa.

Tuesday, June 9—Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "To Perdita", Repper; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; Jota from "Il Spana," Stoessel-Jacchia; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Prelude Religieux," Edith Lang; "Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen.

Wednesday, June 10—March, "National Masonic Club," Harlow; Overture, "Morning, Noon, and Night in Vienna," Suppe; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia; Fantasia, "Aida," Verdi, "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "The Music Box," Liadov; Air, "Non piu andrai," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart (sung by Charles H. Bennett, baritone); "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; "Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook," Seigi Abe; Waltz, "Roses from the South," Strauss.

Thursday, June 11—"Rackoczy March," Berlioz; overture to "Zampa," Herold; excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers," Wagner; Tufts songs, a "[illegible]," E. W. Hayes, '06, b "Spell It Out," A. T. Williams, '13, c "Aren't You Glad?" E. W. Newton, '9[illegible]; Largo, from the "New World Symphony," Dvorak; Spanish dance, "Panaderos," Glazounov; Furlana, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Tufts Songs, a "The Mascot," P. B. Lewis, '[illegible], b "Brown and Blue," E. W. Newton, '96, c "Dear Alma Mater," L. R. Lewis, '87; Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs, J. W. Morton, '11; waltz, "La Barcarolle," Waldteufel; coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer.

Friday, June [illegible]—March, "Father of Victory," Ganne; overture, "Light Cavalry," Suppe; fantasia, "Mefistofele," Boito; "Tech" songs; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; second Slavonic dance, Dvorak; finale, Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "Tech" songs; selection, "Rose Marie," [illegible]; waltz, "Dream of Love," Fahrbach; "Pomp and Circumstance," [illegible] [illegible] Song," Ballard.

Saturday, June [illegible]—Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; waltz from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; "Ave Maria," [illegible]; fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; suite, [illegible] Gretry-Mottl; [illegible] Hadley; "Deep River," [illegible]; rhapsody, "Italia," [illegible]; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; [illegible] Minuet," Howells; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov.

HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

BELIEVES JAZZ WILL BE AMERICAN MUSIC MOTIF

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has staged a wonderful "comeback" under his magnetic leadership, waits till he returns to London before he confides his views on American music and musicians. Koussevitsky thinks the first American musician who writes really great music will base it on jazz motifs.

"Jazz has a tremendous effect on the mentality of the general public in America and it cannot fail to have its influence on American music," he contends. "The difference is that in London you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect, for the day of American composers is yet to come. Perhaps it is due to the fact that America is a very young country. I [illegible]

"In London [illegible] musical [illegible] in the [illegible] orchestra [illegible] concerts which take place in a city like Boston with those which take place in London.

"In Boston alone I conducted 112. Besides that, America, and Boston in particular, opens its arms to modern musicians, which is all the more strange since London has modern composers of a high order, which America lacks.

"Comparisons I know are odious, but the Boston [illegible] has the largest [illegible] in the world, but it is my [illegible] that the London Symphony plays the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky better than any orchestra in the world. They have cultivated these particular musicians to [illegible]. What is even more interesting, perhaps, is the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra is composed almost entirely of English musicians, whereas that of Boston contains musicians from every European country with only a sprinkling of Americans."

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 2

KOUSSEVITZKY IN LONDON

Comparing Two Cities

THE INTERVIEWER overtook Mr. Koussevitzky in London, and to a reporter for The Evening Standard he spoke amusingly about Boston and the Symphony Orchestra, almost always in terms of comparison.

In London there is a wonderful musical movement which is expressed in the superb London Symphony Orchestra. But compare the number of concerts which take place in a city like Boston with those which take place in London. In London I am conducting three concerts only and the London Symphony Orchestra is giving twelve altogether. In Boston alone I conducted 112. Besides that, America, and Boston in particular opens its arms to modern musicians, which is all the more strange since London has modern composers of a high order, which America lacks.

Comparisons I know are odious, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the largest repertory in the world; but it is my [illegible] opinion that the London Symphony Orchestra plays the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Chaikovsky better than any orchestra in the world. They have cultivated these particular musicians to perfection. What is even more interesting, perhaps, is the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra is composed almost entirely of English musicians, whereas that of Boston contains musicians from every European country, with only a sprinkling of Americans.

Continued on the Following Page

KOUSSEVITZKY IN LONDON

Continued from Preceding Page

Seemingly, the reporter misunderstood Mr. Koussevitzky as to the number of concerts in which he had conducted in this town. Through 112 concerts he may have led the Symphony orchestra between October and May last, but only [illegible] of them [illegible] in Boston. Not yet are we [illegible] of 112 concerts by a single orchestra in seven months. In fact, and all told, the Symphony Orchestra played but sixty-three times in Boston during the season of 1924-25. The conductor, however, was soon off on another [illegible]. Said he:

I think it probable that the first American musician who writes really great music will base it on jazz motifs. Furthermore, jazz has a tremendous effect on the mentality of the general public in America and it cannot fail to have its influence on American music. The difference is that in London you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect; [illegible] for the day of American composers is yet to come. Perhaps it is due to the fact that America is still very young as a country. I do not know.

Again the reader mistrusts the reporter. It is hard to gather what Mr. Koussevitzky means when he says that America [illegible] only a vast musical intellect." For [illegible] "intellect" should not the word be "appetite"?

Dissenter I.

[illegible] the reviewers of concerts in London share Mr. Koussevitzky's high opinion of the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newman, for example, [illegible] from New York, seizes the opportunity [illegible] of the conductor's concerts [illegible] "Koussevitzky [illegible]" [illegible] remarks in The Sunday Times [illegible] conducted two concerts during the week, that of the London Symphony Orchestra and the Skriabin memorial concert, with the Philharmonic Orchestra. With the former, he manifestly had the utmost difficulty in getting the players [illegible] at the very end of the concert, the [illegible] finale of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony [illegible] [illegible] There is [illegible] an orchestra [illegible] [illegible] of considerable [illegible] front rank of the second class [illegible] standard of [illegible] gradually since 1914 [illegible] the decline and [illegible] only when one goes abroad. Now and then our players rise above [illegible] though the conductor has to [illegible] hard to get them to do it when they [illegible] [illegible] makes of [illegible] On Monday the strings [illegible] the brass blatant. In America I heard Koussevitzky play the same concerto of Vivaldi for strings with the Boston orchestra, and the difference between [illegible] two string tones was that between [illegible] and [illegible] Boston. . . . We finished up with [illegible] of those astoundingly vitalized Beethoven performances of Koussevitzky that create such [illegible] perturbations in some quarters." At the Skriabin concert the orchestral playing in the concerto and the First Symphony was mostly so [illegible] that it can be [illegible] on the supposition that the orchestra had not had enough rehearsal even to be sure of the notes and the entries. The 'Poem of Ecstasy' was more familiar to the men, and in spirit, at any rate, they rose to Koussevitzky's tremendous height in this music, though technically there were many faults."

Dissenter II.

Like minded also is Mr. [illegible] of The Observer when he writes: "Mr. Koussevitzky demanded a [illegible] from his forces. The London Sym[illegible]

MONITOR JUNE 2

Tonight at the "Pops"

MASONIC NIGHT

March, "Boston Commandery".......... Carter
Overture to "William Tell".......... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".......... Tschaikowsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
Chinese Suite.......... Friml
Volga Boatmen's Song.......... Arranged by Jacchia
The Dance of the Hours.......... Ponchielli
Boston Square and Compass Club
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann".......... Offenbach
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".......... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artist's Life".......... Strauss

phony Orchestra has throughout the present season been in a slack way. The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but pieces it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. A conductor like Koussevitzky, who habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship, can temporarily pull the orchestra back into something like its old best standard, but even he finds it an exhausting business. . . . I have spoken of Koussevitzky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river. In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony the conductor hypnotized or galvanized players and audience by his forceful insistence. There were some remarkable tempi. The visit of a virtuoso conductor is, for once in a way, very stimulating, but I should not like to sit under one (and especially under the same one) every week. Is music a tonic or a food?"

TRAVELER JUNE 2

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and the symphonic forces of the "Pops" at Symphony hall will be heard in the following program tonight.

March, "Boston Commandery".......... Carter
Overture to "William Tell".......... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".......... Tschaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club choir
(a) "To the Field, To the Hunt," from [illegible].......... Buck
(b) [illegible] from "The Flying Dutchman".......... Wagner
[illegible] Song [illegible].......... Friml
Chinese Suite
Volga Boatmen's Song.......... Arranged by Jacchia
The Dance of the Hours.......... Ponchielli
Boston Square and Compass Club
Ernest [illegible] Johnson, soloist
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman".......... Offenba[illegible]
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".......... Leoncava[illegible]
Waltz, "Artist's Life".......... Stra[illegible]

HERALD JUNE 2

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Agide Jacchia and the symphon[illegible] forces of the "Pops" at Symphony ha[illegible] will be heard in the following progra[illegible] tonight.

March, "Boston Commandery".......... Car[illegible]
Overture, "William Tell".......... Ross[illegible]
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".......... Tschaikov[illegible]
Boston Square and Compass Club choir
(a) "To the Field, To the Hunt," from [illegible].......... B[illegible]
(b) [illegible] from "The Flying Dutchman".......... Wa[illegible]
Chinese Suite.......... Fr[illegible]
Volga Boatmen's Song.......... Arranged by Jacch[illegible]
The Dance of the Hours.......... Ponchiel[illegible]
Boston Square and Compass Club
[illegible] soloist
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman".......... Offenba[illegible]
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".......... Leoncava[illegible]
Waltz, "Artist's Life".......... Stra[illegible]

[illegible] 2

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

March, "Boston Commandery" .... Carter
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .... Tchaikovs[illegible]
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
(a) "To the Field, To the Hunt," from [illegible] ....
(b) Song of the [illegible] from "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wa[illegible]
Chinese Suite .... [illegible]
Volga Boatmen's Song .... Arranged by Jacchia
Dance of the Hours .... Ponchiélli
Boston Square and SCompanss Club
a Gypsy Love Song .... Herbert
Ernest W. Johnson, Soloist
b Dear Old Pops
Selection, "Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .... Strauss

[illegible]

MIXED PROGRAM ARRANGED FOR POP CONCERT TONIGHT

The following program will be presented by the Symphony Orchestra at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppe
American Patrol .... Meacham
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
(a) Aragonaise, (b) Intermezzo, Act 3
(c) Prelude to Act 1
American Fantasy .... Herbert
Largo .... Handl
Solo Violin, Harp, Organ and Strings.
From the Land of the Sky Blue Water .... Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose Marie" .... Friml-Stothart
Overture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

TRAVELER JUNE 3

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppe
American Patrol .... Meacham
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
American Fantasy .... Herbert
Solo Violin, Harp, Organ and Strings
From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water .... Cadman-Jac[illegible]
Selection, "Rose Marie" .... Friml-Sto[illegible]
Overture, "1812" .... Tchaik[illegible]
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" ....
Pomp and Circumstance ....

"POPS" TONIGHT

March, "Boston Commandery," [illegible]; Overture to "William Tell," [illegible]; Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky. Boston [illegible] Club Choir [illegible] [illegible] "from [illegible]" [illegible] from "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Chinese Suite [illegible]; Volga Boatmen's Song Arranged [illegible]. Dance of the Hours [illegible] Ponchielli. Boston Square and Compass Club (a) Gypsy Love Song, Herbert, [illegible] Johnson, soloist. (b) Dear Old Pops. Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach. Intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo. Waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss.

TELEGRAM JUNE 2

color characterizing cuckolds.

Herald June 3/25

A CRY FROM THE EAR

As the World Wags:

There hasn't been a single broadcast of Pops—not the tiniest, tootiest echo from the nightly delectation has been sent through this year's ether! Do you realize what that means? It means that in a thousand outlandish spots lying between here and the western coast, from the grimy desolation of the Lake cities to the lonely grandeur of Coyote Canyon, exiled Bostonians are turning their dials each evening in the vain endeavor to catch a strain from the best beloved and most individual Boston institution.

We know how they are feeling about it—for we have been there. In a cosmopolis just 500 miles from the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, we betook ourselves early in May of last year to the residence of the rarest avis in those parts, a man who could tune out the local station and get Boston. Because our pen is feeble, no one will ever know the agonizing suspense of the moments during which we manoeuvred to sort out the contributions coming from the array of local talent, and clear up WBZ's wave length—nor can they imagine the immensity of the sensation experienced when success was ours, and the final bars of the "Marche Slave" swept through the room, followed by a roar of applause that alike shook Symphony Hall and the walls of the house beside Lake Erie.

We distinctly remember jumping up and down in unbridled excitement, shrieking, "That's Boston!—that's cold, unenthusiastic Boston opening up Pops!" But we were not then ware of doing so. We had forgotten the many miles between us and home, forgotten the weary loneliness so commonly experienced during one's first year out in the cold and cruel—we were back, 'way back, at the little "rush" tables behind the barrier, surrounded by friends from school, waving our glass of loganberry highball aloft and howling for another encore or Jacchia's blood!

And now as we again hear Pops pop unpunctuated by static, we wish that some evening there we'd look up and see a microphone all set to carry the festivities to every lonely Bostonian listening in 'way out beyond the borders of the Bach-and-Beethoven belt.

Who'll put the nickel on the drum?

TYRUS THE TERRIBLE.

MONITOR JUNE 3

Tonight at the "Pops"

"Stars and Stripes Forever" .. Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .. Suppé
"American Patrol" .... Meacham
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
American Fantasy .... Herbert
Largo .... Handel
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" .... Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose-Marie" .... Frimi-Stothart
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
"Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar

ADVOCATE JUNE 4

JEWISH PROGRAM AT THE "POPS"

Conductor Will Welcome Suggestions for Program

Agide Jacchia, the conductor of the "Pop" concerts which take place each night in Symphony Hall, is always eager to devise a new species of program which may vie in popularity with such old favorites as the Russian program, Wagner program, and Request program. A new departure at the "Pops" will be Jewish night on Tuesday, June 16, with a program drawn entirely from the Jewish composers. The conductor has examined the existing rich repertory of such music with special attention. The resulting program which he has compiled is evidently of great musical and popular interest. However, there may well be certain pieces which he has overlooked and he will be glad to consider any suggestions regarding possible pieces for encores on "Jewish Night." Patrons of the "Pops" with such especial numbers in mind should address their communications to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston.

TRAVELER JUNE 4

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pops" orchestra, under the direction of Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program at Symphony hall tonight:

Military March (arranged by Agide Jacchia) .... Schubert
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte" ...... Mozart
The Lark .... Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Indian Summer, an American Idyl Herbert
Solo English horn, Louis Speyer
Czardas (No. 1) .... Michiels
Marche Slave .... Tchaikowsky
Suite Coppelia .... Delibes
Waltz of the Hours—Czardas
Intermezzo from "Goyescas" ..... Granados
Bacchanale from "Philemon et Baucis"

NEW YORK

MONITOR JUNE 4

Tonight at the "Pops"

Military March .... Schubert
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte" ... Mozart
"The Lark" .... Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Indian Summer, An American Idyl .... Herbert
Czardas (No. 1) .... Michiels
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Coppelia" .... Delibes
Intermezzo from "Goyescas" .... Granados
Bacchanale from "Philemon et Baucis" .... Gounod

AMERICAN JUNE 4

MIXED PROGRAM ON POP CONCERT LIST TONIGHT

The "Pops" Orchestra, under the direction of Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program at Symphony Hall tonght:

Military March (Arranged by Agide Jacchia) .... Schuber
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte" ...... Mozar
The Lark .... Glinka-Jacchi
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Lis
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saer
Indian Summer, an American Idyl, Herbe

ADVERTISER JUNE 4

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Wedding March, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssoh
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thoma
Reve Angelique .... Rubinstei
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Lis
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Ver
Ave Marie .... Schubert-Wilheln
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacch
Ride of the Calkyries .... Wagne
Selection, "The Love Song" Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

ADVERTISER JUNE 4

TONIGHT'S POP CONCERT

Military March .... Schubert
Overture, "Cosi fan tutte" .... Mozart
The Lark .... Glinka-Jacchia
14th Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Solo English Horn, Louis Speyer.
Czardas (No. 1) .... Michiels
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
Suite Coppelia .... Delibes
Intermezzo, "Goyescas" .... Granados
Bacchanale, "Philemon et Baucis" ... Gounod

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 5

At the Pops Tonight

Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Angelic Dream .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song," Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... J. Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HERALD JUNE 5

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

These numbers will be on the program of the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight under direction of Agide Jacchia:

Wedding march, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Reve Angelique .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Violin, harp, organ and strings
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Selection "The Love Song" .. Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Gan

MONITOR JUNE 5

Tonight at the "Pops"

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon" ...... Thomas
"Rêve Angelique" ...... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Maria ...... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song" ..... Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 6

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba". Gounod
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeri" ... Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" .. Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
O Katharina .... Fall
Waltz, No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Tempest Scene from Othello" ..... Verdi
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 6

Sunday Evening for Wagner—Two "College Nights" in Prospect — Programs Variously Freshened

ENTERING upon a sixth week tomorrow, The Pops are making hay while the Commencement sun shines. Thus two of the seven concerts are "college nights"—one for Tufts on Thursday; one for the Institute of Technology on Friday. On each evening, there will be interludes of college songs to diversify an orchestral program along the usual lines. The other incident of the week is the annual "Wagner Concert" announced for tomorrow evening. The program comprises the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger"; fragments from "Parsifal"—Procession of the Knights; from "Rheingold"—Passage of the Gods toward Valhalla; from "Siegfried"—Forest Scene; from "Die Walküre"—Valkyrs' Ride. For introduction stands the "Festival March"—not exactly one of Wagner's major "works"

Though The Pops are well past mid-season, Mr. Jacchia continues to enlarge and vary the repertory. On Monday next, for example, the program lists four numbers from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Sleeping Beauty," and a transcribed piece from Borodin, "At the Convent." On Tuesday, two pieces by resident composers will be heard —Mr. Repper's "Perdita"; Miss Edith Lang's "Religious Prelude." On Wednesday the orchestra will play Liadov's amusing trifle, "The Music Box," and Mr. Charles Bennett, the baritone, will sing one of Mozart's airs for Figaro. On Saturday two old dances of Grétry and a Minuet for Puck by the English composer, Herbert Howells, have place. Otherwise, throughout the week, all goes as custom ordains—for a public possibly a bit too well content.

MONITOR JUNE 6

Tonight at the "Pops"

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba" .. Gounod
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" .... Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly" ... Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
"O Katharina" .... Fall
Waltz No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overture to "Tannhäuser" .. Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello" .... Verdi
"Valse Triste" .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" ...... Sousa

Sunday Evening

Wagner Program

Festival March
"The Flying Dutchman"—Overture
"Lohengrin"—Prelude
"Tannhäuser"—Bacchanale
"Meistersinger"—Prelude
"Parsifal"—Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail
"The Rhine-Gold"—Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla
"Siegfried"—"Forest Murmurs"
"The Valkyrie"—The Ride of the Valkyries

AMERICAN JUNE 6

"Pop" Concerts Start Sixth Week Tomorrow Night

The sixth week of the season of "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall starts tomorrow night with a Wagnerian program. Tufts and Technology will be represented on Thursday and Friday, respectively. These and all other nights are open to the public.

The following is tonight's program:

Cortge, "Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" .. Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly" ...... Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
O Katharina .... Fall
Waltz No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overtture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello" .... Verdi
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa

TRAVELER JUNE 6

"Pops" Begin Sixth Week of Season

Tomorrow night will open the sixth week of the season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall, with the third of the Sunday concerts and an all-Wagner program.

The colleges will be represented next week by Tufts on Thursday and Technology on Friday. These and all other nights are open to the public. The program for tonight will be found elsewhere in the Traveler. Tomorrow evening Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

WAGNER PROGRAM
Sunday, June 7, 1925

1—Festival March.
2—The Flying Dutchman—Overture.
3—Lohengrin—Prelude.
4—Tannhauser—Bacchanale.
5—The Mastersingers of Nuremberg—Prelude
6—Parsifal—Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail.
7—The Rhine Gold—Entrance of the Gods in Walhalla.
8—Siegfried—"Forest Murmurs."
9—The Valkyrie—The Ride of the Valkyries

ADVERTISER JUNE 6

TONIGHT'S POP CONCERT

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeri" ... Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
O Katharina .... Fall
Waltz No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overture "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello" .... Verdi
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa

114

TELEGRAM JUNE 6

"POPS" TONIGHT

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri," Rossini! serenade, Tosselli; fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; "Fireworks," Stravinsky; "O Katharina," Fall; "Waltz No. 15," Brahms-Gericke; overture from "Tannhauser," Wagner; "The Tempest," "Othello," Verdi; 'Valse Triste,' Sibelius; march, 'El Capitan,' Sousa.

JUN 7 1925

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

Ultra-Modern Chamber Music Waits Audiences Next Season

THE League of Composers of New York city, which divides honors with the International Composers' Guild in giving to a more or less receptive public the latest developments of modern, especially in the new form of orchestral chamber music, has announced an ambitious program for next season. The organization is now in its third year.

Next season there will be three concerts of modern chamber orchestral music. The first is to be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the second by William Mengelberg with Mme. Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists. There will be in addition one recital of new chamber music and four issues of the League's magazine.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who appears by permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program of first performances of works by Europeans and Americans. This will be his first appearance here that is not connected with a performance of the Boston Symphony. The concert will take place in November. The ensemble will consist of picked men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

ADVERTISER JUNE 7

Wagner Music at Pop Concert Tonight

AT Symphony Hall tonight the sixth week of the Pop concerts will open with an all-Wagner program. Tufts College will celebrate next Thursday night and Tech the following night. All the other concerts this week are open to the public. The program for tonight follows:

Festival March; "Flying Dutchman" overture; "Lohengrin" prelude; Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; prelude to "The Mastersingers"; an excerpt from "Parsifal"; a Walhalla scene from "Rhine Gold"; the "Forest Murmurs" music from "Siegfried" and the "The Ride of the Valkyries."

GLOBE JUNE 7

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Jacchia has chosen for the Sunday special Pop concert tonight an all-Wagner program which should attract the capacity audience customary in this city whenever a program includes much Wagner. In the concert hall Wagner is a big drawing card.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 8

At the Pops Tonight

Processional March from "Tannhäuser" Wagner
Overture, "William Tell" ...... Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Two Numbers from the Music to "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play. Van Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture, "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
Waltz, "Vienna Woods" ..... J. Strauss
March, "Washington Post" ...... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HERALD JUNE 7

"POPS" BEGIN SIXTH WEEK

Wednesday and Thursday to Be Special College Nights

The "Pop" concerts will begin the sixth week of their season tonight in Symphony hall with an all-Wagner program.

The colleges to be represented during the course of the week are Tufts on Thursday, and Technology on Friday. These and all other nights, however, are open to the public.

The following programs have been arranged by Mr. Jacchia:

SUNDAY, JUNE 7

Festival March
The Flying Dutchman—Overture
Lohengrin—Prelude
Tannhaeuser—Bacchanale
The Mastersingers of Nuremberg—Prelude
Parsifal—Entrance of the knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail
The Rhine Gold—Entrance of the gods into Walhalla.
Siegfried—"Forest Murmurs"
The Valkyrie—The ride of the Valkyries

MONDAY, JUNE 8

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner
Overture to "Masaniello" .... Auber
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods" Tchaikovsky
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play ...... Van Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

TUESDAY, JUNE 9

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
To Perdita .... Repper
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem .... Sibelius
Finale of "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Jota from "Hispana" .... Stoessel-Jacchia
"By the Waters of Minnetonka" ...... Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Polovtsian Dances from 'Prince Igor'. Borodin
Prelude Religieux .... Edith Lang
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 10

March, "National Masonic Club" .... Harlow
Overture, 'Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppe
Elli, Elli .... Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem ... Saint-Saens
The Music Box .... Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, Baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook" Seigi Abe
Waltz, "Roses from the South .... Strauss

TUFTS COLLEGE NIGHT
THURSDAY, JUNE 11

Rackoczy March .... Berlioz
Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
Excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers". Wagner
Tufts Songs
a. Fight .... E. W. Hayes '16
b. Spell It Out .... A. T. Williams '19
c. Aren't You Glad .... E. W. Newton '90
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony Dvorak
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" .... Glazounov
Furlana from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Tufts Songs
a. That Mascot .... P. B. Lewis '18
b. Brown and Blue .... E. W. Newton '90
c. Dear Alma Mater .... L. R. Lewis '87
Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs J. W. Morton '11
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer

M. I. T. NIGHT, FRIDAY, JUNE 12.

March, "Father of Victory" .... Ganne
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppe
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .... Boito
"Tech" songs.
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah", Saint-Saens
Second Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
Finale, Fourth Symphony .... Tchaikovsky
"Tech" songs.
Selection, "Rose Marie" .... Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Dream of Love" .... Fahrbach
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
Stein Song.

SATURDAY, JUNE 13.

Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" ...... Tchaikovsky
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
Fantasia, "Sampson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Suite, "Cephale et Procris" ...... Gretry-Mottl
Valse, "Juanita" .... Hadley
Deep River .... Burleigh-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casello
Dance of the Hours .... Ponchielli
Puck's Minuet .... Howells
Procession o fthe Sardar ...... Ippolitov-Ivanoff

TRAVELER JUNE 8

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following program will be performed at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
"Morning Mood," "In the Troll," "King's Grotto"
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play ...... Van-Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

HERALD JUNE 8

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be performed at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
"Morning Mood," "In the Troll," "King's Grotto"
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play ...... Van-Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

color characterizing cuckolds.

Herald June 3/25

A CRY FROM THE EAR

As the World Wags:

There hasn't been a single broadcast of Pops—not the tiniest, tootiest echo from the nightly delectation has been sent through this year's ether! Do you realize what that means? It means that in a thousand outlandish spots lying between here and the western coast, from the grimy desolation of the Lake cities to the lonely grandeur of Coyote Canyon, exiled Bostonians are turning their dials each evening in the vain endeavor to catch a strain from the best beloved and most individual Boston institutic

We know how they are feeling about it—for we have been there. In a cosmopolis just 500 miles from the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, we betook ourselves early in May of last year to the residence of the rarest avis in those parts, a man who could tune out the local station and get Boston. Because our pen is feeble, no one will ever know the agonizing suspense of the moments during which we manoeuvred to sort out the contributions coming from the array of local talent, and clear up WBZ's wave length—nor can they imagine the immensity of the sensation experienced when success was ours, and the final bars of the "Marche Slave" swept through the room, followed by a roar of applause that alike shook Symphony Hall and the walls of the house beside Lake Erie.

We distinctly remember jumping up and down in unbridled excitement, shrieking, "That's Boston!—that's cold, unenthusiastic Boston opening up Pops!" But we were not then ware of doing so. We had forgotten the many miles between us and home, forgotten the weary loneliness so commonly experienced during one's first year out in the cold and cruel—we were back, 'way back, at the little "rush" tables behind the barrier, surrounded by friends from school, waving our glass of loganberry highball aloft and howling for another encore or Jacchia's blood!

And now as we again hear Pops pop unpunctuated by static, we wish that some evening there we'd look up and see a microphone all set to carry the festivities to every lonely Bostonian listening in 'way out beyond the borders of the Bach-and-Beethoven belt.

Who'll put the nickel on the drum?

TYRUS THE TERRIBLE.

MONITOR JUNE 3

Tonight at the "Pops"

"Stars and Stripes Forever" .. Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppé
"American Patrol" .... Meacham
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
American Fantasy .... Herbert
Largo .... Handel
"From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water" .... Cadman-Jacchia
Selection, "Rose-Marie" .... Friml-Stothart
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
"Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar

ADVOCATE JUNE 4

JEWISH PROGRAM AT THE "POPS"

Conductor Will Welcome Suggestions for Program

Agide Jacchia, the conductor of the "Pop" concerts which take place each night in Symphony Hall, is always eager to devise a new species of program which may vie in popularity with such old favorites as the Russian program, Wagner program, and Request program. A new departure at the "Pops" will be Jewish night on Tuesday, June 16, with a program drawn entirely from the Jewish composers. The conductor has examined the existing rich repertory of such music with special attention. The resulting program which he has compiled is evidently of great musical and popular interest. However, there may well be certain pieces which he has overlooked and he will be glad to consider any suggestions regarding possible pieces for encores on "Jewish Night." Patrons of the "Pops" with such especial numbers in mind should address their communications to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston.

TRAVELER JUNE 4

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The "Pops" orchestra, under the direction of Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program at Symphony hall tonight:

Military March (arranged by Agide Jacchia) .... Schubert
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte" ...... Mozart
The Lark .... Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Indian Summer, an American Idyl .... Herbert
Solo English horn, Louis Speyer
Czardas (No. 1) .... Michiels
Marche Slave .... Tchaikowsky
Suite Coppelia .... Delibes
Waltz of the Hours—Czardas
Intermezzo from "Goyescas" ..... Granados
Bacchanale from "Philemon et Baucis" .... Gounod

NEW YORK

MONITOR JUNE 4

Tonight at the "Pops"

Military March .... Schubert (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte" ... Mozart
"The Lark" .... Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns
Indian Summer, An American Idyl .... Herbert
Czardas (No. 1) .... Michiels
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Coppelia" .... Delibes
Intermezzo from "Goyescas" .... Granados
Bacchanale from "Philemon et Baucis" .... Gounod

AMERICAN JUNE 4

MIXED PROGRAM ON POP CONCERT LIST TONIGHT

The "Pops" Orchestra, under the direction of Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program at Symphony Hall tonght:

Military March (Arranged by Agide Jacchia) .... Schubert
Overture to "Cosi fan tutte" ...... Mozart
The Lark .... Glinka-Jacchia
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Indian Summer, an American Idyl, Herbert

ADVERTISER JUNE 4

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Wedding March, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Reve Angelique .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Marie .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Calkyries .... Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song" .... Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

ADVERTISER JUNE 4

TONIGHT'S POP CONCERT

Military March .... Schubert
Overture, "Cosi fan tutte" .... Mozart
The Lark .... Glinka-Jacchia
14th Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Solo English Horn, Louis Speyer.
Czardas (No. 1) .... Michiels
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
Suite Coppelia .... Delibes
Intermezzo, "Goyescas" .... Granados
Bacchanale, "Philemon et Baucis" ... Gounod

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 5

At the Pops Tonight

Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Angelic Dream .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song." .... Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... J. Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HERALD JUNE 5

AT THE "POPS" TONIGHT

These numbers will be on the program of the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight under direction of Agide Jacchia:

Wedding march, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Reve Angelique .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Violin, harp, organ and strings
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Selection "The Love Song" .. Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," .... Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

MONITOR JUNE 5

Tonight at the "Pops"

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Mignon" ...... Thomas
"Rêve Angelique" ...... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Ave Maria ...... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Clavelitos .... Valverde-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Selection, "The Love Song" .... Offenbach-Kunneke
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 6

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba". .... Gounod
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeri" ... Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" .. Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
O Katharina .... Fall
Waltz, No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ...... Wagner
Tempest Scene from Othello" ..... Verdi
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 6

Sunday Evening for Wagner—Two "College Nights" in Prospect — Programs Variously Freshened

ENTERING upon a sixth week tomorrow, The Pops are making hay while the Commencement sun shines. Thus two of the seven concerts are "college nights"—one for Tufts on Thursday; one for the Institute of Technology on Friday. On each evening, there will be interludes of college songs to diversify an orchestral program along the usual lines. The other incident of the week is the annual "Wagner Concert" announced for tomorrow evening. The program comprises the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger"; fragments from "Parsifal"—Procession of the Knights; from "Rheingold"—Passage of the Gods toward Valhalla; from "Siegfried"—Forest Scene; from "Die Walküre"—Valkyrs' Ride. For introduction stands the "Festival March"—not exactly one of Wagner's major "works"

Though The Pops are well past mid-season, Mr. Jacchia continues to enlarge and vary the repertory. On Monday next, for example, the program lists four numbers from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Sleeping Beauty," and a transcribed piece from Borodin, "At the Convent." On Tuesday, two pieces by resident composers will be heard—Mr. Repper's "Perdita"; Miss Edith Lang's "Religious Prelude." On Wednesday the orchestra will play Liadov's amusing trifle, "The Music Box," and Mr. Charles Bennett, the baritone, will sing one of Mozart's airs for Figaro. On Saturday two old dances of Grétry and a Minuet for Puck by the English composer, Herbert Howells, have place. Otherwise, throughout the week, all goes as custom ordains—for a public possibly a bit too well content.

MONITOR JUNE 6

Tonight at the "Pops"

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba" .. Gounod
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" .... Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly" ... Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
"O Katharina" .... Fall
Waltz No. 15 ...... Brahms-Gericke
Overture to "Tannhäuser" .. Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello" .... Verdi
"Valse Triste" .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" ...... Sousa

Sunday Evening

Wagner Program

Festival March
"The Flying Dutchman"—Overture
"Lohengrin"—Prelude
"Tannhäuser"—Bacchanale
"Meistersinger"—Prelude
"Parsifal"—Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail
"The Rhine-Gold"—Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla
"Siegfried"—"Forest Murmurs"
"The Valkyrie"—The Ride of the Valkyries

AMERICAN JUNE 6

"Pop" Concerts Start Sixth Week Tomorrow Night

The sixth week of the season of "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall starts tomorrow night with a Wagnerian program. Tufts and Technology will be represented on Thursday and Friday, respectively. These and all other nights are open to the public.

The following is tonight's program:

Cortge, "Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" .. Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
O Katharina .... Fall
Waltz No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overtture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello" .... Verdi
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa

TRAVELER JUNE 6

"Pops" Begin Sixth Week of Season

Tomorrow night will open the sixth week of the season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall, with the third of the Sunday concerts and an all-Wagner program.

The colleges will be represented next week by Tufts on Thursday and Technology on Friday. These and all other nights are open to the public. The program for tonight will be found elsewhere in the Traveler. Tomorrow evening Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

WAGNER PROGRAM
Sunday, June 7, 1925

1—Festival March.
2—The Flying Dutchman—Overture.
3—Lohengrin—Prelude.
4—Tannhauser—Bacchanale.
5—The Mastersingers of Nuremberg—Prelude
6—Parsifal—Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail.
7—The Rhine Gold—Entrance of the Gods in Walhalla.
8—Siegfried—"Forest Murmurs."
9—The Valkyrie—The Ride of the Valkyries

ADVERTISER JUNE 6

TONIGHT'S POP CONCERT

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeri" ... Rossini
Serenade .... Toselli
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Fireworks .... Stravinsky
O Katharina .... Fall
Waltz No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
Overture "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
"The Tempest," "Othello" .... Verdi
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa

114

TELEGRAM JUNE 6

"POPS" TONIGHT

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri," Rossini! serenade, Tosselli; fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; "Fireworks," Stravinsky; "O Katharina," Fall; "Waltz No. 15," Brahms-Gericke; overture from "Tannhauser," Wagner; "The Tempest," "Othello," Verdi; 'Valse Triste,' Sibelius; march, 'El Capitan,' Sousa.

JUN 7 1925

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

Ultra-Modern Chamber Music Waits Audiences Next Season

THE League of Composers of New York city, which divides honors with the International Composers' Guild in giving to a more or less receptive public the latest developments of modern, especially in the new form of orchestral chamber music, has announced an ambitious program for next season. The organization is now in its third year.

Next season there will be three concerts of modern chamber orchestral music. The first is to be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the second by William Mengelberg with Mme. Wanda Landowska and other distinguished artists as soloists. There will be in addition one recital of new chamber music and four issues of the League's magazine.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who appears by permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program of first performances of works by Europeans and Americans. This will be his first appearance here that is not connected with a performance of the Boston Symphony. The concert will take place in November. The ensemble will consist of picked men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

ADVERTISER JUNE 7

Wagner Music at Pop Concert Tonight

AT Symphony Hall tonight the sixth week of the Pop concerts will open with an all-Wagner program. Tufts College will celebrate next Thursday night and Tech the following night. All the other concerts this week are open to the public. The program for tonight follows:

Festival March; "Flying Dutchman" overture; "Lohengrin" prelude; Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; prelude to "The Mastersingers"; an excerpt from "Parsifal"; a Walhalla scene from "Rhine Gold"; the "Forest Murmurs" music from "Siegfried" and the "The Ride of the Valkyries."

GLOBE JUNE 7

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Jacchia has chosen for the Sunday special Pop concert tonight an all-Wagner program which should attract the capacity audience customary in this city whenever a program includes much Wagner. In the concert hall Wagner is a big drawing card.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 8

At the Pops Tonight

Processional March from "Tannhäuser" .... Wagner
Overture, "William Tell" ...... Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Two Numbers from the Music to "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play. Van Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture, "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
Waltz, "Vienna Woods" ..... J. Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

HERALD JUNE 7

"POPS" BEGIN SIXTH WEEK

Wednesday and Thursday to Be Special College Nights

The "Pop" concerts will begin the sixth week of their season tonight in Symphony hall with an all-Wagner program.

The colleges to be represented during the course of the week are Tufts on Thursday, and Technology on Friday. These and all other nights, however, are open to the public.

The following programs have been arranged by Mr. Jacchia:

SUNDAY, JUNE 7

Festival March
The Flying Dutchman—Overture
Lohengrin—Prelude
Tannhaeuser—Bacchanale
The Mastersingers of Nuremberg—Prelude
Parsifal—Entrance of the knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail
The Rhine Gold—Entrance of the gods into Walhalla.
Siegfried—"Forest Murmurs"
The Valkyrie—The ride of the Valkyries

MONDAY, JUNE 8

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner
Overture to "Masaniello" .... Auber
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods" .... Tchaikovsky
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play ...... Van Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

TUESDAY, JUNE 9

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
To Perdita .... Repper
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem .... Sibelius
Finale of "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Jota from "Hispana" .... Stoessel-Jacchia
"By the Waters of Minnetonka" ...... Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Polovtsian Dances from 'Prince Igor" . Borodin
Prelude Religieux .... Edith Lang
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 10

March, "National Masonic Club" .... Harlow
Overture, 'Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppe
Eili, Eili ....Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem ... Saint-Saens
The Music Box .... Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" from 'The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, Baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook" .... Seigi Abe
Waltz, "Roses from the South .... Strauss

TUFTS COLLEGE NIGHT
THURSDAY, JUNE 11

Rackoczy March .... Berlioz
Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
Excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers". Wagner
Tufts Songs
a. Fight .... E. W. Hayes '16
b. Spell It Out .... A. T. Williams '19
c. Aren't You Glad .... E. W. Newton '90
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony .... Dvorak
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" .... Glazounov
Furlana from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Tufts Songs
a. That Mascot .... P. B. Lewis '18
b. Brown and Blue .... E. W. Newton '90
c. Dear Alma Mater .... L. R. Lewis '87
Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs .... J. W. Morton '11
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
Coronation March from "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer

M. I. T. NIGHT, FRIDAY, JUNE 12.

March, "Father of Victory" .... Ganne
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppe
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .... Boito
"Tech" songs.
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah". .... Saint-Saens
Second Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
Finale, Fourth Symphony .... Tchaikovsky
"Tech" songs.
Selection, "Rose Marie" ..... Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Dream of Love" .... Fahrbach
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
Stein Song.

SATURDAY, JUNE 13.

Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" ...... Tchaikovsky
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
Fantasia, "Sampson and Delilah," .... Saint-Saens
Suite, "Cephale et Procris" .... Gretry-Mottl
Valse, "Juanita" .... Hadley
Deep River .... Burleigh-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casello
Dance of the Hours .... Ponchielli
Puck's Minuet .... Howells
Procession o fthe Sardar ...... Ippolitov-Ivanoff

TRAVELER JUNE 8

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following program will be performed at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," .... Mascagni
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
"Morning Mood," "In the Troll," "King's Grotto"
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play ...... Van-Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

HERALD JUNE 8

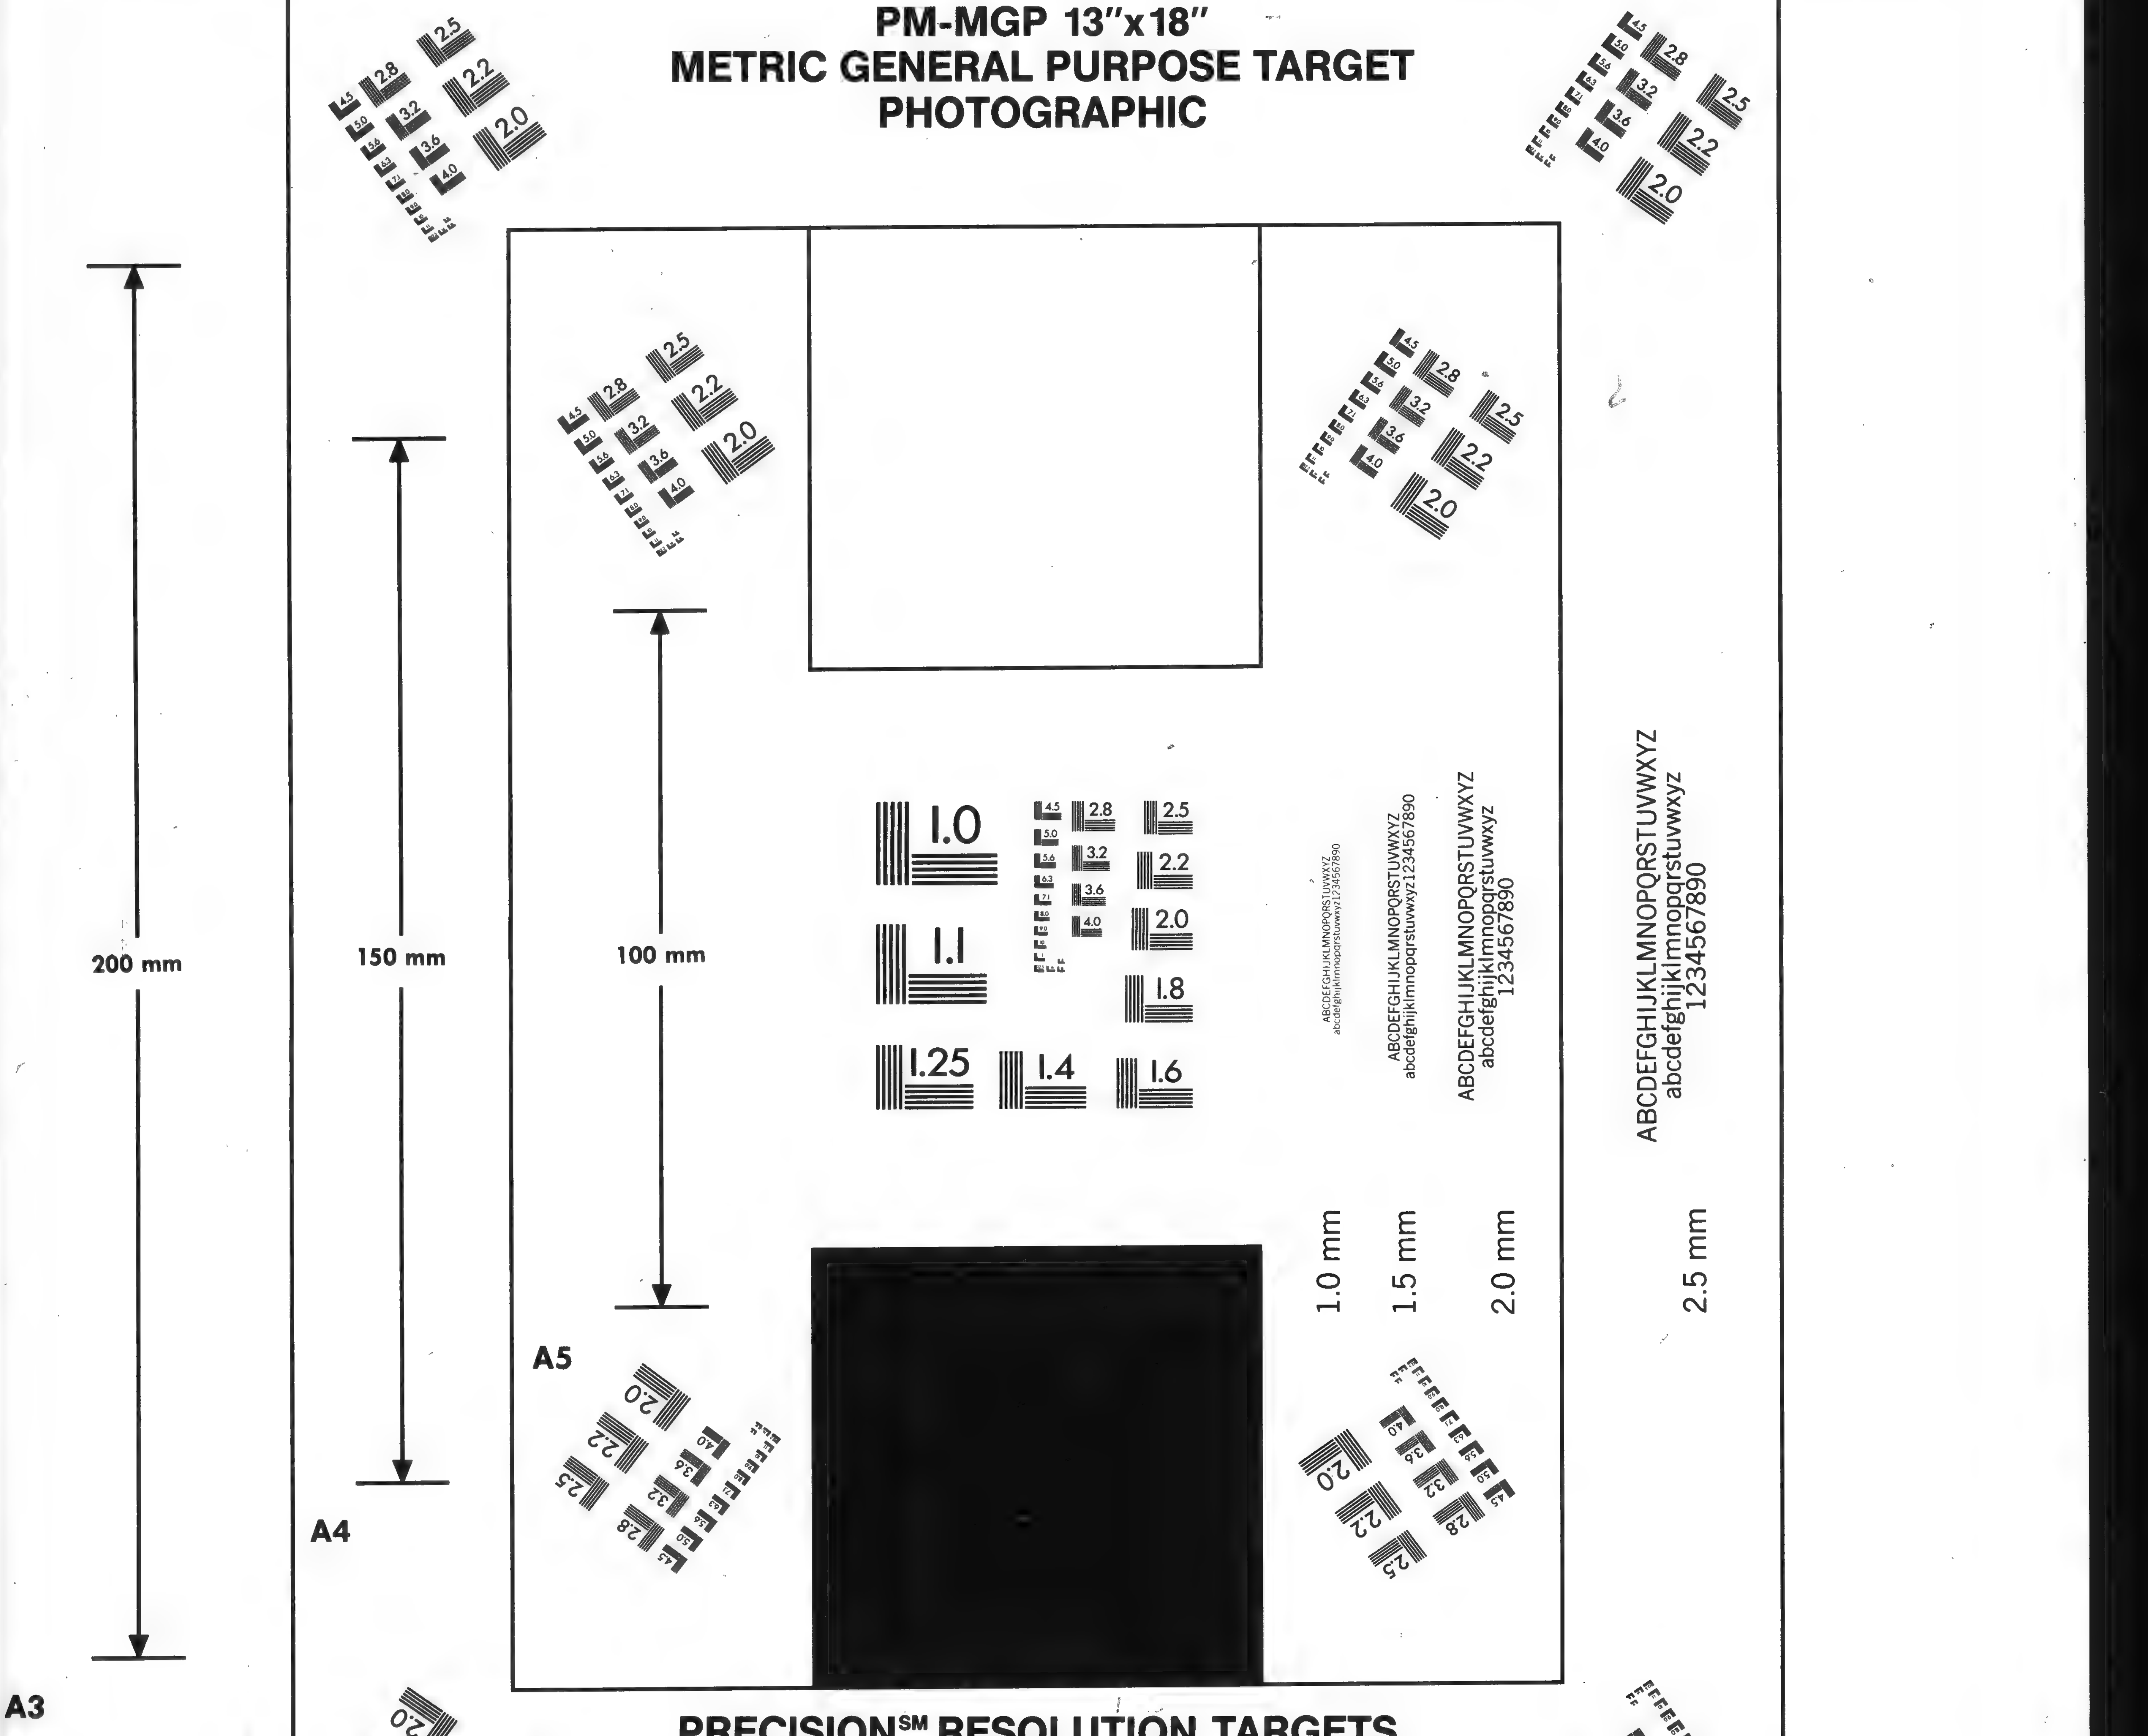
POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be performed at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," .... Mascagni
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
"Morning Mood," "In the Troll," "King's Grotto"
At the Convent .... Borodin-Marr
Children at Play ...... Van-Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
March, "Washington Post" .... Sousa

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

121

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

JUN 7 1925

Some Conductors of the Season in Retrospect

V.–BODANZKY AND WAGNER

By Lawrence Gilman

ONE of the pleasantest memories of the past opera season is our recollection of the hearty outbursts of applause which greeted Mr. Bodanzky as he returned to the conductor's stand after the intermissions in the performances of the Metropolitan's Wagner Cycle. Mr. Bodanzky, who is suspected of having a low opinion of the public taste, was plainly impatient at these delays of the business in hand, which from his point of view was to get on with "Die Walküre" or "Götterdämmerung" or whatever it happened to be that engaged his energies. But there was no mistaking the intention of those audiences of happy Wagnerites to make known to Mr. Bodanzky their admiration for him as a conductor and their appreciation of his endeavors in behalf of the more important elements in the Metropolitan repertoire.

It is ten years since Mr. Bodanzky first came to the Metropolitan; and in the decade that has passed since he made his debut there as a Wagner conductor he has grown remarkably: in skill, in force, in breadth, in authority, and in his hold on the most intelligent and musical section of the Metropolitan's public.

• • •

It is characteristic of the three leaders whom we have thus far considered in this series of studies, Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Furtwängler and ~~Mr. Mengelberg~~, that each of them is to some extent and in different degree inclined toward ornateness and overelaboration: they are of the Corinthian order of conductors. Mr. Bodanzky is of the Doric order. He is never ornamental, florid, exuberant. He is as unbending and spare and sharp and unadorned as a lightning-rod.

His most disconcerting tendency, indeed, is his inclination toward understatement. Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Furtwängler or Mr. Mengelberg, viewing Mont Blanc for the first time, would exclaim that it was a sublime and unsurpassed example of the Creator's handiwork. Mr. Bodanzky would say that it was a pretty high hill. Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Furtwängler and Mr. Mengelberg, in their conducting of Wagner, for example, err on the side of rhetoric and excessive emphasis. Their Wagner is generally too slow, too sentimental, too fussy, too loud or too soft. Mr. Bodanzky, on the other hand, though he is far more at home in this music than any of these particular colleagues of his, and has a truer instinct for its essential style, is inclined to scamp his Wagner. Too often he underplays it—perhaps for fear of sentimentalizing it.

• • •

We have heard it said by persons who should know better that "any conductor can play Wagner." In the sense that any conductor can play Wagner and get away with it, that is of course a truism. Every conductor does play Wagner, and it is virtually impossible for any performance of Wagner, however poor, to fall entirely flat. Wagner, in fact, is almost completely fool proof. Conductors who would drive an audience into the street if they tried to play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony can subdue a hall full of average music-lovers at any time with a performance of the Liebestod that does little more than adhere to the directions on the printed page. For Wagner's music is so compact of eloquence, so steeped in gorgeousness, that any mediocrity can make an effect with it. In a sense it plays itself.

But this is a very different matter from playing Wagner up to the hilt, playing it for all it is worth—in a word, doing full justice to it. We have heard most of the eminent conductors now living and most of those who have functioned here and abroad within the last generation, and among them all we can think of only four who have played or now play Wagner as he can and should be played; whereas we have heard a dozen or more who could play Mozart and Beethoven and Brahms to the queen's taste.

• • •

How easy and inviting they look, those thrice-familiar Wagner scores, with their relatively simple rhythms, their great tunes that have long since sung themselves into the hearts and imaginations of the world, their nobility and tenderness and passion, their [illegible] eloquence, their timeless irresistible [illegible] beauty, their unfailing appeal! Yet test the average reading of a Wagner score by the touchstone of your conception of its ideal delivery, by the standard of the music's inherent possibilities, and then make your deliberate estimate of what you have just heard. If you have supposed that the conducting of Wagner is child's play, our guess is that you will change your mind.

• • •

The distinguishing trait of Wagner's music, the thing that makes it incomparable, is its blend of heroic strength and sensuous loveliness. Its sumptuous beauty and its epic grandeur of style go hand in hand; and this music of surpassing richness and intensity, that repeatedly assumes titanic stature, looming against the sky in shapes of towering sublimity, is the most difficult of all music to play well, because it requires the continuous interaction of two different kinds of imaginative perception. You must be sensitively aware of the Mediterranean element in its style—its luxuriant, glowing sensuousness, its magical sweetness and efflorescence; but you must not temper the winds that blow upon it from the North and give it its hardy strength; those winds that have blown over fir-covered mountain tops and have lifted the bright hair of the Valkyrs in their sunset flight to the banquet tables of the gods. The danger of over-romanticizing Wagner at the cost of relaxing his vigor and impairing his strength is no greater than the danger of over-energizing him at the cost of turning him into a mere 100 per cent Nordic.

• • •

This, then, is the special problem that is posed for the conductor by Wagner's major scores: how to capture and convey their rich sensuousness, their burning intensity, their unexampled weight of passionate emotion, and at the same time to preserve their nobility and their strength, to keep out of them that sick devil of sentimentalism which lurks in the neighborhood of every expression of the romantic imagination.

• • •

Mr. Bodanzky is more adequately equipped than many interpreters to meet these peculiarly complex requirements. He has fire, intensity, power; a singularly pure, severe and exacting taste; a genuine sense of line. He has developed within recent years a feeling for the epic quality in Wagner, for the titanic, superhuman strength of certain pages in the "Ring," for example; and last season his performance of the colossal hymn to the dead Siegfried was extraordinary for its breadth and sweep and its true grandeur of style. In his treatment of Wagner's more ardent passages, when the music blazes and burns like a torrent of flame, Mr. Bodanzky is immensely effectual—there are moments in his handling of the first act of "Tristan" which are difficult to forget.

• • •

His limitations as a Wagner conductor arise from his imaginative asceticism. One suspects that Mr. Bodanzky regards the sensuous element in music as something rather unsanitary and debilitating. Beethoven is never sensuous (you can fancy Mr. Bodanzky reasoning), neither is Mozart; nor were most of the other great masters. The sensuous fellows are Chopin and Strauss and Debussy and Scriabin and others whom Mr. Bodanzky probably does not rank very high (let us forbear to remind him that Brahms knew the secret of sensuous beauty in music and could use it to his advantage when he chose). But Wagner is indubitably great, and indubitably sensuous; and this inescapable fact is, one imagines, decidedly irksome to Mr. Bodanzky. He settles the matter to his own satisfaction by refusing to bow to Wagner when he encounters that gentleman in one of his voluptuous moods: averting his eyes, he hurries by, bored and impatient.

The result of this draconian attitude on Mr. Bodanzky's part is that his conducting of Wagner is somewhat lacking in glamor and sensibility and nuance. It is too astringent, too cerebral; it misses a good deal of the enchantment of Wagner the weaver of spells. Yet it has many of the other things that are essential to Wagner. It has pace and fire and dignity and breadth; it is large-molded and often noble; it has, at its best, the great style; likewise at its best it has a beautiful poetry and tenderness—as in several performances last season of the matchless Introduction to the Third Act of "Die Meistersinger."

• • •

Having all this, it would doubtless be unreasonable to expect it to have more; and we, for one, are quite content to take this admirable interpreter as he is—in Wagner and elsewhere: as one of the most single-minded, devoted and austere of artists; an artist who will not compromise his æsthetic faith; a superb musician, a conductor of intellect and power and imagination; a fanatical idealist in a deplorably casual world.

Passing in Review

Artur Bodanzky, who conducted the Metropolitan Opera Company's first post-war Wagner cycle last season

---

[illegible] June 9

Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; overture "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nico To Perdita, Repper; Finlandia, Symph Poem, Sibelius; Finale of "Scheherazad Rimsky-Korsakov; Festival at Bagdad, sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock s mounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusi Jota from "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieuranc Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Polovts dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; U lude Religieux, Edith Lang; Entrance the Boyards, Halvorsen.

[illegible] June 9

Symphony Hall "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall are now in the sixth week of their 40th season. Thursday will be Tufts night and Friday Tech night, but these and all nights are open to the public.

Tonight's program follows:

Prelude, "Carmen," Bizet; Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "To Perdita," Repper; "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; Jota from "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Polovtsian Dances from, "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Prelude Religieux," Edith Lang; "Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen.

Monitor June 8

Tonight at the "Pops"

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF BANKING NIGHT

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser"	Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Serenade	Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Suite, "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
"At the Convent"	Borodin-Marr
"Children at Play"	Van-Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
March, "Washington Post"	Sousa

American June 9

VARIED PROGRAM AT "POPS" TONIGHT

The following program will be given at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
To Perdita	Repper
Finlandia, symphonic poem	Sibelius
Finale of "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Jota from "Hispana"	Stoessel-Jacchia
"By the Waters of Minnetonka"	Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor,"	Borodin
Prelude religieux	Edith Lang
Entrance of the Boyards	Halvorsen

Monitor June 9

Tonight at the "Pops"

MASS. FEDERATION OF MUSIC CLUBS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
To Perdita	Repper
"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Finale of "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Jota from "Hispaña"	Stoessel-Jacchia
"By the Waters of Minnetonka"	Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
"Prélude Religieux"	Edith Lang
"Entrance of the Boyards"	Halvorsen

Monitor June 8

MUSIC

"The Pops"

The annual Wagner program of the "Pop" concerts was presented last night in Symphony Hall, with the usual large audience of enthusiastic Wagnerites, perfect, imperfect, and present. In addition to familiar excerpts from the music dramas, Mr. Jacchia included among his selections the Centennial March written for the Philadelphia Exposition of 1876. An "occasional" piece, not representative of the high water mark of the composer's genius, it nevertheless was worthy of a place on the program as exhibiting his characteristic vocabulary in unfamiliar synthesis.

The rest of the week, up to Saturday, is filled with special programs, all of which, however, are open to the public. Tonight's concert is designed for the entertainment of the American Institute of Banking, the Women Musicians' Association and the Field and Forest Club. Tomorrow night the Massachusetts Federation of Music Clubs and the Professional Women's Club will be especially represented, and Edith Lang's "Prélude Religieux" is included in the program. Wednesday brings Euclid Lodge night, Thursday Tufts night, and Friday Tech night.

The final Sunday evening concert of the season is announced for June 21 with a Russian program. On the following evening falls the annual "Request" program (unrestricted), for which ballots are now being received.

Transcript June 9

At the Pops Tonight

Prelude, "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
To Perdita	Repper
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
Finale, "Scheherazade,"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Jota, Suite "Hispaña"	Stoessel-Jacchia
By the Waters of Minnetonka,	Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Polovtsian Dances, "Prince Igor,"	Borodin
Prélude Réligieux	Edith Lang
Entrance of the Boyards	Halvorsen

Transcript June 10

At the Pops Tonight

March, "National Masonic Club,"	Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna"	Suppé
Elli, Elli
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saëns
The Music Box	Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai"	Mozart
The Ride of the Valkyrs	Wagner
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabrier
By the Brook	Seigi Abè
Waltz, "Roses from the South,"	Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Charles H. Bennett

American June 10

MIXED PROGRAM ARRANGED FOR POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight the following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" Symphony Orchestra:

March, "National Masonic Club"	Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon, and Night in Vienna"	Suppe
Eili, Eili	Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem	Saint-Saens
The Music Box	Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, Baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook"	Seigi Abe
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss

Herald June 10

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

At the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight the following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" Symphony orchestra.

March, "National Masonic Club"	Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna"	Suppe
Elli, Elli	Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem	Saint-Saens
The Music Box	Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hortori ni," "By the Brook"	Seigi Abe
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss

American Oct 10

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

115

JUN 10 1925

Musical "Culture" and "Intellect."

Serge Koussevitzky, having passed a winter in Boston, varied by excursions to New York and other Eastern cities of the United States, has been talking to the London Evening Standard about our music. The first American who will write "really grand music," predicts this Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "will base it on jazz motifs."

In which profound observation the distinguished Muscovite differs not at all from the Greenwich Village run of prophets. "In London," Mr. Koussevitzky goes on to say, "you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect, for the day of American composers is yet to come."

All this will not be pleasing to that faithful band which insists that the late Edward MacDowell, if not a major god of music, is distinctly one of its accredited deities. And how about the ever-growing galaxy of lesser lights who year by year have diligently been adding to the quantity and, they suppose, the quality of our musical production? Trail blazers, Mr. Koussevitzky evidently thinks, preparing with exemplary self-sacrifice the way of the greater who are yet to come.

For many laborers in the vineyard, Mr. Koussevitzky's pronouncement, provided they learn of it and then take it seriously, must be very distressing indeed. But what, they might well ask, does Mr. Koussevitzky really mean by the "musical culture" of London and the "vast musical intellect of America"?

Elsewhere in the interview he indicates his belief that England now has ponderable composers and we have not, but that our concerts are more numerous and our "musical public" larger and more keenly alive.

Such may be the Muscovite distinction between "culture" and "intellect." But, after all, outside of the highly cultivated cerebrum of the Russian gentleman himself, does this point to any fundamental dissimilarity between the bob-tailed nag and the bay?

Monitor June 10

Tonight at the "Pops"

EUCLID LODGE NIGHT

March, "National Masonic Club"	Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna"	Suppé
"Eili, Eili"	Arranged by Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aïda"	Verdi
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saëns
"The Music Box"	Liadoff
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook"	Seigi Abè
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss

At the Pops Tonight

"Tufts Night"

Rackoczy March	Berlioz
Overture, "Zampa"	Herold
Excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers"	Wagner
Tufts Songs
Fight	E. W. Hayes, '16
Spell It Out	A. T. Williams, '19
Aren't You Glad?	E. W. Newton, '90
Largo, "From the New World"	Dvořák
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"	Glazounov
Furlana, "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Tufts Songs
That Mascot	P. B. Lewis, '18
Brown and Blue	E. W. Newton, '90
Dear Alma Mater	L. R. Lewis, '87
Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs	J. W. Morton, '11
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"	Waldteufel
Coronation March, "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Transcript June 11

121

NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune

JUN 7 1925

Some Conductors of the Season in Retrospect

V.—BODANZKY AND WAGNER

By Lawrence Gilman

ONE of the pleasantest memories of the past opera season is our recollection of the hearty outbursts of applause which greeted Mr. Bodanzky as he returned to the conductor's stand after the intermissions in the performances of the Metropolitan's Wagner Cycle. Mr. Bodanzky, who is suspected of having a low opinion of the public taste, was plainly impatient at these delays of the business in hand, which from his point of view was to get on with "Die Walküre" or "Götterdämmerung" or whatever it happened to be that engaged his energies. But there was no mistaking the intention of those audiences of happy Wagnerites to make known to Mr. Bodanzky their admiration for him as a conductor and their appreciation of his endeavors in behalf of the more important elements in the Metropolitan repertoire.

It is ten years since Mr. Bodanzky first came to the Metropolitan; and in the decade that has passed since he made his debut there as a Wagner conductor he has grown remarkably: in skill, in force, in breadth, in authority, and in his hold on the most intelligent and musical section of the Metropolitan's public.

* * *

It is characteristic of the three leaders whom we have thus far considered in this series of studies, Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Furtwängler and ~~Mr. Mengelberg~~, that each of them is to some extent and in different degree inclined toward ornateness and overelaboration: they are of the Corinthian order of conductors. Mr. Bodanzky is of the Doric order. He is never ornamental, florid, exuberant. He is as unbending and spare and sharp and unadorned as a lightning-rod.

His most disconcerting tendency, indeed, is his inclination toward understatement. Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Furtwängler or Mr. Mengelberg, viewing Mont Blanc for the first time, would exclaim that it was a sublime and unsurpassed example of the Creator's handiwork. Mr. Bodanzky would say that it was a pretty high hill. Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Furtwängler and Mr. Mengelberg, in their conducting of Wagner, for example, err on the side of rhetoric and excessive emphasis. Their Wagner is generally too slow, too sentimental, too fussy, too loud or too soft. Mr. Bodanzky, on the other hand, though he is far more at home in this music than any of these particular colleagues of his, and has a truer instinct for its essential style, is inclined to scamp his Wagner. Too often he underplays it—perhaps for fear of sentimentalizing it.

* * *

We have heard it said by persons who should know better that "any conductor can play Wagner." In the sense that any conductor can play Wagner and get away with it, that is of course a truism. Every conductor does play Wagner, and it is virtually impossible for any performance of Wagner, however poor, to fall entirely flat. Wagner, in fact, is almost completely fool proof. Conductors who would drive an audience into the street if they tried to play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony can subdue a hall full of average music-lovers at any time with a performance of the Liebestod that does little more than adhere to the directions on the printed page. For Wagner's music is so compact of eloquence, so steeped in gorgeousness, that any mediocrity can make an effect with it. In a sense it plays itself.

But this is a very different matter from playing Wagner up to the hilt, playing it for all it is worth—in a word, doing full justice to it. We have heard most of the eminent conductors now living and most of those who have functioned here and abroad within the last generation, and among them all we can think of only four who have played or now play Wagner as he can and should be played; whereas we have heard a dozen or more who could play Mozart and Beethoven and Brahms to the queen's taste.

* * *

How easy and inviting they look, those thrice-familiar Wagner scores, with their relatively simple rhythms, their great tunes that have long since sung themselves into the hearts and imaginations of the world, their nobility and tenderness and passion, their irresistible eloquence, their timeless beauty, their unfailing appeal! Yet test the average reading of a Wagner score by the touchstone of your conception of its ideal delivery, by the standard of the music's inherent possibilities, and then make your deliberate estimate of what you have just heard. If you have supposed that the conducting of Wagner is child's play, our guess is that you will change your mind.

* * *

The distinguishing trait of Wagner's music, the thing that makes it incomparable, is its blend of heroic strength and sensuous loveliness. Its sumptuous beauty and its epic grandeur of style go hand in hand; and this music of surpassing richness and intensity, that repeatedly assumes titanic stature, looming against the sky in shapes of towering sublimity, is the most difficult of all music to play well, because it requires the continuous interaction of two different kinds of imaginative perception. You must be sensitively aware of the Mediterranean element in its style—its luxuriant, glowing sensuousness, its magical sweetness and efflorescence; but you must not temper the winds that blow upon it from the North and give it its hardy strength; those winds that have blown over fir-covered mountain tops and have lifted the bright hair of the Valkyrs in their sunset flight to the banquet tables of the gods. The danger of over-romanticizing Wagner at the cost of relaxing his vigor and impairing his strength is no greater than the danger of over-energizing him at the cost of turning him into a mere 100 per cent Nordic.

* * *

This, then, is the special problem that is posed for the conductor by Wagner's major scores: how to capture and convey their rich sensuousness, their burning intensity, their unexampled weight of passionate emotion, and at the same time to preserve their nobility and their strength, to keep out of them that sick devil of sentimentalism which lurks in the neighborhood of every expression of the romantic imagination.

* * *

Mr. Bodanzky is more adequately equipped than many interpreters to meet these peculiarly complex requirements. He has fire, intensity, power; a singularly pure, severe and exacting taste; a genuine sense of line. He has developed within recent years a feeling for the epic quality in Wagner, for the titanic, superhuman strength of certain pages in the "Ring," for example; and last season his performance of the colossal hymn to the dead Siegfried was extraordinary for its breadth and sweep and its true grandeur of style. In his treatment of Wagner's more ardent passages, when the music blazes and burns like a torrent of flame, Mr. Bodanzky is immensely effectual—there are moments in his handling of the first act of "Tristan" which are difficult to forget.

* * *

His limitations as a Wagner conductor arise from his imaginative asceticism. One suspects that Mr. Bodanzky regards the sensuous element in music as something rather unsanitary and debilitating. Beethoven is never sensuous (you can fancy Mr. Bodanzky reasoning), neither is Mozart; nor were most of the other great masters. The sensuous fellows are Chopin and Strauss and Debussy and Scriabin and others whom Mr. Bodanzky probably does not rank very high (let us forbear to remind him that Brahms knew the secret of sensuous beauty in music and could use it to his advantage when he chose). But Wagner is indubitably great, and indubitably sensuous; and this inescapable fact is, one imagines, decidedly irksome to Mr. Bodanzky. He settles the matter to his own satisfaction by refusing to bow to Wagner when he encounters that gentleman in one of his voluptuous moods: averting his eyes, he hurries by, bored and impatient.

The result of this draconian attitude on Mr. Bodanzky's part is that his conducting of Wagner is somewhat lacking in glamor and sensibility and nuance. It is too astringent, too cerebral; it misses a good deal of the enchantment of Wagner the weaver of spells. Yet it has many of the other things that are essential to Wagner. It has pace and fire and dignity and breadth; it is large-molded and often noble; it has, at its best, the great style; likewise at its best it has a beautiful poetry and tenderness—as in several performances last season of the matchless Introduction to the Third Act of "Die Meistersinger."

* * *

Having all this, it would doubtless be unreasonable to expect it to have more; and we, for one, are quite content to take this admirable interpreter as he is—in Wagner and elsewhere: as one of the most single-minded, devoted and austere of artists: an artist who will not compromise his æsthetic faith; a superb musician, a conductor of intellect and power and imagination; a fanatical idealist in a deplorably casual world.

Passing in Review

Artur Bodanzky, who conducted the Metropolitan Opera Company's first post-war Wagner cycle last season

---

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 9

...CONCERT ...S" TONIGHT

Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; overture "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nico
To Perdita, Repper; Finlandia, Sympho
Poem, Sibelius; Finale of "Scheherazad
Rimsky-Korsakov; Festival at Bagdad, sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock s mounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusi
Jota from "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; "
the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieuranc Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Polovtsi dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; U lude Religieux, Edith Lang; Entrance
the Boyards, Halvorsen.

[illegible] JUNE 9

Symphony Hall "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall are now in the sixth week of their 40th season. Thursday will be Tufts night and Friday Tech night, but these and all nights are open to the public.

Tonight's program follows:

Prelude, "Carmen," Bizet; Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "To Perdita," Repper; "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; Jota from "Hispana," Stoessel-Jacchia; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Polovtsian Dances from, "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Prelude Religieux," Edith Lang; "Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen.

MONITOR JUNE 8

Tonight at the "Pops"

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF BANKING NIGHT

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" ... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" .. Rossini
Serenade .... Schubert-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
"At the Convent" ... Borodin-Marr
"Children at Play" ... Van-Westerhout-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi" ...... Wagner
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
March, "Washington Post" ... Sousa

[illegible] JUNE 8

MUSIC

"The Pops"

The annual Wagner program of the "Pop" concerts was presented last night in Symphony Hall, with the usual large audience of enthusiastic Wagnerites, perfect, imperfect, and present. In addition to familiar excerpts from the music dramas, Mr. Jacchia included among his selections the Centennial March written for the Philadelphia Exposition of 1876. An "occasional" piece, not representative of the high water mark of the composer's genius, it nevertheless was worthy of a place on the program as exhibiting his characteristic vocabulary in unfamiliar synthesis.

The rest of the week, up to Saturday, is filled with special programs, all of which, however, are open to the public. Tonight's concert is designed for the entertainment of the American Institute of Banking, the Women Musicians' Association and the Field and Forest Club. Tomorrow night the Massachusetts Federation of Music Clubs and the Professional Women's Club will be especially represented, and Edith Lang's "Prélude Religieux" is included in the program. Wednesday brings Euclid Lodge night, Thursday Tufts night, and Friday Tech night.

The final Sunday evening concert of the season is announced for June 21 with a Russian program. On the following evening falls the annual "Request" program (unrestricted), for which ballots are now being received.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 9

At the Pops Tonight

Prelude, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
To Perdita .... Repper
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem .... Sibelius
Finale, "Scheherazade," . Rimsky-Korsakov
Jota, Suite "Hispaña" . Stoessel-Jacchia
By the Waters of Minnetonka, Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Polovtsian Dances, "Prince Igor," Borodin
Prélude Réligieux .. .. Edith Lang
Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 10

At the Pops Tonight

March, "National Masonic Club," Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppé
Eili, Eili
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Danse Macabre .... Saint-Saëns
The Music Box .... Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" .... Mozart
The Ride of the Valkyrs ...... Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
By the Brook .... Seigi Abè
Waltz, "Roses from the South," Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Charles H. Bennett

AMERICAN JUNE 10

MIXED PROGRAM ARRANGED FOR POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight the following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" Symphony Orchestra:

March, "National Masonic Club" ... Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon, and Night in Vienna" .... Suppe
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem Saint-Saens
The Music Box .... Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, Baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook" .... Seigi Abe
Waltz, "Roses from the South". Strauss

HERALD JUNE 10

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

At the "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight the following program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and the "Pops" Symphony orchestra.

March, "National Masonic Club". Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppe
Eili, Eili .... Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem Saint-Saens
The Music Box .... Liadov
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hortori ni," "By the Brook" .... Seigi Abe
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss

AMERICAN OCT 10 '2 RECITAL

115

NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

JUN 10 1925

Musical "Culture" and "Intellect."

Serge Koussevitzky, having passed a winter in Boston, varied by excursions to New York and other Eastern cities of the United States, has been talking to the London Evening Standard about our music. The first American who will write "really grand music," predicts this Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "will base it on jazz motifs."

In which profound observation the distinguished Muscovite differs not at all from the Greenwich Village run of prophets. "In London," Mr. Koussevitzky goes on to say, "you have a musical culture, whereas in America there is only a vast musical intellect, for the day of American composers is yet to come."

All this will not be pleasing to that faithful band which insists that the late Edward MacDowell, if not a major god of music, is distinctly one of its accredited deities. And how about the ever-growing galaxy of lesser lights who year by year have diligently been adding to the quantity and, they suppose, the quality of our musical production? Trail blazers, Mr. Koussevitzky evidently thinks, preparing with exemplary self-sacrifice the way of the greater who are yet to come.

For many laborers in the vineyard, Mr. Koussevitzky's pronouncement, provided they learn of it and then take it seriously, must be very distressing indeed. But what, they might well ask, does Mr. Koussevitzky really mean by the "musical culture" of London and the "vast musical intellect of America"?

Elsewhere in the interview he indicates his belief that England now has ponderable composers and we have not, but that our concerts are more numerous and our "musical public" larger and more keenly alive.

Such may be the Muscovite distinction between "culture" and "intellect." But, after all, outside of the highly cultivated cerebrum of the Russian gentleman himself, does this point to any fundamental dissimilarity between the bob-tailed nag and the bay?

MONITOR JUNE 10

Tonight at the "Pops"

EUCLID LODGE NIGHT

March, "National Masonic Club" Harlow
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppé
"Eili, Eili" .... Arranged by Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aïda" .... Verdi
"Danse Macabre" ...... Saint-Saëns
"The Music Box" .... Liadoff
Air, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro" ...... Mozart
Charles H. Bennett, baritone
The Ride of the Valkyries .. Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" ...... Chabrier
"Kogawa no Hotori ni," "By the Brook" .... Seigi Abè
Waltz, "Roses from the South" Strauss

MONITOR JUNE 9

Tonight at the "Pops"

MASS. FEDERATION OF MUSIC CLUBS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
To Perdita .... Repper
"Finlandia" .... Sibelius
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Jota from "Hispaña" .... Stoessel-Jacchia
"By the Waters of Minnetonka" Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
"Prélude Religieux" .... Edith Lang
"Entrance of the Boyards" ..... Halvorsen

AMERICAN JUNE 9

VARIED PROGRAM AT "POPS" TONIGHT

The following program will be given at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight under Agide Jacchia's direction:

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
To Perdita .... Repper
Finlandia, symphonic poem .... Sibelius
Finale of "Scheherazade". Rimsky-Korsakov
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Jota from "Hispana" ...... Stoessel-Jacchia
"By the Waters of Minnetonka" .. Lieurance
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
Prelude religieux .... Edith Lang
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

At the Pops Tonight

"Tufts Night"

Rackoczy March .... Berlioz
Overture, "Zampa" .... Herold
Excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers" Wagner

Tufts Songs
  Fight .... E. W. Hayes, '16
  Spell It Out .... A. T. Williams, '19
  Aren't You Glad? .. E. W. Newton, '90
Largo, "From the New World" .. Dvořák
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" . Glazounov
Furlana, "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Tufts Songs
  That Mascot .... P. B. Lewis, '18
  Brown and Blue .... E. W. Newton, '90
  Dear Alma Mater .... L. R. Lewis, '87
Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs J. W. Morton, '11
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" ..... Waldteufel
Coronation March, "The Prophet" Meyerbeer

Conductor: A. Jacchia

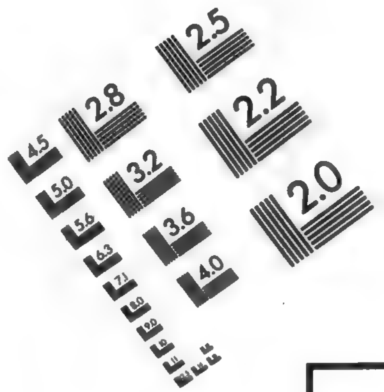
TRANSCRIPT JUNE 11

REDUCTION

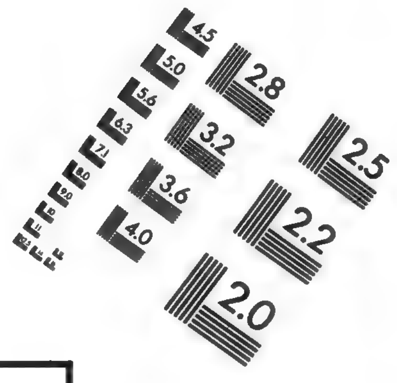
RATIO

12x

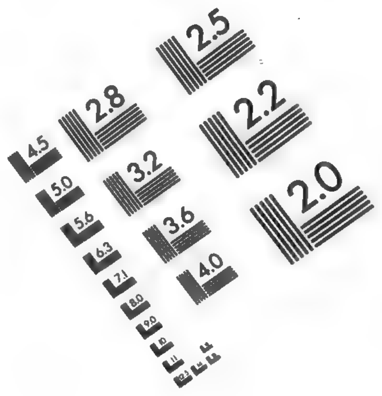
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



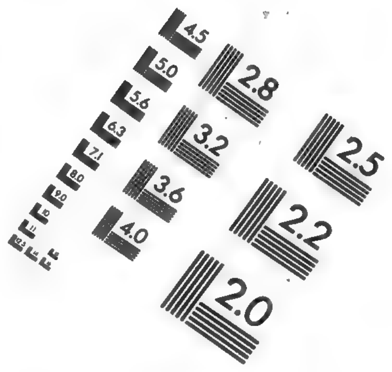
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
4.0



4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
4.0

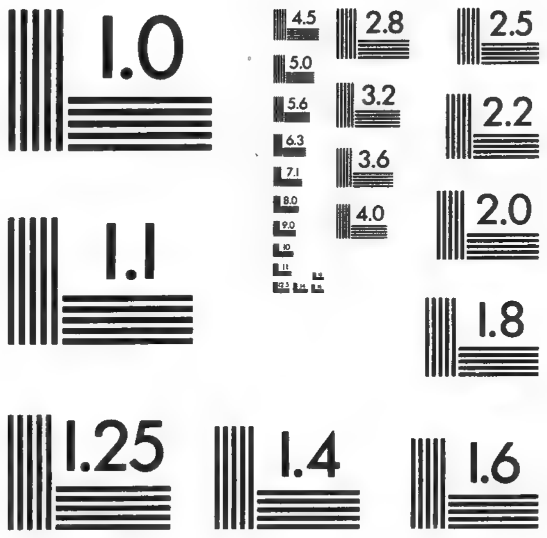


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

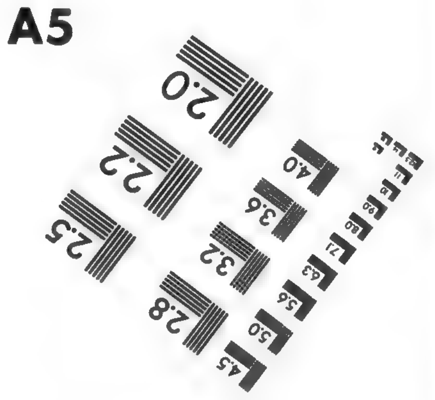
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

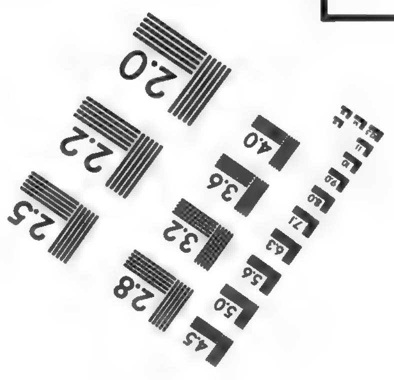


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

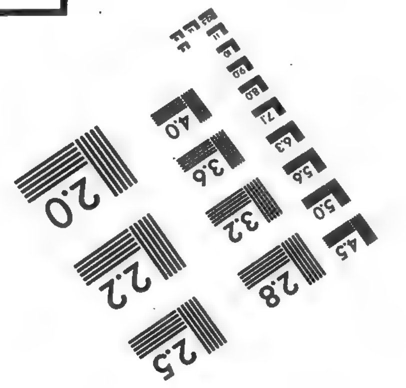
4.0
2.0
3.6
5.0
3.2
4.5
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
4.0
2.2
3.6
2.5
3.2
5.0
2.8
4.5



4.0
5.0
2.0
3.6
4.5
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

116

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 9

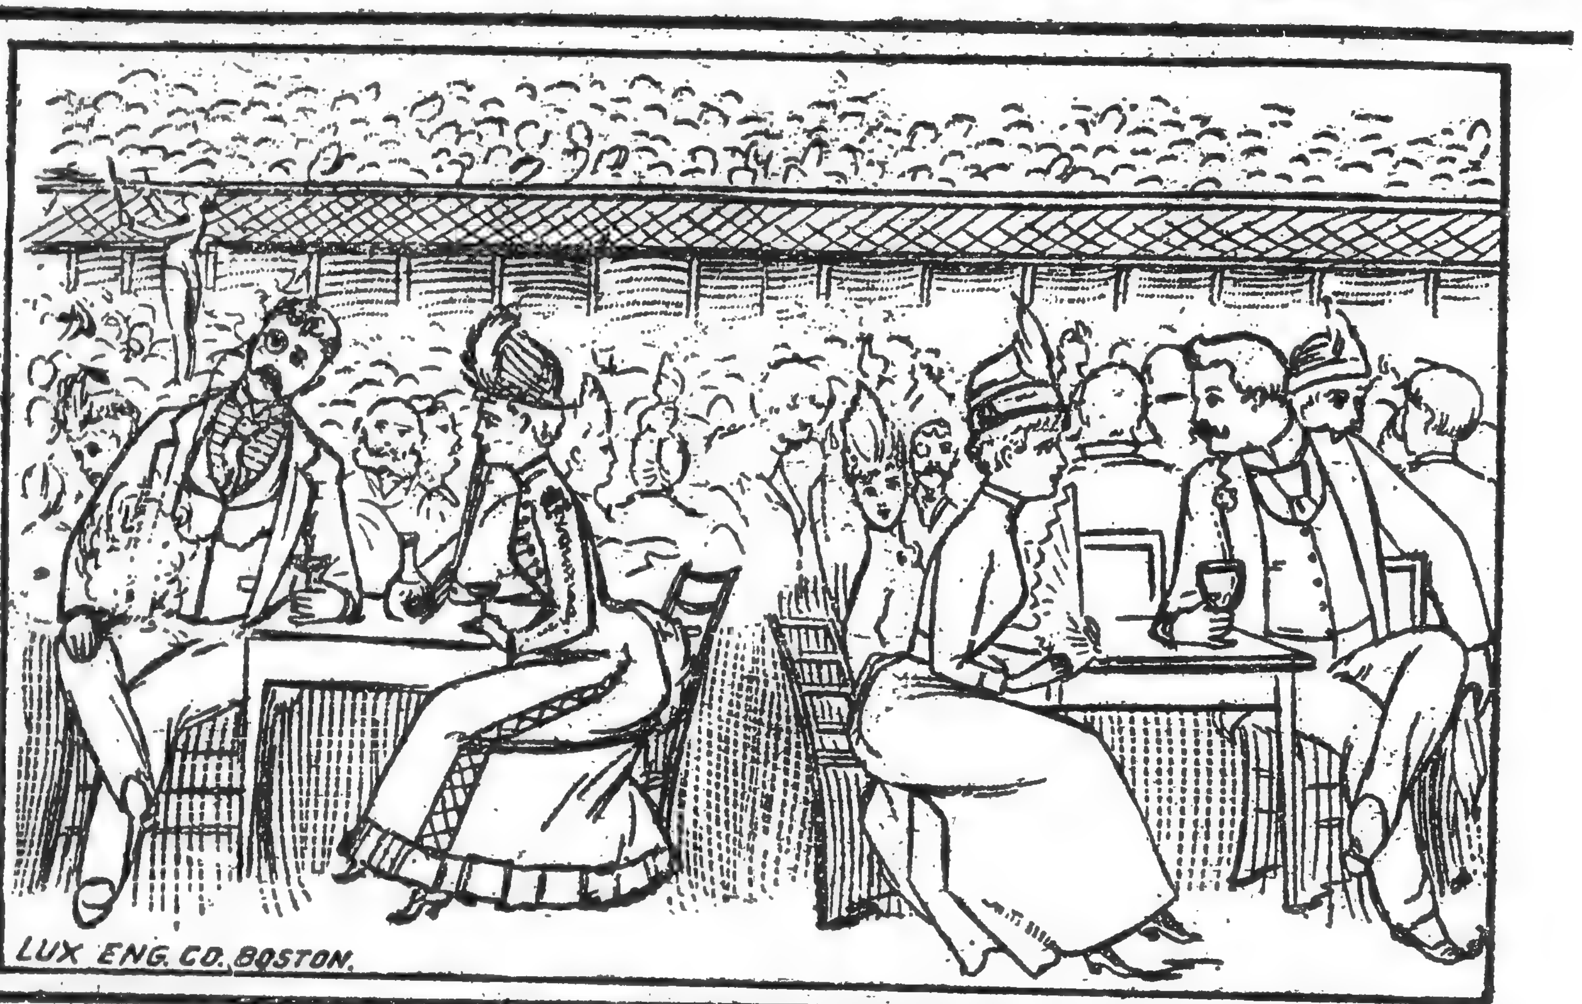
Other Times; Other Music

THIS MONDAY EVENING!

8 TO 11.

MUSIC HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS



LUX ENG. CO. BOSTON.

50 GRAND ORCHESTRA 50

MR. AD. NEUENDORFF - - CONDUCTOR

Monday, August 20, 1888.

PROGRAMME.

1	WEDDING MARCH	MENDELSSOHN
2	OVERTURE (Rakoczy)	KELER BELA
3	WALTZ (Freudenklaenge)	RESCH
4	GRAND SELECTION (from Aida)	VERDI
5	OVERTURE (In Memoriam)	SULLIVAN
6	*a VORSPIEL to the 5th act Manfred	REINECKE
	*b INTERMEZZO (from Ballet Music Naila)	DELIBES
7	WALTHERS PRIZE SONG (from Die Meisersinger)	WAGNER
8	VORSPIEL to Henry the Lion	KRETSCHMER
9	OVERTURE (Orpheus aux Enfers)	OFFENBACH
10	WALTZ (Freut euch des Lebens)	STRAUSS
11	MEDITATION	BACH-GOUNOD
12	GALOP (La Chasse Infernale)	KOELLING

* The audience is respectfully requested to preserve silence during this number.

SPECIAL—To-morrow (Tuesday) 75th Night. Gala Performance. Only appearance of MISS MARIE JANSEN.

Tickets, 25 cents. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony, 50 cents, now on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall.

Memento of the Pops, When They Were Yet a Novelty
(From the Collection at Symphony Hall)

ADVOCATE JUNE 11

Anticipate Record Attendance at the "Jewish Pops Night"

A record attendance is anticipated at the "Jewish Night" of the

AGIDE JACCHIA
Italian Jew, Conductor of the "Pops" Concerts

"Pops" at Boston Symphony Hal next Tuesday evening. It is the first time in the history of "Pops' concerts that a "Jewish Night" ha been designated. The program wil be devoted solely to Jewish foll

HENRY L. GIDEON
Under whose direction the choirs of Temple Israel, Temple Ohabei Shalom and Temple Mishkan Tefila will present intimate examples of Jewish folk music.

music and the works of a whole galaxy of immortal Jewish composers.

The Jewish Culture Club, of which Max Katzeff is president, has arranged a reception to be given immediately after the concert in honor of Conductor Jacchia, at Garrison Hall.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JUN 11 1925

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Percy N. Scholes, reviewing a concert of the London Symphony Orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as one who "habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship." It may be recalled that Mr. Koussevitzky said that no orchestra in the world played music by Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky as well as the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newman recently declared that there was no first class orchestra in London. Mr. Scholes said of the L. S. O.: "The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but works it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. I have spoken of Koussevitzky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river."

For his second concert in Paris, (May 30), Mr. Koussevitzky announced Denis Taylor's Suite "Through the Looking Glass." The other pieces were Bach-Steinberg, Concerto in D major for orchestra; Dukas, "The Peri;" Ravel, "The Waltz," and Miss Tailleperre's concerto played by her.

Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Furtwaengler or Mr. Mengelberg, viewing Mont Blanc for the first time, would exclaim that it was a sublime and unsurpassed example of the Creator's handiwork. Mr. Bodanzky would say that it was a pretty high hill. Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Furtwaengler and Mr. Mengelberg, in their conducting of Wagner, for example, err on the side of rhetoric and excessive emphasis. Their Wagner is generally too slow, too sentimental, too fussy, too loud or too soft. Mr. Bodanzky, on the other hand, though he is far more at home in this music than any of these particular colleagues of his, and has a truer instinct for its essential style, is inclined to scamp his Wagner. Too often he underplays it—perhaps for fear of sentimentalizing it.—Lawrence Gilman.

SCRANTON, PA.
REPUBLICAN
JUN 11

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra as the largest repertoire in the world ut it is my convinced opinion that he London Symphony Orchestra plays he works of Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky better than any orchestra in the world; they have cultivated hese particular composers to perfection. What is even more interestir is the fact that the London Symphor is composed almost entirely of English musicians, whereas that of Bo ton contains musicians from ever European country, with only a sprin kling of Americans. Besides, Bosto opens its arms to modern musician which is all the more strange sin London has modern composers of high order which America lacks."

o o o

ADVERTISER JUNE 12

Tech at Pops

Tonight will be Tech night at the Pops in Symphony Hall but the concert is open to the public. The program follows:

March, "Father of Victory" .... Ganne
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppe
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .... Boito
"Tech" Songs
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" ......
.... Saint-Saen
Second Slavonic Dance.............Dvo
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikov
"Tech" Songs
Selection, "Rose Marie" .... Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Dream of Love" .... Fahrbach
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

MONITOR JUNE 12

Tonight at the "Pops"

M. I. T. NIGHT

March, "Father of Victory"..Ganne
Overture, "Light Cavalry"...Suppé
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ......Boïto
"Tech" Songs
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saëns
Second Slavonic Dance.......Dvořák
Finale, Fourth Symphony ......
Tschaikowsky
"Tech" Songs
Selection, "Rose-Marie" ....
Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Dream of Love"..Fahrbach
"Pomp and Circumstance"...Elgar
"Stein Song"

MONITOR JUNE 11

Tonight at the "Pops"

TUFTS COLLEGE NIGHT

Rackoczy March ....Berlioz
Overture to "Zampa"........Herold
Excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers" ....Wagner
Tufts Songs
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony ....Dvořák
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....
Glazounoff
Furlana from "La Gioconda"
Ponchie
Tufts Songs
Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs
J. W. Morton '11
altz, "La Barcarolle" ....
Waldteufel
oronation March from "The Prophet" ....Meyerbeer

ADVERTISER JUNE 11

Tu[illegible]ongs on [illegible]onight's [illegible]op Program

Tufts College will celebrate at the Pops tonight in Symphony Hall, but the concert will be open to the public as usual. Several Tufts songs are on the program, which follows:

Rackoczy March ....Berlioz
Overture to "Zampa"...............Herold
Excerpts, "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Tufts Songs—
(a) "Fight" ....E. W. Hayes, '16
(b) "Spell It Out"......A. T. William, '19
(c) "Aren't You Glad?" E. W. Newton '90
Largo, "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos".....Glazounov
Furlana, "La Goconda"..........Ponchielli
Tufts Song—
(a) "That Mascot" ....P. B. Lewis, '18
(b) "Brown and Blue"..E. W. Newton, '90
(c) "Dear Alma Mater"..L. R. Lewis, '87
Fantasa on Tufts Aira....J. W. Morton, '11
Waltz, "La Bacarolle"..........Waldteufel
Coronation March, "The Prophet".Meyerbeer

HERALD JUNE 11 PAGE NINETEEN

TONIGHT AT THE "POPS"

The "Pop" concert in Symphony hall tonight, which is a public occasion although Tufts College will be particularly represented, will be as follows:

Rackoczy March...................Berlioz
Overture to "Zampa"...............Herold
Excerpts Act III, "The Mastersingers"
Wagner
Tufts Songs
(a) Fight..............E. W. Hayes, '16
(b) Spell It Out......A. T. Williams, '19
(c) Aren't You Glad?.E. W. Newton, '90
Largo, "From the New World" Symphony ....Dvorak
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....Glazounov
Furlana from "La Giocanda"....Ponchielli
Tufts Songs
(a) That Mascot.........P. B. Lewis, '18
(b) Brown and Blue....E. W. Newton, '90
(c) Dear Alma Mater..L. R. Lewis, '87
Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs
J. W. Morton, '11
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".......Waldteufel
Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer

HERALD JUNE 12 PAGE TWENTY-SEVEN

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Tonight will be the annual Tech night at the Pops concert in Symphony hall. The concert, however, is open to the public. The program follows:

March, "Father of Victory"..............Ganne
Overture, "Light Cavalry"...............Suppe
Fantasia, "Mefistofele"..................Boito
"Tech" Songs.
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"..
Saint-Saens
Second Slavonic Dance..................Dvorak
Finale, Fourth Symphony..........Tchaikovsky
"Tech" Songs.
Selection, "Rose-Marie"..........Friml-Stothart
Waltz, "Dream of Love"................Fahrbach
Pomp and Circumstance....................Elgar

MISSING
PAGE(S)

parency of Mr. Gericke's or Dr. Muck's day. The recruits to the wind-choir augur well for the future. In particular, the new oboist and the new clarinetist excel their predecessors in warm richness and quick sensibility of voice. At every turn, moreover, the whole orchestra played with an equal humogeneity and plasticity of tone—a sound to gratify the conductor's as well as hearers' ears. Except as a convenient phrase it is hard to say what sacred fires really are. No one, however, that frequents Symphony Hall may now mistake the Koussevitzkian flame. With it, man by man and choir by choir, the orchestra burns.

As for Monsieur Serge (as some call him in Paris) at the head of these five-score-and-ten, he is quite his familiar self. Coming to his place he surveyed the audience from the edge of the stage with the calm eyes of a simple child; while not a few within it—if the truth may be politely written—surveyed, with wonder in their glance, a new fashion in trousers. Upon them, as light-hued garment of ceremonial afternoon, it lays a long, narrow, black and silken strip, like unto that which sometimes adorns evening clothes. Advanced, however, to the conductor's stand, Mr. Koussevitzky was no longer simple and bland and child-like. In the relatively brief space of his stay in Boston, he has seldom been more pantomimic upon music, orchestra and audience. He snatched tonal virtue from the air; gathered it in the hollow of his outstretched hand; upon the band outpoured it. He enjoined puissance or he commanded finesse; he caressed or he goaded; he stayed or he sped; he outflung the tonal mass like Jupiter thundering, or he subdued and opened it until a single detail whispered clear; he sopped up a melody, he whipped at a rhythm—all things to all men upon any music, with eyes, lips, hands, head, body, the crouching here, the up-leaping there for tireless instruments of this intense self-expression. If ever there was a "very personal" conductor, it is Serge Koussevitzky. Not only does he re-make orchestras; he also re-writes music—both in his own image.

Through the pieces of the day this conducting might range far and cut deep. Across Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" went Mr. Koussevitzky poetizing. His ear and his hand were super-sensitive to the curving of a melody, the shaping of a phrase, the blending of a euphony, the tempering of a timbre. Sensibility that was intuition paced, rhythmed, modulated, shaded; arrayed, dispersed, subdued or isolated the contributing voices. They became as the strands of a luminous web hanging in the serene air, flecked only by the moods of the Faun—remembering and troubled, visioning and sensuous. The memory of Mallarmé's prompting verses faded. Gone was the more immediate sense of human presences and human abilities releasing Debussy's tones. Here was the stripped essence of sound evoking beauty upon imagination. There can be few pieces of music in which fulfilment so rounds purpose as in this Prelude of the Faun. Sensuous subtlety quivers — perfectly achieved. Full and perfect circle came also Mr. Koussevitzky's performance.

These columns have already set forth the nature and the content of Monsieur Jacques Ibert's "Escales." Playing them, the conductor obliged his friend and also disclosed the new mettle—or, rather, finesse—of the reorganized wind-choir. Furthermore, he proved his ability to make a little go, if not a long, at least a pleasant, way. For Monsieur Ibert dispenses an exceeding slenderness of matter with an exceeding delicacy of hand. He plies the nicest of precisions; teems with playful little fancies about melody and modulation, prettifies them harmonically and instrumentally; tosses up rhythms like a gentle parlor-juggler; dips his fingers in local color that he may forthwith exhale atmosphere; recites his lesson from Ravel and Debussy so wistfully that there is no blaming him for learning it too well.

ful. Out of his own emotion, he watered the occasional dryness of the slow movement; while the reflective passion of the sober Brahms gave him no opportunity to languish. He poised the succeeding interlude at the golden mean of gentle musing and smiling progress. Into the beginning of the end, he infused the thrill of suspense expectant; his entering horns and trombones yielded a dusky and haunting splendor; the harmonic mists dissolved; in radiant panoply swung the finale of exultation. Beethoven outdone, it were almost reasonable to write. And certainly and truly, Mr. Koussevitzky master of himself and thereby master of the music.

As the luck of the day would have it, the "Leonora" Overture upturned the reverse of the medal. In no music that he has undertaken in Boston has the conductor been more the Koussevitzky of superfluous, studied, insatiable excesses. Hardly a measure escaped his manipulation, though pages of them are but transition and passage-work. He retarded, he sentimentalized, every melody till he had wrung it dry. He played tricks with each climax until the saving trumpet-call seemed but contrivance. To Beethoven's just emphases he added twenty exaggerations of his own. Upon an overture that is already music-drama distilled and concentrated he sprayed a showman's artifice. A dual personality is Mr. Koussevitzky conducting—his worse and his better self. A single concert may contain them both

H. T. P.

OPENS NEW SCHRAFFT'S STORE

F. G. Shattuck Company Adds Another Link, at 356 Boylston Street, to Chain of Attractive Stores and Restaurants

The F. G. Shattuck Company today opened a new Schrafft's store at 356 Boylston street, in which the restaurant has the appearance of a large dining room of the homes of quaint Spanish days.

This adds another link to the chain of stores and restaurants with which the Shattuck firm has already made its reputation. Occupying the space of three former stores, this new Schrafft's store includes a shop for the sale of candy and chocolates, a restaurant for breakfast luncheon, afternoon tea and dinner; a fountain for ices and sodas and a home-made bakery counter, where foods are offered for sale.

As one enters the store, he is impressed with the quaint effect, interior decorations, fixtures, fireplaces, oil paintings of the seventeenth century and travatine pillars. The walls are of cream color.

The restaurant will accommodate 250 people and, before long another restaurant will be opened upstairs, to seat 400 people. The restaurant on the street floor was designed by J. Harleston Parker of Parker, Thomas & Rice, architects, and harmonizes with the store and bakery. The fireplace is Spanish and Spanish trinkets are shown in a cupboard built ito the side wall.

The heads of the departments and their assistants are men and women of experience. The firm is spending some $2,500,000 on new stores and fixtures at present. Six other stores are being fitted up in New York. When they are completed, the chain will comprise thirty stores, doing nearly $15,000,000 of business in a year. The firm has two other Schrafft stores in this city, at 16 West street and at 11 Summer street

Get on the main line

advertise
advertise
advertise
DAILY in the Boston Evening Transcript

6950
main

Globe Sept 27 '25

MUSIC MUSIC

The Coming Symphony Season

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct 9 and 10 with the first concerts of the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series. There will be the usual 24 concerts in each series. Every seat for both series is sold for the season, except the 505 unreserved second balcony seats for Fridays. These will be sold at 50 cents, but only to people willing to wait in line for them for a period varying according to weather and program. You pay as you enter. There will be the usual five Monday evening concerts at popular prices. All seats are subscribed for this series also.

Serge Koussevitzky returned from a Summer in Europe last Monday, bringing with him new music to be heard this season, his second as conductor here. His success in pleasing last season's audiences is responsible for the unprecedented subscription list. The Friday concerts have for years always sold out in advance. But the Saturday and Monday concerts have never quite done so. As a box office attraction Mr Koussevitzky is superior to any of his predecessors.

No information except a list of names is forthcoming about the programs for the year. Rehearsals will begin Friday next. Koussevitzky told the interviewers on arrival that he had brought with him pieces by Hindemith, Roussel, Imbert, Respighi, Ravel and Steinbach, composed especially for the Boston Symphony. Ravel's name is dropped from this list in a subsequent official announcement from Symphony Hall.

Respighi, composer of "Fountains of Rome" and of a "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra previously heard at these concerts, is to visit America and presumably Boston this Winter. A new work of his "Pini di Roma" is announced to have its first American performance in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Toscanini in January next.

New Compositions

Paul Hindemith is a young German of the extreme modernist school. He has composed a string quartet in quarter tones, and other highly experimental works. None of his music has yet been heard in Boston. It is highly praised and also harshly condemned by European critics, but this is true of all modernist music that attracts any attention.

Maximilian Steinbach is a German known here only by his arrangements of 18th century music played last season under Koussevitzky. The "new work" by him will probably turn out to be an arrangement, but arrangers have been known to blossom forth as composers.

Roussel is a living Frenchman, whose symphony Koussevitzky introduced last season here. His "Festin de l'araignee" had been heard here previously, also his "La Ville Rose." His music has never seemed especially interesting or important to the Globe reviewer.

Imbert is another minor Parisian, who has written about music as well as composing it. Ravel is, of course, one of the most noted of living composers, whose music has often figured on Boston programs.

It is not probable that Mr Koussevitzky contemplates giving his highly conservative audiences here any undue amount of modern music. Last season he was reported to have said that on every program there would be at least one piece by a modern composer, and it was true enough that except for the all-Beethoven program given as an excuse for a subsequent all-Stravinsky program living composers were always represented. But there are living composers whom nobody would designate as "modern" in the sense of dangerous. We have several of them right here in Boston.

There will be a number of new players, probably about 20. It has been more than once reported from Paris this Summer that lamentations were arising there over the departure for Boston of a number of leading members of the several Paris orchestras. So it would seem that the French contingent in the cosmopolitan body of 100 players is to be strengthened. Before the war French players were numerous only among the wood wind. Many of the strings were Germans.

Sustaining Reputation

There are two serious difficulties in the way of engaging American players for the Boston Symphony. Except for violinists and cellists there is likely to be a scarcity of performers of American birth or citizenship who have sufficient ability. And since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been willing to accept the somewhat rigorous conditions imposed upon other American orchestras by the Musicians' Union, membership in it does not improve an American's chance of ever getting another job if he loses his place in the Boston Symphony.

For Mr Koussevitzky this will be a season hardly less difficult than last. He has made a great reputation here. Now he will have to live up to it, in a city proverbially coldly critical of all performers, before an audience nearly all of which remembers the genuis of Muck and some of which still remembers the genuis of Nikisch, both men of far more firmly established reputation here and in Europe than is Mr Koussevitzky as a conductor.

Even last season there were many murmurs at the unprecedented changes of program and the obvious lack of a completely planned repertory for the season. This year Mr Koussevitzky has no doubt planned his complete season in advance, but unless his programs are as wide ranging in content and as clever in assembling related or contrasted pieces as were those of Monteux and Muck his programs will still afford ground for the fault finders.

His personality, his brilliant displays of nervous energy, and his superb sense of rhythm have been Mr Koussevitzky's great assets. He is not a scholarly musician like Muck. Tradition he ignores and despises. He conducts as he feels at the moment. At best he is magnificent, even at worst interesting. His personality will dominate this season's Symphony concerts as it did last season's. Nor does it seem probable that many of his audience will weary of him.

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Globe — Oct 10

Koussevitzky Excels in Brahm's First Symphony

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon. Every seat for every concert in Boston and New York has been sold by subscription for the season. Yet the trustees in a statement printed in yesterday's programs are appealing for funds to meet a deficit estimated as likely to be $91,000 on the current season. Last season the net loss, as now announced, was $41,813.

But it has been necessary since the close of last season to increase the aggregate salaries by about $50,000, state the trustees in their appeal. There are 14 new players this season, replacing 10 who have left for various reasons, including several principals, but one surmises that Mr Koussevitzky has received a large increase in salary. His compensation has never been made public. Dr Muck is said to have been paid $28,500 a year as conductor here.

There was cordial applause for Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra before the concert began. Each number on the program was applauded vigorously, especially Brahms' First Symphony and Debussy's "Afteroon of a Faun." Mr Laurent, first flute player, rose upon signal from Mr Koussevitzky at the end of Debussy's tone poem and was, of course, given a round of applause which his beautiful playing of the flute solo no doubt deserved.

The new first oboe, Fernand Gillet, formerly of the Lamoureux orchestra in Paris, was similarly honored at the conclusion of Ibert's "Ports of Call," in one section of which he had played a conspicuous solo in a way that proves him likely to be a worthy successor of Mr Longy. But one questions the expediency of permitting single players to acknowledge presonal applause. It is nearly always the orchestra as a unit, not any individual player, not even the conductor, which deserves applause.

Mr Koussevitzky began the concert with Beethoven's "Leonore No 2" overture. This is believed to be the first composed of the four written for his opera "Fidelio." The familiar "Leonore No. 3" is a rewritten version of this No. 2, which uses the same thematic material. "Leonore No. 2" like "Leonore No. 3" is really a tone poem, conveying the conflicting emotions of hero and heroine threatened with torture and death, then saved as by a miracle through the opportune arrival of an official bearing the King's pardon. The overture is the opera condensed and intensified.

Mr Koussevitzky failed to make the trumpet calls off stage, which here as in "Leonore No. 3" mark the arrival of the pardon, impressive. He did not seem to have studied the piece sufficiently to make anything out of it, though it is the sort of thing in which he might excel. The errors of tempi in particular were unfortunate. The tone of the orchestra in this number was harsh and scratchy, loud but not resonant.

The performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony, on the other hand, was remarkably effective, superbly vital in its rhythmic sweep and control, planned and carried out on broad lines. Mr Koussevitzky's conception of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is sharply different from that of other conductors. With him the faun disports himself in a languid perfumed atmosphere. He stresses the kinship of Debussy's music on its weakest side with that of Massenet. The music of Debussy is of too delicate a texture and too perfectly wrought and polished to stand the weight of stress and the turbid emotionalism Mr Koussevitzky puts upon it.

The one novelty on the program, "Ports of Call," a suite of three Mediterra ... Ibert, is t ... de

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

SEP 27 1925

Serge Kroussevitzky Wins New Honors

Serge Kousseevitzky arrived in America from Europe recently to begin preparations for the forty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open in Boston on Oct. 9. He brings with him a number of new scores of interest which are to be presented in the course of the season.

Serge Koussevitzky, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual series of five Brooklyn concerts again this season, beginning Nov. 27, has become in his first season at the head of this famous organization one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music.

In Europe likewise, Kousseevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors. Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances over the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French Government. To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem

---

121

BOSTON TRAVELER

Oct 10th 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Photographed in New York Just After His Arrival from Europe. M. Koussevitzky Conducted Yesterday Afternoon the First Symphony Concert of the Season in Boston.
(Underwood & Underwood)

Transcript

, OCTOBER 10, 1925

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss and Berlioz

UPON Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of next week stand two pieces in which he should excel—the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Since a half-forgotten concert by Mr. Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra, Boston has known no richly romantic performance of the Fantastic Symphony. A Concerto Grosso (No. 8) for Strings and Organ, by Corelli, will begin the concerts.

Strauss and Brahms

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater in Cambridge on Thursday evening next Mr. Koussevitzky sets this program:

Overture to the Opera. "Figaro's Wedding" .... Mozart
Escales: Mediterranean Impressions (Rome to Palermo: Tunis to Nefta: (Palermo: Tunis, Valencia) .... Ibert
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" .... Strauss
Symphony in C minor, No. 1 .... Brahms

The Nonpareil

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Transcript — Oct 5, 25

"Assisting Artists" at the Symphony Concerts — Departures from Custom — Koussevitzkian Idyls—A Tenor from Lithuania — Choral Plans — Return of Miss Hess

SO FAR as present arrangements go, there will be but six "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts. There is no singer among them; and all are men. Mr. Bauer, the pianist, will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first appearance with the Boston Orchestra, playing the same Concerto of Brahms in which he took the solo-part in 1900. Mr. Lhévinne a rare visitor to Boston and a rarer gue at Symphony Hall, is the other pianis The teachers bid their pupils take patter from him as poised artist. Pianist, too is Mr. Prokoviev; but he will appear pri marily as composer in a concert largely de voted to his own music. In Mr. Szigeti, a new and noted violinist will be heard for the first times in Boston. He has also modernistic leanings; whereas Mr. Thibaud the other violinist upon the list, is firm-set in the classics—preferably from the elder masters. The violoncellist is Mr. Casals. Recollection, deepened by his every return, will welcome him. Playing concertos, these virtuosi share naturally and fittingly in the courses of the orchestra and in the program of the particular concerts that bring them. Singers, on the contrary, were always intruders—with their arbitrary numbers, often ill attuned to the preceding, or the following, music. If they were notable artists, they disclosed themselves too briefly and narrowly. If they were

Continued on Following Page

Adv Oct 10 '25

PAGE EIGHT

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN HEARTY WELCOME BACK

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky was heartily welcomed back yesterday at the opening of the 45th Symphony season.

Serge Kouusevitzky

On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds himself in a heroic position.

Never before has the Symphony Orchestra started a season with all seats sold for every series in Boston and other cities. That i remarkable proof of his drawin power, his personal prestige and th enjoyment that music-lovers her and elsewhere have derived from hi programs and performances.

This season is also noteworthy fo the unusual number of new player in the orchestra. There are about dozen new members in all, inclu ing soloists engaged to replace r tired veterans and new addition that bring the total membershi figure up to around 110, the lar est on record.

NEW SOLOIST APPLAUDED

One of the new soloists, F. Gille who has taken Mr. Longy's plac made a brilliant debut yesterday playing the oboe obbligato part in the second movement of Ibert's "Ports of Call," an impressionistic tone picture of Mediterranean seaboard life. He was also soloist when the piece was first heard in Paris. Mr. Gillet's tone is colorful, haunting, and his technic is extraordinarily facile. An artist of the first rank, judging by nis performance at this first matinee!

FRENCH NOVELTY

The Ibert piece, played for the first time in this country, was thoroughly enjoyed. The tone picture of Tunis-Nefta, with its Oriental atmosphere, and of Valencia, done in the Spanish rhapsody style, were particularly delightful; but there was a gorgeous display of rich orchestration in the Palermo sketch. It was like Palermo on a sunny, breezy day, gay and golden.

A dramatic performance of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture opens the concert, which will be repeatd tonight. Mr. Laurent, the flute soloist, was given special applause for his masterful playing in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." There was also an absorbingly fine performance of Brahms' first symphony.

AMERICAN Oct 10 '25

FIRST RECITAL OF SYMPHONY A DELIGHT

By MOSES SMITH

The opening of the Symphony Orchestra season came off on schedule yesterday afternoon with very little of the sensational that some might have expected. Serge Koussevitzky was his well-known self on the conductor's stand, a little smoother, if anything, than last year. Coming on the stage at the start of the concert, and after every number, he was given long applause.

A good deal of interest was centered on the new players which Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to the Symphony Orchestra. As far as one could tell from one concert, there is little change in the tonal quality of the band. It will take more familiarity to gauge the change properly. It is perfectly evident, however, that the orchestra has an oboe soloist of unusual excellence in Mr. Gillet. He played with exquisite phrasing the long solo in the second movement of "Escales," a new piece by the Frenchman, Jacques Ibert, produced yesterday for the first time in America.

This work, which is in three movements, proved to be of real worth musically, and the long applause which greeted its performance was deserved. Mr. Koussevitzky had previously opened the concert with a very dramatic rendition of the sec- nd "Leonore" Overture, and had ollowed this with Debussy's "Pre- ude to the Afternoon of a Faun."

The second half of the program vas devoted to Brahms First Sym- hony, the one in C minor. As was be expected. Mr. Koussevitzky ook his own way with this music, ramatizing everything so that none night miss the point.

It is to him that is due the phe- omenal record of selling out in ad- ance of the opening of the season ot only every seat for every con- ert that the orchestra is to give in oston this year, but also the seats r concerts to be given elsewhere.

"Best by attest"
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

OCT 1 - 1925

Symphony Concerts Sold Out

That the advent of Serge Koussevitzky as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enabled that celebrated band to regain its former prestige is indicated by the fact that it is now impossible to obtain seats for any of the concerts in Boston or New York. The three series of concerts in Boston—twenty-four Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and five Monday evenings—as well as the two series in New York—five Thursday evenings and Saturday matinees—are now completely sold out.

Mr. Koussevitzky is now on his way from Europe and is expected to arrive at the beginning of this week to begin preparations for the forty-fifth season of the orchestra, which will open in Symphony Hall on October 9 and 10. Koussevitzky has had a striking and successful season in Europe, where he has repeated his series of Concerts Koussevitzky and his series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He is bringing a number of new scores of interest with him which will figure upon the programs of the coming season.

---

hu expec built the crow
a solid structure.
zky's reading was atic, well-considered fro
g to end, vital in all respect
oes one say "theatrical?" Well,

Death. With design and pre-
of transfigura-
se days upon the con known to sound lik
monplace—an ascenda
tune in C major plus an augumenting
chestra; or like an operatic less only platforms and angels.

121

Globe Sept 27 '25

MUSIC MUSIC

The Coming Symphony Season

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct 9 and 10 with the first concerts of the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series. There will be the usual 24 concerts in each series. Every seat for both series is sold for the season, except the 505 unreserved second balcony seats for Fridays. These will be sold at 50 cents, but only to people willing to wait in line for them for a period varying according to weather and program. You pay as you enter. There will be the usual five Monday evening concerts at popular prices. All seats are subscribed for this series also.

Serge Koussevitzky returned from a Summer in Europe last Monday, bringing with him new music to be heard this season, his second as conductor here. His success in pleasing last season's audiences is responsible for the unprecedented subscription list. The Friday concerts have for years always sold out in advance. But the Saturday and Monday concerts have never quite done so. As a box office attraction Mr Koussevitzky is superior to any of his predecessors.

No information except a list of names is forthcoming about the programs for the year. Rehearsals will begin Friday next. Koussevitzky told the interviewers on arrival that he had brought with him pieces by Hindemith, Roussel, Imbert, Respighi, Ravel and Steinbach, composed especially for the Boston Symphony. Ravel's name is dropped from this list in a subsequent official announcement from Symphony Hall.

Respighi, composer of "Fountains of Rome" and of a "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra previously heard at these concerts, is to visit America and presumably Boston this Winter. A new work of his "Pini di Roma" is announced to have its first American performance in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Toscanini in January next.

New Compositions

Paul Hindemith is a young German of the extreme modernist school. He has composed a string quartet in quarter tones, and other highly experimental works. None of his music has yet been heard in Boston. It is highly praised and also harshly condemned by European critics, but this is true of all modernist music that attracts any attention.

Maximilian Steinbach is a German known here only by his arrangements of 18th century music played last season under Koussevitzky. The "new work" by him will probably turn out to be an arrangement, but arrangers have been known to blossom forth as composers.

Roussel is a living Frenchman, whose symphony Koussevitzky introduced last season here. His "Festin de l'araignee" had been heard here previously, also his "La Ville Rose." His music has never seemed especially interesting or important to the Globe reviewer.

Imbert is another minor Parisian, who has written about music as well as composing it. Ravel is, of course, one of the most noted of living composers, whose music has often figured on Boston programs.

It is not probable that Mr Koussevitzky contemplates giving his highly conservative audiences here any undue amount of modern music. Last season he was reported to have said that on every program there would be at least one piece by a modern composer, and it was true enough that except for the all-Beethoven program given as an excuse for a subsequent all-Stravinsky program living composers were always represented. But there are living composers whom nobody would designate as "modern" in the sense of dangerous. We have several of them right here in Boston.

There will be a number of new players, probably about 20. It has been more than once reported from Paris this Summer that lamentations were arising there over the departure for Boston of a number of leading members of the several Paris orchestras. So it would seem that the French contingent in the cosmopolitan body of 100 players is to be strengthened. Before the war French players were numerous only among the wood wind. Many of the strings were Germans.

Sustaining Reputation

There are two serious difficulties in the way of engaging American players for the Boston Symphony. Except for violinists and cellists there is likely to be a scarcity of performers of American birth or citizenship who have sufficient ability. And since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been willing to accept the somewhat rigorous conditions imposed upon other American orchestras by the Musicians' Union, membership in it does not improve an American's chance of ever getting another job if he loses his place in the Boston Symphony.

For Mr Koussevitzky this will be a season hardly less difficult than last. He has made a great reputation here. Now he will have to live up to it, in a city proverbially coldly critical of all performers, before an audience nearly all of which remembers the genuis of Muck and some of which still remembers the genuis of Nikisch, both men of far more firmly established reputation here and in Europe than is Mr Koussevitzky as a conductor.

Even last season there were many murmurs at the unprecedented changes of program and the obvious lack of a completely planned repertory for the season. This year Mr Koussevitzky has no doubt planned his complete season in advance, but unless his programs are as wide ranging in content and as clever in assembling related or contrasted pieces as were those of Monteux and Muck his programs will still afford ground for the fault finders.

His personality, his brilliant displays of nervous energy, and his superb sense of rhythm have been Mr Koussevitzky's great assets. He is not a scholarly musician like Muck. Tradition he ignores and despises. He conducts as he feels at the moment. At best he is magnificent, even at worst interesting. His personality will dominate this season's Symphony concerts as it did last season's. Nor does it seem probable that many of his audience will weary of him.

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Globe —— Oct 10

Koussevitzky Excels in Brahm's First Symphony

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon. Every seat for every concert in Boston and New York has been sold by subscription for the season. Yet the trustees in a statement printed in yesterday's programs are appealing for funds to meet a deficit estimated as likely to be $91,000 on the current season. Last season the net loss, as now announced, was $41,813.

But it has been necessary since the close of last season to increase the aggregate salaries by about $50,000, state the trustees in their appeal. There are 14 new players this season, replacing 10 who have left for various reasons, including several principals, but one surmises that Mr Koussevitzky has received a large increase in salary. His compensation has never been made public. Dr Muck is said to have been paid $28,500 a year as conductor here.

There was cordial applause for Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra before the concert began. Each number on the program was applauded vigorously, especially Brahms' First Symphony and Debussy's "Afteroon of a Faun." Mr Laurent, first flute player, rose upon signal from Mr Koussevitzky at the end of Debussy's tone poem and was, of course, given a round of applause which his beautiful playing of the flute solo no doubt deserved.

The new first oboe, Fernand Gillet, formerly of the Lamoureux orchestra in Paris, was similarly honored at the conclusion of Ibert's "Ports of Call," in one section of which he had played a conspicuous solo in a way that proves him likely to be a worthy successor of Mr Longy. But one questions the expediency of permitting single players to acknowledge presonal applause. It is nearly always the orchestra as a unit, not any individual player, not even the conductor, which deserves applause.

Mr Koussevitzky began the concert with Beethoven's "Leonore No 2" overture. This is believed to be the first composed of the four written for his opera "Fidelio." The familiar "Leonore No. 3" is a rewritten version of this No. 2, which uses the same thematic material. "Leonore No. 2" like "Leonore No. 3" is really a tone poem, conveying the conflicting emotions of hero and heroine threatened with torture and death, then saved as by a miracle through the opportune arrival of an official bearing the King's pardon. The overture is the opera condensed and intensified.

Mr Koussevitzky failed to make the trumpet calls off stage, which here as in "Leonore No. 3" mark the arrival of the pardon, impressive. He did not seem to have studied the piece sufficiently to make anything out of it, though it is the sort of thing in which he might excel. The errors of tempi in particular were unfortunate. The tone of the orchestra in this number was harsh and scratchy, loud but not resonant.

The performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony, on the other hand, was remarkably effective, superbly vital in its rhythmic sweep and control, planned and carried out on broad lines. Mr Koussevitzky's conception of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is sharply different from that of other conductors. With him the faun disports himself in a languid perfumed atmosphere. He stresses the kinship of Debussy's music on its weakest side with that of Massenet. The music of Debussy is of too delicate a texture and too perfectly wrought and polished to stand the weight of stress and the turbid emotionalism Mr Koussevitzky puts upon it.

The one novelty on the program, "Ports of Call," a suite of three Mediterra… …es Ibert, is t… …de Ro…

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN
SEP 27 1925

Serge Kroussevitzky Wins New Honors

Serge Kousseevitzky arrived in America from Europe recently to begin preparations for the forty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open in Boston on Oct. 9. He brings with him a number of new scores of interest which are to be presented in the course of the season.

Serge Koussevitzky, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual series of five Brooklyn concerts again this season, beginning Nov. 27, has become in his first season at the head of this famous organization one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music.

In Europe likewise, Kousseevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors. Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances over the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French Government To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem

---

BOSTON TRAVELER

Oct 10th 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Photographed in New York Just After His Arrival from Europe. M. Koussevitzky Conducted Yesterday Afternoon the First Symphony Concert of the Season in Boston.

(Underwood & Underwood)

Transcript

, OCTOBER 10, 1925

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss and Berlioz

UPON Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of next week stand two pieces in which he should excel—the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Since a half-forgotten concert by Mr. Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra, Boston has known no richly romantic performance of the Fantastic Symphony. A Concerto Grosso (No. 8) for Strings and Organ, by Corelli, will begin the concerts.

Strauss and Brahms

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater in Cambridge on Thursday evening next Mr. Koussevitzky sets this program:

Overture to the Opera. "Figaro's Wedding" .... Mozart
Escales: Mediterranean Impressions (Rome to Palermo: Tunis to Nefta; (Palermo: Tunis, Valencia) .... Ibert
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" .... Strauss
Symphony in C minor, No. 1 .... Brahms

The Nonpareil

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Transcript —— Oct 5, 25

"Assisting Artists" at the Symphony Concerts — Departures from Custom — Koussevitzkian Idyls—A Tenor from Lithuania — Choral Plans — Return of Miss Hess

SO FAR as present arrangements go, there will be but six "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts. There is no singer among them; and all are men. Mr. Bauer, the pianist, will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first appearance with the Boston Orchestra, playing the same Concerto of Brahms in which he took the solo-part in 1900. Mr. Lhévinne, a rare visitor to Boston and a rarer guest at Symphony Hall, is the other pianist. The teachers bid their pupils take pattern from him as poised artist. Pianist, too, is Mr. Prokoviev; but he will appear primarily as composer in a concert largely devoted to his own music. In Mr. Szigeti, a new and noted violinist will be heard for the first times in Boston. He has also modernistic leanings; whereas Mr. Thibaud, the other violinist upon the list, is firm-set in the classics—preferably from the elder masters. The violoncellist is Mr. Casals. Recollection, deepened by his every return, will welcome him. Playing concertos, these virtuosi share naturally and fittingly in the courses of the orchestra and in the program of the particular concerts that bring them. Singers, on the contrary, were always intruders—with their arbitrary numbers, often ill attuned to the preceding, or the following, music. If they were notable artists, they disclosed themselves too briefly and narrowly. If they were

Continued on Following Page

Adv Oct 10 '25

PAGE EIGHT

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN HEARTY WELCOME BACK

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky was heartily welcomed back yesterday at the opening of the 45th Symphony season.

Serge Kouusevitzky

On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds himself in a heroic position.

Never before has the Symphony Orchestra started a season with all seats sold for every series in Boston and other cities. That is remarkable proof of his drawing power, his personal prestige and the enjoyment that music-lovers here and elsewhere have derived from his programs and performances.

This season is also noteworthy for the unusual number of new players in the orchestra. There are about a dozen new members in all, including soloists engaged to replace retired veterans and new additions that bring the total membership figure up to around 110, the largest on record.

NEW SOLOIST APPLAUDED

One of the new soloists, F. Gillet, who has taken Mr. Longy's place, made a brilliant debut yesterday playing the oboe obbligato part in the second movement of Ibert's "Ports of Call," an impressionistic tone picture of Mediterranean seaboard life. He was also soloist when the piece was first heard in Paris. Mr. Gillet's tone is colorful, haunting, and his technic is extraordinarily facile. An artist of the first rank, judging by his performance at this first matinee!

FRENCH NOVELTY

The Ibert piece, played for the first time in this country, was thoroughly enjoyed. The tone picture of Tunis-Nefta, with its Oriental atmosphere, and of Valencia, done in the Spanish rhapsody style, were particularly delightful; but there was a gorgeous display of rich orchestration in the Palermo sketch. It was like Palermo on a sunny, breezy day, gay and golden.

A dramatic performance of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture opens the concert, which will be repeatd tonight. Mr. Laurent, the flute soloist, was given special applause for his masterful playing in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." There was also an absorbingly fine performance of Brahms' first symphony.

American Oct 10 '25

FIRST RECITAL OF SYMPHONY A DELIGHT

By MOSES SMITH

The opening of the Symphony Orchestra season came off on schedule yesterday afternoon with very little of the sensational that some might have expected. Serge Koussevitzky was his well-known self on the conductor's stand, a little smoother, if anything, than last year. Coming on the stage at the start of the concert, and after every number, he was given long applause.

A good deal of interest was centered on the new players which Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to the Symphony Orchestra. As far as one could tell from one concert, there is little change in the tonal quality of the band. It will take more familiarity to gauge the change properly. It is perfectly evident, however, that the orchestra has an oboe soloist of unusual excellence in Mr. Gillet. He played with exquisite phrasing the long solo in the second movement of "Escales," a new piece by the Frenchman, Jacques Ibert, produced yesterday for the first time in America.

This work, which is in three movements, proved to be of real worth musically, and the long applause which greeted its performance was deserved. Mr. Koussevitzky had previously opened the concert with a very dramatic rendition of the second "Leonore" Overture, and had followed this with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun."

The second half of the program was devoted to Brahms First Symphony, the one in C minor. As was to be expected. Mr. Koussevitzky took his own way with this music, dramatizing everything so that none might miss the point.

It is to him that is due the phenomenal record of selling out in advance of the opening of the season not only every seat for every concert that the orchestra is to give in Boston this year, but also the seats for concerts to be given elsewhere.

"Best by attest"

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

OCT 1 - 1925

Symphony Concerts Sold Out

That the advent of Serge Koussevitzky as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enabled that celebrated band to regain its former prestige is indicated by the fact that it is now impossible to obtain seats for any of the concerts in Boston or New York. The three series of concerts in Boston—twenty-four Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and five Monday evenings—as well as the two series in New York—five Thursday evenings and Saturday matinees—are now completely sold out.

Mr. Koussevitzky is now on his way from Europe and is expected to arrive at the beginning of this week to begin preparations for the forty-fifth season of the orchestra, which will open in Symphony Hall on October 9 and 10. Koussevitzky has had a striking and successful season in Europe, where he has repeated his series of Concerts Koussevitzky and his series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He is bringing a number of new scores of interest with him which will figure upon the programs of the coming season.

---

e hu
e expec
ilt the crow
a solid structure.
zky's reading was i
atic, well-considered fro
g to end, vital in all respect
oes one say "theatrical?" Well,

Death. With
design and pre mn of transfigura
se days upon the co
en known to sound lik
on commonplace—an ascenda
tune in C major plus an augumenting
chestra; or like an operatic
less only platforms and angels.

Globe Sept 27 '25

MUSIC MUSIC

The Coming Symphony Season

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct 9 and 10 with the first concerts of the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series. There will be the usual 24 concerts in each series. Every seat for both series is sold for the season, except the 5C5 unreserved second balcony seats for Fridays. These will be sold at 50 cents, but only to people willing to wait in line for them for a period varying according to weather and program. You pay as you enter. There will be the usual five Monday evening concerts at popular prices. All seats are subscribed for this series also.

Serge Koussevitzky returned from a Summer in Europe last Monday, bringing with him new music to be heard this season, his second as conductor here. His success in pleasing last season's audiences is responsible for the unprecedented subscription list. The Friday concerts have for years always sold out in advance. But the Saturday and Monday concerts have never quite done so. As a box office attraction Mr Koussevitzky is superior to any of his predecessors.

No information except a list of names is forthcoming about the programs for the year. Rehearsals will begin Friday next. Koussevitzky told the interviewers on arrival that he had brought with him pieces by Hindemith, Roussel, Imbert, Respighi, Ravel and Steinbach, composed especially for the Boston Symphony. Ravel's name is dropped from this list in a subsequent official announcement from Symphony Hall.

Respighi, composer of "Fountains of Rome" and of a "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra previously heard at these concerts, is to visit America and presumably Boston this Winter. A new work of his "Pini di Roma" is announced to have its first American performance in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Toscanini in January next.

New Compositions

Paul Hindemith is a young German of the extreme modernist school. He has composed a string quartet in quarter tones, and other highly experimental works. None of his music has yet been heard in Boston. It is highly praised and also harshly condemned by European critics, but this is true of all modernist music that attracts any attention.

Maximilian Steinbach is a German known here only by his arrangements of 18th century music played last season under Koussevitzky. The "new work" by him will probably turn out to be an arrangement, but arrangers have been known to blossom forth as composers.

Roussel is a living Frenchman, whose symphony Koussevitzky introduced last season here. His "Festin de l'araignee" had been heard here previously, also his "La Ville Rose." His music has never seemed especially interesting or important to the Globe reviewer.

Imbert is another minor Parisian, who has written about music as well as composing it. Ravel is, of course, one of the most noted of living composers, whose music has often figured on Boston programs.

It is not probable that Mr Koussevitzky contemplates giving his highly conservative audiences here any undue amount of modern music. Last season he was reported to have said that on every program there would be at least one piece by a modern composer, and it was true enough that except for the all-Beethoven program given as an excuse for a subsequent all-Stravinsky program living composers were always represented. But there are living composers whom nobody would designate as "modern" in the sense of dangerous. We have several of them right here in Boston.

There will be a number of new players, probably about 20. It has been more than once reported from Paris this Summer that lamentations were arising there over the departure for Boston of a number of leading members of the several Paris orchestras. So it would seem that the French contingent in the cosmopolitan body of 100 players is to be strengthened. Before the war French players were numerous only among the wood wind. Many of the strings were Germans.

Sustaining Reputation

There are two serious difficulties in the way of engaging American players for the Boston Symphony. Except for violinists and cellists there is likely to be a scarcity of performers of American birth or citizenship who have sufficient ability. And since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been willing to accept the somewhat rigorous conditions imposed upon other American orchestras by the Musicians' Union, membership in it does not improve an American's chance of ever getting another job if he loses his place in the Boston Symphony.

For Mr Koussevitzky this will be a season hardly less difficult than last. He has made a great reputation here. Now he will have to live up to it, in a city proverbially coldly critical of all performers, before an audience nearly all of which remembers the genuis of Muck and some of which still remembers the genuis of Nikisch, both men of far more firmly established reputation here and in Europe than is Mr Koussevitzky as a conductor.

Even last season there were many murmurs at the unprecedented changes of program and the obvious lack of a completely planned repertory for the season. This year Mr Koussevitzky has no doubt planned his complete season in advance, but unless his programs are as wide ranging in content and as clever in assembling related or contrasted pieces as were those of Monteux and Muck his programs will still afford ground for the fault finders.

His personality, his brilliant displays of nervous energy, and his superb sense of rhythm have been Mr Koussevitzky's great assets. He is not a scholarly musician like Muck. Tradition he ignores and despises. He conducts as he feels at the moment. At best he is magnificent, even at worst interesting. His personality will dominate this season's Symphony concerts as it did last season's. Nor does it seem probable that many of his audience will weary of him.

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Globe —— Oct 10

Koussevitzky Excels in Brahm's First Symphony

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon. Every seat for every concert in Boston and New York has been sold by subscription for the season. Yet the trustees in a statement printed in yesterday's programs are appealing for funds to meet a deficit estimated as likely to be $91,000 on the current season. Last season the net loss, as now announced, was $41,813.

But it has been necessary since the close of last season to increase the aggregate salaries by about $50,000, state the trustees in their appeal. There are 14 new players this season, replacing 10 who have left for various reasons, including several principals, but one surmises that Mr Koussevitzky has received a large increase in salary. His compensation has never been made public. Dr Muck is said to have been paid $28,500 a year as conductor here.

There was cordial applause for Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra before the concert began. Each number on the program was applauded vigorously, especially Brahms' First Symphony and Debussy's "Afteroon of a Faun." Mr Laurent, first flute player, rose upon signal from Mr Koussevitzky at the end of Debussy's tone poem and was, of course, given a round of applause which his beautiful playing of the flute solo no doubt deserved.

The new first oboe, Fernand Gillet, formerly of the Lamoureux orchestra in Paris, was similarly honored at the conclusion of Ibert's "Ports of Call," in one section of which he had played a conspicuous solo in a way that proves him likely to be a worthy successor of Mr Longy. But one questions the expediency of permitting single players to acknowledge presonal applause. It is nearly always the orchestra as a unit, not any individual player, not even the conductor, which deserves applause.

Mr Koussevitzky began the concert with Beethoven's "Leonore No 2" overture. This is believed to be the first composed of the four written for his opera "Fidelio." The familiar "Leonore No. 3" is a rewritten version of this No. 2, which uses the same thematic material. "Leonore No. 2" like "Leonore No. 3" is really a tone poem, conveying the conflicting emotions of hero and heroine threatened with torture and death, then saved as by a miracle through the opportune arrival of an official bearing the King's pardon. The overture is the opera condensed and intensified.

Mr Koussevitzky failed to make the trumpet calls off stage, which here as in "Leonore No. 3" mark the arrival of the pardon, impressive. He did not seem to have studied the piece sufficiently to make anything out of it, though it is the sort of thing in which he might excel. The errors of tempi in particular were unfortunate. The tone of the orchestra in this number was harsh and scratchy, loud but not resonant.

The performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony, on the other hand, was remarkably effective, superbly vital in its rhythmic sweep and control, planned and carried out on broad lines. Mr Koussevitzky's conception of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is sharply different from that of other conductors. With him the faun disports himself in a languid perfumed atmosphere. He stresses the kinship of Debussy's music on its weakest side with that of Massenet. The music of Debussy is of too delicate a texture and too perfectly wrought and polished to stand the weight of stress and the turbid emotionalism Mr Koussevitzky puts upon it.

The one novelty on the program, "Ports of Call," a suite of three Mediterranean impressions, by Jacques Ibert, is the work of a winner of the Prix de Rome still in his early 30s, of the school of Ravel rather than that of Satie and the Six. The orchestration is highly ingenious. A pretty Oriental theme for oboe solo, depicting Tunis, and some vigorous bits of Spanish rhythms depicting Valencia made the music attractive. But the piece is not the work of a powerful creative imagination. M. Ibert, if one may judge from a single hearing of a single work, has everything a composer needs except genius. The performance was apparently faithful to the composer's intentions.

Again, as so often last season, one was left to contemplate half regretfully the inequalities, the undependable nature of Mr Koussevitzky's great talents as a conductor. No workaday mediocrity would have made such a botch of interpreting an unfamiliar Beethoven overture. No workaday mediocrity could ever give so thrilling a performance of Brahms. No workaday mediocrity would dare go so much his own way, and as it seemed yesterday a wrong way, in interpreting Debussy.

We are certain of an interesting Symphony season.—P. R.

---

in the Flatbush Congregational Church on Oct. 2. The bridesmaids will be Miss Hazel Van Ridley, Mrs. Pierrepont Adams, Miss Irene King and Miss Luella McCormick.

Wilson Hewitt will be best man for Mr. Anderson, and the ushers will be Elliott Anderson, William Colford Anderson, Richard W. Charlock, DeHart Bergen, Jr., and Robert Hall Bergen.

The ceremony will be fol

---

a concer

wrote special music. Proba conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem

BOSTON TRAVELER

Oct 10th 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Photographed in New York Just After His Arrival from Europe. M. Koussevitzky Conducted Yesterday Afternoon the First Symphony Concert of the Season in Boston.
(Underwood & Underwood)

Transcript

, OCTOBER 10, 1925

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss and Berlioz

UPON Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of next week stand two pieces in which he should excel—the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Since a half-forgotten concert by Mr. Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra, Boston has known no richly romantic performance of the Fantastic Symphony. A Concerto Grosso (No. 8) for Strings and Organ, by Corelli, will begin the concerts.

Strauss and Brahms

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater in Cambridge on Thursday evening next Mr. Koussevitzky sets this program:

Overture to the Opera. "Figaro's Wedding" .... Mozart
Escales: Mediterranean Impressions (Rome to Palermo: Tunis to Nefta: (Palermo: Tunis, Valencia) .... Ibert
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" .... Strauss
Symphony in C minor, No. 1 .... Brahms

The Nonpareil

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Transcript —— Oct 5, 25

"Assisting Artists" at the Symphony Concerts — Departures from Custom — Koussevitzkian Idyls—A Tenor from Lithuania — Choral Plans — Return of Miss Hess

SO FAR as present arrangements go, there will be but six "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts. There is no singer among them; and all are men. Mr. Bauer, the pianist, will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first appearance with the Boston Orchestra, playing the same Concerto of Brahms in which he took the solo-part in 1900. Mr. Lhévinne a rare visitor to Boston and a rarer guest at Symphony Hall, is the other pianist. The teachers bid their pupils take pattern from him as poised artist. Pianist, too is Mr. Prokoviev; but he will appear primarily as composer in a concert largely devoted to his own music. In Mr. Szigeti, a new and noted violinist will be heard for the first times in Boston. He has also modernistic leanings; whereas Mr. Thibaud, the other violinist upon the list, is firm-set in the classics—preferably from the elder masters. The violoncellist is Mr. Casals. Recollection, deepened by his every return, will welcome him. Playing concertos, these virtuosi share naturally and fittingly in the courses of the orchestra and in the program of the particular concerts that bring them. Singers, on the contrary, were always intruders—with their arbitrary numbers, often ill attuned to the preceding, or the following, music. If they were notable artists, they disclosed themselves too briefly and narrowly. If they were

Continued on Following Page

---

e hu
e expec
ilt the crow
a solid structure.
zky's reading was atic, well-considered fr
g to end, vital in all respect
oes one say "theatrical?" Well, usic itself is largely the

Adv Oct 10 '25

PAGE EIGHT

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN HEARTY WELCOME BACK

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky was heartily welcomed back yesterday at the opening of the 45th Symphony season.

Serge Kouusevitzky

On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds himself in a heroic position.

Never before has the Symphony Orchestra started a season with all seats sold for every series, in Boston and other cities. That is remarkable proof of his drawing power, his personal prestige and the enjoyment that music-lovers here and elsewhere have derived from his programs and performances.

This season is also noteworthy for the unusual number of new players in the orchestra. There are about a dozen new members in all, including soloists engaged to replace retired veterans and new additions that bring the total membership figure up to around 110, the largest on record.

NEW SOLOIST APPLAUDED

One of the new soloists, F. Gillet, who has taken Mr. Longy's place, made a brilliant debut yesterday, playing the oboe obbligato part in the second movement of Ibert's "Ports of Call," an impressionistic tone picture of Mediterranean seaboard life. He was also soloist when the piece was first heard in Paris. Mr. Gillet's tone is colorful, haunting, and his technic is extraordinarily facile. An artist of the first rank, judging by his performance at this first matinee!

FRENCH NOVELTY

The Ibert piece, played for the first time in this country, was thoroughly enjoyed. The tone picture of Tunis-Nefta, with its Oriental atmosphere, and of Valencia, done in the Spanish rhapsody style, were particularly delightful; but there was a gorgeous display of rich orchestration in the Palermo sketch. It was like Palermo on a sunny, breezy day, gay and golden.

A dramatic performance of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture opens the concert, which will be repeatd tonight. Mr. Laurent, the flute soloist, was given special applause for his masterful playing in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." There was also an absorbingly fine performance of Brahms' first symphony.

American Oct 10 '25

FIRST RECITAL OF SYMPHONY A DELIGHT

By MOSES SMITH

The opening of the Symphony Orchestra season came off on schedule yesterday afternoon with very little of the sensational that some might have expected. Serge Koussevitzky was his well-known self on the conductor's stand, a little smoother, if anything, than last year. Coming on the stage at the start of the concert, and after every number, he was given long applause.

A good deal of interest was centered on the new players which Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to the Symphony Orchestra. As far as one could tell from one concert, there is little change in the tonal quality of the band. It will take more familiarity to gauge the change properly. It is perfectly evident, however, that the orchestra has an oboe soloist of unusual excellence in Mr. Gillet. He played with exquisite phrasing the long solo in the second movement of "Escales," a new piece by the Frenchman, Jacques Ibert, produced yesterday for the first time in America.

This work, which is in three movements, proved to be of real worth musically, and the long applause which greeted its performance was deserved. Mr. Koussevitzky had previously opened the concert with a ery dramatic rendition of the sec-nd "Leonore" Overture, and had ollowed this with Debussy's "Preude to the Afternoon of a Faun."
The second half of the program vas devoted to Brahms First Symhony, the one in C minor. As was o be expected, Mr. Koussevitzky ook his own way with this music, ramatizing everything so that none night miss the point.
It is to him that is due the phe-omenal record of selling out in ad-ance of the opening of the season ot only every seat for every con-ert that the orchestra is to give in oston this year, but also the seats r concerts to be given elsewhere.

---

test" omeike
PRINGS
, NEW YORK
a 8860
NG FROM
G, PA.
S

-1925
rts Sold Out
Serge Kousse
he Boston Sym
s enabled that gain its former by the fact that to obtain seats in Boston or e series of conenty-four Friday
turday evenings,
nings—as well as
New York—five and Saturday completely sold is now on his nd is expected to ing of this week
ns for the forty-orchestra, which phony Hall on Oc-Koussevitzky has successful season has repeated his Koussevitzky and conductor of the Orchestra. He is of new scores of which will figure s of the coming

Death. Wit
design and pre-
mn of transfigura-
e days upon the con
en known to sound lik
mmonplace—an ascenda tune in C major plus an augmenting
chestra; or like an operatic
less only platforms and angels.

ROMANTIC MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe ——— Oct 17

"Fantastic Symphony" Proves Genius of Berlioz

Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon a performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" so vivid, so romantic as to prove beyond doubt the often doubted genius of a misunderstood composer. The concert, the second in the regular subscription series, began with a beautiful performance of a concerto for strings by Corelli, and included Mr Koussevitzky's original interpretation of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

All musicians admit that Berlioz had a gift for orchestration. Even as a quarter-educated boy he had a knack of finding the right instrumental blending to fit each and every passage of music he composed. In this respect he notoriusly excelled such great figures as Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. The symphony played yesterday offers abundant confirmation of this received opinion.

But every musician has an opinion of his own about the merits of Berlioz' music. Many agree with Cherubini, himself dubbed by Beethoven the greatest composer of the day, that Berlioz was a crack-brained amateur, without thorough musical training, with no gift of melody, and no knowledge of the fundamental principals of musical theory. Cherubini was asked why he did not attend the first performance of this symphony, if only as head of the Conservatoire in which Berlioz had been an indocile pupil. He answered in his bad Italianate French that he did not need to go to hear how not to compose.

This Fantastic Symphony springs certainly from vehement and personal emotion as those who have read the composer's memoirs will recall. What is more important it conveys these emotions to the listener who will read the descriptive program about the lover disappointed in love haunted under the influence of a drug by visions of the beloved.

The melody which stands for the beloved is an "idee fixe," an obsession recurring again and again through the five movements, often not as a repetition but by suggestion. It is hauntingly beautiful to at least one listener.

The stirring rhythms of the "March to the Scaffold" and the "Witches Sabbat" gave Mr Koussevitzky a chance to employ his greatest musical gift, his vivid and subtle rhythmic sense. Yet no sheer virtuosity of performance could have so impressed one with a symphony. No conductor can successfully read into a score depths and splendors unless the composer embodied in it denths and splendors.

The conductor's vision may not be that of the composer. It did not seem so yesterday with Strauss' familiar "Tod und Verklaerung." Mr Koussevitzky built up an imposing climax at the end, with irresistible rhythmic impulse. But there seemed hesitancy in his treatment of the earlier sections.

Strauss is free from what is probably the only grave defect of Berlioz as a composer: inability to weave many strands into his tonal web, inability to think and write polyphonically. The "Fantastic Symphony," a work essentially homophonic, one-voiced, sounded thin and a bit pallid in texture after the gorgeous musical tapestry of Strauss, in which every thread of theme or development, every inner voice, will bear the closest scrutiny of its workmanship.

Mr Kouusevitzky has shown too little ability to think polyphonically as conductor here. He treats everything as a single line of melody and rhythm, emphasizing only occasional salient but isolated bits of acompaniment, unless the nature of the music sternly opposes him.

With Corelli yesterday, however, he caught the grave nobility of the solemn chords in the introduction and the stately melancholy sweep of the allegros to perfection.

Throughout the concert one wondered whether the latest revised seating of the orchestra had not distorted and roughened its tone.

P. R.

SYMPHONY HONORS KRAFFT'S MEMORY

Conductor Pays Tribute to Late Member

Traveler ——— Oct 8, '25

Before starting the final rehearsal for the opening of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall today paid tribute to the memory of William W. Krafft, a member of the first violin section, who died in August.

The members stood up as Conductor Koussevitzky addressed them. He spoke of their late colleague as a good man, a fine musician, and a great artist; beloved by his fellow-members in the orchestra, and an example and influence both in conduct and in the truly exceptional quality of his musicianship.

The orchestra then played the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Krafft had been a member of the orchestra for 25 years.

"Best by attest"

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.

POST

OCT 3 - 1925

November 4.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the most highly developed bodies of players in the world, will play under the direction of its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Prophet"

SYMPHONY VIVIFIES STRAUSS

Post ——— Oct 17 '25

"Death and Transfiguration" Given Historic Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music of a romantic, dramatic cast, music of that type in which Mr. Koussevitsky indubitably excels, made the bulk of yesterday's Symphony concert, and throughout the afternoon the orchestral performance was eloquent to a degree.

For stately beginning came a Concerto Grosso for strings and organ by Corelli, hitherto unplayed at the Symphony concerts, and upon it followed first Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," then the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, both pieces to tempt the conductor's most exuberant powers.

STRAUSS' INTENTION BARED

The most theatrical as well as the least characteristic of the tone-poems of Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" needs in these days a deal of conducting if it is wholly to escape the obviousness, even the banality, into which here and there it may so easily fall. And from such fate Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday successfully saved it, though in one or two instances his means to that end might by some be deemed extravagant.

Thus the introduction went with unprecedented slowness; yet thereby it gained needed solemnity, while the lyric passages, expressively sung by the oboe of Mr. Gillet and the violin of Mr. Burgin, had true poignancy. Again a slight dragging of the pace worked to the clear benefit of that section of the tone-poem in which the dying man recalls his childhood, while, per contra, the stormier sections of the music were played with all the necessary fury. And for the first time in many a day the final climax, slowly and relentlessly upbuilded, sounded in Symphony Hall with all the power and all the tonal splendor of Strauss' intention.

Outburst of Enthusiasm

That so masterful a performance should have aroused an outburst of enthusiasm was but natural; it seemed, indeed, that more spontaneous and more fervent were the plaudits than at any time in the concert of the preceding Friday.

But was it not an error in programme-making to follow Strauss' effulgent peroration with the Symphony of Berlioz? Surely there, in the eyes of the audience, had come the climax

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

EAGLE

OCT 4 1925

Serge Koussevitzky now begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under his direction the orchestra has retained its unique place in the symphonic field. For its 75 concerts in Boston, as well as for its regular season in New York, every seat has been subscribed for the season. The success enjoyed by this orchestra in Brooklyn during past seasons indicates that its annual five concerts at the Academy will also be oversubscribed. The dates for these are Friday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 12 and April 9.

"Best by attest"

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES

OCT 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS YEAR'S WORK

BOSTON, Oct. 3—Larger than ever before, the Boston Symphony orchestra assembled yesterday for the first rehearsal preparatory to the opening night, next Friday. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, made a speech of welcome to the orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

The conductor then introduced 14 new members, including four principals: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone.

It was announced that no more seats are to be had, since all the concert series are fully subscribed to for the season.

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURG, PA.

Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 3 1925

ORCHESTRAS ARE BOOKED

Philadelphia and Boston Symphonies Among Features for New Season.

The symphony orchestra series this season brings the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski, conductor. This orchestra will be here after an absence of three seasons on Monday night, February 22. The other orchestras in this series will all give both a night and an afternoon concert, and the season will open with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under their leader, Serge Koussevitzky. His Pittsburgh concerts will be given at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7.

Serge Koussevitzky.

Following this orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor, will give a pair of concerts on November 20 and 21, in conjunction with the Pittsburgh Mendelssohn Choir. On these occasions an entire Brahms program will be given, with the local choir singing the Requiem. The Cleveland Orchestra will give a second pair on January 22 and 23, with Josef Lhevinne, piano soloist.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

OLD RELIABLE

Henry Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

106 SEVENTH AVE., N. Y.

BE SURE ITS HENRY

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

N Y HERALD

OCT 4 1925

League of Composers Opens Season Oct. 25

Koussevitzky and Mengelberg Will Appear Later in Town Hall

The League of Composers will open its third season with a program of new chamber music at the Anderson Galleries on Sunday afternoon, October 25. League members will be invited. The program features works from the festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, held last month in Venice.

The league announces three evening concerts in Town Hall, devoted to music for chamber orchestra, each under a noted conductor. On Saturday, November 28, Serge Koussevitzky, appearing by special permission of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees, will conduct his first American performance outside of that orchestra's concerts, with a program of new American and European works.

In the second Tuesday

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.

HERALD

OCT 4 - 1925

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned from a summer abroad for the opening of the forty-fifth season of the orchestra in Boston, next Friday, October 9. Koussevitzky has brought with him a number of new scores which are to be presented by the Boston Symphony during the coming season including its appearance here in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists course at Poli's on February 2. next

---

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.

STAR

OCT 4 - 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned from a Summer abroad for the opening of the forty-fifth season of the orchestra, in Boston next Friday. Koussevitzky has brought with him a number of new scores which are to be presented by the Boston Symphony during the coming season, including its appearance here, February 2.

ROMANTIC MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Oct 17

"Fantastic Symphony" Proves Genius of Berlioz

Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon a performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" so vivid, so romantic as to prove beyond doubt the often doubted genius of a misunderstood composer. The concert, the second in the regular subscription series, began with a beautiful performance of a concerto for strings by Corelli, and included Mr Koussevitzky's original interpretation of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

All musicians admit that Berlioz had a gift for orchestration. Even as a quarter-educated boy he had a knack of finding the right instrumental blending to fit each and every passage of music he composed. In this respect he notoriusly excelled such great figures as Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. The symphony played yesterday offers abundant confirmation of this received opinion.

But every musician has an opinion of his own about the merits of Berlioz' music. Many agree with Cherubini, himself dubbed by Beethoven the greatest composer of the day, that Berlioz was a crack-brained amateur, without thorough musical training, with no gift of melody, and no knowledge of the fundamental principals of musical theory. Cherubini was asked why he did not attend the first performance of this symphony, if only as head of the Conservatoire in which Berlioz had been an indocile pupil. He answered in his bad Italianate French that he did not need to go to hear how not to compose.

This Fantastic Symphony springs certainly from vehement and personal emotion as those who have read the composer's memoirs will recall. What is more important it conveys these emotions to the listener who will read the descriptive program about the lover disappointed in love haunted under the influence of a drug by visions of the beloved.

The melody which stands for the beloved is an "idee fixe," an obsession recurring again and again through the five movements, often not as a repetition but by suggestion. It is hauntingly beautiful to at least one listener.

The stirring rhythms of the "March to the Scaffold" and the "Witches Sabbat" gave Mr Koussevitzky a chance to employ his greatest musical gift, his vivid and subtle rhythmic sense. Yet no sheer virtuosity of performance could have so impressed one with a symphony. No conductor can successfully read into a score depths and splendors unless the composer embodied in it depths and splendors.

The conductor's vision may not be that of the composer. It did not seem so yesterday with Strauss' familiar "Tod und Verklaerung." Mr Koussevitzky built up an imposing climax at the end, with irresistible rhythmic impulse. But there seemed hesitancy in his treatment of the earlier sections.

Strauss is free from what is probably the only grave defect of Berlioz as a composer: inability to weave many strands into his tonal web, inability to think and write polyphonically. The "Fantastic Symphony," a work essentially homophonic, one-voiced, sounded thin and a bit pallid in texture after the gorgeous musical tapestry of Strauss, in which every thread of theme or development, every inner voice, will bear the closest scrutiny of its workmanship.

Mr Kouusevitzky has shown too little ability to think polyphonically as conductor here. He treats everything as a single line of melody and rhythm, emphasizing only occasional salient but isolated bits of acompaniment, unless the nature of the music sternly opposes him.

With Corelli yesterday, however, he caught the grave nobility of the solemn chords in the introduction and the stately melancholy sweep of the allegros to perfection.

Throughout the concert one wondered whether the latest revised seating of the orchestra had not distorted and roughened its tone.

P. R.

SYMPHONY VIVIFIES STRAUSS

Post — Oct 17 '25

"Death and Transfiguration" Given Historic Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music of a romantic, dramatic cast, music of that type in which Mr. Koussevitsky indubitably excels, made the bulk of yesterday's Symphony concert, and throughout the afternoon the orchestral performance was eloquent to a degree.

For stately beginning came a Concerto Grosso for strings and organ by Corelli, hitherto unplayed at the Symphony concerts, and upon it followed first Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," then the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, both pieces to tempt the conductor's most exuberant powers.

STRAUSS' INTENTION BARED

The most theatrical as well as the least characteristic of the tone-poems of Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" needs in these days a deal of conducting if it is wholly to escape the obviousness, even the banality, into which here and there it may so easily fall. And from such fate Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday successfully saved it, though in one or two instances his means to that end might by some be deemed extravagant.

Thus the introduction went with unprecedented slowness; yet thereby it gained needed solemnity, while the lyric passages, expressively sung by the oboe of Mr. Gillet and the violin of Mr. Burgin, had true poignancy. Again a slight dragging of the pace worked to the clear benefit of that section of the tone-poem in which the dying man recalls his childhood, while, per contra, the stormier sections of the music were played with all the necessary fury. And for the first time in many a day the final climax, slowly and relentlessly upbuilded, sounded in Symphony Hall with all the power and all the tonal splendor of Strauss' intention.

Outburst of Enthusiasm

That so masterful a performance should have aroused an outburst of enthusiasm was but natural; it seemed, indeed, that more spontaneous and more fervent were the plaudits than at any time in the concert of the preceding Friday.

But was it not an error in programme-making to follow Strauss' effulgent peroration with the Symphony of Berlioz? Surely there, in the eyes of the audience, had come the climax

---

SYMPHONY HONORS KRAFFT'S MEMORY

Conductor Pays Tribute to Late Member

Traveler — Oct 8, '25

Before starting the final rehearsal for the opening of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall today paid tribute to the memory of William W. Krafft, a member of the first violin section, who died in August.

The members stood up as Conductor Koussevitzky addressed them. He spoke of their late colleague as a good man, a fine musician, and a great artist; beloved by his fellow-members in the orchestra, and an example and influence both in conduct and in the truly exceptional quality of his musicianship.

The orchestra then played the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Krafft had been a member of the orchestra for 25 years.

"Best by attest"

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

[illegible]

November 4.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the ~~most highly~~ developed bodies of players in the world, will play under the direction of its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Prophet"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 4 1925

Serge Koussevitzky now begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under his direction the orchestra has retained its unique place in the symphonic field. For its 75 concerts in Boston, as well as for its regular season in New York, every seat has been subscribed for the season. The success enjoyed by this orchestra in Brooklyn during past seasons indicates that its annual five concerts at the Academy will also be oversubscribed. The dates for these are Friday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 12 and April 9.

"Best by attest"

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES

OCT 3 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS YEAR'S WORK

BOSTON, Oct. 3—Larger than ever before, the Boston Symphony orchestra assembled yesterday for the first rehearsal preparatory to the opening night, next Friday. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, made a speech of welcome to the orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

The conductor then introduced 14 new members, including four principals: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone.

It was announced that no more seats are to be had, since all the concert series are fully subscribed to for the season.

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 3 1925

ORCHESTRAS ARE BOOKED

Philadelphia and Boston Symphonies Among Features for New Season.

The symphony orchestra series this season brings the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski, conductor. This orchestra will be here after an absence of three seasons on Monday night, February 22. The other orchestras in this series will all give both a night and an afternoon concert, and the season will open with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under their leader, Serge Koussevitzky. His Pittsburgh concerts will be given at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7.

Serge Koussevitzky.

Following this orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor, will give a pair of concerts on November 20 and 21, in conjunction with the Pittsburgh Mendelssohn Choir. On these occasions an entire Brahms program will be given, with the local choir singing the Requiem. The Cleveland Orchestra will give a second pair on January 22 and 23, with Josef Lhevinne, piano soloist.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

OLD RELIABLE
Henry Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
106 SEVENTH AVE., N. Y.
BE SURE ITS HENRY
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HERALD

OCT 4 19

League of Composers Opens Season Oct. 25

Koussevitzky and Mengelberg Will Appear Later in Town Hall

The League of Composers will open its third season with a program of new chamber music at the Anderson Galleries on Sunday afternoon, October 25. League members will be invited. The program features works from the festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, held last month in Venice.

The league announces three evening concerts in Town Hall, devoted to music for chamber orchestra, each under a noted conductor. On Saturday, November 28, Serge Koussevitzky, appearing by special permission of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees, will conduct his first American performance outside of that orchestra's concerts, with a program of new American and European works.

In the second Tuesday

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 4 1925

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned from a summer abroad for the opening of the forty-fifth season of the orchestra in Boston, next Friday, October 9. Koussevitzky has brought with him a number of new scores which are to be presented by the Boston Symphony during the coming season including its appearance here in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists course at Poli's on February 2, next.

"Best by attest"

HENRY ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

OCT 4 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned from a Summer abroad for the opening of the forty-fifth season of the orchestra, in Boston next Friday. Koussevitzky has brought with him a number of new scores which are to be presented by the Boston Symphony during the coming season, including its appearance here, February 2.

HERALD Oct 10' 25

45TH SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS

Hall Filled at First Concert —Every Number Enthusiastically Received

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 45th season of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 2; Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Ibert, "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call")—first time in America; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor.

The expectant audience—it filled completely the hall—came in enthusiastic mood. There was curiosity to know how Mr. Koussevitzky would treat the first symphony of our old friend, Johannes Brahms; curiosity to see the new players; eagerness to hear again the superb orchestra. Perhaps there were some who hoped to be shocked by the music of Jacques Ibert, for is he not a Parisian and probably one of the ultra-modern "anarchists" in music? If there were persons thus disposed, they were disappointed, for Mr. Ibert, whatever one may think of "Ports of Call," is not flagrantly vicious in the use of dissonances, and his "Ports of Call" is not without form.

Ibert is now in his 36th year. He is a prix de Rome man whose list of works is of some importance. Judged by the titles, he is of a literary, poetic turn of mind. If he has read the prose of Jules Laforgue, he is also acquainted with Oscar Wilde, for he has written a symphonic poem, "The Ballad of Reading Gaol," which has been performed in London as well as in Paris.

The score of "Ports of Call" bears no titles to the three movements, but when they were first played in Paris, it was said that the music was suggested in turn by impressions of Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia, so this music should have a geographical and ethnological interest.

"Palermo." What demon of perversity reminded us while the music was playing that the first barber to enter Italy came out of Sicily in the 454th year after the foundation of Rome; that he was brought in by P. Ticinius Mena; that the first Roman to be shaved every day was Scipio Africanus. There was no thought of Theocritus; no memory of the Sicilian Vespers; only this miserable fact that before the advent of the Sicilian barbers, the Romans did not have their hair cut, and, unfortunately, Iberts' music for Palermo did not hold our attention. A port-of-call is a port where vessels revictual or take in coal. A certain boisterous section of the movement led one to believe that the sailors had at least an hour of shore leave.

But "Tunis-Nefta" was worth hearing and not only by reason of the musical and poetic playing of the long and charming melodic sentence by Mr. Gillett, the new first oboist, whose reputation as an accomplished artist had preceded him. Discreetly and effectively accompanied, this theme has Oriental languor. In this movement rhythm and color disclose a composer of imagination.

Given the title "Valencia," the hearer naturally expects Spanish rhythm and what is loosely called national color, although many years ago the Parisian critic, Johannes Weber, tried to prove that there is no such thing as "color" peculiar to a nation's music. There is the requisite rhythmic excitement in "Valencia," but other Frenchmen have been far more successful in putting musical Spain before one. Richard Ford, visiting Valencia in the Forties, characterized the town and province as being of "unsubstantial disrepute." The years have passed; perhaps the music of Ibert is sufficiently representative of

To us the feature of the concert was the performance of Beethoven's overture which had not been played at a Symphony concert since 1904; the performance and the music itself. It is not necessary to compare the overture with the more famous No. 3, though it is true that the trumpet passage in the latter is more dramatic. Mr. Koussevitzky gave a thrilling reading, not bound by tradition—"traditions" are the ruin of many performances—not extravagant, not theatrical, but eloquent in dramatic intensity. And Mr. Koussevitzky knows the dramatic value of pauses, to confirm a previous effect, to awaken anticipation of mighty effects to come.

One might say that a little faster tempo would have given still greater charm to the opening measures of Debussy's "Prelude," but the beauty of Mr. Laurent's tone and phrasing was the more apparent. Mr. Koussevitzky interprets music as he feels it. He is a man of marked emotional nature, whose individual conception of a composition may differ from that of another conductor, but it is his own. The composer as a rule gains thereby.

So one might, remembering preceding performances of Brahm's symphony, take exception to this or that ruling of Mr. Koussevitzky. We are all, like Charles Lamb, men of imperfect sympathies. To us this first symphony of Brahms has not the ingratiating qualities of the three that followed. Like the celebrated interpretation of Hamlet, discussed in "Great Expectations" it is, no doubt, "massive and concrete"; it is also granitic. There are fine moments, as the cantilena for violins towards the end of the first movement: as the introduction to the finale. The symphony as a whole leaves us cold. The faster a conductor leads the movements, the more grateful to us is his reading.

The audience was enthusiastic throughout. There was warm applause for Mr. Gillet when Mr. Koussevitzky asked him to rise at the end of "Ports-of-Call."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week comprises Corelli's Concerto Grosso ("Christmas" Concerto)—first time at these concerts: Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz.

Old 'Left Tackle' Wilbur to See Princeton Game

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9—Curtis D. Wilbur, secretary of the navy, was a midshipman at the Annapolis Naval Academy in 1887, and that year played left tackle on the academy football eleven. One of the big games of the year was against Princeton, which beat Annapolis by a score of 16 to 5. Secretary Wilbur announced today that he would attend the Navy-Princeton game a week from Saturday, in the hope that on this occasion Annapolis would defeat the old-time opponents of the midshipmen.

The Ninth Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in aid of its pension fund, presenting Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Ninth Symphony. It was assisted in the symphony by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass.

The performance of the symphony was magnificent. Everybody concerned seemed inspired by this great music. Mr. Koussevitzky was in his most eloquent and poetic mood, and players, chorus and soloists alike clearly caught fire from him. Building on the foundation laid two years ago by Mr. Monteux and Dr. Davison, he reared a resplendent edifice of sound. G. Wallace Woodworth, actinug conductor of the choruses, and Mrs. Robert Winternitz, his assistant, share the honors.

An innovation that added much to the effectiveness of the final movement was the placing of the quartet behind the orchestra, in the midst of the chorus. The soloists have really a minor, though an important, rôle to play. Their withdrawal from the edge of the crowded platform enhanced the beauty of the solo voices and greatly improved the ensemble by correcting a disproportionate visual and tonal emphasis.

Detailed criticism of such a superb performance seems out of place. It is sufficient to say that the first movement was thrilling, the Scherzo delightful, the Adagio charming; while the Finale renewed these pleasures and added a stirring expression of noble aspiration.

The overture was admirably played. The audience, which overflowed along the walls, was warmly appreciative. The concert will be repeated this evening. L. A. S.

Monitor Nov 23' 25

9TH SYMPHONY FOR PENSION FUND

Oct 18 Herald

A large part of the fame of Serge Koussevitzky in Europe before his coming to America rested on his remarkable performances of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. He will now perform the symphony at the coming annual autumn concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. The concert will be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22. The full orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists soon to be announced.

---

be given.

Prov. Journal · Nov 22 '25

Koussevitsky Expected to Renew Contract

An announcement that Serge Koussevitzky probably would not continue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the expiration of his present contract in the spring of 1927, made recently in a music magazine, is utterly without foundation, W. H. Brennan, the manager, declared while in this city Tuesday evening for the first concert of the local series by the orchestra.

The article stated that Koussevitzky "is said to balk at so heavy a schedule as that which confronts him." The conductor, according to Mr. Brennan, has never intimated to the management that his schedule was overcrowded, and indeed he is given an important part in deciding how many concerts shall be played. Because of the increasing popularity of the orchestra and the demand for concerts in the larger cities, many smaller places have already been eliminated from the schedule, Providence now being one of the few cities in New England, outside of Greater Boston, that the organization continues to visit regularly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's present contract calls for a three year engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and according to Mr. Brennan, it is not customary to negotiate for the renewal of a contract until a year before it expires. While the conductor is strongly attached to Paris, he has found great artistic pleasure in conducting in this country, Mr. Brennan says, and it is expected that he will continue at the head of the orchestra at least for another three-year period after 1927. The orchestra schedule this season includes 112 concerts.

2D IN SYMPHONY CONCERT SERIES

Herald —— Oct 17 '25

Feature of Koussevitzky's Program, Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration'

PIECES BY CORELLI AND BERLIOZ ALSO

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Corelli, Concerto Grosso, No. 8 ("Christmas" Concerto); Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration"; Berlioz, "Fantastic" Symphony.

The concerto was performed for the first time by this orchestra. Mr. Martino brought out Aleco Toni's arrangement, the one used yesterday, at one of his 18th century concerts at the St. James Theatre early last year. The music is interesting in more ways than one. In a slow movement there is the suggestion of the angelic host, passages that Handel may have remembered in writing the "Messiah." Handel had met Corelli at Rome, thought highly of him, and knew his music. It was the habit of Handel to help himself in a lordly manner to whatever in music seemed good to him. Not that in this case there was deliberate plagiarism of measures, but the scheme and the spirit are much the same, though Corelli, fine person that he was, could not reach the sublime height that Handel attained in his concertos, on a few transitional measures of apparently great simplicity, nor has any one approached during the years Handel in this respect. Corelli's music also served to display the beautiful sonority of the great string band.

Mr. Cecil Gray in his recent volume of destructive criticism says of "Death and Transfiguration" that the first section is admirable. "It is full of the very stench of death and the menace of approaching dissolution," while the transfiguration section is "cold, sophisticated, effusive, shameless, reminding one irresistibly of the cafe in Montmartre representing Heaven, in which one is served by waiters dressed as angels in white robes and holding harps." Mr. Gray has a right to his opinion, and he may be permitted his little joke, though his comparison seems rather far-fetched.

To me the death section is most imaginative in its gruesome realism (realism in music as in the drama falls flat and is commonplace unless it is quickened by imagination.)

For this section might bear as a motto the speech of Brachiano in Webster's "White Devil":

> "On pain of death, let no man name > death to me:
> It is a word infinitely terrible."

If the Transfiguration section is "diffuse," it might be said that Strauss's man is a long time dying, and unlike Charles the Second does not have the grace to apologize for the delay. They say that Ritter wrote his explanatory poem after he heard the music. Did he consult Strauss? To some this poem does not in any way enlarge the power of the music. It is a good thing once in a while to allow a hearer to find out what he can in musical contents, especially as no two persons hear music with the same ears or dilate with exactly the same emotion.

As for the Transfiguration section which Mr. Gray finds "cold," "sophisticated"—why, "shameless"?—the effect depends largely on the manner in which it is interpreted. Excellent conductors have here come to grief. They have anticipated the great climax, have hurried in their impatience for the expected applause, have not built the crowning measures upon a solid structure.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was intensely dramatic, well-considered from beginning to end, vital in all respects. Does one say "theatrical?" Well, the music itself is largely theatrical tragedy of "Hamlet" or "Othello" is theatrical in the better meaning of the word. The death of the humblest man or woman is an episode in the great theatre of the world. Mr. Koussevitzky made all details an inevitable part of the whole. At the beginning there was shuddering, sinister anticipation of what was to come. There was the passionate, spasmodic revolt. If there was undue sentiment in the recollections and the bitter regrets, the fault was with Strauss, not Mr. Koussevitzky, for Richard in his choice of thematic material is often amazingly tasteless, incline dtowards mush. The great feature of the interpretation was the magnificent preparation of the overwhelming climax with the long preceding crescendo. We do not recall so remarkable example of interpretative skill.

The "Fantastic" symphony was finely and sympathetically read, but the concert was a long one, so that many left before the end; some thus missed the astounding "March to the Scaffold," one of the most wildly impressive movements in musical literature. As for the Witches' Sabbath, it is the one weak spot in the symphony. Here Berlioz was no more successful than Boito with his witch music in "Mefistofele" or Moussorgsky in his "Night on Bald Mountain." As fo rthe Ball Scene, it should be remembered that the dance music in the Paris of the '20's and '30's of the 19th century was chiefly rhythm and glitter; there was little or no sensuousness. And so it was with the ballets at the opera houses: witness "Giselle," with its singularly vapid measures, a ballet applauded to the echo by those who first saw it in 1841 and in after years. In the "Scene in the Meadow" Mr. Speyer played the English horn with poetic feeling.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Liadov, "From the Apocalypse," symphonic picture (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky, "Pathetic Symphony"; Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree Fantasque; Debussy, First Rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra (Mr. Allegra, clarinetist); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Transcript Oct 5 '25

Continued from Preceding Page

mediocrities, they were bores. At best and at worst, they remained excrescences upon a symphony concert. There should be no regrets at their absence through the coming season. For some also it will be a pleasure to see only men assembled. After all, they accord better with the background of Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening. H. T. P.

Arms and The Man

Two Parisian composers have lately sketched in words Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. In Musique et Théater, a new magazine, Monsieur Albert Roussel wrote:

> With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra — unloosing sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said of the Magyar leader: "He plays on the orchestra."
>
> If Mr. Koussevitzky's gestures are admirable in clarity and persuasion, they never involve exaggeration or superfluity. Every motion has a definite intention and attains a definite goal. His position changes little; it is by means of his arms and hands, and by his magnetic glance that he obtains the most surprising effects. At times, by a total cessation of movement, he underlines and makes more vivid the mechanical and regular rhythm of a Scherzo. Motionless, his hands at his sides, in an attitude of meditative composure, he seems to listen to the beating pulse of the orchestra.

And in "L' Eclair," the daily newspaper, Monsieur Roland-Manuel lets himself go in this fashion:

> Mr. Koussevitzky's left arm is magic; often stretched towards a certain instrumental group, taut, the fingers clenched, in a movement of frenetic appeal. Yet at times he can also forget and efface hmiself, with a graceful relaxation. His right arm carries a wand of enchantment, diversely undulating by which the very essence of the music is revealed.

From Lithuania

harm, the delicacy, the dramatic culmination of the latter, all mark J. Gruodis a composer by the grace of God." And as composer and singer were one, Mr. Bobrovitch gave forth his songs. Special comment is also deserved for the exquisite artistry shown in singing of Petrauskas's "Softly, Softly Niemen Pivor Flows." With beautiful pianissimos, gradual ascents, gorgeous warmths did he clothe this song. A tower of strength, a mountain-top of grandeur and dignity was his version of Rachmaninov's "I Am No Prophet." Tosti's "April"—a good song by the way—received gorgeously spirited treatment. The other song of Tosti, "Vorrei Morrire" smacked more of the clichés one usually associates with this composer. Chopin's "La Tristesse" proved to be an arrangement of the lyric parts of the Etude in E major. The various opera airs rose somewhat though not greatly above the conventional. The chromaticisms in the air from Chaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin" and in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Hymn to the Sun" from "The Golden [illegible] always absolutely in tune. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

There will be no performance this season of Monsieur Honegger's "King David" under the auspices of the Boston Orchestra. With Dr. Davison on leave in Europe, the essential chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe is unobtainable. In his absence, the only choral prospect at Symphony Hall is a concert for the Pension Fund at which Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct through Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. His version is his own.

Late in the winter or early in the spring Miss Hess, the admired pianist, will play once or twice in Boston. She will [illegible] again for two years since she purposes in the intervening time to renew her reputation in Europe.

The Westminster Choir from Dayton—of Ohio, not Tennessee—is about to make a tour of Eastern cities. Sixty "working people" compose it, giving their time voluntarily to practice in church-music. It will be heard at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Nov. 11.

SIGNS, WONDERS, STRAUSS, BRAHMS, MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

CAMBRIDGE HEARS A MEMORABL CONCERT

"Death and Transfiguration" and the Symphony in C Minor by the Conductor Raised Full and High—Mr. Levine Whets Interest with a Program—Beethoven's Choral Symphony Again Impending—To Introduce a Clarinetist

WHEN we listeners, in Sanders Theater at Cambridge yesterday, had welcomed Mr. Koussevitzky to a r twined music stand and to a series of concerts; when we had heard him leading the orchestra with eighteenth-century gayety and eighteenth-century precision through Mozart's Overture to "Figaro's Wedding"; when, finally, we had observed him doing what he might with the neatly modelled surfaces and meaningless tumults of Monsieur Ibert's "Escales"—then he and we passed to the events of the evening; performances of Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration" and of Brahms's Symphony in C minor that filled the reverberant room with the substance and the spirit, the illusion and possession, of either music. Through thirty years, "Tod und Verklärung" has been repertory-piece at the Symphony Concerts. Within that time, not a conductor, worth his salt, has overlooked it. For many a reason it is tempting; not least, in these immediate days, because it has aged above Strauss's other tone-poems; seems rather a culmination of the Lisztian species than a step in the illustrious line stretching from "Don Juan" and the "Eulenspiegel" to "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica." As for the Symphony of Brahms, memories of last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall prepared the way for a third fulfillment.

The insight that is imagination, the mastery that is proclamation, the justice that is power measured and controlled, informed Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the tone-poem. The sapping years were stayed; the crust of formula fell away; a music, "still living," resumed its sway. With a far-seeing sense of design, the conductor began low-pitched. Wan and pallid was the tone-color upon the desolate room of the dying. Sounded upon Mr. Gillet's oboe, the melody of youth remembered was poignant anew. It was the bitterness and the futility of the struggle with Death, not the sound and slither and fury that Mr. Koussevitzky stressed. Ominously, not savagely, dissolution knocked and menaced. Repeated and amplified, the song of youth wet listening eyes; superb was the stride of the measures that summon the joy of living and doing, of faith fulfilled in conflict.

Composer and conductor set the Death motiv to burrowing; the vision of transfiguration struggled into tonal speech. Not Lisztian melodrama, but life rent and quenched was the final deed of Death. With all Strauss's clearness of design and precision of purpose the hymn of transfiguration depends in these days upon the conductor. It has been known to sound like a welter of commonplace—an ascending tune in C major plus an augmenting orchestra; or like an operatic [illegible] less only platforms and an ap [illegible] vitzky infused the music with the elegiac note. In subdued radiance it mourned a hero. "Death and Transfiguration" stood saved from itself. If telepathy may reach to Vienna, Strauss surely returned thanks.

Of another mettle, but with conductor and orchestra undiminished, was the performance of Brahms's Symphony. The streaming strings, the reiterated drum-beats seemed the preface and herald of greatness. The choirs phrased tense, sharp; the rhythmic accents beat high; like a sea of power tossed measures; like a wave up-flung returned and re-entered the dominant theme. It was Brahms released from the middle-grayness that was once the chilly tradition; Brahms still terse and austere, but Brahms also epic. There is might in him, given the conductor to set him free. The long-breathed melody of the slow movement was a marvel of instrumental phrasing, of ascending progression from depth to depth, from light to light—a Brahms reaffirmed, grave yet songful. Into grace

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

SIGNS, WONDERS, STRAUSS, BRAHMS, MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Continued from Preceding Page

and charm Mr. Koussevitzky molded the melodic line of the little Allegretto; yet never finicked or dawdled.

The introduction to the Finale was music become a living, flaming, all-possessing thing. The agitated phrases, the suspensive rhythms lashed imagination; the melody of horn and flutes into music led a beauty that after fifty years and a thousand repetitions remains strange, piercing, ineffable. The entering trombones sounded as powers and portents. From music rivened and opened upsprang the theme of joy. They said in his Vienna that Brahms could not rejoice. Fools and slow of heart! For here is music that to the very end knows the divine madness, as only Beethoven knew it in his other hymn. Brahms infused with a Russian temperament, life-giving and epic-making. . . . For once Cambridge knew a memorable evening; for once Mr. Koussevitzky was unalloyed. H. T. P.

124

Music and Musicians ==

FOR PLAIN MEN A PLAIN MUSIC IN FULL COURSE

KOUSSEVITZKY AND THE NINTH SYMPHONY

The Occasion, the Audience and a Deep-Set Faith—Simple, Lucid, Direct and Vital Performance—The Conductor Again Goes Back to Beethoven, Putting by Precedent and Tradition—Less Excitement, More Truth

IN Boston, a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is still an occasion. There is no room for it in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts, because the extension of the stage for an adequate chorus strips away row after row of subscribers' seats. Precedent, moreover will not have it the repertory-piece that, long since, it became in Germany and tends to become, in these days of Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Damrosch, in New York as well. Through two terms in Boston, Dr. Muck arrayed it but once—in the choral concerts of his final year. Mr. Monteux withheld it to the end of his stay and the last of his concerts for the Pension Fund of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has been quicker to it than either predecessor; while again it serves and swells the Pension Fund. Under all three conductors, besides, "public demand" has genuinely warranted an immediate repetition—again "to standing room only." By these signs the Bostonian public knows an "event" when it hears it.

The aspect of the hall, the arrangement of the program, the mood of the audience are each exceptional. Thrust beyond the proscenium frame, the orchestra seems seated in the hall rather than on the stage, and thereby of less tempered tone. Behind it rises the chorus, tier on tier; while in the fore-front of these singing voices Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday placed the solo-quartet that neither band nor choir might overshadow it. For once, too, the chorus was a black rather than a black-and-white mass. The women of the Radcliffe Choral Society wore the black frocks, edged here and there with white, of Dr. Davison's chapel choir; the men of the Harvard Glee Club followed the American custom of dark-clothed masculinity. . . . In turn, the program was like no other: an overture from Beethoven—this time to "Egmont"—that late-comers might not interrupt the progress of the Symphony; then the Symphony itself; next the pause for return to earth; finally the long and loud applause, acknowldged in cumulation by conductor, solo-singers, orchestra and chorus. A concert hardly an hour and a half long, yet filled to brimming.

Exceptional, above all, is the temper of the audience. Would it twice fill Symphony Hall for a performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, of the Seventh of "The Eroica?" By no means. Yet all three are acknowledged masterpieces of long standing. The chorus—it is easy to say—exalts the Ninth; but it enters only the final movement, for the climacteric quarter-hour of the music. Rather, a widespread and unquestioned faith persists that this last Symphony of Beethoven is also his "greatest"; that it is consecrate and set apart; not to be heard with the ear and in the mood that his other music—indeed all other music—invites. As soon change the rotation of the earth as alter this state of mind. There are those that believe this Ninth appreciably inferior to the Fifth or the Seventh, both in isolated pages and as music of sustained, diversified, cumulated power. "Wayward sisters [and also brothers], go in peace." There are even those that would gladly see some iconoclastic conductor plying the pruning knife upon the first movement, if not elsewhere. Shall Beethoven lengthy escape what Wagner in like excess must endure? "Procul, O procul, este profani!"

Mr. Koussevitzky conducting is no iconoclast thrusting down precedents—with a glance over his shoulder at the watching public. No more is he an innovator preening himself upon "new readings" and sniffing the incense thereof. Least of all as some of his detractors mistakenly say, is he an unschooled conductor knowing naught of the best masters and their ways with the classics. Rather—and quite simply—he is a conductor self-contained, who comprehends, feels, projects, a given music according to his own perceptive and transmitting faculties—and nothing else. For him is no other way. There he is, with his orchestra. There also is the composer with his music. Out of this contact springs the performance. It is a reaction experienced and conveyed that neither follows nor flaunts the tradition. Always it is unfettered and honest; often it is surprisingly simple and direct; least of all is it contrivance and exhibition to make the musical bourgeoisie sit up.

Now the Ninth Symphony is coated with tradition and varnished with precedent. Wagner had a way with it, and Bülow. Weingartner leads it in this fashion and Nikisch used to lead it in that. Here are the earmarks of Mr. Mengelberg; while those acute Parisians—bless them!—discovered innovations even from Mr. Damrosch. All of which is neither here nor there. Beethoven and his music sounded yesterday through Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra in an integrity and vitality more to be desired than a hundred precedents, fifty traditions, and twenty "readings." As it seemed, the listener heard the Ninth Symphony face to face with nothing intervening except the power to disclose, coördinate and intensify. The pace of the Adagio was exceeding slow; at moments it was possible to wish for a deeper, more pulsing tone; yet the intrinsic beauty was little obscured and nowhere manipulated. Some detected "effects," as they called them, in the Scherzo; but they seemed to be of Beethoven's own contrivance, endued with Koussevitzkian vigor. In the first movement (it was said) were departures from precedent and from Beethoven's "clear purpose"; yet seldom has a performance so conveyed his creative energy in passioned stress. The beginning of the Finale was like the gradual unfolding of a vast canvas upon which chorus, orchestra and solo-voices were to be outspread in a great tapestry of sound and motion. To suspense ensued magnificance.

Possibly this directness, simplicity and lucidity made Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Ninth Symphony seem far less an "occasion" than expectation prophesied, with no more excitement than emanates from his version of the Fifth or, say, of Brahms's First, There, for example, were the thrilling drum-beats of the Scherzo; but Beethoven rather than the conductor wrought the thrill. There again, were the scrutiny and dismissal of the preceding themes at the beginning of the Finale; but they seemed the composer's, not the conductor's, work of imagination. The entrance of the theme of joy was suspensive and significant—exactly as Beethoven prescribed. The Harvard-Radcliffe Choir flung out large-lined, full-voiced phrases; the solo-quartet courted like breadths and vigors—all of which Beethoven's pages plainly ordain. It is hard for some of us to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky approaches these Symphonies of Beethoven as though there had been no century of tradition, precedent and interpretation; that he regards them in the phrase of the program-books as "New: First Time"; that he becomes as a plain man (with an intensifying temperament) serving the composer's clear-marked will. In this wise he apprehended and accomplished the Ninth Symphony—and Beethoven's was the glory.

H. T. P.

Of This Day and Land

Aaron Copland

New Talent and Temperament in American Music, Discovered and Applauded at the Symphony Concerts

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

"Made in America"

FOREIGN CONDUCTORS—the professional patriots of music sometimes say—have "always" controlled the Symphony Concerts. Yet they have hardly closed their ears to American composers; nor have they failed to do American music some service in their time. It has been their custom, however, to search, sift and discriminate among American pieces; whereas to the true-blue patriot of the concert-hall, the birth-certificate is enough. Once upon a time, a young American composer, Griffes by name, sought hearing for an orchestral piece, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," suggested by Coleridge's fantastical vision. This and that conductor returned the manuscript. At length Mr. Monteux received it; played the tone-poem in Boston and New York—and American music was the richer for a rare and subtle talent, by envious Death cut off untimely. Last winter, Miss Nadia Boulanger, dispatched to the United States on French propaganda, would have audiences hear the Symphony for Orchestra and Organ of her American pupil, Aaron Copland. She carried it to Boston and forthwith Mr. Koussevitzky discovered and would foster the young composer's ability. The first occasion came when at the Symphony Concerts of last week he played Mr. Copland's new "Music for the Theater."

At the repetition of the five pieces on Saturday, no less intent was the audience; while hardly less warm and sustained was the applause. The conductor beamed upon the composer; both beamed upon the orchestra; while hands were clapping for all three. In every respect, moreover, a second hearing confirmed and deepened the impression of the first. Better-knit seemed the whole music; more compact, in particular, the Burlesque. Mr. Copland's ear and hand were more distinctive, imaginative and adroit with the instrumental voices—throughout with the piano; in the Prologue with the distant trumpet and the hushed oboe; in the Interlude with the English horn and clarinet; in the Burlesque with the humorsome brass; in the harmonies suffusing the Epilogue. The Prologue, as nuold, and it filled when the

---

the platform at
The only las announced Lourie, Cho
llege, Cambridge,
ting the Oxford
king the place of J.
consul for Grea
will be unable to

Mr. Koussevitzky will set his hand to Beethoven's Choral Symphony at a concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 10 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA FIRST

Local Season to Open November 6 With Serge Koussevitzky Conducting.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the symphony orchestra season in Pittsburgh with his Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7. His "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris last summer culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute, for which they wrote special music.

For the season now opening the entire series in New York and in Boston are completely sold out in subscription, and the demand for the orchestra in other cities is more than they can fill.

Other orchestras in this series, for which subscriptions are now open, are the Cleveland Orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, on November 20 and 21, when they will combine with the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 10 25

Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky, who will open the symphony orchestra season in Pittsburgh with his Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, is esteemed by the principal musicians of Europe above any conductor of the day. It is probable that Koussevitzky's genius has found its finest expression in the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. This orchestra has never in its long and distinguished history been more in demand. Other orchestras in this series, for which subscriptions are now open, are the Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, on November 20 and 21, when they will combine with the Mendelssohn Choir in "Brahms' Requiem"; the Cincinnati orchestra, Fritz Reiner, conductor, on December 11 and 12; the New York Philharmonic, with Mengelberg, con-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA
OCT 15 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GETS NEW PLAYERS

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, introduced 14 new players, including four choir leaders to complete the personnel of the orchestra as follows: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegre, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone.

Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, the oboist who, as teacher at the Paris Conservatory, produced such distinguished musicians as M. Georges Longy, Louis Speyer, and his nephew who now succeeds Mr. Longy as first oboe of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Fernand Gillet took first prize at the conservatory at the age of 15. For 23 years he has been oboe soloist at the Concerts Lamaureux and with the orchestra of the Opera.

Edmond Allegro, born in Switzerland, of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine year solo clarinet at the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera-Comique Orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first.

Music and Musicians

FOR PLAIN MEN A PLAIN MUSIC IN FULL COURSE

KOUSSEVITZKY AND THE NINTH SYMPHONY

The Occasion, the Audience and a Deep-Set Faith—Simple, Lucid, Direct and Vital Performance—The Conductor Again Goes Back to Beethoven, Putting by Precedent and Tradition—Less Excitement, More Truth

IN Boston, a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is still an occasion. There is no room for it in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts, because the extension of the stage for an adequate chorus strips away row after row of subscribers' seats. Precedent, moreover will not have it the repertory-piece that, long since, it became in Germany and tends to become, in these days of Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Damrosch, in New York as well. Through two terms in Boston, Dr. Muck arrayed it but once—in the choral concerts of his final year. Mr. Monteux withheld it to the end of his stay and the last of his concerts for the Pension Fund of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has been quicker to it than either predecessor; while again it serves and swells the Pension Fund. Under all three conductors, besides, "public demand" has genuinely warranted an immediate repetition—again "to standing room only." By these signs the Bostonian public knows an "event" when it hears it.

The aspect of the hall, the arrangement of the program, the mood of the audience are each exceptional. Thrust beyond the proscenium frame, the orchestra seems seated in the hall rather than on the stage, and thereby of less tempered tone. Behind it rises the chorus, tier on tier; while in the fore-front of those singing voices Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday placed the solo-quartet that neither band nor choir might overshadow it. For once, too, the chorus was a black rather than a black-and-white mass. The women of the Radcliffe Choral Society wore the black frocks, edged here and there with white, of Dr. Davison's chapel choir; the men of the Harvard Glee Club followed the American custom of dark-clothed masculinity. . . . In turn, the program was like no other: an overture from Beethoven—this time to "Egmont"—that late-comers might not interrupt the progress of the Symphony; then the Symphony itself; next the pause for return to earth; finally the long and loud applause, acknowldged in cumulation by conductor, solo-singers, orchestra and chorus. A concert hardly an hour and a half long, yet filled to brimming.

Exceptional, above all, is the temper of the audience. Would it twice fill Symphony Hall for a performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, of the Seventh of "The Eroica?" By no means. Yet all three are acknowledged masterpieces of long standing. The chorus—it is easy to say—exalts the Ninth; but it enters only the final movement, for the climacteric quarter-hour of the music. Rather, a widespread and unquestioned faith persists that this last Symphony of Beethoven is also his "greatest"; that it is consecrate and set apart; not to be heard with the ear and in the mood that his other music—indeed all other music—invites. As soon change the rotation of the earth as alter this state of mind. There are those that believe this Ninth appreciably inferior to the Fifth or the Seventh, both in isolated pages and as music of sustained, diversified, cumulated power. "Wayward sisters [and also brothers], go in peace." There are even those that would gladly see some iconoclastic conductor plying the pruning knife upon the first movement, if not elsewhere. Shall Beethoven lengthy escape what Wagner in like excess must endure? "Procul, O procul, este profani!"

Mr. Koussevitzky conducting is no iconoclast thrusting down precedents—with a glance over his shoulder at the watching public. No more is he an innovator preening himself upon "new readings" and sniffing the incense thereof. Least of all as some of his detractors mistakenly say, is he an unschooled conductor knowing naught of the best masters and their ways with the classics. Rather—and quite simply—he is a conductor self-contained, who comprehends, feels, projects, a given music according to his own perceptive and transmitting faculties—and nothing else. For him is no other way. There he is, with his orchestra. There also is the composer with his music. Out of this contact springs the performance. It is a reaction experienced and conveyed that neither follows nor flaunts the tradition. Always it is unfettered and honest; often it is surprisingly simple and direct; least of all is it contrivance and exhibition to make the musical bourgeoisie sit up.

Now the Ninth Symphony is coated with tradition and varnished with precedent. Wagner had a way with it, and Bülow. Weingartner leads it in this fashion and Nikisch used to lead it in that. Here are the earmarks of Mr. Mengelberg; while those acute Parisians—bless them!—discovered innovations even from Mr. Damrosch. All of which is neither here nor there. Beethoven and his music sounded yesterday through Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra in an integrity and vitality more to be desired than a hundred precedents, fifty traditions, and twenty "readings." As it seemed, the listener heard the Ninth Symphony face to face with nothing intervening except the power to disclose, coördinate and intensify. The pace of the Adagio was exceeding slow; at moments it was possible to wish for a deeper, more pulsing tone; yet the intrinsic beauty was little obscured and nowhere manipulated. Some detected "effects," as they called them, in the Scherzo; but they seemed to be of Beethoven's own contrivance, endued with Koussevitzkian vigor. In the first movement (it was said) were departures from precedent and from Beethoven's "clear purpose"; yet seldom has a performance so conveyed his creative energy in passioned stress. The beginning of the Finale was like the gradual unfolding of a vast canvas upon which chorus, orchestra and solo-voices were to be outspread in a great tapestry of sound and motion. To suspense ensued magnificance.

Possibly this directness, simplicity and lucidity made Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Ninth Symphony seem far less an "occasion" than expectation prophesied, with no more excitement than emanates from his version of the Fifth or, say, of Brahms's First, There, for example, were the thrilling drum-beats of the Scherzo; but Beethoven rather than the conductor wrought the thrill. There again, were the scrutiny and dismissal of the preceding themes at the beginning of the Finale; but they seemed the composer's, not the conductor's, work of imagination. The entrance of the theme of joy was suspensive and significant—exactly as Beethoven prescribed. The Harvard-Radcliffe Choir flung out large-lined, full-voiced phrases; the solo-quartet courted like breadths and vigors—all of which Beethoven's pages plainly ordain. It is hard for some of us to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky approaches these Symphonies of Beethoven as though there had been no century of tradition, precedent and interpretation; that he regards them in the phrase of the program-books as "New: First Time"; that he becomes as a plain man (with an intensifying temperament) serving the composer's clear-marked will. In this wise he apprehended and accomplished the Ninth Symphony—and Beethoven's was the glory.

H. T. P.

Of This Day and Land

Aaron Copland

New Talent and Temperament in American Music, Discovered and Applauded at the Symphony Concerts

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

"Made in America"

FOREIGN CONDUCTORS—the professional patriots of music sometimes say—have "always" controlled the Symphony Concerts. Yet they have hardly closed their ears to American composers; nor have they failed to do American music some service in their time. It has been their custom, however, to search, sift and discriminate among American pieces; whereas to the true-blue patriot of the concert-hall, the birth-certificate is enough. Once upon a time, a young American composer, Griffes by name, sought hearing for an orchestral piece, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," suggested by Coleridge's fantastical vision. This and that conductor returned the manuscript. At length Mr. Monteux received it; played the tone-poem in Boston and New York—and American music was the richer for a rare and subtle talent, by envious Death cut off untimely. Last winter, Miss Nadia Boulanger, dispatched to the United States on French propaganda, would have audiences hear the Symphony for Orchestra and Organ of her American pupil, Aaron Copland. She carried it to Boston and forthwith Mr. Koussevitzky discovered and would foster the young composer's ability. The first occasion came when at the Symphony Concerts of last week he played Mr. Copland's new "Music for the Theater."

At the repetition of the five pieces on Saturday, no less intent was the audience; while hardly less warm and sustained was the applause. The conductor beamed upon the composer; both beamed upon the orchestra; while hands were clapping for all three. In every respect, moreover, a second hearing confirmed and deepened the impression of the first. Better-knit seemed the whole music: more compact, in particular, the Burlesque. Mr. Copland's ear and hand were more distinctive, imaginative and adroit with the instrumental voices—throughout with the piano; in the Prologue with the distant trumpet and the hushed oboe; in the Interlude with the English horn and clarinet; in the Burlesque with the humorsome brass; in the harmonies suffusing the Epilogue. The Prologue, as

---

Mr. Koussevitzky will set his hand t Beethoven's Choral Symphony at a concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22.

For the third pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday and Saturday of next week, Oct. 23 and 24, Mr. Koussevitzky has promised Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, a symphonic picture; Chaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "the Pathetic"; Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; and Debussy's First Rhapsody for Orchestra and Clarinet. This last piece will offer opportunity to Mr. Edmo

---

Symphony orchestra on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7. His "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris last summer culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute, for which they wrote special music.

For the season now opening the entire series in New York and in Boston are completely sold out in subscription, and the demand for the orchestra in other cities is more than they can fill.

Other orchestras in this series, for which subscriptions are now open, are the Cleveland Orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, on November 20 and 21, when they will combine with the Mendelssohn Choir, in Brahms Requiem; the Cincinnati Orchestra, Fritz Reiner, conductor, on December 11 and 12; the New York Philharmonic, with Mengelberg conducting, on January 8 and 9; the Cleveland for a second visit on January 22 and 23; the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski, for one night on Monday, February 22, and a return of the New York Philharmonic on March 12 and 13, under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

---

20 and 21, with the Mendelssohn Choir in "Brahms' Requiem"; the Cincinnati orchestra, Fritz Reiner, conductor, on December 11 and 12; the New York Philharmonic, with Mengelberg, conducting, on January 8 and 9; the Cleveland orchestra for a second visit, on January 22 and 23; the Philadelphia orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski, for one night, Monday, February 22, and a return of the New York Philharmonic, on March 12 and 13, under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

Serge Koussevitzky

---

as M. Georges Longy, Louis Speyer, and his nephew who now succeeds Mr. Longy as first oboe of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Fernand Gillet took first prize at the conservatory at the age of 15. For 23 years he has been oboe soloist at the Concerts Lamaureux and with the orchestra of the Opera.

Edmond Allegro, born in Switzerland, of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine year solo clarinet at the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

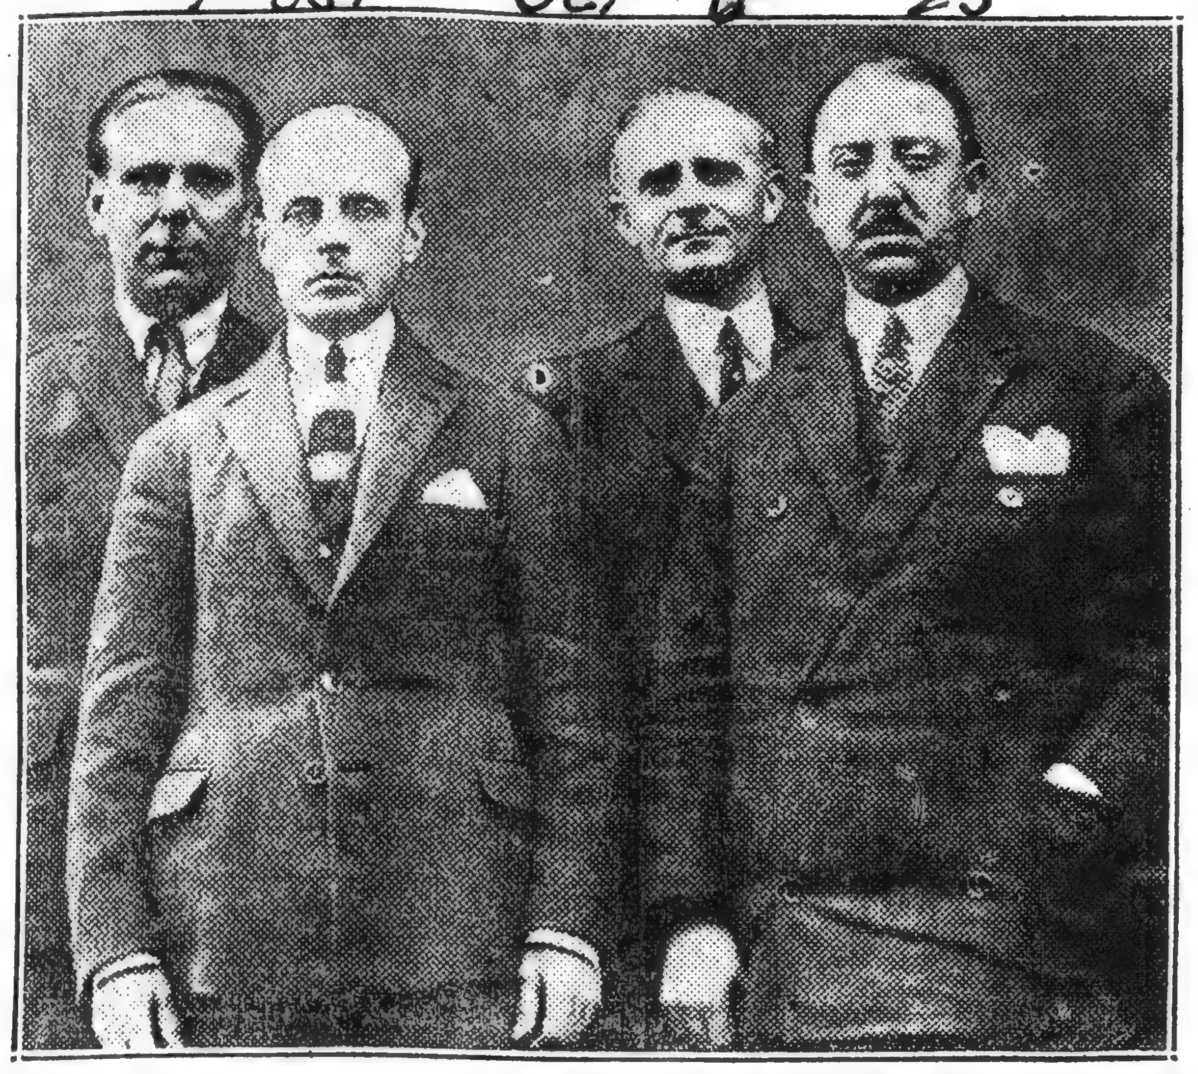
Jean Lefranc was graduated from the conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera-Comique Orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first.

125

NEW SYMPHONY VIRTUOSOS

Post Oct 6th '25



Four new artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will make their first Boston appearance Friday. Left to right: Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Joannes Rochut, first trombone; Jean Lefranc, first viola. All four have had distinguished careers.

MONITOR, OCTOBER 17, 1925

Boston Symphony Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its second concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Corelli—Concerto Grosso No. 8.
Strauss—Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Berlioz—"Fantastic" Symphony.

Corelli's "Christmas" concerto was played for the first time at these concerts, although it has been previously performed in this city by Mr. Martino's excellent Eighteenth Century Orchestra. On hearing it, as well as compositions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the question arises as to whether or not these ancient pieces are effective when played by a large body of strings; whether some of the intimacy of this music is not lost by the increase of tonal power; whether, in fact, they are altogether suited to the large spaces of a modern concert hall.

In any event, the playing of this music yesterday was far from satisfactory, possibly for the above reasons and undoubtedly because of the flamboyant style of the performance. Mr. Koussevitzky has been known to play such ancient music with more feeling for its character, more careful attention to the shading of its melodic lines, more taste in his choice of nuance than he displayed yesterday. But then, yesterday afternoon did not find Mr. Koussevitzky in the exalted poetic mood of last week. He is a man who delights in sharp contrasts. Not content with surprise in a single composition, he must contrast whole programs. Perhaps he feels that a departure now and again from the refined and highly emotional heights which he is at times able to command will make these moments more appreciated because of their rarity.

Strauss' Tone Poem

For as the concert continued it became more and more difficult to realize that the same orchestra and conductor were playing who gave such an eloquent and moving performance of Brahms' First Symphony a week ago. For all the stupendous and astonishing genius of Richard Strauss, it must be admitted that his music gains immeasurably if certain characteristics are not too sharply defined. There is a certain exaggeration, one is almost tempted to say vulgarity, in much of the thematic material of his tone poems which hardly adds to their musical value. But this defect, if not insisted upon, is concealed and lost sight of in admiration of the composer's wonderful handling of his material and almost unbelievable dexterity in his command of orchestral resources.

Yesterday, by a sort of seeming perversity, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to seize every opportunity to bring out the things in "Death and Transfiguration" which would better have been lightly touched upon. He played with a heavy hand upon the orchestra. The slower parts of the tone poem were taken with an exaggerated slowness of tempo. The climaxes were noisy rather than noble, bombastic, turgid, and Strauss's music for the reason above mentioned cannot stand such treatment without losing those qualities which are its sole reason for being.

Disturbing Departures

Many of the audience departed during the intervals of the symphony; and, more than this, they departed noisily. Are these departures to become a custom at the Friday afternoon concerts? They occurred during the playing of the Brahms symphony last week, and were an unpleasant interruption, disturbing to those of the audience who remained and discourteous to the orchestra and its distinguished conductor.

Again in the playing of the Berlioz Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky was hardly in the vein. He seemed out of sympathy with this picturesque music, to which, by all past precedents, he would seem to be eminently suited. The "Scene in the Fields," in a word, was dull. The "March to the Scaffold" missed fire altogether, and the "Witches' Sabbath" hardly rose above the commonplace.

While we would not be a faultfinding Beckmesser there were one or two places in which the evident intentions of the composer were so glaringly disregarded that it is not possible to pass over them without comment. For example — Berlioz plainly says in his program notes to this symphony that at the end of the "March to the Scaffold," the four measures of the "idée fixe (that is, the theme associated with the Beloved) intended to signify a last thought of love, are interrupted by the fall of the knife. Strange to say, by introducing a rallentando Mr. Koussevitzky failed entirely to make this effect. Again, at the beginning of the "Witches' Sabbath" the composer expressly marks in the score that the bells are to be heard at a distance. Of course the whole atmosphere is lost if they are played on the stage, and loudly at that, as they were yesterday afternoon. And again, one ventures to ask why the "Dies Irae" should be played on the tuba in a succession of hoarse grunts. The appearance of this theme is sufficiently grotesque and horrible of itself. It needs no such underscoring.

S. M.

Weekly Comment

HERALD Oct 11th '25

Mme. Melba has written her autobiography. It is appearing in serial form, entitled "Melodies and Memories," in the Daily Telegraph of London. She had a beautiful time in New York when she first sang there. She enjoyed the society of John Jacob Astor, though he had a "metallic voice which seemed to snip his sentences rather than to say them." "In spite of his wealth there were moments when one felt that the epithet 'Scotch' would be almost too generous to give him."

She has delightful memories of Mrs. Ogden Mills, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid and Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, "although in those days these families were newer than they are today." She also remembers by name Mrs. Ogden Goelet.

"I have always been perfectly happy whether my host is a millionaire or a bootmaker, a sense of humor and a sprinkling of brains.

Boston, though she names no names of our ave visited Boston so early—the spring of enormous success of the New York season, arrange this special tour. But I shall never

I did go, for it was to be my introduction usicians—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
reader to whom an orchestra is just an uments and nothing more, can realize the superb institution? I grew to love that ad been a single human being instead of a first moment I admired and venerated its inson.
in music, and it has always had it. In-audiences before which it is a delight to much as, if not more, than that of any ton that makes its society so charming, ch one finds among one's friends in Eng-

the social life of Boston totally different ican cities, a quality which can best be

"Best by attest"
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS
FEB 25 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming to Albany

Good news to Albany music lovers is imparted in the announcement made by Ben Franklin to the effect that he will present the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert, at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday evening, March 11. This event will mark the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky in this city, and his appearance will lend tremendous interest to the occasion. His fame as the greatest of all conductors, his great success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his unique standing among the musicians of the world are all well known, and without the least doubt he will receive a warm welcome in this coming concert. Albany gives enthusiastic welcome to the Bostonians whenever they appear here, and the orchestra management gives this city preference to many others demanding concerts. Mr. Franklin announces that the mail order seat sale for the event will open at once.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
OCT 12 1925

Serge Koussevitzky conducted in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week his first program of the season, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It consisted of Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a suite of three pieces entitled "Escales" by the French composer Jacques Ibert (marked "first time in America"), and the C minor symphony of Brahms.

It is worthy of note that though the Debussy piece and the symphony are played continually in Boston as in New York, performances of the second of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures (as goes the misnumbering of the three) are few and far between. The last previous performance of the work at a Boston Symphony concert was on April 2, 1904, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke.

The program chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for his Boston concerts of this week comprises the "Christmas Concerto" for string orchestra with organ by Corelli, the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss, and the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz.

here. Provi-
ew New Eng-organization.

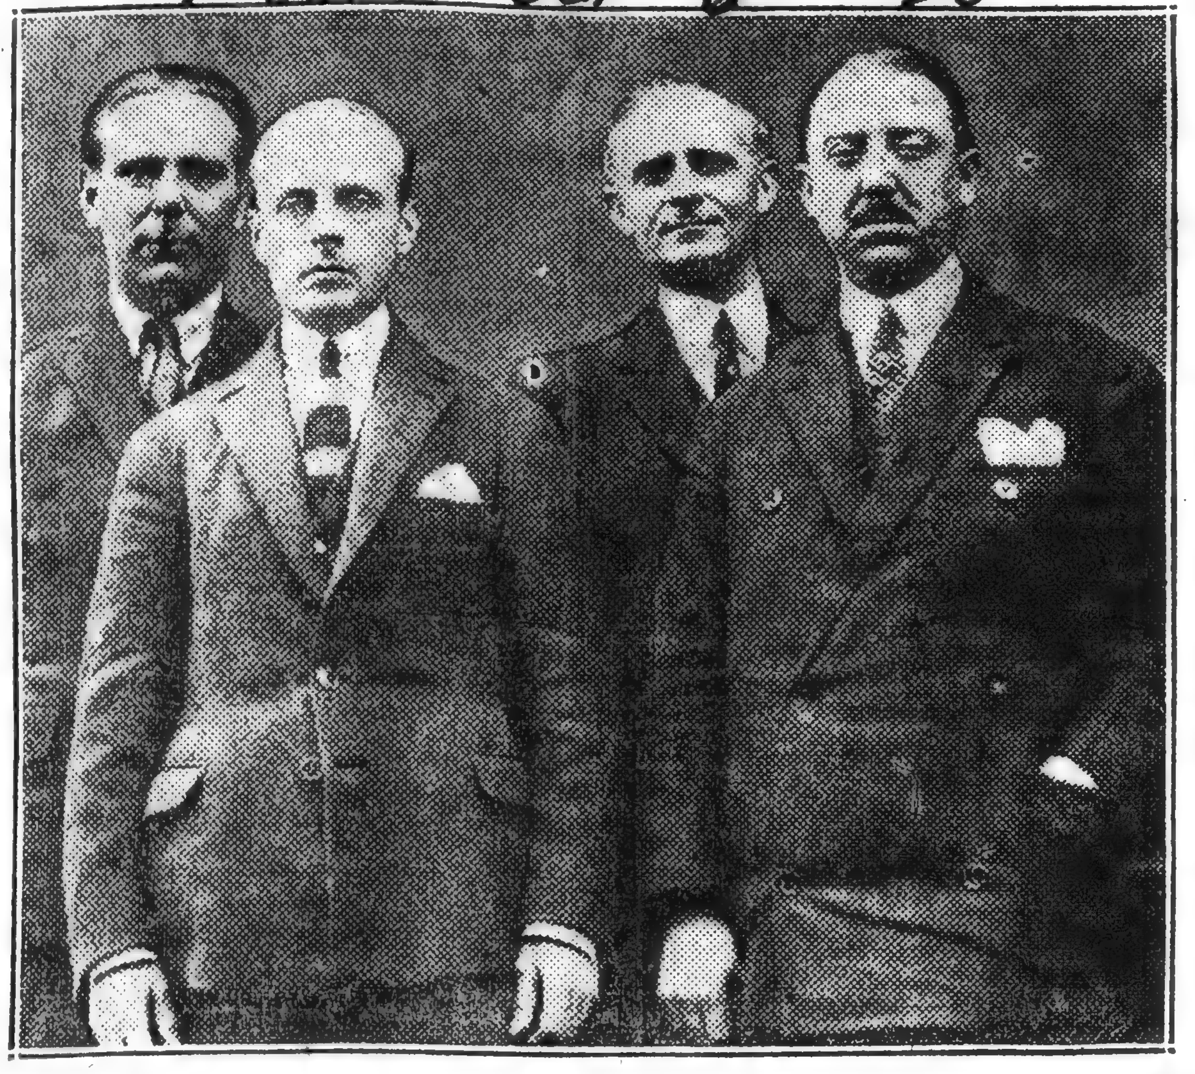
125

NEW SYMPHONY VIRTUOSOS

Post Oct 6th '25



Four new artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ,who will make their first Boston appearance Friday. Left to right: Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Joannes Rochut, first trombone; Jean Lefranc, first viola. All four have had distinguished careers.

Weekly Comment

HERALD Oct 11th '25

Mme. Melba has written her autobiography. It is appearing in serial form, entitled "Melodies and Memories," in the Daily Telegraph of London. She had a beautiful time in New York when she first sang there. She enjoyed the society of John Jacob Astor, though he had a "metallic voice which seemed to snip his sentences rather than to say them." "In spite of his wealth there were moments when one felt that the epithet 'Scotch' would be almost too generous to give him."

She has delightful memories of Mrs. Ogden Mills, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid and Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, "although in those days these families were newer than they are today." She also remembers by name Mrs. Ogden Goelet.

"I have always been perfectly happy whether my host is a millionaire or a bootmaker, a sense of humor and a sprinkling of brains.

Mme. Melba just dotes on Boston, though she names no names of our prominent citizenesses.

"I should probably not have visited Boston so early—the spring of 1894—had it not been for the enormous success of the New York season, which prompted Mr. Abbey to arrange this special tour. But I shall never be sufficiently thankful that I did go, for it was to be my introduction to the world's finest body of musicians—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I wonder if the average reader to whom an orchestra is just an orchestra, a collection of instruments and nothing more, can realize the great soul which animated that superb institution? I grew to love that orchestra almost as though it had been a single human being instead of a collection. And from the very first moment I admired and venerated its patron and inspirer, Maj. Higginson.

"Yes, Boston knew the best in music, and it has always had it. Indeed, all American audiences are audiences before which it is a delight to sing. Their praise is worth as much as, if not more, than that of any audience in the world.

"What is there about Boston that makes its society so charming, with the same quiet appeal which one finds among one's friends in England" There is a quality about the social life of Boston totally different from that of most great American cities, a quality which can best be descr[illegible] one of repose."

MONITOR, OCTOBER 17, 1925

Boston Symphony Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its second concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Corelli—Concerto Grosso No. 8.
Strauss—Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Berlioz—"Fantastic" Symphony.

Corelli's "Christmas" concerto was played for the first time at these concerts, although it has been previously performed in this city by Mr. Martino's excellent Eighteenth Century Orchestra. On hearing it, as well as compositions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the question arises as to whether or not these ancient pieces are effective when played by a large body of strings; whether some of the intimacy of this music is not lost by the increase of tonal power; whether, in fact, they are altogether suited to the large spaces of a modern concert hall.

In any event, the playing of this music yesterday was far from satisfactory, possibly for the above reasons and undoubtedly because of the flamboyant style of the performance. Mr. Koussevitzky has been known to play such ancient music with more feeling for its character, more careful attention to the shading of its melodic lines, more taste in his choice of nuance than he displayed yesterday. But then, yesterday afternoon did not find Mr. Koussevitzky in the exalted poetic mood of last week. He is a man who delights in sharp contrasts. Not content with surprise in a single composition, he must contrast whole programs. Perhaps he feels that a departure now and again from the refined and highly emotional heights which he is at times able to command will make these moments more appreciated because of their rarity.

Strauss' Tone Poem

For as the concert continued it became more and more difficult to realize that the same orchestra and conductor were playing who gave such an eloquent and moving performance of Brahms' First Symphony a week ago. For all the stupendous and astonishing genius of Richard Strauss, it must be admitted that his music gains immeasurably if certain characteristics are not too sharply defined. There is a certain exaggeration, one is almost tempted to say vulgarity, in much of the thematic material of his tone poems which hardly adds to their musical value. But this defect, if not insisted upon, is concealed and lost sight of in admiration of the composer's wonderful handling of his material and almost unbelievable dexterity in his command of orchestral resources.

Yesterday, by a sort of seeming perversity, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to seize every opportunity to bring out the things in "Death and Transfiguration" which would better have been lightly touched upon. He played with a heavy hand upon the orchestra. The slower parts of the tone poem were taken with an exaggerated slowness of tempo. The climaxes were noisy rather than noble, bombastic, turgid, and Strauss's music for the reason above mentioned cannot stand such treatment without losing those qualities which are its sole reason for being.

Disturbing Departures

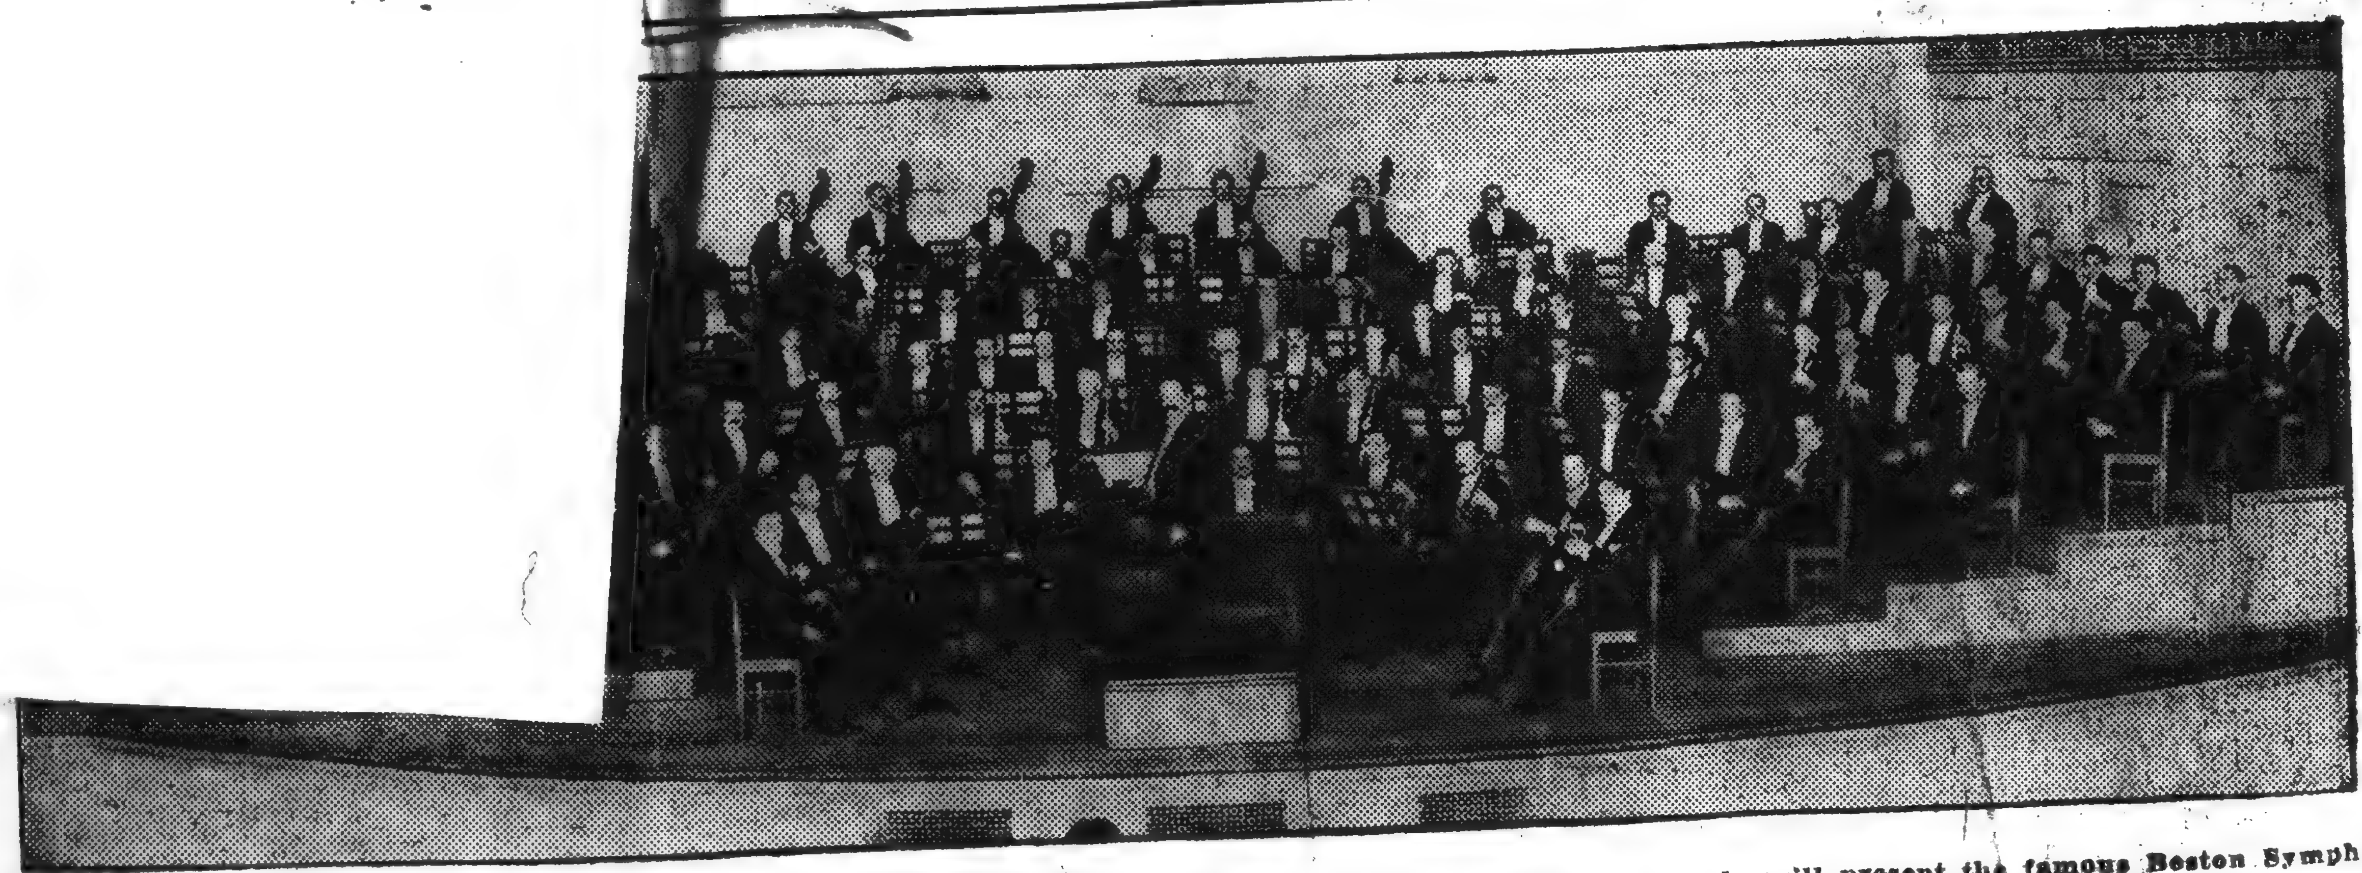
Many of the audience departed during the intervals of the symphony; and, more than this, they departed noisily. Are these departures to become a custom at the Friday afternoon concerts? They occurred during the playing of the Brahms symphony last week, and were an unpleasant interruption, disturbing to those of the audience who remained and discourteous to the orchestra and its distinguished conductor.

Again in the playing of the Berlioz Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky was hardly in the vein. He seemed out of sympathy with this picturesque music, to which, by all past precedents, he would seem to be eminently suited. The "Scene in the Fields," in a word, was dull. The "March to the Scaffold" missed fire altogether, and the "Witches' Sabbath" hardly rose above the commonplace.

While we would not be a fault-finding Beckmesser there were one or two places in which the evident intentions of the composer were so glaringly disregarded that it is not possible to pass over them without comment. For example—Berlioz plainly says in his program notes to this symphony that at the end of the "March to the Scaffold," the four measures of the "idée fixe (that is, the theme associated with the Beloved) intended to signify a last thought of love, are interrupted by the fall of the knife. Strange to say, by introducing a rallentando Mr. Koussevitzky failed entirely to make this effect. Again, at the beginning of the "Witches' Sabbath" the composer expressly marks in the score that the bells are to be heard at a distance. Of course the whole atmosphere is lost if they are played on the stage, and loudly at that, as they were yesterday afternoon. And again, one ventures to ask why the "Dies Irae" should be played on the tuba in a succession of hoarse grunts. The appearance of this theme is sufficiently grotesque and horrible of itself. It needs no such underscoring.

S. M.

Symphony Orchestra Coming to Albany



Good news to Albany music lovers is imparted in the announcement made by Ben Franklin to the effect that he will present the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert, at the Capitol theatre, Wednesday evening, March 11. This event will mark the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky in this city, and his appearance will lend tremendous interest to the occasion. His fame as the greatest of all conductors, his great success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his unique standing among the musicians of the world are all well known, and without the least doubt he will receive a warm welcome in this coming concert. Albany gives enthusiastic welcome to the Bostonians whenever they appear here, and the orchestra management gives this city preference to many others demanding concerts. Mr. Franklin announces that the mail order seat sale for the event will open at once.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

OCT 12 1925

Serge Koussevitzky conducted in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week his first program of the season, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It consisted of Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a suite of three pieces entitled "Escales" by the French composer Jacques Ibert (marked "first time in America"), and the C minor symphony of Brahms.

It is worthy of note that though the Debussy piece and the symphony are played continually in Boston as in New York, performances of the second of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures (as goes the misnumbering of the three) are few and far between. The last previous performance of the work at a Boston Symphony concert was on April 2, 1904, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke.

The program chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for his Boston concerts of this week comprises the "Christmas Concerto" for string orchestra with organ by Corelli, the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss, and the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz.

here. Provi-
ew New Eng-
organization.

1806

The Jewish Tribun

e, September 26, 1924

Music

By ALFRED LIEBAN

Bayreuth and New York

The resumption of the Wagner Festival at Bayreuth, after a silence of ten years, due to the war's ravages, constituted the chief musical event of the past summer. Siegfried Wagner, on his return from his American trip, designed to win financial support for the undertaking, bent all his energies to insure the artistic success of the festival, and judging from all reports, accomplished wonders, in spite of certain factors, inimical to the highest artistic achievement.

A large part of the festival's success was due to the guiding genius of the veteran Bayreuth conductor Dr. Muck, whose admirable record at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not soon be forgotten. Dr. Muck conducted "Parsifal," and needless to say, he conducted it with the authority, and the marvellous lucidity, that one associates with his name. The "Meistersinger" was conducted by Fritz Busch, a young and promising conductor from Dresden, while Michael Balling, a tried leader, steeped in the Bayreuth traditoin, conducted the "Ring."

Balling, from all accounts, gave an eminently satisfying reading of the "Ring" dramas, even though his climaxes never reached the emotional intensity of Bruno Walter's famous readings, a conductor known in this country only through his association with the New York Symphony Orchestra. His conducting of the Tristan "Prelude and Lovedeath," at one of these concerts, however, revealed to discerning listeners his potentialities as a Wagner conductor.

The playing of the orchestra at Bayreuth, an orchestra, composed of the best players, selected from the major German Opera, and Symphony-Orchestras, headed by Anton Witek, former concert master of Boston, was a feature of the festival. Equally, if not more impressive, was the singing of the chorus, trained by Prof. Ruedel of the Berlin Domchoir, who achieved marvels in "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "Gotterdaemmerung."

The singers were uneven. Some of the most highly priced German stars could not be lured to Bayreuth. They did not seek for glory, and Bayreuth offered no fees to its artists this year. The unselfish few, who returned to the place of their former triumphs, were Herman Weil, (the admirable Hans Sachs) Carl Braun (the Wotan, who is a fine basso, but insists on singing baritone), both well remembered from their Metropolitan days, Edward Habich, the Alberich of both London and Bayreuth, Soomer, a former Metropolitan Sachs and Wotan, now a basso, singing Fasolt and Hagen, and singing both parts admirably to boot.

Richard Mayr, a London "Ochs von Lerchenau" was "Gurnemanz." This excellent basso, a Mozart singer of Salzburg and Paris fame, is badly needed at our Metropolitan. Elschner of Leipsic was a new "Mime," and a good "Mime," if not quite up to the standard of Carl Seydel, of Munich, who has no peer in the part. His

(Continued on page 94)

Music

(Continued from page 93)

"David" in "Meistersinger" is said to be equally fine.

Of the tenors Lauritz Melchior as "Parsifal" and "Siegmund" created a sensations. There is only one voice as to this young Danish singer's qualifications, and that is one of unqualified approval. Would, that the Metropolitan listen to the voice! There is crying need for him, here!

The women at Bayreuth were not nearly as capable as the men. London, with Frida Leider, a glorious "Bruehnhuelde" and "Isolde," and Maria Olszewska, splendid "Waltraute" and "Brangaene," easily outshone their "Festival" rivals.

There is the lesson for New York. The Metropolitan has had no soprano capable to portray the Wagnerian heroines in the "grand" manner, since Olive Fremstad left it's sacred confines.

Mme. Matzenauer is an excellent contralto, but she sings the high Wagnerian soprano parts by dint of sheer violence only. Florence Easton, a delightful artist in her way, is not the dramatic type necessary to Wagner.

Curt Taucher, a painstaking artist, has little distinction, and is no convincing "Tristan" or "Walter."

Finally, there is Mr. Bodanzky, an excellent Mozart and Weber conductor, but lacking in that sweep, which is essential to the full significance of the Wagner music drama. A Mahler or Toscanini he is not.

Bayreuth is a pillar of conservatism! So is our own Metropolitan! The need for reform in the ancient stage-business is evident in both houses. Boris Anisfeld, and Nemirowitsch-Dantschenko have given valuable hints. The screen has shown a way. Imaginative lighting direction, the poetry of illusion, projected through the medium of a true poet, will do the rest.

Bayreuth is awake again after its long slumber! We hail it's re-birth! Let us pray that there will be a similar awakening here, too! We shall not fail to rejoice, and cheer.

A Standard for piano quality—no pr

SOHM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

OCT 4 1925

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

A year ago Serge Koussevitzky was known to our musical public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a force and a striking personality in music. Under his direction, the Boston Symphony continues to affirm its traditional fame. For its seventy-five concerts in Greater Boston, and for its regular series in Manhattan every ticket has been taken for the season. Never before in the history of the orchestra has there ben no single seat available for its Boston and Manhattan concerts.

The great success enjoyed by both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that its annual series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy will also be oer-scribed. The dates for these are Friday eenings. November 27, January 8, February 5, March 12 and April 9. In the choice of soloists for the Brooklyn concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Brooklyn the policy which has been so successful in New York and Boston. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi, but in the interest of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programes will maintain their symphonic integrity, and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programes and soloists will be announced before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled to play in Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3, is the only large orchestra to be heard in Toronto this season, there is bound to be an exceedingly heavy demand for seats. The Boston Symphony, greatest of all orchestras, would attract a capacity audience at any time, and its Toronto concert, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will eclipse anything we have heard before. Those desirous of positively securing seats may order now by mail direct to Massey Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming ~~to Toronto~~ to give a concert in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. This announcement is particularly interesting, first because no other large orchestra is scheduled to play in Toronto this season, and second because it brings to Toronto, for the first time, the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, who in his first season [illegible] the head of this famous organiza[illegible]on became one of the most con[illegible]cuous figures in our world of [illegible]ic. It is probably that Koussevit[illegible] genius has found its finest ex[illegible]n in the famous Boston [illegible] Orchestra which he now [illegible] The Boston Symphony [illegible]ncerts have never in [illegible] distinguished history [illegible] Indeed, each [illegible]ork and Boston hav[illegible]bed last May, there [illegible] seat to sell for [illegible]ities during the [illegible] Mail orders

---

LA PRESSE, MONTREAL, SAMEDI 22 AOUT 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY EST HONORE PAR LA FRANCE ET FETE PAR LES MUSICIENS

Le tout-Paris musical s'amuse aux dépens du nouveau chevalier et le divertit.

L'AMERIQUE ARTISTIQUE

Les circonstances les plus solennelles sont parfois marquées par des manifestations où, inconsciemment peut-être l'humour bruyant atténue les dehors imposés par les conventions sociales. La Légion d'Honneur est incontestablement une institution grave, mais les Parisiens modernes se plaisent à y trouver prétexte à réjouissances, où l'ironie l'emporte sur le sérieux.

Lorsque Serge Koussevitzky fut nommé chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, des compositeurs et des musiciens se groupèrent pour l'honorer et pour lui prouver qu'ils étaient assez ses amis pour se réjouir à ses dépens. Ce fut une soirée où la caricature et le délassement musicaux furent à l'honneur. Serge Koussevitzky fut portraituré dans toutes ses attitudes et jouant des instruments les plus divers.

Le conférencier, Henri Casadesus, qui à ses moments de sérieux est à la tête de la Société des anciens instruments, s'improvise bouffon de la soirée et prit chacun à partie, y compris André Messager, dont le discours de bienvenue avait été des plus posés.

Une pièce pour trombone, de Arthur Honegger, jouée au piano par Alfred Cortot, marqua le début des hostilités. Le compositeur y exprimait, en mesures dolentes, son regret de ne pouvoir prendre part au concert et la gaité clownesque dont il manquerait le spectacle.

Au piano, Paul Dukas confia les pompeuses protestations amicales que lui inspirait l'occasion et la spontanéité avec laquelle il se rendait compte de l'importance de la solennité. Horrifié à la pensée qu'on ne pourrait l'entendre sans le voir, Albert Roussel esquisse une pièce pour basson et contrebasse, en y révélant un don de la facétie que sa courte barbe ne pouvait faire soupçonner.

Le rideau de l'intermède se leva sur la tête rouge de Serge Prokofieff, attelé à un piano automatique dont les accords reconstituaient l'atmosphère artistique de Coney Island. Une céleste volée de harpes, que ponctua du cri de: "Ah! c'est donc ça le ciel!" un auditeur surexcité, fut suivie d'une personnification idyllique de Koussevitzky par Carlos Salzedo. Roland-Manuel et Raymond Charpentier démontrèrent bientôt qu'un instrument aussi inoffensif que la harpe sait être malin.

Alexandre Tansman exprima l'hommage de la Pologne en une pièce de piano; Félia Lidvinne chanta deux airs russes et Paul Le Flem fit entendre un quatuor.

M. Casadesus annonça alors qu'un solennel tribut de respect et de vénération allait être présenté. Une fillette de douze ans avait écrit, en Angleterre, une lettre d'appréciation et une pièce pour clarinette en hommage au célèbre maître d'orchestre. Lorsque le naïf solo eût charmé les tendres oreilles, un choeur de volontaires vint chanter une berceuse, dont le compositeur reste anonyme. Mme Germaine Taillefer, toutefois, tint à décliner toute responsabilité à ce sujet.

Les choristes se plurent pourtant à dire bien haut leurs noms: Hanri Casadesus, soliste; Germaine Taillefer, Madeleine Grovlez, Carlos Salzedo, Maurice Ravel, Florent Schmitt, Albert Roussel, Félia Litvinne, Berthe Bert, Nadia Boulanger, Serge Prokofieff, Alfred Cortot et Marie Miller.

Serge Koussevitzky dut ensuite embrasser chacun des participants sur les deux joues et répondre à ces cérémonies. Il se plut à reconnaître le bon esprit de ces artistes de réputation internationale qui prennent plaisir à oublier leur "soi" pour rire d'eux-même et les uns des autres.

Jacques Rouché, directeur de l'Opéra, ayant l'aspect de Gatti-Casazza et celui d'un directeur d'opéra, était là. D.-E. Ingelbrecht et Jacques Ibert, aussi.

L'Amérique était bien représen[illegible] Wladimir Shavitch, de l'orches[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

OCT 1 1 1925

Boston Symphony Announces Dates for Brooklyn Concerts.

A year ago, Serge Koussevitsky was known to our musical public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a force and a striking personality in music. Under his direction, the Boston Symphony continues to affirm its traditional fame. For its seventy-five concerts in greater Boston, and for its regular series in Manhattan, every ticket has been taken for the season. Never before in the history of the orchestra has there been no single seat available for its Boston and Manhattan concerts.

The great success enjoyed by both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that its annual series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music will also be oversubscribed. The dates for these are Friday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 5. March 12 and April 9. In the choice of soloists. Mr. Koussevitsky will adopt in Brooklyn the policy which has been so successful in New York and Boston. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi, but in the interest of special work for which their genius is [illegible] fitted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 1 1 19

Welcome for Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky was greeted with tremendous applause when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Russian Conductor who so warmly won over the Boston music lovers on his first appearance here last season promises some very interesting programs for the Fall and Winter.

1206

The Jewish Tribun

e, September 26, 1924

Music

By ALFRED LIEBAN

Bayreuth and New York

The resumption of the Wagner Festival at Bayreuth, after a silence of ten years, due to the war's ravages, constituted the chief musical event of the past summer. Siegfried Wagner, on his return from his American trip, designed to win financial support for the undertaking, bent all his energies to insure the artistic success of the festival, and judging from all reports, accomplished wonders, in spite of certain factors, inimical to the highest artistic achievement.

A large part of the festival's success was due to the guiding genius of the veteran Bayreuth conductor Dr. Muck, whose admirable record at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not soon be forgotten. Dr. Muck conducted "Parsifal," and needless to say, he conducted it with the authority, and the marvellous lucidity, that one associates with his name. The "Meistersinger" was conducted by Fritz Busch, a young and promising conductor from Dresden, while Michael Balling, a tried leader, steeped in the Bayreuth traditoin, conducted the "Ring."

Balling, from all accounts, gave an eminently satisfying reading of the "Ring" dramas, even though his climaxes never reached the emotional intensity of Bruno Walter's famous readings, a conductor known in this country only through his association with the New York Symphony Orchestra. His conducting of the Tristan "Prelude and Lovedeath," at one of these concerts, however, revealed to discerning listeners his potentialities as a Wagner conductor.

The playing of the orchestra at Bayreuth, an orchestra, composed of the best players, selected from the major German Opera, and Symphony-Orchestras, headed by Anton Witek, former concert master of Boston, was a feature of the festival. Equally, if not more impressive, was the singing of the chorus, trained by Prof. Ruedel of the Berlin Domchoir, who achieved marvels in "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "Gotterdaemmerung."

The singers were uneven. Some of the most highly priced German stars could not be lured to Bayreuth. They did not seek for glory, and Bayreuth offered no fees to its artists this year. The unselfish few, who returned to the place of their former triumphs, were Herman Weil, (the admirable Hans Sachs) Carl Braun (the Wotan, who is a fine basso, but insists on singing baritone), both well remembered from their Metropolitan days, Edward Habich, the Alberich of both London and Bayreuth, Soomer, a former Metropolitan Sachs and Wotan, now a basso, singing Fasolt and Hagen, and singing both parts admirably to boot.

Richard Mayr, a London "Ochs von Lerchenau" was "Gurnemanz." This excellent basso, a Mozart singer of Salzburg and Paris fame, is badly needed at our Metropolitan. Elschner of Leipsic was a new "Mime," and a good "Mime," if not quite up to the standard of Carl Seydel, of Munich, who has no peer in the part. His

(Continued on page 94)

Music

(Continued from page 93)

"David" in "Meistersinger" is said to be equally fine.

Of the tenors Lauritz Melchior as "Parsifal" and "Siegmund" created a sensations. There is only one voice as to this young Danish singer's qualifications, and that is one of unqualified approval. Would, that the Metropolitan listen to the voice! There is crying need for him, here!

The women at Bayreuth were not nearly as capable as the men. London, with Frida Leider, a glorious "Bruennhuelde" and "Isolde," and Maria Olszewska, splendid "Waltraute" and "Brangaene," easily outshone their "Festival" rivals.

There is the lesson for New York. The Metropolitan has had no soprano capable to portray the Wagnerian heroines in the "grand" manner, since Olive Fremstad left it's sacred co[illegible]nes.

Mme. Matzenauer is an excellent contralto, but she sings the high Wagnerian soprano parts by dint of sheer violence only. Florence Easton, a delightful artist in her way, is not the dramatic type necessary to Wagner.

Curt Taucher, a painstaking artist, has little distinction, and is not convincing "Tristan" or "Walter."

Finally, there is Mr. Bodanzky, an excellent Mozart and Weber conductor, but lacking in that sweep, which is essential to the full significance of the Wagner music drama. A Mahler or Toscanini he is not.

Bayreuth is a pillar of conservatism! So is our own Metropolitan! The need for reform in the ancient stage-business is evident in both houses. Boris Anisfeld, and Nemirowitsch-Dantschenko have given valuable hints. The screen has shown a way. Imaginative lighting direction, the poetry of illusion, projected through the medium of a true poet, will do the rest.

Bayreuth is awake again after its long slumber! We hail it's re-birth! Let us pray that there will be a similar awakening here, too! We shall not fail to rejoice, and cheer.

A Standard for piano quality—no pr

SOHM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

OCT 4 1925

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

A year ago Serge Koussevitzky was known to our musical public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a force and a striking personality in music. Under his direction, the Boston Symphony continues to affirm its ~~traditional~~ fame. For its seventy-five concerts in Greater Boston, and for its regular series in Manhattan every ticket has been taken for the season. Never before in the history of the orchestra has there ben no single seat available for its Boston and Manhattan concerts.

The great success enjoyed by both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that its annual series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy will also be oer-scribed. The dates for these are Friday eenings. November 27, January 8, February 5, March 12 and April 9. In the choice of soloists for the Brooklyn concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Brooklyn the policy which has been so successful in New York and Boston. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi, but in the interest of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programes will maintain their symphonic integrity, and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programes and soloists will be announced before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming ~~to Toronto~~ to give a concert in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. This announcement is particularly interesting, first because no other large orchestra is scheduled to play in Toronto this season, and second because it brings to Toronto, for the first time, the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, who in his first season t the head of this famous organiza-on became one of the most con-cuous figures in our world of
ic. It is probably that Koussevit-genius has found its finest ex-n in the famous Boston
y Orchestra which he now the platform. The Boston Symphony
The only la ncerts have never in announced distinguished history Lourie, Ch emand. Indeed, each lege, Cambridge ork and Boston havnting the Oxford bed last May, there king the place of J. seat to sell for e consul for Grea ities during the will be unable to Mail orders

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled to ~~play in~~ Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3, is the only large orchestra to be heard in Toronto this season, there is bound to be an exceedingly heavy demand for seats. The Boston Symphon greatest of all orchestras, would attract a capacity audience at any time, and its Toronto concert, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will eclipse anything we have heard before. Those desirous of positively securing seats may order now by mail direct to Massey Hall.

LA PRESSE, MONTREAL, SAMEDI 22 AOUT 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY EST HONORE PAR LA FRANCE ET FETE PAR LES MUSICIENS

Le tout-Paris musical s'amuse aux dépens du nouveau chevalier et le divertit.

L'AMERIQUE ARTISTIQUE

Les circonstances les plus solennelles sont parfois marquées par des manifestations où, inconsciemment peut-être l'humour bruyant atténue les dehors imposés par les conventions sociales. La Légion d'Honneur est incontestablement une institution grave, mais les Parisiens modernes se plaisent à y trouver prétexte à réjouissances, où l'ironie l'emporte sur le sérieux.

Lorsque Serge Koussevitzky fut nommé chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, des compositeurs et des musiciens se groupèrent pour l'honorer et pour lui prouver qu'ils étaient assez ses amis pour se réjouir à ses dépens. Ce fut une soirée où la caricature et le délassement musicaux furent à l'honneur. Serge Koussevitzky fut portraituré dans toutes ses attitudes et jouant des instruments les plus divers.

Le conférencier, Henri Casadesus, qui à ses moments de sérieux est à la tête de la Société des anciens instruments, s'improvise bouffon de la soirée et prit chacun à partie, y compris André Messager, dont le discours de bienvenue avait été des plus posés.

Une pièce pour trombone, de Arthur Honegger, jouée au piano par Alfred Cortot, marqua le début des hostilités. Le compositeur y exprimait, en mesures dolentes, son regret de ne pouvoir prendre part au concert et la gaité clownesque dont il manquerait le spectacle.

Au piano, Paul Dukas confia les pompeuses protestations amicales que lui inspirait l'occasion et la spontanéité avec laquelle il se rendait compte de l'importance de la solennité. Horrifié à la pensée qu'on ne pourrait l'entendre sans le voir, Albert Roussel esquisse une pièce pour basson et contrebasse, en y révélant un don de la facétie que sa courte barbe ne pouvait faire soupçonner.

Le rideau de l'intermède se leva sur la tête rouge de Serge Prokofieff, attelé à un piano automatique dont les accords reconstituaient l'atmosphère artistique de Coney Island. Une céleste volée de harpes, que ponctua du cri de: "Ah! c'est donc ça le ciel!" un auditeur surexcité, fut suivie d'une personnification idyllique de Koussevitzky par Carlos Salzedo. Roland-Manuel et Raymond Charpentier démontrèrent bientôt qu'un instrument aussi inoffensif que la harpe sait être malin.

Alexandre Tansman exprima l'hommage de la Pologne en une pièce de piano; Félia Lidvinne chanta deux airs russes et Paul Le Flem fit entendre un quatuor.

M. Casadesus annonça alors qu'un solennel tribut de respect et de vénération allait être présenté. Une fillette de douze ans avait écrit, en Angleterre, une lettre d'appréciation et une pièce pour clarinette en hommage au célèbre maître d'orchestre. Lorsque le naïf solo eût charmé les tendres oreilles, un choeur de volontaires vint chanter une berceuse, dont le compositeur reste anonyme. Mme Germaine Taillefer, toutefois, tint à décliner toute responsabilité à ce sujet.

Les choristes se plurent pourtant à dire bien haut leurs noms: Hanri Casadesus, soliste; Germaine Taillefer, Madeleine Grovlez, Carlos Salzedo, Maurice Ravel, Florent Schmitt, Albert Roussel, Félia Litvinne, Berthe Bert, Nadia Boulanger, Serge Prokofieff, Alfred Cortot et Marie Miller.

Serge Koussevitzky dut ensuite embrasser chacun des participants sur les deux joues et répondre à ces cérémonies. Il se plut à reconnaître le bon esprit de ces artistes de réputation internationale qui prennent plaisir à oublier leur "soi" pour rire d'eux-même et les uns des autres.

Jacques Rouché, directeur de l'Opéra, ayant l'aspect de Gatti-Casazza et celui d'un directeur d'opéra, était là. D.-E. Ingelbrecht et Jacques Ibert, aussi.

L'Amérique était bien représen-
Wladimir Shavitch, de l'orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

OCT 1 1 1925

Boston Symphony Announces Dates for Brooklyn Concerts.

A year ago, Serge Koussevitsky was known to our musical public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a force and a striking personality in music. Under his direction, the Boston Symphony continues to affirm ~~its~~ traditional fame. For its seventy-five concerts in greater Boston, and for its regular series in Manhattan, every ticket has been taken for the season. Never before in the history of the orchestra has there been no single seat available for its Boston and Manhattan concerts.

The great success enjoyed by both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that its annual series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music will also be oversubscribed. The dates for these are Friday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 12 and April 9. In the choice of soloists, Mr. Koussevitsky will adopt in Brooklyn the policy which has been so successful in New York and Boston. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi, but in the interest of special work for which their genius is parti[illegible] fitted

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 1 1 19

Welcome for Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky was greeted with tremendous applause when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Russian Conductor who so warmly won over the Boston music lovers on his first appearance here last season promises some very interesting programs for the Fall and Winter.

1206

The Jewish Tribun

e, September 26, 1924

Music

By ALFRED LIEBAN

Bayreuth and New York

The resumption of the Wagner Festival at Bayreuth, after a silence of ten years, due to the war's ravages, constituted the chief musical event of the past summer. Siegfried Wagner, on his return from his American trip, designed to win financial support for the undertaking, bent all his energies to insure the artistic success of the festival, and judging from all reports, accomplished wonders, in spite of certain factors, inimical to the highest artistic achievement.

A large part of the festival's success was due to the guiding genius of the veteran Bayreuth conductor Dr. Muck, whose admirable record at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not soon be forgotten. Dr. Muck conducted "Parsifal," and needless to say, he conducted it with the authority, and the marvellous lucidity, that one associates with his name. The "Meistersinger" was conducted by Fritz Busch, a young and promising conductor from Dresden, while Michael Balling, a tried leader, steeped in the Bayreuth traditoin, conducted the "Ring."

Balling, from all accounts, gave an eminently satisfying reading of the "Ring" dramas, even though his climaxes never reached the emotional intensity of Bruno Walter's famous readings, a conductor known in this country only through his association with the New York Symphony Orchestra. His conducting of the Tristan "Prelude and Lovedeath," at one of these concerts, however, revealed to discerning listeners his potentialities as a Wagner conductor.

The playing of the orchestra at Bayreuth, an orchestra, composed of the best players, selected from the major German Opera, and Symphony-Orchestras, headed by Anton Witek, former concert master of Boston, was a feature of the festival. Equally, if not more impressive, was the singing of the chorus, trained by Prof. Ruedel of the Berlin Domchoir, who achieved marvels in "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "Gotterdaemmerung."

The singers were uneven. Some of the most highly priced German stars could not be lured to Bayreuth. They did not seek for glory, and Bayreuth offered no fees to its artists this year. The unselfish few, who returned to the place of their former triumphs, were Herman Weil, (the admirable Hans Sachs) Carl Braun (the Wotan, who is a fine basso, but insists on singing baritone), both well remembered from their Metropolitan days, Edward Habich, the Alberich of both London and Bayreuth, Soomer, a former Metropolitan Sachs and Wotan, now a basso, singing Fasolt and Hagen, and singing both parts admirably to boot.

Richard Mayr, a London "Ochs von Lerchenau" was "Gurnemanz." This excellent basso, a Mozart singer of Salzburg and Paris fame, is badly needed at our Metropolitan. Elschner of Leipsic was a new "Mime," and a good "Mime," if not quite up to the standard of Carl Seydel, of Munich, who has no peer in the part. His

(Continued on page 94)

Music

(Continued from page 93)

"David" in "Meistersinger" is said to be equally fine.

Of the tenors Lauritz Melchior as "Parsifal" and "Siegmund" created a sensations. There is only one voice as to this young Danish singer's qualifications, and that is one of unqualified approval. Would, that the Metropolitan listen to the voice! There is crying need for him, here!

The women at Bayreuth were not nearly as capable as the men. London, with Frida Leider, a glorious "Bruennhuelde" and "Isolde," and Maria Olszewska, splendid "Waltraute" and "Brangaene," easily outshone their "Festival" rivals.

There is the lesson for New York. The Metropolitan has had no soprano capable to portray the Wagnerian heroines in the "grand" manner, since Olive Fremstad left it's sacred con nnes.

Mme. Matzenauer is an excellent contralto, but she sings the high Wagnerian soprano parts by dint of sheer violence only. Florence Easton, a delightful artist in her way, is not the dramatic type necessary to Wagner.

Curt Taucher, a painstaking artist, has little distinction, and is not convincing "Tristan" or "Walter."

Finally, there is Mr. Bodanzky, an excellent Mozart and Weber conductor, but lacking in that sweep, which is essential to the full significance of the Wagner music drama. A Mahler or Toscanini he is not.

Bayreuth is a pillar of conservatism! So is our own Metropolitan! The need for reform in the ancient stage-business is evident in both houses. Boris Anisfeld, and Nemirowitsch-Dantschenko have given valuable hints. The screen has shown a way. Imaginative lighting direction, the poetry of illusion, projected through the medium of a true poet, will do the rest.

Bayreuth is awake again after its long slumber! We hail it's re-birth! Let us pray that there will be a similar awakening here, too! We shall not fail to rejoice, and cheer.

A Standard for piano quality—no pr

SOHM

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN CITIZEN

OCT 4 1925

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

A year ago Serge Koussevitzky was known to our musical public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a force and a striking personality in music. Under his direction, the Boston Symphony continues to affirm its traditional fame. For its seventy-five concerts in Greater Boston, and for its regular series in Manhattan every ticket has been taken for the season. Never before in the history of the orchestra has there ben no single seat available for its Boston and Manhattan concerts.

The great success enjoyed by both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that its annual series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy will also be oer-scribed. The dates for these are Friday eenings. November 27, January 8, February 5, March 12 and April 9. In the choice of soloists for the Brooklyn concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Brooklyn the policy which has been so successful in New York and Boston. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi, but in the interest of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programes will maintain their symphonic integrity, and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programes and soloists will be announced before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

GLOBE

TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming ~~to Toronto~~ to give a concert in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. This announcement is particularly interesting, first because no other large orchestra is scheduled to play in Toronto this season, and second because it brings to Toronto, for the first time, the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, who in his first season at the head of this famous organization became one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music. It is probably that Koussevitzky's genius has found its finest expression in the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra which he now [illegible] The Boston Symphony concerts have never in [illegible] distinguished history [illegible] demand. Indeed, each [illegible] York and Boston having [illegible] bed last May, there [illegible] seat to sell for [illegible] ities during the [illegible] Mail orders

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

GLOBE

TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled to play in Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3, is the only large orchestra to be heard in Toronto this season, there is bound to be an exceedingly heavy demand for seats. The Boston Symphon greatest of all orchestras, would attract a capacity audience at any time, and its Toronto concert, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will eclipse anything we have heard before. Those desirous of positively securing seats may order now by mail direct to Massey Hall,

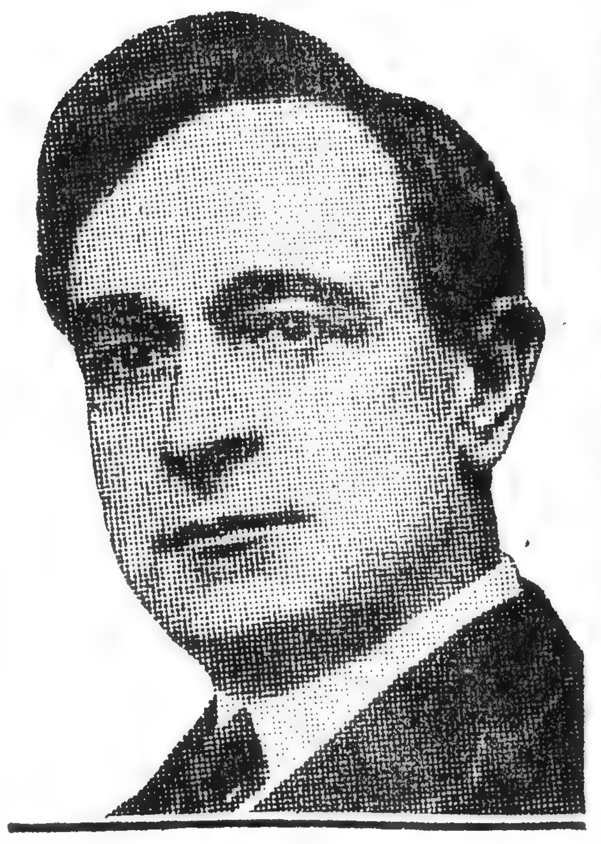
---

LA PRESSE, MONTREAL, SAMEDI 22 AOUT 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY EST HONORE PAR LA FRANCE ET FETE PAR LES MUSICIENS

Le tout-Paris musical s'amuse aux dépens du nouveau chevalier et le divertit.

L'AMERIQUE ARTISTIQUE



Le grand chef d'orchestre Serge Koussevitzky, Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur.

Les circonstances les plus solennelles sont parfois marquées par des manifestations où, inconsciemment peut-être l'humour bruyant atténue les dehors imposés par les conventions sociales. La Légion d'Honneur est incontestablement une institution grave, mais les Parisiens modernes se plaisent à y trouver prétexte à réjouissances, où l'ironie l'emporte sur le sérieux.

Lorsque Serge Koussevitzky fut nommé chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, des compositeurs et des musiciens se groupèrent pour l'honorer et pour lui prouver qu'ils étaient assez ses amis pour se réjouir à ses dépens. Ce fut une soirée où la caricature et le délassement musicaux furent à l'honneur. Serge Koussevitzky fut portraituré dans toutes ses attitudes et jouant des instruments les plus divers.

Le conférencier, Henri Casadesus, qui à ses moments de sérieux est à la tête de la Société des anciens instruments, s'improvise bouffon de la soirée et prit chacun à partie, y compris André Messager, dont le discours de bienvenue avait été des plus posés.

Une pièce pour trombone, de Arthur Honegger, jouée au piano par Alfred Cortot, marqua le début des hostilités. Le compositeur y exprimait, en mesures dolentes, son regret de ne pouvoir prendre part au concert et la gaité clownesque dont il manquerait le spectacle.

Au piano, Paul Dukas confia les pompeuses protestations amicales que lui inspirait l'occasion et la spontanéité avec laquelle il se rendait compte de l'importance de la solennité. Horrifié à la pensée qu'on ne pourrait l'entendre sans le voir, Albert Roussel esquisse une pièce pour basson et contrebasse, en y révélant un don de la facétie que sa courte barbe ne pouvait faire soupçonner.

Le rideau de l'intermède se leva sur la tête rouge de Serge Prokofieff, attelé à un piano automatique dont les accords reconstituaient l'atmosphère artistique de Coney Island. Une céleste volée de harpes, que ponctua du cri de: "Ah! c'est donc ça le ciel!" un auditeur surexcité, fut suivie d'une personnification idyllique de Koussevitzky par Carlos Salzedo. Roland-Manuel et Raymond Charpentier démontrèrent bientôt qu'un instrument aussi inoffensif que la harpe sait être malin.

Alexandre Tansman exprima l'hommage de la Pologne en une pièce de piano; Félia Lidvinne chanta deux airs russes et Paul Le Flem fit entendre un quatuor.

M. Casadesus annonça alors qu'un solennel tribut de respect et de vénération allait être présenté. Une fillette de douze ans avait écrit, en Angleterre, une lettre d'appréciation et une pièce pour clarinette en hommage au célèbre maître d'orchestre. Lorsque le naïf solo eût charmé les tendres oreilles, un choeur de volontaires vint chanter une berceuse, dont le compositeur reste anonyme. Mme Germaine Taillefer, toutefois, tint à décliner toute responsabilité à ce sujet.

Les choristes se plurent pourtant à dire bien haut leurs noms: Hanri Casadesus, soliste; Germaine Taillefer, Madeleine Grovlez, Carlos Salzedo, Maurice Ravel, Florent Schmitt, Albert Roussel, Félia Litvinne, Berthe Bert, Nadia Boulanger, Serge Prokofieff, Alfred Cortot et Marie Miller.

Serge Koussevitzky dut ensuite embrasser chacun des participants sur les deux joues et répondre à ces cérémonies. Il se plut à reconnaître le bon esprit de ces artistes de réputation internationale qui prennent plaisir à oublier leur "soi" pour rire d'eux-même et les uns des autres.

Jacques Rouché, directeur de l'Opéra, ayant l'aspect de Gatti-Casazza et celui d'un directeur d'opéra, était là. D.-E. Ingelbrecht et Jacques Ibert, aussi.

L'Amérique était bien représen- [illegible] Vladimir Shavitch, de l'orches-doivent le faire en Europe.

Paris reste encore le centre d'attraction des musiciens. Leur inspiration y trouve toujours sa pâtée, leur tempérament, sa satisfaction musicale.

---

regular se[illegible] Manhattan, every ticket has been taken for the season. Never before in the history of the orchestra has there been no single seat available for its Boston and Manhattan concerts.

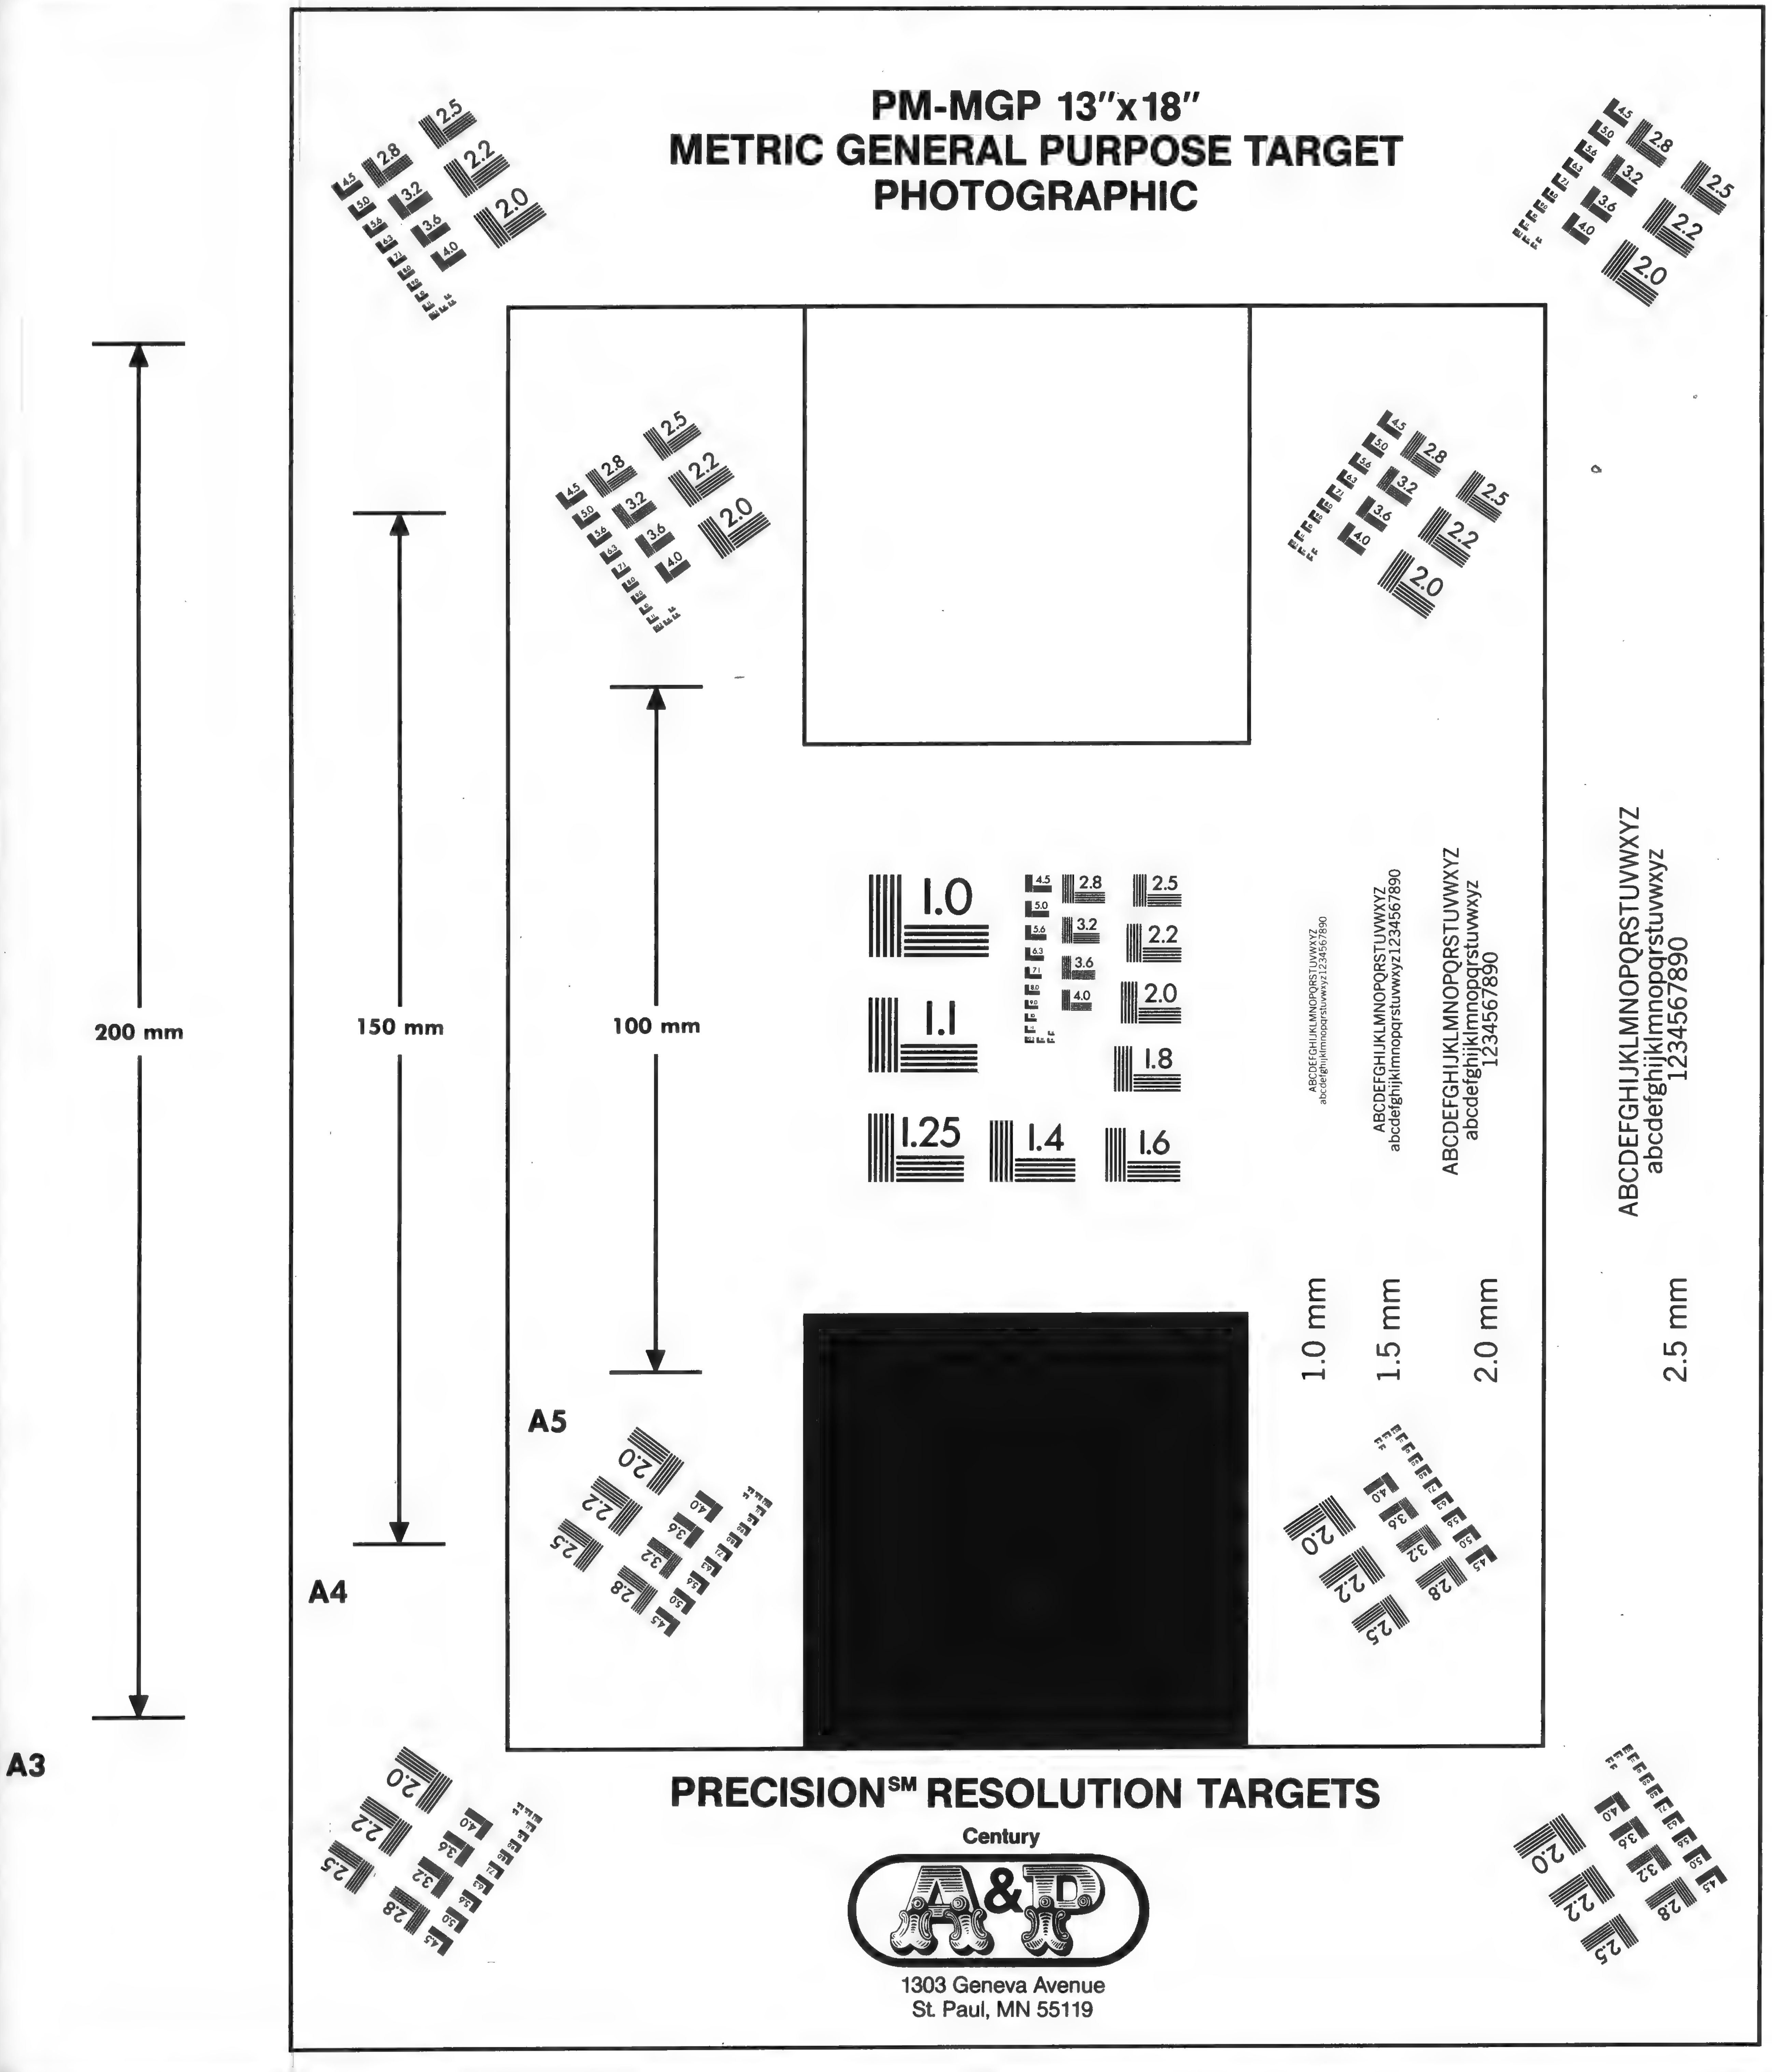
The great success enjoyed by both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that its annual series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music will also be oversubscribed. The dates for these are Friday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 12 and April 9. In the choice of soloists, Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Brooklyn the policy which has been so successful in New York and Boston. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi, but in the interest of special work for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programmes will maintain their symphonic integrity and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programmes and soloists are to be announced before each concert.

[illegible] Conductor who so warmly won over the Boston music lovers on his first appearance here last season promises some very interesting programs for the Fall and Winter.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow, on Tuesday evening, November 3rd. Many interesting stories about this distinguished musician are going the rounds and already Toronto has a pretty good idea of the importance of the man who will conduct the orchestra on this noteworthy occasion. Those who would make sure of accommodation for this concert are well advised to order their seats by mail now.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 17 1925

this newcomer is a master.

Serge Koussevitzky and the 107 men of the great Boston Symphony orchestra will open the foundation's series of six symphonic concerts Wednesday evening, November 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 18 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAMS

Programs of brilliance, variety and musical interest have been arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for his coming appearances here, at Syria Mosque, on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7.

For the Friday evening program Mr. Koussevitzky will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the most popular and best known work of this composer, known as the "Pathetic"; three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—"Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March"—and, for a notable novelty, Ibert's "Escales." This latter work, given its first American performance at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, October 9 and 10, proved a delightful and skillful picturing in music of various Mediterranean ports. The second movement consists of an oboe solo of much charm, while the last abounds in the rhythms of Spain.

The Russian conductor's interpretation of the "Pathetic" symphony, which he will perform for the first time in Boston and America, is eagerly anticipated, since he has already evidenced a special eloquence and sympathy with the music of this composer.

At the Saturday matinee Koussevitzky will perform Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and three excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the "Ride of the Valkries" from "The Valkyrie" prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 18 1925

tion.

Serge Koussevitzky and the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra series will open the six symphonic concerts by visiting orchestras on Wednesday evening, November 4. The Foundation announces that it has almost doubled its record of season sales over that of last year, with a genuine appreciation of these beautiful orchestral concerts growing throughout the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

OCT 17 1925

THE orchestra has been defined as a body of strings with woodwind and brass instruments for incidental color. Despite the efforts of Mr. Stravinsky and other extreme modernists in orchestration as well as in harmonization, to relegate the strings to a secondary position, even banishing them entirely in a few singular compositions, the strings are still the main body of the orchestra and probably will so remain for some time to come.

And in the ensemble, the strings of all the great orchestras sound pretty much alike. Of course, there is a vast advantage in having a concertmaster with the tone of Thadeus Rich when Rimsky's "Scheherazade" is on the program, or exceedingly able solo viola and violoncello players if a conductor desires to play Strauss' "Don Quixote." But, in the main, there is not a vast deal of difference among the really great orchestras, in the tone of the strings in the tuttis and such differences as exist are largely due to the ideas of the conductor as regards pianissimos, fortissimos and general dynamic effects.

But each orchestra will play the same composition with an entirely different effect, even though the interpretation of the various conductors does not differ materially as to general conception. A striking instance of this was given last season when the New York Philhramonic Society Orchestra, under Mr. Mengelberg, played the Beethoven "Erioca" symphony, which was also performed by Mr. Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The same thing might have been noted in the Debussy "Nocturnes" as played by the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Koussevitsky, and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski.

THEREFORE, it makes for musical breath of thought to hear as many orchestras as possible during a season. No matter if the compositions on each program do not duplicate by a single number, there is a new musical viewpoint for the listener.

Due to the efforts of the indefatigable Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, the local Philharmonic Society will provide Philadelphians with the opportunity of hearing three of the great orchestras of the country this year, each under its own permanent leader—so far as any leader of any orchestra can be permanent, always excepting Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch. These orchestras will be the New York Philharmonic, under Mr. Mengleberg; the Bostons, under Mr. Koussevitzky, and the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner.

The New York Philharmonic was here last season and will be here again in a few days through the efforts of the Forum. Last year the Bostons were here under the same auspices. But the Cincinnati Orchestra has not given a concert in Philadelphia for a long time, the last appearance being at a singular—and the word is used advisedly—concert conducted by the then leader, Eugene Ysaye. The Cesar Franck symphony given that evening will linger long in the memory of the more discriminating attendants for more than one reason.

THERE are also rumors that Toscanini will conduct a concert in Philadelphia during his engagement with the New York Philharmonic. He has not led an orchestra in this city since the visit of the "La Scala" Orchestra some years ago, when he introduced to Philadelphia the exquisite "The Fountains of Rome" of Respighi, who will be one of the guest conductors of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the winter vacation of Mr. Stokowski.

Incidentally, since that time Maestro Respighi has composed another tone poem, "The Pines of Rome," which was produced with immense success in Italy last spring. He may possibly conduct this work when he leads the Philadelphia Orchestra, as the program will doubtless be made up largely, if not entirely, of his own compositions. Respighi is today the sole creative talent of Italy in the orchestral forms who really seems to have something to say without expressing it in a distorted form. Those who heard "The Fountains of Rome" under Toscanini will long remember certain phrases of superlative beauty which were interpreted with the utmost musicianship.

The projected series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which a lot was heard after its visit last spring, seems to have fallen through. And in passing, a glimpse at the personnel of this organization shows many changes in some of the leading instruments. Georges Longy, the first of the great French oboe players to come to America, coming about 1898, retires as solo oboe in favor of Francois Gillet, son of the composer. Clement Lenom, second oboe for an equal length of time, has also left the orchestra, and Andre Sand, first clarinet, is succeeded by Emil Allegra. There is also a new first viola and Alwin Schroeder retires from the cellos. Max Hess also retires from the horns and there are numerous changes in the strings.

1207

PART ONE Transcript Oct 17

The Symphony

AN ANCIENT, A ROMANTIC, AND STRAUSS

TRIPLE MEASURE OF MUSIC FROM MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

A Changeful Conductor Upon One and the Same Piece—"Death and Transfiguration" Newly Placed—The Pleasure of Old Corelli and the Infinite Tedium of Berlioz—The "Fantastic Symphony," Now Wizened and Sapless

IT IS not the least of the pleasures of Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor that in repetitions of a given piece he is seldom one and the same. On Thursday evening he included Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," in the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge. Yesterday afternoon, it was middle item upon the program at Symphony Hall. Less than eighteen hours separated the two performances; yet here and there—with every allowance for tricks in the hearer's memory—the second was unlike the first. In Boston, as at Harvard, the conductor kept to the wan and desolate tonal color of the introduction; but the pace was slower as though he would have the music suggest also the monotony of suffering. More furious was the instrumental onslaught of Death. The havoc, more than the bitterness, now engrossed Mr. Koussevitzky. Upon Strauss's violence he pressed his own vehemence. Not so poignant as at Cambridge was the return of the melody of youth remembered; ever so little dulled strode the measures of life in conflict a-making; less apocalyptic was the unfolding of the theme of the transfiguration.

Seemingly, from a sub-conscious change of mood in the conductor sprang deviations in pace, rhythm, graduation, coloring, that in turn altered subtly the hearer's impression. At Cambridge Mr. Koussevitzky tended to subdue the grandiloquence that, in these days, haunts the tone-poem. Through the surfaces, he would pierce to the quick of it; while one or another hearer was moved beyond anticipation. In Boston, those surfaces preoccupied him. To the grandiloquence he lent a more willing ear. Only in the final ascent did the two performances seem identical. Again Mr. Koussevitzky clothed this Transfiguration-Music with a sombre splendor, heroic, elegiac. So doing, he also transfigured a rhetoric of tones into a poetry of music.

Between them, with now and then a visiting conductor to aid, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky have passed in relatively recent review nearly all of Strauss's tone-poems. Of them, "Death and Transfiguration" seems least to endure the wear and change of time, the chance and wastage of the years. "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," are no whit impaired. Firm and high they sit among the masterpieces of music in these days. Pages that pulse with the sensuous passion of sound, vivid with imagery, surcharged with emotion, plumbing deep and sweeping high, still abound in "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Sinfonia Domestica." In both are pages acrid and riotous; upon both at will and need Strauss lays the balm of beauty. By the board go the occasional bombast and bitterness. Aloof rests "Zarathustra," on a lonely height, where meditation and mental process—an action within a mind—become the matter and the voice of music; tour de force by Strauss when he is mos cerebral, tour de force, likewise, of the few conductors who with him may go the course.

"Death and Transfiguration," however, too readily invites questioning. A Koussevitzky must transfigure transfiguration or it becomes very like thick-voiced and glowing rhetoric. Need Death slam and slither, crash and storm through a chromatic fever of tonal melodrama? Not so steals the drum of his step through the wainscot; or falls his creeping, cold-sweating hand. As they now appear, the scheme and the substance of the whole tone-poem are obvious, rhetorical, Lisztian. True, there are saving measures: the melody of youth remembered still pierces the ear to wring the heart; both tingle to the music of life fulfilled; permeating the orchestra, the theme of transfiguration disperses the chromatic mists, stretches wide the tonal horizon. It is the custom to say that the tone-poems of Strauss are the fruition of the symphonic poems of Liszt. "Don Juan" continues them enriched and intensified by younger, ampler, more ardent powers. It also opens the way to "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Domestica." The rondo of Eulenspiegel does not wholly discard the Lisztian precedent, but it sets the course toward the tonal characterization of "Don Quixote" and "Zarathustra." Between the two groups "Death and Transfiguration" stands solitary—Strauss waving the cap of farewell to the best and the worst of all things Lisztian. Henceforth he will be his own Richard.

Before "Death and Transfiguration," strings and organ played a Concerto of Corelli—a Christmas Concerto as he chose to call it, though with no discoverable implication. In 1712 he published it; in modern days Casa Ricordi transcribed it; recently and after a fashion a few heard it in this town from Mr. Martino's orchestra. In turn, Mr. Koussevitzky serves the art of music and the pleasure of audiences equally well when he restores these ancients to conspicuous place in the Symphony Concerts. Into Bostonian ears he has poured afresh Bach and his sons, Handel and his contemporaries; while large are his deserts and theirs. Modernist that he righteously is, he would go himself, and take us listeners with him, to the springs of music. A bath in that source fortifies and purifies us. We slough away thick coats of romantic dross. We wash the scales of habit from our eyes—or rather from our ears. By faith and by works we perceive that from these ancients do our modernists descend and derive.

Yet there are more stimulating ancients than Corelli of yesterday. In spite of our reason, we ask instinctively for another Handel striding in tonal pomps, sounding the depths and scaling the heights of instrumental song; for another Bach from whom music withheld few secrets; whereas Corelli in this Concerto did no more than fashion an ingenious, agreeable music. It was gravely songful and serenely contrapuntal. He made it with scholarship, sentiment, taste and skill. No doubt, his Roman patron, Cardinal Ottoboni, heard it gladly, surrounded by "an elegant circle." It was as welcome in 1925 to the larger and more miscellaneous company of Symphony Hall. Well within the prowess of Mr. Koussevitzky's string choir it also remained. Our twentieth-century imaginations touched it with melancholy.

The other half of the concert fell to Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which music it is incumbent upon every conductor to revive—at decent intervals. According to the composer, it covers 2300 sheets. By the watch, with the shortest of pauses, it consumes five-and-fifty minutes—"precious minutes" as teachers in kindergarten and Sunday School used to call them. Yet double those sheets and thrice that hour seems the tedium of this withered and creaking symphony—tedium unrelieved save in the briefest of the five episodes, "The March to the Scaffold." There the rhythms still bite; the massed tone pounds; Berlioz evokes the desired phantasmagoria; while for once he is short-breathed. But the rest, the monotonous, endless, exasperating and exhausting rest—those sapless melodies diagrammed, those wizened modulations underscored; that harmonic and instrumental color forever writing labels; that whole musical structure and substance by a precisian's lean and bony hand laboriously articulated.

Down the wind long since blew the romantic frippery that passes for Berlioz's poetic scheme—"l'idée fixe," or the bright and beautiful vision; Monsieur le jeune artiste tossed on "le vague de passion," mooning about the ball-room and the hedge-rows, plunging into the tonal debauchery of Marches to the Scaffold and Infernal Sabbaths. The second-rate romanticism of the Parisian thirties wound, re-wound and wound again into a music as creaking, stripped and lifeless as dead boughs in autumn. As well resurrect Dumas's "Tour de Nesle" out of the melodrama of those vanished thirties as this "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz. Twenty Koussevitzkys and ten Boston Orchestras could not prevail against these dry and marrowless bon most of the tr a classic; wh viewing salutes terpiece. Cheer laws sit in con we might even noses.

New! From Stravinsky

Boston at Last to Hear "The Song of the Nightingale"

BEFORE LONG, Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the Symphony Concerts a celebrated piece by Stravinsky as yet unheard in Boston—"The Song of the Nightingale," final distillation into a tone-poem of music first written as opera, next transformed into ballet-pantomime. It is not music in the manner of "The Fire-Bird" or "Petrushka" or "The Rite of Spring." Yet it partakes of the nature of all three. At moments it stirs with bustle, or runs sharp with characterization. Again it touches beauty; while everywhere imagination quickens or glamours it. Two years ago New York first heard the tone-poem. Many times it was repeated there.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

T 18 1925

Boston Symphony Plans Announced

Preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of five concerts to be given in Providence this season has just been received in this city. The programmes by Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra of 107 musicians will be given at 8:15 o'clock on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16. There were rumors in local musical circles that the concer would not be given in Infantry Hall t year, following announcement that building was to be razed soon, but management says the orchestra will appear at the hall one more season, as the structure is not be demolished until next spring.

Serge Koussevitzky, a year ago known to the American public only by hearsay, begins his second season at the head of the Boston orchestra holding the attention of the country as a rare force and a striking personality. His success in Providence last year was duplicated in every city where he appeared, and in a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the concensus of opinion about no other seems to have been so high.

In Europe, the conductor likewise remains one of the great figures in music. Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were among the important events of the season. Shortly after his return from America he was decorated by France as "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation for which they wrote and performed special music.

Names of soloists to appear in Providence have not been announced, but in the choice of these artists Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Providence the ploicy which has been successful in Boston and New York. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi; but in the interest of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Within five years the number of concerts in Greater Boston has incerased from 58 to 75, and this has led to a curtailment of the orchestra's schedule elsewhere. Providence remains one of the few New England cities visited by the organization.

* * *

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 1 7 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow, on Tuesday evening, November 3rd. Many interesting stories about this distinguished musician are going the rounds and already Toronto has a pretty good idea of the importance of the man who will conduct the orchestra on this noteworthy occasion. Those who would make sure of accommodation for this concert are well advised to order their seats by mail now.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 1 7 1925

Serge Koussevitzky and the 107 men of the great Boston Symphony orchestra will open the foundation's series of six symphonic concerts Wednesday evening, November 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 1 8 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAMS

Programs of brilliance, variety and musical interest have been arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for his coming appearances here, at Syria Mosque, on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7.

For the Friday evening program Mr. Koussevitzky will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the most popular and best known work of this composer, known as the "Pathetic"; three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—"Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March"—and, for a notable novelty, Ibert's "Escales." This latter work, given its first American performance at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, October 9 and 10, proved a delightful and skillful picturing in music of various Mediterranean ports. The second movement consists of an oboe solo of much charm, while the last abounds in the rhythms of Spain.

The Russian conductor's interpretation of the "Pathetic" symphony, which he will perform for the first time in Boston and America, is eagerly anticipated, since he has already evidenced a special eloquence and sympathy with the music of this composer.

At the Saturday matinee Koussevitzky will perform Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and three excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the "Ride of the Valkries" from "The Valkyrie" prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 1 8 1925

Serge Koussevitzky and the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra series will open the six symphonic concerts by visiting orchestras on Wednesday evening, November 4. The Foundation announces that it has almost doubled its record of season sales over that of last year, with a genuine appreciation of these beautiful orchestral concerts growing throughout the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

OCT 1 7 1925

THE orchestra has been defined as a body of strings with woodwind and brass instruments for incidental color. Despite the efforts of Mr. Stravinsky and other extreme modernists in orchestration as well as in harmonization, to relegate the strings to a secondary position, even banishing them entirely in a few singular compositions, the strings are still the main body of the orchestra and probably will so remain for some time to come.

And in the ensemble, the strings of all the great orchestras sound pretty much alike. Of course, there is a vast advantage in having a concertmaster with the tone of Thadeus Rich when Rimsky's "Scheherazade" is on the program, or exceedingly able solo viola and violoncello players if a conductor desires to play Strauss' "Don Quixote." But, in the main, there is not a vast deal of difference among the really great orchestras, in the tone of the strings in the tuttis and such differences as exist are largely due to the ideas of the conductor as regards pianissimos, fortissimos and general dynamic effects.

But each orchestra will play the same composition with an entirely different effect, even though the interpretation of the various conductors does not differ materially as to general conception. A striking instance of this was given last season when the New York Philhramonic Society Orchestra, under Mr. Mengelberg, played the Beethoven "Erioca" symphony, which was also performed by Mr. Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The same thing might have been noted in the Debussy "Nocturnes" as played by the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Koussevitsky, and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski.

THEREFORE, it makes for musical breath of thought to hear as many orchestras as possible during a season. No matter if the compositions on each program do not duplicate by a single number, there is a new musical viewpoint for the listener.

Due to the efforts of the indefatigable Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, the local Philharmonic Society will provide Philadelphians with the opportunity of hearing three of the great orchestras of the country this year, each under its own permanent leader—so far as any leader of any orchestra can be permanent, always excepting Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch. These orchestras will be the New York Philharmonic, under Mr. Mengleberg; the Bostons, under Mr. Koussevitsky, and the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner.

The New York Philharmonic was here last season and will be here again in a few days through the efforts of the Forum. Last year the Bostons were here under the same auspices. But the Cincinnati Orchestra has not given a concert in Philadelphia for a long time, the last appearance being at a singular—and the word is used advisedly—cencert conducted by the then leader, Eugene Ysaye. The Cesar Franck symphony given that evening will linger long in the memory of the more discriminating attendants for more than one reason.

THERE are also rumors that Toscanini will conduct a concert in Philadelphia during his engagement with the New York Philharmonic. He has not led an orchestra in this city since the visit of the "La Scala" Orchestra some years ago, when he introduced to Philadelphia the exquisite "The Fountains of Rome" of Respighi, who will be one of the guest conductors of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the winter vacation of Mr. Stokowski.

Incidentally, since that time Maestro Respighi has composed another tone poem, "The Pines of Rome," which was produced with immense success in Italy last spring. He may possibly conduct this work when he leads the Philadelphia Orchestra, as the program will doubtless be made up largely, if not entirely, of his own compositions. Respighi is today the sole creative talent of Italy in the orchestral forms who really seems to have something to say without expressing it in a distorted form. Those who heard "The Fountains of Rome" under Toscanini will long remember certain phrases of superlative beauty which were interpreted with the utmost musicianship.

The projected series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which a lot was heard after its visit last spring, seems to have fallen through. And in passing, a glimpse at the personnel of this organization shows many changes in some of the leading instruments. Georges Longy, the first of the great French oboe players to come to America, coming about 1898, retires as solo oboe in favor of Francois Gillet, son of the composer. Clement Lenom, second oboe for an equal length of time, has also left the orchestra, and Andre Sand, first clarinet, is succeeded by Emil Allegra. There is also a new first viola and Alwin Schroeder retires from the cellos. Max Hess also retires from the horns and there are numerous changes in the strings.

1207

PART ONE Transcript Oct 17

The Symphony

AN ANCIENT, A ROMANTIC, AND STRAUSS

TRIPLE MEASURE OF MUSIC FROM MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

A Changeful Conductor Upon One and the Same Piece—"Death and Transfiguration" Newly Placed—The Pleasure of Old Corelli and the Infinite Tedium of Berlioz—The "Fantastic Symphony," Now Wizened and Sapless

IT IS not the least of the pleasures of Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor that in repetitions of a given piece he is seldom one and the same. On Thursday evening he included Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," in the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge. Yesterday afternoon, it was middle item upon the program at Symphony Hall. Less than eighteen hours separated the two performances; yet here and there—with every allowance for tricks in the hearer's memory—the second was unlike the first. In Boston, as at Harvard, the conductor kept to the wan and desolate tonal color of the introduction; but the pace was slower as though he would have the music suggest also the monotony of suffering. More furious was the instrumental onslaught of Death. The havoc, more than the bitterness, now engrossed Mr. Koussevitzky. Upon Strauss's violence he pressed his own vehemence. Not so poignant as at Cambridge was the return of the melody of youth remembered; ever so little dulled strode the measures of life in conflict a-making; less apocalyptic was the unfolding of the theme of the transfiguration.

Seemingly, from a sub-conscious change of mood in the conductor sprang deviations in pace, rhythm, graduation, coloring, that in turn altered subtly the hearer's impression. At Cambridge Mr. Koussevitzky tended to subdue the grandiloquence that, in these days, haunts the tone-poem. Through the surfaces, he would pierce to the quick of it; while one or another hearer was moved beyond anticipation. In Boston, those surfaces preoccupied him. To the grandiloquence he lent a more willing ear. Only in the final ascent did the two performances seem identical. Again Mr. Koussevitzky clothed this Transfiguration-Music with a sombre splendor, heroic, elegiac. So doing, he also transfigured a rhetoric of tones into a poetry of music.

Between them, with now and then a visiting conductor to aid, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky have passed in relatively recent review nearly all of Strauss's tone-poems. Of them, "Death and Transfiguration" seems least to endure the wear and change of time, the chance and wastage of the years. "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," are no whit impaired. Firm and high they sit among the masterpieces of music in these days. Pages that pulse with the sensuous passion of sound, vivid with imagery, surcharged with emotion, plumbing deep and sweeping high, still abound in "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Sinfonia Domestica." In both are pages acrid and riotous; upon both at will and need Strauss lays the balm of beauty. By the board go the occasional bombast and bitterness. Aloof rests "Zarathustra," on a lonely height, where meditation and mental process—an action within a mind—become the matter and the voice of music; tour de force by Strauss when he is mos cerebral, tour de force, likewise, of the few conductors who with him may go the course.

"Death and Transfiguration," however, too readily invites questioning. A Koussevitzky must transfigure transfiguration or it becomes very like thick-voiced and glowing rhetoric. Need Death slam and slither, crash and storm through a chromatic fever of tonal melodrama? Not so steals the drum of his step through the wainscot; or falls his creeping, cold-sweating hand. As they now appear, the scheme and the substance of the whole tone-poem are obvious, rhetorical, Lisztian. True, there are saving measures: the melody of youth remembered still pierces the ear to wring the heart; both tingle to the music of life fulfilled; permeating the orchestra, the theme of transfiguration disperses the chromatic mists, stretches wide the tonal horizon. It is the custom to say that the tone-poems of Strauss are the fruition of the symphonic poems of Liszt. "Don Juan" continues them enriched and intensified by younger, ampler, more ardent powers. It also opens the way to "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Domestica." The rondo of Eulenspiegel does not wholly discard the Lisztian precedent, but it sets the course toward the tonal characterization of "Don Quixote" and "Zarathustra." Between the two groups "Death and Transfiguration" stands solitary—Strauss waving the cap of farewell to the best and the worst of all things Lisztian. Henceforth he will be his own Richard.

Before "Death and Transfiguration," strings and organ played a Concerto of Corelli—a Christmas Concerto as he chose to call it, though with no discoverable implication. In 1712 he published it; in modern days Casa Ricordi transcribed it, recently and after a fashion a few heard it in this town from Mr. Martino's orchestra. In turn, Mr. Koussevitzky serves the art of music and the pleasure of audiences equally well when he restores these ancients to conspicuous place in the Symphony Concerts. Into Bostonian ears he has poured afresh Bach and his sons, Handel and his contemporaries; while large are his deserts and theirs. Modernist that he righteously is, he would go himself, and take us listeners with him, to the springs of music. A bath in that source fortifies and purifies us. We slough away thick coats of romantic dross. We wash the scales of habit from our eyes—or rather from our ears. By faith and by works we perceive that from these ancients do our modernists descend and derive.

Yet there are more stimulating ancients than Corelli of yesterday. In spite of our reason, we ask instinctively for another Handel striding in tonal pomps, sounding the depths and scaling the heights of instrumental song; for another Bach from whom music withheld few secrets; whereas Corelli in this Concerto did no more than fashion an ingenious, agreeable music. It was gravely songful and serenely contrapuntal. He made it with scholarship, sentiment, taste and skill. No doubt, his Roman patron, Cardinal Ottoboni, heard it gladly, surrounded by "an elegant circle." It was as welcome in 1925 to the larger and more miscellaneous company of Symphony Hall. Well within the prowess of Mr. Koussevitzky's string choir it also remained. Our twentieth-century imaginations touched it with melancholy.

The other half of the concert fell to Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which music it is incumbent upon every conductor to revive—at decent intervals. According to the composer, it covers 2300 sheets. By the watch, with the shortest of pauses, it consumes five-and-fifty minutes—"precious minutes" as teachers in kindergarten and Sunday School used to call them. Yet double those sheets and thrice that hour seems the tedium of this withered and creaking symphony—tedium unrelieved save in the briefest of the five episodes, "The March to the Scaffold." There the rhythms still bite; the massed tone pounds; Berlioz evokes the desired phantasmagoria; while for once he is short-breathed. But the rest, the monotonous, endless, exasperating and exhausting rest—those sapless melodies diagrammed, those wizened modulations underscored; that harmonic and instrumental color forever writing labels; that whole musical structure and substance by a precisian's lean and bony hand laboriously articulated.

Down the wind long since blew the romantic frippery that passes for Berlioz's poetic scheme—"l'idée fixe," or the bright and beautiful vision; Monsieur le jeune artiste tossed on "le vague de passion," mooning about the ball-room and the hedge-rows, plunging into the tonal debauchery of Marches to the Scaffold and Infernal Sabbaths. The second-rate romanticism of the Parisian thirties wound, re-wound and wound again into a music as creaking, stripped and lifeless as dead boughs in autumn. As well resurrect Dumas's "Tour de Nesle" out of the melodrama of those vanished thirties as this "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz. Twenty Koussevitzkys and ten Boston Orchestras could not prevail against these dry and marrowless bon most of the tr
a classic; wh viewing salutes terpiece. Cheer laws sit in con
we might ever noses.

New! From Stravinsky

Boston at Last to Hear "The Song of the Nightingale"

BEFORE LONG, Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the Symphony Concerts a celebrated piece by Stravinsky as yet unheard in Boston—"The Song of the Nightingale," final distillation into a tone-poem of music first written as opera, next transformed into ballet-pantomime. It is not music in the manner of "The Fire-Bird" or "Petrushka" or "The Rite of Spring." Yet it partakes of the nature of all three. At moments it stirs with bustle, or runs sharp with characterization. Again it touches beauty; while everywhere imagination quickens or glamours it. Two years ago New York first heard the tone-poem. Many times it was repeated there.

VIOLINIST

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

T 1 8 1925

Boston Symphony Plans Announced

Preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of five concerts to be given in Providence this season has just been received in this city. The programmes by Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra of 107 musicians will be given at 8:15 o'clock on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16. There were rumors in local musical circles that the concer would not be given in Infantry Hall this year, following announcement that the building was to be razed soon, but the management says the orchestra will appear at the hall one more season, as the structure is not be demolished until next spring.

Serge Koussevitzky, a year ago known to the American public only by hearsay, begins his second season at the head of the Boston orchestra holding the attention of the country as a rare force and a striking personality. His success in Providence last year was duplicated in every city where he appeared, and in a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the concensus of opinion about no other seems to have been so high.

In Europe, the conductor likewise remains one of the great figures in music. Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were among the important events of the season. Shortly after his return from America he was decorated by France as "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation for which they wrote and performed special music.

Names of soloists to appear in Providence have not been announced, but in the choice of these artists Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Providence the ploicy which has been successful in Boston and New York. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi; but in the interest of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Within five years the number of concerts in Greater Boston has incerased from 58 to 75, and this has led to a curtailment of the orchestra's schedule elsewhere. Providence remains one of the few New England cities visited by the organization.

* * *

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 17 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow, on Tuesday evening, November 3rd. Many interesting stories about this distinguished musician are going the rounds and already Toronto has a pretty good idea of the importance of the man who will conduct the orchestra on this noteworthy occasion. Those who would make sure of accommodation for this concert are well advised to order their seats by mail now.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 17 1925

This newcomer is a master.

Serge Koussevitzky and the 107 men of the great Boston Symphony orchestra will open the foundation's series of six symphonic concerts Wednesday evening, November 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 18 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAMS

Programs of brilliance, variety and musical interest have been arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for his coming appearances here, at Syria Mosque, on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7.

For the Friday evening program Mr. Koussevitzky will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the most popular and best known work of this composer, known as the "Pathetic"; three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—"Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March"—and, for a notable novelty, Ibert's "Escales." This latter work, given its first American performance at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, October 9 and 10, proved a delightful and skillful picturing in music of various Mediterranean ports. The second movement consists of an oboe solo of much charm, while the last abounds in the rhythms of Spain.

The Russian conductor's interpretation of the "Pathetic" symphony, which he will perform for the first time in Boston and America, is eagerly anticipated, since he has already evidenced a special eloquence and sympathy with the music of this composer.

At the Saturday matinee Koussevitzky will perform Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and three excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the "Ride of the Valkries" from "The Valkyrie" prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 18 1925

tion.

Serge Koussevitzky and the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra series will open the six symphonic concerts by visiting orchestras on Wednesday evening, November 4. The Foundation announces that it has almost doubled its record of season sales over that of last year, with a genuine appreciation of these beautiful orchestral concerts growing throughout the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

OCT 17 1925

THE orchestra has been defined as a body of strings with woodwind and brass instruments for incidental color. Despite the efforts of Mr. Stravinsky and other extreme modernists in orchestration as well as in harmonization, to relegate the strings to a secondary position, even banishing them entirely in a few singular compositions, the strings are still the main body of the orchestra and probably will so remain for some time to come.

And in the ensemble, the strings of all the great orchestras sound pretty much alike. Of course, there is a vast advantage in having a concertmaster with the tone of Thadeus Rich when Rimsky's "Scheherazade" is on the program, or exceedingly able solo viola and violoncello players if a conductor desires to play Strauss' "Don Quixote." But, in the main, there is not a vast deal of difference among the really great orchestras, in the tone of the strings in the tuttis and such differences as exist are largely due to the ideas of the conductor as regards pianissimos, fortissimos and general dynamic effects.

But each orchestra will play the same composition with an entirely different effect, even though the interpretation of the various conductors does not differ materially as to general conception. A striking instance of this was given last season when the New York Philhramonic Society Orchestra, under Mr. Mengelberg, played the Beethoven "Erioca" symphony, which was also performed by Mr. Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The same thing might have been noted in the Debussy "Nocturnes" as played by the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Koussevitsky, and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski.

THEREFORE, it makes for musical breath of thought to hear as many orchestras as possible during a season. No matter if the compositions on each program do not duplicate by a single number, there is a new musical viewpoint for the listener.

Due to the efforts of the indefatigable Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, the local Philharmonic Society will provide Philadelphians with the opportunity of hearing three of the great orchestras of the country this year, each under its own permanent leader—so far as any leader of any orchestra can be permanent, always excepting Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch. These orchestras will be the New York Philharmonic, under Mr. Mengleberg; the Bostons, under Mr. Koussevitsky, and the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner.

The New York Philharmonic was here last season and will be here again in a few days through the efforts of the Forum. Last year the Bostons were here under the same auspices. But the Cincinnati Orchestra has not given a concert in Philadelphia for a long time, the last appearance being at a singular—and the word is used advisedly—concert conducted by the then leader, Eugene Ysaye. The Cesar Franck symphony given that evening will linger long in the memory of the more discriminating attendants for more than one reason.

THERE are also rumors that Toscanini will conduct a concert in Philadelphia during his engagement with the New York Philharmonic. He has not led an orchestra in this city since the visit of the "La Scala" Orchestra some years ago, when he introduced to Philadelphia the exquisite "The Fountains of Rome" of Respighi, who will be one of the guest conductors of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the winter vacation of Mr. Stokowski.

Incidentally, since that time Maestro Respighi has composed another tone poem, "The Pines of Rome," which was produced with immense success in Italy last spring. He may possibly conduct this work when he leads the Philadelphia Orchestra, as the program will doubtless be made up largely, if not entirely, of his own compositions. Respighi is today the sole creative talent of Italy in the orchestral forms who really seems to have something to say without expressing it in a distorted form. Those who heard "The Fountains of Rome" under Toscanini will long remember certain phrases of superlative beauty which were interpreted with the utmost musicianship.

The projected series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which a lot was heard after its visit last spring, seems to have fallen through. And in passing, a glimpse at the personnel of this organization shows many changes in some of the leading instruments. Georges Longy, the first of the great French oboe players to come to America, coming about 1898, retires as solo oboe in favor of Francois Gillet, son of the composer. Clement Lenom, second oboe for an equal length of time, has also left the orchestra, and Andre Sand, first clarinet, is succeeded by Emil Allegra. There is also a new first viola and Alwin Schroeder retires from the cellos. Max Hess also retires from the horns and there are numerous changes in the strings.

127

PART ONE Transcript Oct 17

The Symphony

AN ANCIENT, A ROMANTIC, AND STRAUSS

TRIPLE MEASURE OF MUSIC FROM MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

A Changeful Conductor Upon One and the Same Piece—"Death and Transfiguration" Newly Placed—The Pleasure of Old Corelli and the Infinite Tedium of Berlioz—The "Fantastic Symphony," Now Wizened and Sapless

IT IS not the least of the pleasures of Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor that in repetitions of a given piece he is seldom one and the same. On Thursday evening he included Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," in the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge. Yesterday afternoon, it was middle item upon the program at Symphony Hall. Less than eighteen hours separated the two performances; yet here and there—with every allowance for tricks in the hearer's memory—the second was unlike the first. In Boston, as at Harvard, the conductor kept to the wan and desolate tonal color of the introduction; but the pace was slower as though he would have the music suggest also the monotony of suffering. More furious was the instrumental onslaught of Death. The havoc, more than the bitterness, now engrossed Mr. Koussevitzky. Upon Strauss's violence he pressed his own vehemence. Not so poignant as at Cambridge was the return of the melody of youth remembered; ever so little dulled strode the measures of life in conflict a-making; less apocalyptic was the unfolding of the theme of the transfiguration.

Seemingly, from a sub-conscious change of mood in the conductor sprang deviations in pace, rhythm, graduation, coloring, that in turn altered subtly the hearer's impression. At Cambridge Mr. Koussevitzky tended to subdue the grandiloquence that, in these days, haunts the tone-poem. Through the surfaces, he would pierce to the quick of it; while one or another hearer was moved beyond anticipation. In Boston, those surfaces preoccupied him. To the grandiloquence he lent a more willing ear. Only in the final ascent did the two performances seem identical. Again Mr. Koussevitzky clothed this Transfiguration-Music with a sombre splendor, heroic, elegiac. So doing, he also transfigured a rhetoric of tones into a poetry of music.

Between them, with now and then a visiting conductor to aid, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky have passed in relatively recent review nearly all of Strauss's tone-poems. Of them, "Death and Transfiguration" seems least to endure the wear and change of time, the chance and wastage of the years. "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," are no whit impaired. Firm and high they sit among the masterpieces of music in these days. Pages that pulse with the sensuous passion of sound, vivid with imagery, surcharged with emotion, plumbing deep and sweeping high, still abound in "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Sinfonia Domestica." In both are pages acrid and riotous; upon both at will and need Strauss lays the balm of beauty. By the board go the occasional bombast and bitterness. Aloof rests "Zarathustra," on a lonely height, where meditation and mental process—an action within a mind—become the matter and the voice of music; tour de force by Strauss when he is mos cerebral, tour de force, likewise, of the few conductors who with him may go the course.

"Death and Transfiguration," however, too readily invites questioning. A Koussevitzky must transfigure transfiguration or it becomes very like thick-voiced and glowing rhetoric. Need Death slam and slither, crash and storm through a chromatic fever of tonal melodrama? Not so steals the drum of his step through the wainscot; or falls his creeping, cold-sweating hand. As they now appear, the scheme and the substance of the whole tone-poem are obvious, rhetorical, Lisztian. True, there are saving measures: the melody of youth remembered still pierces the ear to wring the heart; both tingle to the music of life fulfilled; permeating the orchestra, the theme of transfiguration disperses the chromatic mists, stretches wide the tonal horizon. It is the custom to say that the tone-poems of Strauss are the fruition of the symphonic poems of Liszt. "Don Juan" continues them enriched and intensified by younger, ampler, more ardent powers. It also opens the way to "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Domestica." The rondo of Eulenspiegel does not wholly discard the Lisztian precedent, but it sets the course toward the tonal characterization of "Don Quixote" and "Zarathustra." Between the two groups "Death and Transfiguration" stands solitary—Strauss waving the cap of farewell to the best and the worst of all things Lisztian. Henceforth he will be his own Richard.

Before "Death and Transfiguration," strings and organ played a Concerto of Corelli—a Christmas Concerto as he chose to call it, though with no discoverable implication. In 1712 he published it; in modern days Casa Ricordi transcribed it, recently and after a fashion a few heard it in this town from Mr. Martino's orchestra. In turn, Mr. Koussevitzky serves the art of music and the pleasure of audiences equally well when he restores these ancients to conspicuous place in the Symphony Concerts. Into Bostonian ears he has poured afresh Bach and his sons, Handel and his contemporaries; while large are his deserts and theirs. Modernist that he righteously is, he would go himself, and take us listeners with him, to the springs of music. A bath in that source fortifies and purifies us. We slough away thick coats of romantic dross. We wash the scales of habit from our eyes—or rather from our ears. By faith and by works we perceive that from these ancients do our modernists descend and derive.

Yet there are more stimulating ancients than Corelli of yesterday. In spite of our reason, we ask instinctively for another Handel striding in tonal pomps, sounding the depths and scaling the heights of instrumental song; for another Bach from whom music withheld few secrets; whereas Corelli in this Concerto did no more than fashion an ingenious, agreeable music. It was gravely songful and serenely contrapuntal. He made it with scholarship, sentiment, taste and skill. No doubt, his Roman patron, Cardinal Ottoboni, heard it gladly, surrounded by "an elegant circle." It was as welcome in 1925 to the larger and more miscellaneous company of Symphony Hall. Well within the prowess of Mr. Koussevitzky's string choir it also remained. Our twentieth-century imaginations touched it with melancholy.

The other half of the concert fell to Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which music it is incumbent upon every conductor to revive—at decent intervals. According to the composer, it covers 2300 sheets. By the watch, with the shortest of pauses, it consumes five-and-fifty minutes—"precious minutes" as teachers in kindergarten and Sunday School used to call them. Yet double those sheets and thrice that hour seems the tedium of this withered and creaking symphony—tedium unrelieved save in the briefest of the five episodes, "The March to the Scaffold." There the rhythms still bite; the massed tone pounds; Berlioz evokes the desired phantasmagoria; while for once he is short-breathed. But the rest, the monotonous, endless, exasperating and exhausting rest—those sapless melodies diagrammed, those wizened modulations underscored; that harmonic and instrumental color forever writing labels; that whole musical structure and substance by a precisian's lean and bony hand laboriously articulated.

Down the wind long since blew the romantic frippery that passes for Berlioz's poetic scheme—"l'idée fixe," or the bright and beautiful vision; Monsieur le jeune artiste tossed on "le vague de passion," mooning about the ball-room and the hedge-rows, plunging into the tonal debauchery of Marches to the Scaffold and Infernal Sabbaths. The second-rate romanticism of the Parisian thirties wound, re-wound and wound again into a music as creaking, stripped and lifeless as dead boughs in autumn. As well resurrect Dumas's "Tour de Nesle" out of the melodrama of those vanished thirties as this "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz. Twenty Koussevitzkys and ten Boston Orchestras could not prevail against these dry and marrowless bones. True, all the books and most of the traditions say that they are a classic; while every "dean" of reviewing salutes them as a hallowed masterpiece. Cheerfully we outcasts and outlaws sit in contempt of court. Less bored, we might even thumb our mannerless noses.

H. T. P.

New! From Stravinsky

Boston at Last to Hear "The Song of the Nightingale"

BEFORE LONG, Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the Symphony Concerts a celebrated piece by Stravinsky as yet unheard in Boston—"The Song of the Nightingale," final distillation into a tone-poem of music first written as opera, next transformed into ballet-pantomime. It is not music in the manner of "The Fire-Bird" or "Petrushka" or "The Rite of Spring." Yet it partakes of the nature of all three. At moments it stirs with bustle, or runs sharp with characterization. Again it touches beauty; while everywhere imagination quickens or glamours it. Two years ago New York first heard the tone-poem. Many times it was repeated there.

VIOLINIST FROM PORTUGAL

---

concerts

season has just been received city. The programmes by Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra of 107 musicians will be given at 8:15 o'clock on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16. There were rumors in local musical circles that the concer would not be given in Infantry Hall year, following announcement that building was to be razed soon, but management says the orchestra will appear at the hall one more season, as the structure is not be demolished until next spring.

Serge Koussevitzky, a year ago known to the American public only by hearsay, begins his second season at the head of the Boston orchestra holding the attention of the country as a rare force and a striking personality. His success in Providence last year was duplicated in every city where he appeared, and in a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the concensus of opinion about no other seems to have been so high.

In Europe, the conductor likewise remains one of the great figures in music. Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were among the important events of the season. Shortly after his return from America he was decorated by France as "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation for which they wrote and performed special music.

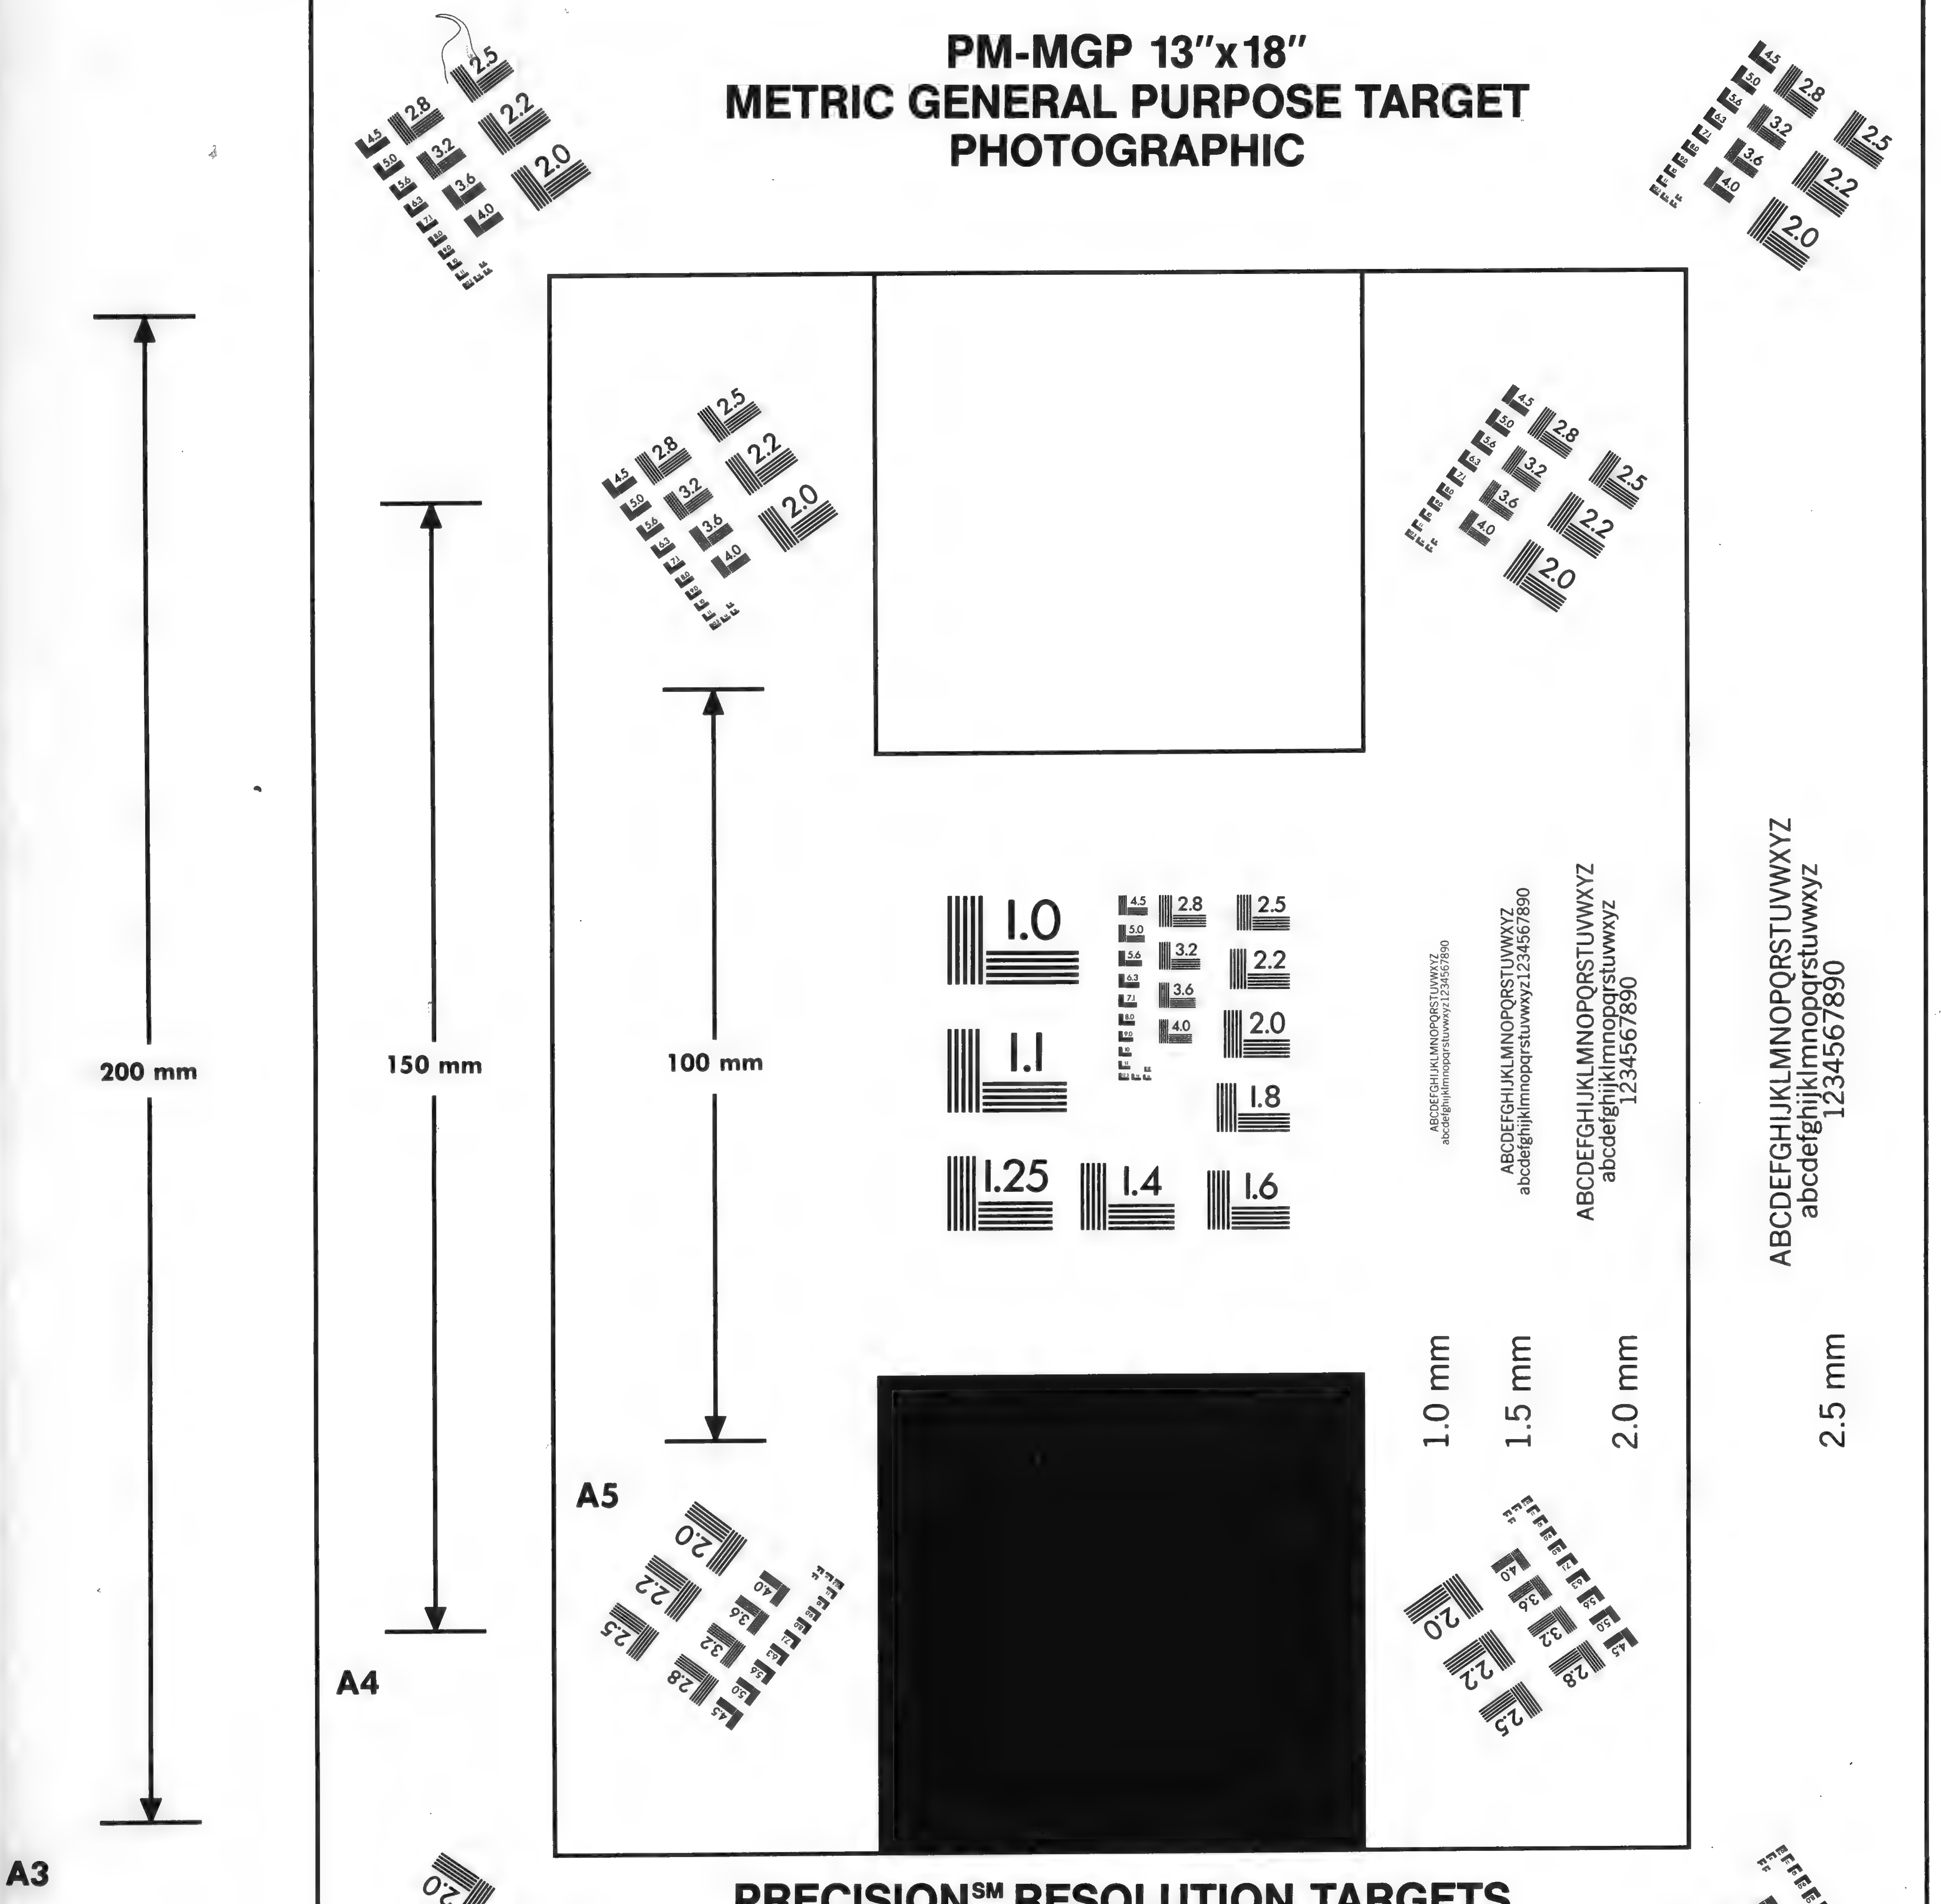
Names of soloists to appear in Providence have not been announced, but in the choice of these artists Mr. Koussevitzky will adopt in Providence the ploicy which has been successful in Boston and New York. They will be selected not only for their abilities as virtuosi; but in the interest of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Within five years the number of concerts in Greater Boston has incerased from 58 to 75, and this has led to a curtailment of the orchestra's schedule elsewhere. Providence remains one of the few New England cities visited by the organization.

* * *

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

1258

OCT 18 1925

Eminent Soloists for Boston Symphony Concerts

In the choice of soloists for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music this season, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will adopt the policy which has been so successful in Boston, selecting soloists not only for their ability as virtuosi, but in the interests of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programs will maintain their symphonic integrity and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programs and soloists will be announced before each concert.

All seats for the Boston Symhhony concerts in Manhattan, Boston an Cambridge have been sold for the sea son, a situation unprecedented, in th history of the orchestra. The succe of both orchestra and conductor Brooklyn last season indicates that th Academy of Music series will also oversubscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 18 1925

In selecting soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music this season, Serge Koussewitsky will consider not only the artists' virtuosity and fame but also their special qualification for the performance of works selected. Both programs and soloists will be announced some time before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—MASSEY HALL.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. The New York and Boston, as well as other leading musical papers, have had columns of space devoted to the career of Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
ZITS

OCT 17 1925

HUB WELCOMES CONDUCTOR

Boston, Oct. 14.—Serge Koussevitzky was welcomed back this week at the opening of the 45th symphony season. On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds the Symphony Orchestra started a season with [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

OCT 17 1925

NUMBERS 112 MUSICIANS
Boston Symphony Orchestra at Forum November 2

At the concert to be given in the Forum on Monday evening, November 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be composed of one hundred and twelve musicians, which will make it the largest orchestra that has ever visited Montreal. The coming of this organization is of special interest to the musical public, because with it will come for the first time, Serge Koussevitzky, who is considered today one of the outstanding conductors of the present day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 18 1925

estra Busy

itzky, brilliant
r of the Boston
tra, has
of that fam
will be unable to

PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

OCT 18 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, has arranged programs that will combine musical brilliance with variety, it was announced.

For the Friday evening concert the orchestra will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetic," and other orchestral numbers of equal brilliance. Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and the overture to "Tannhauser," are included in Saturday's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

OCT 19 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY
Koussevitzky Conducts Twice

Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on each of its two appearances in Washington this season, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene has become, in his first season at the head of this famous organization, one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music. In Europe likewise, Koussevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors.

Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of "guest" appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem.

The orchestra's first appearance will be as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greent's Artist's Course while its second appearance will be as one of the concerts in that manager's philharmonic series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 21 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE
To Bring Many Notables Here for Season 192[illegible]-1926.

The subscription [illegible] for the Sedgwick concert course [illegible] 1925-1926 is now open and seats [illegible] be obtained in person or by mail [illegible] McCoy's Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. All checks should be addressed to F[illegible]k A. Sedgwick. The Sedgwick course offers for this season two of the world's greatest musical attractions, both [illegible] which will be heard on Sunday afternoons at the Capitol theater. The first concert offers Giovanni Martinelli, the world renowned tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company on January 24, and the second concert on February 7 offers the ranking orchestra of the world—the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian conductor.

The return [illegible] Martinelli to the season's list of musical attractions is certain to find high favor with local music lovers. He is easily the most popular and colorful [illegible] all operatic tenors and a rara avis among them, for he is as famous for his song recitals as for his work on the stage of the world's greatest opera house. Whether in London, Milan, Havana, Mexico City, Buenos Aires [illegible] New York city, where he has appeared for the tenth successive season as one of the leading tenors of the Metropolitan Opera company, the youthful vibrant quality of Martinelli's magnetic tenor voice has gained him world-wide renown.

A year ago Serge Koussevitzky was known only to our public by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music. His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems so high and so unqualified. On the occasion of his first visit to Hartford last season, he was the recipient of the greatest ovation ever accorded a conductor and the press and public agreed that here was the outstanding musical event of the decade.

Owing to the large capacity of the Capitol theater, [illegible] is possible to show these great attractions at a very reasonable scale of prices; in fact, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2[illegible] 1925

FRENCH TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY
Famous Conductor Coming to Hartford Next February.

Serge Kousevitzky, who will come to Hartford next February with the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the distinguished leader, in the Sedgwick concert course, is declared to be esteemed by the principal musicians of Europe above any conductors of his day.

Albert Roussel, famous French composer, wrote the following in tribute to Koussevitzky, in "Musique et Theatre" last June:

"M. Serge Koussevitzky is again in Paris, and the four symphony con which he has announced, will brin gether once more, in the Opera h his following of musicians and teurs. They are drawn as much the constantly renewed interest of programs as by the undeniable att tion which he holds on his audien Important musical events are certa not lacking in Paris. Among the priests of this religion which in country is increasing daily in devot M. Serge Koussevitzky is one of th whose ministrations are most punc ally attended, even though they t place only at rare intervals. The r son is doubtless in the accent of mod nity in these particular rites, and a in the personality of the ministrant a the order of ceremonies, which awak the curiosity and hold the attention.

"It will be remembered that M. Koussevitzky gave his first concerts in Paris in 1921. He was then already known as a marvelous virtuoso of the double-bass, since revealed as a conductor of the first order. It was known that he had formed in 1907 chestra with which he had given concerts, not only in Moscow and Petrograd, but also in outlying towns where symphony concerts had never been heard. It was thus that he had made all of Russia acquainted with the music of his younger countrymen, as well as the classical repertory, and likewise with such French composers as Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel. It was also known that he had founded in Moscow a music publishing house devoted to the publication of most striking and audacious works of contemporary Russian composers.

"He came to France, then, preceded by a reputation which he justified in his first contact with the French public. He also made an impression as one of the most remarkable leaders of men, one of the most magnificent animating spirits who has consecrated to the service of music his sympathetic faculties and his persuasive powers.

"In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said [illegible] Magyar leader—the plays on the orchestra,

"This man, vibrating, enthusiastic,

COURIER

OCT 22 1925

Boston Symphony Has 14 New Players

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphpony Orchestra this season including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Joan Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for twenty-three years oboe soloist with the Concerts Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris Conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is uarger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

[illegible]24 1925

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS EXCEEDS LAST Y
Advance Subscriptions Indicate Capacity Audiences for Series.

The advance subscription sale for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on five Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, is at this time 25 per cent. greater than last year, an indication that when the public subscription sale opens on Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's, these concerts will be oversubscribed by the season. A similar interest has been manifest in such cities as Boston and New York, where every seat for each series was taken in advance by subscription last spring. The excessive demand has made necessary the curtailment of New England cities, of which Providence remains one of the few to be visited.

Serge Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 24 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra h had to curtail the schedule of co certs in New England cities for t present season. Providence, howeve remains one of the few cities to visited and will have the usual seri of five Tuesday evening concerts Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Ja 19, Feb. 16 and March 16. The curtai ment has been made neceessary by t great demand for concerts in Bosto where the three series of 53 concer are sold out by the season to t last seat. The same condition exis in Cambridge and New York. Ther is every indication that in Providenc likewise, the series of five will oversubscribed. The remarkable su cess of the orchestra and its condu tor in Providence last season poin to this conclusion, which is confirme by the advance season sale. At t present date the renewal of seats 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the solois for the Providence concerts this se son according to the policy which adopted so successfully in New Yo and Boston the beginning of last se son. They will be chosen not only their merits as singers or virtuo but in the interest of special scor for which their genius is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 24 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A significant figure in the comin oncerts to be given by the Bosto ymphony orchestra in Syria Mosqu riday evening and Saturday afte oon, November 6 and 7, will be Ser Koussevitzky, its eminent Russian onductor, now begiining his second season in America. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this ountry last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the rchestra that bore his name. In America Serge Koussevitzky has made nother conquest, both sudden and omplete. The Friday evening program in this city will include Weber's verture to "Euryanthe." Tchaikovky's Sixth Symphony (Pathetic), bert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), and hree numbers from Berlioz's "Damnaon of Faust," Minuet of the "Will 'o the Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs," and "Rakoczky March.' The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner. "Ride of the Valkyries, "prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 24 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO DIRECT ORCHESTRA
Russian Conductor Will Appear With Boston Symphony Here Twice.

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian conductor, now beginning his second season in America.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris and previously in Russia, where he had traveled with the orchestra that bore his nome.

The Friday night program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

OCT 24 1925

One of the numbers which the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will offer for its Buffalo concert in Elmwood Music hall on the evening of November 4th, is in the nature of a novelty, although it was played in this country more than twelve years ago. This is Kikimora by Anatole Liadov, Russian composer. Mr. Liadov was associated with Balakirev and Liapounov in making researches for the Imperial Geographical society into the folklore of Russia. In this way he unearthed many ancient folk and fairy tales that lived, no one knows for how long, in remote Russian villages. Among them was Kikimora, of which the story is as follows: "Kikimora is a strange being who lives and grows up with the magician, Kater Bjam, beyond the starry hills. From dawn till dewy eve Kikimora is the joy of the old magician to whom she relates fairy tales from far-off lands. From dewy eve till morn Kikimora is rocked in a cradle of pure crystal. Seven years she stays with the magician Kater Bjam. Thin as a straw and black as a coal is Kikimora, with a head as small as a thimble, yet ever busy over her spinning wheel weaving the hempen thread and spinning the silken skein." Quoted from Minneapolis Symphony orchestra programme notes:

"From this fantastic trifle," continues the description, "Liadov has constructed a whimsically delicate piece in the form of a scherzo with slow introduction. The orchestration contains no parts for trombones or tuba, but the celesta and xylophone have prominent parts."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

1258

OCT 1 8 1925

Eminent Soloists for Boston Symphony Concerts

In the choice of soloists for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music this season, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will adopt the policy which has been so successful in Boston, selecting soloists not only for their ability as virtuosi, but in the interests of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programs will maintain their symphonic integrity, and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programs and soloists will be announced before each concert.

All seats for the Boston Symhhony concerts in Manhattan, Boston ar Cambridge have been sold for the se son, a situation unprecedented, in tl history of the orchestra. The succe of both orchestra and conductor Brooklyn last season indicates that tl Academy of Music series will also oversubscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 1 8 1925

In selecting soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music this season, Serge Koussewitsky will consider not only the artists' virtuosity and fame but also their special qualification for the performance of works selected. Both programs and soloists will be announced some time before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 1 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—MASSEY HALL.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. The New York and Boston, as well as other leading musical papers, have had columns of space devoted to the career of Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
ZITS

OCT 1 7 1925

HUB WELCOMES CONDUCTOR

Boston, Oct. 14.—Serge Koussevitzky was welcomed back this week at the opening of the 45th symphony season. On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds the Symphony Orchestra started a season with all seats sold f

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

OCT 1 7 1925

NUMBERS 112 MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Forum November 2

At the concert to be given in the Forum on Monday evening, November 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be composed of one hundred and twelve musicians, which will make it the largest orchestra that has ever visited Montreal. The coming of this organization is of special interest to the musical public, because with it will come for the first time, Serge Koussevitzky, who is considered today one of the outstanding conductors of the present day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 1 8 1925

estra Busy

itzky, brilliant
r of the Boston
tra, has
of that fam

PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

OCT 1 8 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, has arranged programs that will combine musical brilliance with variety, it was announced.

For the Friday evening concert the orchestra will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetic," and other orchestral numbers of equal brilliance. Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and the overture to "Tannhauser," are included in Saturday's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

OCT 1 9 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY
Koussevitzky Conducts Twice

Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on each of its two appearances in Washington this season, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene has become, in his first season at the head of this famous organization, one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music. In Europe likewise, Koussevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors.

Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of "guest" appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem.

The orchestra's first appearance will be as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greent's Artist's Course while its second appearance will be as one of the concerts in that manager's philharmonic series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2 1 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE

To Bring Many Notables Here for Season 1925-1926.

The subscription [illegible] for the Sedgwick concert course [illegible] 1925-1926 is now open and seats may be obtained in person or by mail at McCoy's; Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. All checks should be addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick. The Sedgwick course offers for this season two of the world's greatest musical attractions, both [illegible] which will be heard on Sunday afternoons at the Capitol theater. The first concert offers Giovanni Martinelli, the world renowned tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company on January 24, and the second concert on February 7 offers the ranking orchestra of the world—the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian conductor.

The return of Martinelli to the season's list of musical attractions is certain to find high favor with local music lovers. He is easily the most popular and colorful of all operatic tenors and a rara avis among them, for he is as famous for his song recitals as for his work on the stage of the world's greatest opera house. Whether in London, Milan, Havana, Mexico City, Buenos Aires or New York city, where he has appeared for the tenth successive seasons as one of the leading tenors of the Metropolitan Opera company, the youthful vibrant quality of Martinelli's magnetic tenor voice has gained him world-wide renown.

A year ago Serge Koussevitsky was known only to our public by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music. His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems so high and so unqualified. On the occasion of his first visit to Hartford last season, he was the recipient of the greatest ovation ever accorded a conductor and the press and public agreed that here was the outstanding musical event of the decade.

Owing to the large capacity of the Capitol theater it is possible to show these great attractions at a very reasonable scale of prices; in fact, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2 [illegible]

FRENCH TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZK

Famous Conductor Coming to Hartford Next February.

Serge Kousevitzky, who will come to Hartford next February with the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the distinguished leader, in the Sedgwick concert course, is declared to be esteemed by the principal musicians of Europe above any conductors of his day.

Albert Roussel, famous French composer, wrote the following in tribute to Koussevitzky, in "Musique et Theatre" last June:

"M. Serge Koussevitzky is again in Paris, and the four symphony con which he has announced, will brin gether once more, in the Opera h his following of musicians and teurs. They are drawn as much the constantly renewed interest of programs as by the undeniable att tion which he holds on his audier Important musical events are certa not lacking in Paris. Among the priests of this religion which in country is increasing daily in devot M. Serge Koussevitzky is one of th whose ministrations are most punc ally attended, even though they t place only at rare intervals. The r son is doubtless in the accent of mod nity in these particular rites, and a in the personality of the ministrant a the order of ceremonies, which awak the curiosity and hold the attention.

"It will be remembered that M. Koussevitzky gave his first concerts in Paris in 1921. He was then already known as a marvelous virtuoso of the double-bass, since revealed as a conductor of the first order. It was known that he had formed in 1907 [illegible]chestra with which he had given concerts, not only in Moscow and Petrograd, but also in outlying towns where symphony concerts had never been heard. It was thus that he had made all of Russia acquainted with the music of his younger countrymen, as well as the classical repertory, and likewise with such French composers as Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel. It was also known that he had founded in Moscow a music publishing house devoted to the publication of most striking and audacious works of contemporary Russian composers.

"He came to France, then, preceded by a reputation which he justified in his first contact with the French public. He also made an impression as one of the most remarkable leaders of men, one of the most magnificent animating spirits who has consecrated to the service of music his sympathetic faculties and his persuasive powers.

"In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said [illegible] Magyar leader—the plays on the orchestra,

"This man, vibrating, enthusiastic,

COURIER

OCT 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony Has 14 New Players

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphpony Orchestra this season including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Joan Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for twenty-three years oboe soloist with the Concerts Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris Conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is uarger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

[illegible] 4 1925

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS EXCEEDS LAST Y

Advance Subscriptions Indicate Capacity Audiences for Series.

The advance subscription sale for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on five Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, is at this time 25 per cent. greater than last year, an indication that when the public subscription sale opens on Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's, these concerts will be oversubscribed by the season. A similar interest has been manifest in such cities as Boston and New York, where every seat for each series was taken in advance by subscription last spring. The excessive demand has made necessary the curtailment of New England cities, of which Providence remains one of the few to be visited.

Serge Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 2 4 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra had to curtail the schedule of concerts in New England cities for present season. Providence, how remains one of the few cities to visited and will have the usual se of five Tuesday evening concerts Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, J 19, Feb. 16 and March 16. The curt ment has been made necessary by great demand for concerts in Bos where the three series of 53 conc are sold out by the season to last seat. The same condition ex in Cambridge and New York. Th is every indication that in Provide likewise, the series of five will oversubscribed. The remarkable s cess of the orchestra and its cond tor in Providence last season poi to this conclusion, which is confirm by the advance season sale. At present date the renewal of seats 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the solois for the Providence concerts this s son according to the policy which adopted so successfully in New Yo and Boston the beginning of last s son. They will be chosen not only their merits as singers or virtuo but in the interest of special sco for which their genius is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 2 4 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its eminent Russian conductor, now begiining his second season in America. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. In America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Friday evening program in this city will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony (Pathetic), bert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," Minuet of the "Will 'o the Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs," and "Rakoczky March." The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries," "prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 2 4 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO DIRECT ORCHESTRA

Russian Conductor Will Appear With Boston Symphony Here Twice.

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian conductor, now beginning his second season in America.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris and previously in Russia, where he had traveled with the orchestra that bore his nome.

The Friday night program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

OCT 2 4 1925

One of the numbers which the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will offer for its Buffalo concert in Elmwood Music hall on the evening of November [illegible], is in the nature of a novelty, although it was played in this country more than twelve years ago. This is Kikimora by Anatole Liadov, Russian composer. Mr. Liadov was associated with Balakirev and Liapounov in making researches for the imperial Geographical society into the folklore of Russia. In this way he unearthed many ancient folk and fairy tales that lived, no one knows for how long, in remote Russian villages. Among them was Kikimora, of which the story is as follows: "Kikimora is a strange being who lives and grows up with the magician, Kater Bjam, beyond the starry hills. From dawn till dewy eve Kikimora is the joy of the old magician to whom she relates fairy tales from far-off lands. From dewy eve till morn Kikimora is rocked in a cradle of pure crystal. Seven years she stays with the magician Kater Bjam. Thin as a straw and black as a coal is Kikimora, with a head as small as a thimble, yet ever busy over her spinning wheel weaving the hempen thread and spinning the silken skein." Quoted from Minneapolis Symphony orchestra programme notes:

"From this fantastic trifle" continues the description, "Liadov has constructed a whimsically delicate piece in the form of a scherzo with slow introduction. The orchestration contains no parts for trombones or tuba, but the celesta and xylophone have prominent parts."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

1258

OCT 18 1925

Eminent Soloists for Boston Symphony Concerts

In the choice of soloists for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music this season, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will adopt the policy which has been so successful in Boston, selecting soloists not only for their ability as virtuosi, but in the interests of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programs will maintain their symphonic integrity, and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programs and soloists will be announced before each concert.

All seats for the Boston Symhhony's concerts in Manhattan, Boston and Cambridge have been sold for the season, a situation unprecedented, in the history of the orchestra. The success of both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that the Academy of Music series will also be oversubscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 18 1925

In selecting soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music this season, Serge Koussewitsky will consider not only the artists' virtuosity and fame but also their special qualification for the performance of works selected. Both programs and soloists will be announced some time before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—MASSEY HALL.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. The New York and Boston, as well as other leading musical papers, have had columns of space devoted to the career of Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
ZITS

OCT 17 1925

HUB WELCOMES CONDUCTOR

Boston, Oct. 14.—Serge Koussevitzky was welcomed back this week at the opening of the 45th symphony season. On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds the Symphony Orchestra started a season with

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

OCT 17 1925

NUMBERS 112 MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Forum November 2

At the concert to be given in the Forum on Monday evening, November 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be composed of one hundred and twelve musicians, which will make it the largest orchestra that has ever visited Montreal. The coming of this organization is of special interest to the musical public, because with it will come for the first time, Serge Koussevitzky, who is considered today one of the outstanding conductors of the present day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 18 1925

estra Busy

itzky, brilliant
r of the Boston
tra, has
of that famous
will be unable to

PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

OCT 18 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, has arranged programs that will combine musical brilliance with variety, it was announced.

For the Friday evening concert the orchestra will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetic," and other orchestral numbers of equal brilliance. Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and the overture to "Tannhauser," are included in Saturday's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
ASHINGTON, D. C.

CT 19 1925

TON SYMPHONY
ssevitzky Conducts Twice

oussevitzky, who will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra on of its two appearances in Washington this season, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene has become, in his first season at the head of this famous organization, one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music. In Europe likewise, Koussevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors.

Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of "guest" appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem.

The orchestra's first appearance will be as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greent's Artist's Course while its second appearance will be as one of the concerts in that manager's philharmonic series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 21 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE

To Bring Many Notables Here for Season 192[illegible]-1926.

The subscription [illegible] for the Sedgwick concert course, 1925-1926 is now open and seats may be obtained in person or by mail at McCoy's Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. All checks should be addressed to F[illegible]k A. Sedgwick. The Sedgwick course offers for this season two of the world's greatest musical attractions, both of which will be heard on Sunday afternoons at the Capitol theater. The first concert offers Giovanni Martinelli, the world renowned tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company on January 24, and the second concert on February 7 offers the ranking orchestra of the world—the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished Russian conductor.

The return of Martinelli to the season's list of musical attractions is certain to find high favor with local music lovers. He is easily the most popular and colorful of all operatic tenors and a rara avis among them, for he is as famous for his song recitals as for his work on the stage of the world's greatest opera house. Whether in London, Milan, Havana, Mexico City, Buenos Aires or New York city, where he has appeared for the tenth successive season as one of the leading tenors of the Metropolitan Opera company, the youthful vibrant quality of Martinelli's magnetic tenor voice has gained him world-wide renown.

A year ago Serge Koussevitsky was known only to our public by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music. His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems so high and so unqualified. On the occasion of his first visit to Hartford last season, he was the recipient of the greatest ovation ever accorded a conductor and the press and public agreed that here was the outstanding musical event of the decade.

Owing to the large capacity of the Capitol theater it is possible to show these great attractions at a very reasonable scale of prices; in fact, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2[illegible] 1925

FRENCH TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Famous Conductor Coming to Hartford Next February.

Serge Kousevitzky, who will come to Hartford next February with the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the distinguished leader, in the Sedgwick concert course, is declared to be esteemed by the principal musicians of Europe above any conductors of his day.

Albert Roussel, famous French composer, wrote the following in tribute to Koussevitzky, in "Musique et Theatre" last June:

"M. Serge Koussevitzky is again in Paris, and the four symphony concerts which he has announced, will bring together once more, in the Opera house, his following of musicians and amateurs. They are drawn as much by the constantly renewed interest of his programs as by the undeniable attraction which he holds on his audiences. Important musical events are certainly not lacking in Paris. Among the high priests of this religion which in our country is increasing daily in devotees, M. Serge Koussevitzky is one of those whose ministrations are most punctually attended, even though they take place only at rare intervals. The reason is doubtless in the accent of modernity in these particular rites, and also in the personality of the ministrant and the order of ceremonies, which awaken the curiosity and hold the attention.

"It will be remembered that M. Koussevitzky gave his first concerts in Paris in 1921. He was then already known as a marvelous virtuoso of the double-bass, since revealed as a conductor of the first order. It was known that he had formed in 1907 chestra with which he had given concerts, not only in Moscow and Petrograd, but also in outlying towns where symphony concerts had never been heard. It was thus that he had made all of Russia acquainted with the music of his younger countrymen, as well as the classical repertory, and likewise with such French composers as Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel. It was also known that he had founded in Moscow a music publishing house devoted to the publication of most striking and audacious works of contemporary Russian composers.

"He came to France, then, preceded by a reputation which he justified in his first contact with the French public. He also made an impression as one of the most remarkable leaders of men, one of the most magnificent animating spirits who has consecrated to the service of music his sympathetic faculties and his persuasive powers.

"In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said [illegible] Magyar leader—the plays on the orchestra,

"This man, vibrating, enthusiastic,

COURIER

OCT 22 1925

Boston Symphony Has 14 New Play

There are fourteen new pl with the Boston Symphpony Or tra this season including four leaders: Fernand Gillet, first Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for twenty-three years oboe soloist with the Concerts Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris Conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is uarger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

[illegible] 4 1925

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS EXCEEDS LAST Y

Advance Subscriptions Indicate Capacity Audiences for Series.

The advance subscription sale for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on five Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, is at this time 25 per cent. greater than last year, an indication that when the public subscription sale opens on Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's, these concerts will be oversubscribed by the season. A similar interest has been manifest in such cities as Boston and New York, where every seat for each series was taken in advance by subscription last spring. The excessive demand has made necessary the curtailment of New England cities, of which Providence remains one of the few to be visited.

Serge Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he adopted so successfully in New York and Boston the beginning of last season. They will be chosen not only for their merits as virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especially suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programmes embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music. Serge Koussevitzky opened his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9.

[illegible] ive will
[illegible]ribed. The remarkable success of the orchestra and its conductor in Providence last season poi to this conclusion, which is confirm by the advance season sale. At present date the renewal of seats 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the solois for the Providence concerts this se son according to the policy which adopted so successfully in New Yo and Boston the beginning of last s son. They will be chosen not only their merits as singers or virtuo but in the interest of special scor for which their genius is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 24 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its eminent Russian conductor, now begiining his second season in America. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. In America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Friday evening program in this city will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony (Pathetic), Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Minuet of the "Will 'o the Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs," and "Rakoczky March." The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries, "prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 24 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO DIRECT ORCHESTRA

Russian Conductor Will Appear With Boston Symphony Here Twice.

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian conductor, now beginning his second season in America.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris and previously in Russia, where he had traveled with the orchestra that bore his nome.

The Friday night program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony ("Pathetic"), Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will-o-the Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczky March. The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

---

spinning wheel weaving the hempen thread and spinning the silken skein." Quoted from Minneapolis Symphony orchestra programme notes:

"From this fantastic trifle" continues the description, "Liadov has constructed a whimsically delicate piece in the form of a scherzo with slow introduction. The orchestration contains no parts for trombones or tuba, but the celesta and xylophone have prominent parts."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

1258

OCT 1 8 1925

Eminent Soloists for Boston Symphony Concerts

In the choice of soloists for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music this season, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will adopt the policy which has been so successful in Boston, selecting soloists not only for their ability as virtuosi, but in the interests of special works for which their genius is particularly fitted. Thus the programs will maintain their symphonic integrity and be free to embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music. The programs and soloists will be announced before each concert.

All seats for the Boston Symhhony's concerts in Manhattan, Boston and Cambridge have been sold for the season, a situation unprecedented, in the history of the orchestra. The success of both orchestra and conductor in Brooklyn last season indicates that the Academy of Music series will also be oversubscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 18 1925

In selecting soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music this season, Serge Koussewitsky will consider not only the artists' virtuosity and fame but also their special qualification for the performance of works selected. Both programs and soloists will be announced some time before each concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 1 7 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—MASSEY HALL.

The first appearance here of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, adds great interest to the concert to be given in Massey Hall under the local management of Norman M. Withrow on Tuesday evening, Nov. 3. The New York and Boston, as well as other leading musical papers, have had columns of space devoted to the career of Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
ZITS

OCT 1 7 1925

HUB WELCOMES CONDUCTOR

Boston, Oct. 14.—Serge Koussevitzky was welcomed back this week at the opening of the 45th symphony season. On this threshold of his second year with the Hub's famous orchestra the distinguished Russian conductor finds the Symphony Orchestra started a season with

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

OCT 1 7 1925

NUMBERS 112 MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Forum November 2

At the concert to be given in the Forum on Monday evening, November 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be composed of one hundred and twelve musicians, which will make it the largest orchestra that has ever visited Montreal. The coming of this organization is of special interest to the musical public, because with it will come for the first time, Serge Koussevitzky, who is considered today one of the outstanding conductors of the pre-t day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 1 8 1925

estra Busy

itzky, brilliant
of the Boston
tra, has [redacted]
of that famous

PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

OCT 1 8 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, has arranged programs that will combine musical brilliance with variety, it was announced.

For the Friday evening concert the orchestra will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetic," and other orchestral numbers of equal brilliance. Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and the overture to "Tannhauser," are included in Saturday's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
ASHINGTON, D. C.

CT 1 9 1925

TON SYMPHONY

ssevitzky Conducts Twice

oussevitzky, who will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra on of its two appearances in Washington this season, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene has become, in his first season at the head of this famous organization, one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music. In Europe likewise, Koussevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors.

Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of "guest" appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem.

The orchestra's first appearance will be as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greent's Artist's Course while its second appearance will be as one of the concerts in that manager's philharmonic series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2 1 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE

To Bring Many Notables Here for Season 192[illegible] 1926.

The subscription [illegible] for the Sedgwick concert cours[illegible] 1925-1926 is now open and seats [illegible] be obtained in person or by mail [illegible] McCoy's Inc., No. 89 Asylum stree[illegible] All checks should be addressed to [illegible] A. Sedgwick. The Sedgwick cou[illegible] offers for this season two of the wo[illegible]'s greatest musical attractions, both [illegible] which will be heard on Sunday afte[illegible]noons at the Capitol theater. The [illegible] concert offers Giovanni Martin[illegible], the world renowned tenor of [illegible] Metropolitan Opera company on January 24, and the second concert on [illegible]ebruary 7 offers the ranking orche[illegible]a of the world—the famous Bosto[illegible] Symphony orchestra under the direc[illegible] of Serge Koussevitsky, the dist[illegible]guished Russian conductor.

The return [illegible] Martinelli to the season's list of [illegible]sical attractions is certain to find h[illegible] favor with local music lovers. He i[illegible] easily the most popular and colorful [illegible] all operatic tenors and a rara avis [illegible]ong them, for he is as famous for [illegible] song recitals as for his work on [illegible]e stage of the world's greatest ope[illegible] house. Whether in London, Mila[illegible], Havana, Mexico City, Buenos Aires [illegible] New York city, where he has appea[illegible]ed for the tenth successive season as one of the leading tenors of the [illegible]etropolitan Opera company, the you[illegible]ful vibrant quality of Martinelli's ma[illegible]etic tenor voice has gained him wor[illegible]-wide renown.

A year ago Serge Koussevitsky was known only to our public by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music. His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems so high and so unqualified. On the occasion of his first visit to Hartford last season, he was the recipient of the greatest ovation ever accorded a conductor and the press and public agreed that here was the outstanding musical event of the decade.

Owing to the large capacity of the Capitol theater [illegible] is possible to show these great attra[illegible]ions at a very reasonable scale of prices; in fact, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2

FRENCH TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZK

Famous Conductor Coming to Hartford Next February.

Serge Kousevitzky, who will come to Hartford next February with the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the distinguished leader, in the Sedgwick concert course, is declared to be esteemed by the principal musicians of Europe above any conductors of his day.

Albert Roussel, famous French composer, wrote the following in tribute to Koussevitzky, in "Musique et Theatre" last June:

"M. Serge Koussevitzky is again in Paris, and the four symphony con which he has announced, will brin gether once more, in the Opera h his following of musicians and teurs. They are drawn as much the constantly renewed interest of programs as by the undeniable att tion which he holds on his audien
Important musical events are certa not lacking in Paris. Among the priests of this religion which in country is increasing daily in devot
M. Serge Koussevitzky is one of th whose ministrations are most pun ally attended, even though they t place only at rare intervals. The son is doubtless in the accent of mod nity in these particular rites, and in the personality of the ministrant the order of ceremonies, which awal
the curiosity and hold the attention.

"It will be remembered that M. Koussevitzky gave his first concerts in Paris in 1921. He was then already known as a marvelous virtuoso of the double-bass, since revealed as a conductor of the first order. It was known that he had formed in 1907 which he had given concerts, not only in Moscow and Petrograd, but also in outlying towns where symphony concerts had never been heard. It was thus that he had made all of Russia acquainted with the music of his younger countrymen, as well as the classical repertory, and likewise with such French composers as Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel. It was also known that he had founded in Moscow a music publishing house devoted to the publication of most striking and audacious works of contemporary Russian composers.

"He came to France, then, preceded by a reputation which he justified in his first contact with the French public. He also made an impression as one of the most remarkable leaders of men, one of the most magnificent animating spirits who has consecrated to the service of music his sympathetic faculties and his persuasive powers.

"In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said [illegible] Magyar leader—the plays on the orchestra,

"This man, vibrating, enthusiastic,

COURIER

OCT 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony Has 14 New Play

There are fourteen new pl with the Boston Symphpony Or tra this season including four leaders: Fernand Gillet, first
Edmond Allegra, first clarinet;
Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for twenty-three years oboe soloist with the Concerts Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris Conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is uarger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

BULLETIN

24 1925

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS EXCEEDS LAST Y

Advance Subscriptions Indicate Capacity Audiences for Series.

The advance subscription sale for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on five Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, is at this time 25 per cent. greater than last year, an indication that when the public subscription sale opens on Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's, these concerts will be oversubscribed by the season. A similar interest has been manifest in such cities as Boston and New York, where every seat for each series was taken in advance by subscription last spring. The excessive demand has made necessary the curtailment of New England cities, of which Providence remains one of the few to be visited.

Serge Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 2 4 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had to curtail the schedule of concerts in New England cities for the present season. Providence, however, remains one of the few cities to be visited and will have the usual series of five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16. The curtailment has been made neceessary by the great demand for concerts in Boston where the three series of 53 concerts are sold out by the season to the last seat. The same condition exists in Cambridge and New York. There is every indication that in Providence likewise, the series of five will oversubscribed. The remarkable su cess of the orchestra and its condu tor in Providence last season poi to this conclusion, which is confirm by the advance season sale. At present date the renewal of seats
25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the solois for the Providence concerts this se son according to the policy which adopted so successfully in New Yo and Boston the beginning of last se son. They will be chosen not only their merits as singers or virtuo but in the interest of special scor for which their genius is especial suited. This gives the conductor fr dom to make his five programmes brace the vast and rich reperto orchestral music.

Serge Koussevitzky opene
ond season in America in Oct. 9. He may well be most striking figure amo uctors of the day in a lmost all of the "g ow to be heard.

The public subsc
pen Monday, Nov

the strik ... Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. In America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Friday evening program in this city will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony (Pathetic), Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Minuet of the "Will 'o the Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs," and "Rakoczky March.' The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla." Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner. "Ride of the Valkyries. "prelude to "Lohengrin." and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 2 4 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO DIRECT ORCHESTRA

Russian Conductor Will Appear With Boston Symphony Here Twice.

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian conductor, now beginning his second season in America.

Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris and previously in Russia, where he had traveled with the orchestra that bore his nome.

The Friday night program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony ("Pathetic"), Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" —Minuet of the Will-o-the Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczky March. The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overre to "Russlan and Ludmilla," humann's Symphony No. 4 and ree selections from the music amas of Wagner—Ride of the alkyries, Prelude to "Lohengiin" d the Overture to "Tannhauser."

---

wheel weaving hempen thread and spinning the n skein." Quoted from Minne-
's Symphony orchestra pro-me notes:
om this fantastic trifle." cons the description. "Liadov has ructed a whimsically delicate in the form of a scherzo with introduction. The orchestraontains no parts for trombones a, but the celesta and xylohave prominent parts."

PITTSBURGH, PA.

GAZETTE TIMES

OCT18 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, has arranged programs that will combine musical brilliance with variety, it was announced.

For the Friday evening concert the orchestra will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetic," and other orchestral numbers of equal brilliance. Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," and the overture to "Tannhauser," are included in Saturday's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES

WASHINGTON, D. C.

OCT19 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Conducts Twice

Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on each of its two appearances in Washington this season, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene has become, in his first season at the head of this famous organization, one of the most conspicuous figures in our world of music. In Europe likewise, Koussevitzky remains the dominating personality among conductors.

Last summer his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and his series of "guest" appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. These concerts culminated in the decoration of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor" bestowed by the French government. To celebrate this event, the principal composers of France grouped together and participated in a concert of tribute for which they wrote special music. Probably no conductor has ever received so striking a mark of esteem.

The orchestra's first appearance will be as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greent's Artist's Course while its second appearance will be as one of the concerts in that manager's philharmonic series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.

TIMES

OCT21 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE

To Bring Many Notables Here for Season 192[illegible]-1926.

The subscription [illegible] for the Sedgwick concert cours[illegible] 1925-1926 is now open and seats [illegible] be obtained in person or by mail [illegible] McCoy's Inc., No. 89 Asylum stree[illegible] All checks should be addressed to F[illegible]k A. Sedgwick. The Sedgwick cou[illegible] offers for this season two of the wo[illegible]'s greatest musical attractions, both [illegible] which will be heard on Sunday aft[illegible]noons at the Capitol theater. The f[illegible] concert offers Giovanni Martin[illegible]i, the world renowned tenor of [illegible] Metropolitan Opera company on Ja[illegible]uary 24, and the second concert on [illegible]ebruary 7 offers the ranking orche[illegible]a of the world—the famous Bosto[illegible] Symphony orchestra under the direc[illegible]n of Serge Koussevitsky, the dist[illegible]guished Russian conductor.

The return [illegible] Martinelli to the season's list of [illegible]sical attractions is certain to find h[illegible]h favor with local music lovers. He i[illegible] easily the most popular and colorful [illegible] all operatic tenors and a rara avis [illegible]mong them, for he is as famous for [illegible]s song recitals as for his work on [illegible]e stage of the world's greatest ope[illegible] house. Whether in London, Mila[illegible] Havana, Mexico City, Buenos Aires [illegible] New York city, where he has appea[illegible]ed for the tenth successive season [illegible]as one of the leading tenors of the [illegible]etropolitan Opera company, the you[illegible]ful vibrant quality of Martinelli's ma[illegible]etic tenor voice has gained him wor[illegible]-wide renown.

A year ago Serge Koussevitsky was known only to our public by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music. His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems so high and so unqualified. On the occasion of his first visit to Hartford last season, he was the recipient of the greatest ovation ever accorded a conductor and the press and public agreed that here was the outstanding musical event of the decade.

Owing to the [illegible]arge capacity of the Capitol theater [illegible] is possible to show these great attra[illegible]tions at a very reasonable scale of [illegible]prices; in fact, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.

TIMES

OCT2 [illegible]

FRENCH TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZK

Famous Conductor Coming to Hartford Next February.

Serge Kousevitzky, who will come to Hartford next February with the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is the distinguished leader, in the Sedgwick concert course, is declared to be esteemed by the principal musicians of Europe above any conductors of his day.

Albert Roussel, famous French composer, wrote the following in tribute to Koussevitzky, in "Musique et Theatre" last June:

"M. Serge Koussevitzky is again in Paris, and the four symphony concerts which he has announced, will bring together once more, in the Opera house, his following of musicians and amateurs. They are drawn as much by the constantly renewed interest of his programs as by the undeniable attraction which he holds on his audiences. Important musical events are certainly not lacking in Paris. Among the high priests of this religion which in our country is increasing daily in devotees, M. Serge Koussevitzky is one of those whose ministrations are most punctually attended, even though they take place only at rare intervals. The reason is doubtless in the accent of modernity in these particular rites, and also in the personality of the ministrant and the order of ceremonies, which awaken the curiosity and hold the attention.

"It will be remembered that M. Koussevitzky gave his first concerts in Paris in 1921. He was then already known as a marvelous virtuoso of the double-bass, since revealed as a conductor of the first order. It was known that he had formed in 1907 [illegible] chestra with which he had given concerts, not only in Moscow and Petrograd, but also in outlying towns where symphony concerts had never been heard. It was thus that he had made all of Russia acquainted with the music of his younger countrymen, as well as the classical repertory, and likewise with such French composers as Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel. It was also known that he had founded in Moscow a music publishing house devoted to the publication of most striking and audacious works of contemporary Russian composers.

"He came to France, then, preceded by a reputation which he justified in his first contact with the French public. He also made an impression as one of the most remarkable leaders of men, one of the most magnificent animating spirits who has consecrated to the service of music his sympathetic faculties and his persuasive powers.

"In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been sa[illegible] [illegible] Magyar leader—the plays on the orchestra,

"This man, vibrating, enthusiastic, whose interpretations reflect a combative ardor in the cause of music and a profound love of it, this subtle magician whose skill leaves no secret of his art untouched, is at rehearsal the most smiling and courteous of symphonic conductors; is there need of saying that he has won, quite naturally and without effort, the sympathy and devotion of the artists whom he directs?

"Consulting the programs of the concerts which M. Koussevitzky has given in Paris since 1921, we find there besides the overtures and classical symphonies, many works new or little known, for having revealed whose beauties, to us, he deserves our gratitude. His initiative has brought to us the first hearings of "Chant de joie" of Honegger, and of the celebrated "Pacific 231." He also gave us the first performance of "Tableaux d'une Exposition" of Moussorgsky, orchestrated by Ravel; the Classic Symphony of Prokofieff, his First Concerto for Vi and his Second Concerto for Piano; "Poeme de l'extase" of Scriabin; "Liturgie de Saint-Jean-Chrysosto" of Gretchaninoff; "l'Octuor" of Stravinsky, and his Concerto for Pian; the "Ouverture pour un ballet de l'avenir" of Delage; and the "Temp ballo" of Roland Manuel. I could mention other French works more or less known in which he has divined the least intentions of the composers with in he he

"
a-
;
v-di nss
he h

a justness of stress, a depth of expression, and a vehemence which quite transfigured them.

BULLETIN

2 4 1925

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS EXCEEDS LAST Y

Advance Subscriptions Indicate Capacity Audiences for Series.

The advance subscription sale for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on five Tuesday evenings, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, is at this time 25 per cent. greater than last year, an indication that when the public subscription sale opens on Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's, these concerts will be oversubscribed by the season. A similar interest has been manifest in such cities as Boston and New York, where every seat for each series was taken in advance by subscription last spring. The excessive demand has made necessary the curtailment of New England cities, of which Providence remains one of the few to be visited.

Serge Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he adopted so successfully in New York and Boston the beginning of last season. They will be chosen not only for their merits as virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especiall suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programmes embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music. Serge Koussevitzky opene his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9.

---

ive will b[illegible] subscribed. The remarkable suc cess of the orchestra and its condu tor in Providence last season poin to this conclusion, which is confirme by the advance season sale. At t present date the renewal of seats 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the solois for the Providence concerts this se son according to the policy which adopted so successfully in New Yo and Boston the beginning of last se son. They will be chosen not only f their merits as singers or virtuo but in the interest of special scor for which their genius is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SUN

PITTSBURG, PA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURG, PA.

Chronicle Telegraph

OCT24 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TO DIRECT ORCHESTR

Russian Conductor Will Appea With Boston Symphony Here Twice.

A significant figure in the comin concerts to be given by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra in Syri Mosque, Friday night and Saturda afternoon, November 6 and 7, will b Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian co ductor, now beginning his seco season in America.

Many reports of the striking ab ities of Serge Koussevitzky preced his arrival in this country l autumn. He was called the domin ing figure in the concerts of Lond the concerts and opera of Paris a previously in Russia, where he h traveled with the orchestra that b his nome.

The Friday night program w include Weber's Overture to "Eur anthe," Tchaikovsky's sixth sym

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.

POST

OCT24 1925

One of the numbers which the oston Symphony orchestra under erge Koussevitzky will offer for its uffalo concert in Elmwood Music ll on the evening of November , is in the nature of a novelty hough it was played in this coun more than twelve years ago. s is Kikimora by Anatole Liadov, sian composer. Mr. Liadov was associated with Balakirev and Liapounov in making researches for the Imperial Geographical society into the folklore of Russia. In thi way he unearthed many ancient fol and fairy tales that lived, no one knows for how long, in remote Russian villages. Among them was Ki mora, of which the story is as f lows: "Kikimora is a strange bei who lives and grows up with t magician, Kater Bjam, beyond t starry hills. From dawn till de eve Kikimora is the joy of the magician to whom she relates fa tales from far-off lands. From de e till morn Kikimora is rocked a cradle of pure crystal. Seven ye she stays with the magician Ka Bjam. Thin as a straw and black a coal is Kikimora, with a head small as a thimble, yet ever b over her spinning wheel wea

---

COURIER

OCT22 1925

Boston Symphony Has 14 New Players

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphpony Orchestra this season including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Joan Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for twenty-three years oboe soloist with the Concerts Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle Orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris Conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne Orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French Army Band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is uarger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

---

season in America. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. In America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Friday evening program in this city will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovky's Sixth Symphony (Pathetic), bert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), and hree numbers from Berlioz's "Damnaon of Faust." Minuet of the "Will 'o the Wisps," "Ballet of the Sylphs," and "Rakoczky March.' The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla." Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner. "Ride of the Valkyries. "prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 24 1925

WITH an Ibert number, which is being introduced to America this season and with the Brahms Symphony No. 1, as the event of the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the first in the series of orchestra concerts of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Following is the complete program in which Sergei Koussevitzky, the noted Russian conductor, will lead his men:

Overture to Euryanthe............Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63..Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun......
......................Debussy
Escales (Port of Call)..............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68......
......................Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony." Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER

OCT 24 1925

Boston Symphony

With an Ibert number, which is being introduced to America this season and with the Brahms Symphony No. 1 as the event of the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Elmwood Music hall on Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock. Thus will be the first in the series of orchestra concerts of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

With Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor wielding the baton, the 107 men of the Boston Symphony will play an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 24 1925

* * *

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the present season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmund Allegra, first clarinet; Lean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. The personnel of the orchestra is larger this season than ever before, there being eighteen violins, sixteen second violins, thirteen violas and ten basses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 25 1925

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last Summer in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French Government with the emblem of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the bassoon and double bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpenti for four harps with percussion, an Paul Le Flem, for double bass a poser, Other composers who were ry ma- did not contribute music ra which Schmitt, Aubert, Gretchani of per- erre, Boulanger, Samir America eorges, Laparra and Bo

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

OCT 24 1925

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first of the series of concerts for the season of 1925-26 at Sanders theatre by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given on Thursday evening of last week. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program included these numbers: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Escales," ("Ports of Call"), Ibert; Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss; Symphony No. 1, Brahms.

There was a nearly capacity audience present which enthusiastically welcomed Mr. Koussevitsky on his appearance. In the orchestra, many old friends are missed, including Mr. Longy, Mr. Lenom, Mr. Schroeder and others. The new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, is said to be a nephew of the composer of the popular "Loin de Bal."

The program presented one novelty, the "Escales" of Jacques Ibert, a young French composer, who has written a number of works in various forms, unfamiliar to American audiences. The "Escales," first heard in Paris about two years ago, is a set of three pieces, each one of which is supposed to picture musically the impressions received at three "ports of call," where a vessel is supposed to call for the purpose of getting supplies. The ports of call were Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia.

On a first hearing, the best impressions were received by the second number. Tunis must have been a good place to visit, for the music suggests much of Oriental life with strong rhythms, an especially animated middle section, with much of the ultra modern French effects in the instrumentation. The Valencia scene is more or less Spanish in its general character, but Ibert's Spanish picture is commonplace beside that of Chabrier in his Rhapsody. The three numbers were brilliantly played and well received.

Mr. Koussevitsky gave one of the best interpretations of Strauss' rather gruesome work that one can well remember. The great and gradual climatic period of the transfiguration was brought out more logically than most conductors do it. The work, however, is not Strauss at his greatest, though there are many impressive pages.

Brahms is still in evidence and the first symphony received the greatest applause of the evening. Some think it is ageing somewhat, but it appears good for a few seasons yet. And as they say "and then some." The ever popular "Marriage of Figaro" overture made a most acceptable opening number.

The second concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, November 2.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1925

* * *

THERE are 14 new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for 23 years oboe soloist with the Concert Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French army band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is larger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

* * *

CHICAGO'S Civic Opera company will open a season of 12 weeks November 3 Giorgio Polacco,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 25 1925

Serge Koussewitsky, who was introduced to Brooklyn last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was recently decorated by the French Government with the emblem of "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The entire group of modern French composers gathered at the time to honor Mr. K sky, and a special progr

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
~~POST~~
Express

OCT 25 1925

Brahms's symphony No. 1, opus 68, in C minor, has been chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for performance by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, in Elmwood Music hall. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete programme for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe..........Weber
Kikimora (folk fairy tale), op. 63..
..............................Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun
..........................Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call)............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68
..............................Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known perhaps, as by his first symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the ninth symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a tenth symphony." Many have disputed this characterization of the Brahms symphony, and with reason, for the genius of the two masters was so different. But certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the French horn solo in the last movement. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be. The Ibert score is introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9th. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions; Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia. For this concert mail orders are now being received at the Foundation office and the public sale will open on Monday, November 2d. The Foundation is also filling orders for the entire orchestra series, including concerts by the Detroit, Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 25 1925

Boston Symphony Again Foremost

The halcyon days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Karl Muck, when that organization was rated as the premier orchestra of the world, are rapidly returning under the regime of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, according to word from Boston and New York.

Again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a popularity in the two cities mentioned that exceeds all facilities available. In Boston and New York this autumn, reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being purchased by music enthusiasts at a premium from the fortunate holders and all 1925-26 concerts of the orchestra, both in Boston and New York were sold out late last spring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, will visit Washington twice this season, first as an attraction of Mrs. WilsonA-Greene's Artists' Course and later in that manager's Philharmonic Course. Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course include Dusolina Giannini, mezzo soprano; Rachmaninoff, famous Russian pianist and composer; Mme. Galli-Curci, world's greatest coloratura, and Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 25 1925

MUSIC

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahms symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being intro-Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy tale, Op.
63 ....Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." ....Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call) ....Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op
68 ....Brahms.

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of forty-seven years he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of good and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than duced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music "Three Mediterranean Impressions—Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta Valencia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor.

The Friday evening program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony ("Pathetic"), Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will-o-the Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs, and Rakoczky March. The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1925

* * *

Because of the demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its suburbs and in New York, the organization has been forced to curtail visits to other New England and Eastern States cities. In addition to the five concerts in Providence, on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16, New England appearances of the orchestra outside of Greater Boston will probably be limited to such college towns as Wellesley, Northampton, Holyoke and New Haven. Patronage of the concerts in Providence warrants their continuation, according to the management, which announces that the number of seats re-engaged by subscription is already 25 per cent. greater than in previous seasons. The public sale of season tickets opens Monday, Nov. 2.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 25 1925

Finale .... Wolstenholme
Mr. Hardy.

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahm symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music Hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora to "Folk Fairy Tale", Op.
63 .... Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
.... Debussy
Escales ("Ports of Call") .... Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68...
.... Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it, at the age of 47, he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Many have disputed this characterization of the greatest Brahms symphony, and with good reason for the genius of the two masters was so different. Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines the most uplifting in its surging and exultant Finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion

The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming marks a movement towards better music in the churches.

"Music nowadays, like everything else has become distorted," recently wrote Ernest Bloch, internationally famous composer and director of Cleveland's Institute of Music. "It has become an industry, a mere business affair where the ultimate aim has too often been forgotten. The existence of an undertaking like the Westminster Choir is of more importance to the spiritual and cultural development of America than all the talks and sterile plans of organization that are made under the pretext of education. If there were twenty associations led with the same organization and thorough honesty in this country, I would feel perfectly safe as to the future of art in the United States."

The Buffalo Musical Foundation is managing the business details of the concert and is now filling mail orders from towns in Western New York as well as Buffalo folk who are appreciative of the fine old chorales and the music of Palestrina, Antonio Lotti, Bachus, as well as later composers.

The first show
electrically driven attractively desig
peal to every wom
sign, without sacr
cality of the e machine has been

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 28 1925

The outstanding novelty on this week's program of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," music written for a short opera and then recast for a ballet pantomime. Other numbers on the program will be the overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Schumann; "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" from the opera "Kitej," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Persian Dances" from the opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 24 1925

WITH an Ibert number, which is being introduced to America this season and with the Brahms Symphony No. 1, as the event of the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the first in the series of orchestra concerts of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Following is the complete program in which Sergei Koussevitzky, the noted Russian conductor, will lead his men:

Overture to Euryanthe............Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63..Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun...... ....Debussy
Escales (Port of Call)..............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68...... ....Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led ~~von~~ Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony." Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions—Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia.

With Serge ... great Russian conductor wielding ... baton, the 107 men of the Boston Symphony will play an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 24 1925

* * *

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the present season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmund Allegra, first clarinet; Lean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. The personnel of the orchestra is larger this season than ever before, there being eighteen violins, sixteen second violins, thirteen violas and ten basses.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 25 1925

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last Summer in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French Government with the emblem of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the bassoon and double bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpenti[illegible] for four harps with percussion, an[illegible] Paul Le Flem, for double bass a[illegible]oser.

Other composers who were [illegible]y ma[illegible] did not contribute music [illegible] a which [illegible] of per[illegible] Schmitt, Aubert, Gretchani[illegible] America [illegible]erre, Boulanger, Sami[illegible] [illegible]eorges, Laparra and Bo[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

OCT 24 1925

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first of the series of concerts for the season of 1925-26 at Sanders theatre by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given on Thursday evening of last week. Serge Koussevitsky conducted. The program included these numbers: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Escales," ("Ports of Call"), Ibert; Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss; Symphony No. 1, Brahms.

There was a nearly capacity audience present which enthusiastically welcomed Mr. Koussevitsky on his appearance. In the orchestra, many old friends are missed, including Mr. Longy, Mr. Lenom, Mr. Schroeder and others. The new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, is said to be a nephew of the composer of the popular "Loin de Bal."

The program presented one novelty, the "Escales" of Jacques Ibert, a young French composer, who has written a number of works in various forms, unfamiliar to American audiences. The "Escales," first heard in Paris about two years ago, is a set of three pieces, each one of which is supposed to picture musically the impressions received at three "ports of call," where a vessel is supposed to call for the purpose of getting supplies. The ports of call were Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia.

On a first hearing, the best impressions were received by the second number. Tunis must have been a good place to visit, for the music suggests much of Oriental life with strong rhythms, an especially animated middle section, with much of the ultra modern French effects in the instrumentation. The Valencia scene is more or less Spanish in its general character, but Ibert's Spanish picture is commonplace beside that of Chabrier in his Rhapsody. The three numbers were brilliantly played and well received.

Mr. Koussevitsky gave one of the best interpretations of Strauss' rather gruesome work that one can well remember. The great and gradual climatic period at the transfiguration was brought out more logically than most conductors do it. The work, however, is not Strauss at his greatest, though there are many impressive pages.

Brahms is still in evidence and the first symphony received the greatest applause of the evening. Some think it is ageing somewhat, but it appears good for a few seasons yet. And as they say "and then some." The ever popular "Marriage of Figaro" overture made a most acceptable opening number.

The second concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, November 2.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1925

* * *

THERE are 14 new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for 23 years oboe soloist with the Concert Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French army band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is larger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

* * *

CHICAGO'S Civic Opera company will open a season of 12 weeks November 3 [illegible] Giorgio Polacco, mus[illegible] midst of re[illegible] [illegible]he[illegible]s will

---

THIS CLIPPING F
BROOKLYN, N
EAGLE

OCT 25 1925

Serge Koussewitsky, who was introduced to Brooklyn last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was recently decorated by the French Government with the emblem of "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The entire group of modern French composers gathered at the time to honor Mr. Ko[illegible]sky, and a special progra[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
~~POST~~
Express

OCT 25 1925

Brahms's symphony No. 1, opus 68, in C minor, has been chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for performance by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, in Elmwood Music hall. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete programme for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe..........Weber
Kikimora (folk fairy tale), op. 63.. ....Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun ....Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call)............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68 ....Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known perhaps, as by his first symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the ninth symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a tenth symphony." Many have disputed this characterization of the Brahms symphony, and with reason, for the genius of the two masters was so different. But certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the French horn solo in the last movement. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be. The Ibert score is introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9th. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions; Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia. For this concert mail orders are now being received at the Foundation office and the public sale will open on Monday, November 2d. The Foundation is also filling orders for the entire orchestra series, including concerts by the Detroit, Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 25 1925

Boston Symphony Again Foremost

The halcyon days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Karl Muck, when that organization was rated as the premier orchestra of the world, are rapidly returning under the regime of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, according to word from Boston and New York.

Again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a popularity in the two cities mentioned that exceeds all facilities available. In Boston and New York this autumn, reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being purchased by music enthusiasts at a premium from the fortunate holders and all 1925-26 concerts of the orchestra, both in Boston and New York were sold out late last spring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, will visit Washington twice this season, first as an attraction of Mrs. WilsonA-Greene's Artists' Course and later in that manager's Philharmonic Course. Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course include Dusolina Giannini, mezzo soprano; Rachmaninoff, famous Russian pianist and composer; Mme. Galli-Curci, world's greatest coloratura, and Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 25 1925

MUSIC

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahms symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being intro-Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy tale, Op. 63 ....Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." ....Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call) ....Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op 68 ....Brahms.

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of forty-seven years he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of good and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than duced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music "Three Mediterranean Impressions—Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor.

The Friday evening program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony ("Pathetic"), Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will-o-the Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs, and Rakoczky March. The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1925

* * *

Because of the demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its suburbs and in New York, the organization has been forced to curtail visits to other New England and Eastern States cities. In addition to the five concerts in Providence, on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16, New England appearances of the orchestra outside of Greater Boston will probably be limited to such college towns as Wellesley, Northampton, Holyoke and New Haven. Patronage of the concerts in Providence warrants their continuation, according to the management, which announces that the number of seats re-engaged by subscription is already 25 per cent. greater than in previous seasons. The public sale of season tickets opens Monday, Nov. 2.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 25 1925

Finale .... [illegible]
Mr. Hardy.

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahm symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music Hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora to "Folk Fairy Tale", Op. 63 .... Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy
Escales ("Ports of Call") .... Iber[illegible]
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68... .... Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it, at the age of 47, he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Many have disputed this characterization of the greatest Brahms symphony, and with good reason for the genius of the two masters was so different. Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most drama[illegible] lines and [illegible]rous [illegible]tail. are the [illegible]ous [illegible]ve-

This setting in tones of t[illegible] poem in its way is more p[illegible] is not to make money incidenta[illegible] marks a movement towards better music in the churches.

"Music nowadays, like everything else has become distorted," recently wrote Ernest Bloch, internationally famous composer and director of Cleveland's Institute of Music. "It has become an industry, a mere business affair where the ultimate aim has too often been forgotten. The existence of an undertaking like the Westminster Choir is of more importance to the spiritual and cultural development of America than all the talks and sterile plans of organization that are made under the pretext of education. If there were twenty associations led with the same organization and thorough honesty in this country, I would feel perfectly safe as to the future of art in the United States."

The Buffalo Musical Foundation is managing the business details of the concert and is now filling mail orders from towns in Western New York as well as Buffalo folk who are appreciative of the fine old chorales and the music of Palestrina, Antonio Lotti, Bachus, as well as later composers.

The first show
electrically driver attractively desig
peal to every wom
sign, without sacr
cality of the e
machine has been

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 28 1925

The outstanding novelty on [illegible] week's program of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," music written for a short opera and then recast for a ballet pantomime. Other numbers on the program will be the overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Schumann; "The Battle at Kerjenetz" from the opera "Kitej," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Persian Dances" from the opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 24 1925

WITH an Ibert number, which is being introduced to America this season and with the Brahms Symphony No. 1, as the event of the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the first in the series of orchestra concerts of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Following is the complete program in which Sergei Koussevitzky, the noted Russian conductor, will lead his men:

Overture to Euryanthe............Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63..Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun.....
.......................Debussy
Escales (Port of Call)............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68......
.......................Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony." Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions—Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia.

With Serge ... great Russian conductor wielding ... baton, the 107 men of the Boston Symphony will play an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 24 1925

* * *

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the present season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmund Allegra, first clarinet; Lean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. The personnel of the orchestra is larger this season than ever before, there being eighteen violins, sixteen second violins, thirteen violas and ten basses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 25 1925

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last Summer in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French Government with the emblem of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the bassoon and double bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpenti... for four harps with percussion, an... Paul Le Flem, for double bass a... oser,

Other composers who were ...ry ma- ...did not contribute music ... of per- ... Schmitt, Aubert, Gretchani... America ...erre, Boulanger, Samir... ...eorges, Laparra and Bo...

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

OCT 24 1925

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first of the series of concerts for the season of 1925-26 at Sanders theatre by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given on Thursday evening of last week. Serge Koussevitsky conducted. The program included these numbers: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Escales," ("Ports of Call"), Ibert; Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss; Symphony No. 1, Brahms.

There was a nearly capacity audience present which enthusiastically welcomed Mr. Koussevitsky on his appearance. In the orchestra, many old friends are missed, including Mr. Longy, Mr. Lenom, Mr. Schroeder and others. The new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, is said to be a nephew of the composer of the popular "Loin de Bal."

The program presented one novelty, the "Escales" of Jacques Ibert, a young French composer, who has written a number of works in various forms, unfamiliar to American audiences. The "Escales," first heard in Paris about two years ago, is a set of three pieces, each one of which is supposed to picture musically the impressions received at three "ports of call," where a vessel is supposed to call for the purpose of getting supplies. The ports of call were Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia.

On a first hearing, the best impressions were received by the second number. Tunis must have been a good place to visit, for the music suggests much of Oriental life with strong rhythms, an especially animated middle section, with much of the ultra modern French effects in the instrumentation. The Valencia scene is more or less Spanish in its general character, but Ibert's Spanish picture is commonplace beside that of Chabrier in his Rhapsody. The three numbers were brilliantly played and well received.

Mr. Koussevitsky gave one of the best interpretations of Strauss' rather gruesome work that one can well remember. The great and gradual climatic period at the transfiguration was brought out more logically than most conductors do it. The work, however, is not Strauss at his greatest, though there are many impressive pages.

Brahms is still in evidence and the first symphony received the greatest applause of the evening. Some think it is ageing somewhat, but it appears good for a few seasons yet. And as they say "and then some." The ever popular "Marriage of Figaro" overture made a most acceptable opening number.

The second concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, November 12.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1925

* * *

THERE are 14 new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for 23 years oboe soloist with the Concert Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French army band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is larger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

* * *

CHICAGO'S Civic Opera company will open a season of 12 weeks November 3 ... Giorgio Polacco, mus... midst of re- she... will

---

THIS CLIPPING F
BROOKLYN, N
EAGLE

OCT 25 1925

Serge Koussewitsky, who was introduced to Brooklyn last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was recently decorated by the French Government with the emblem of "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The entire group of modern French composers gathered at the time to honor Mr. K... sky, and a special progra...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
~~POST~~ Express

OCT 25 1925

Brahms's symphony No. 1, opus 68, in C minor, has been chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for performance by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, in Elmwood Music hall. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete programme for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe..........Weber
Kikimora (folk fairy tale), op. 63..
.......................Liadov
